Whatever errors James the Second might have fallen into, or whatever crimes towards the constitution and liberties of this country he might have committed, yet he proved to the latest hour of his life, that he had a sincere affection for the English people. Indeed, it is said, that his aversion to fighting against them lost him his crown; and he used, when in exile, always to speak of them as 'his brave English,' and he frequently praised them in a manner not at all pleasing to the nation that had afforded him an asylum. That indecision and weakness marked the reign of James the Second will not be denied; and that, when misfortunes came upon him, he tarnished the military glories of his youth, will be admitted, but, as one of our early dramatists (Daniel) says,—

'Tis easy to accuse

Whom fortune hath made faulty by their fall;

They who are vanquished, may not refuse
The title of reproach they're charged withall:

The conquer'g cause hath right wherein thou art;
The vanquish'd still is judg'd the worse part.'

It would, perhaps, be very difficult to account for a man's being brave at one time and pusillanimous at another, though history has furnished many instances; yet we strongly suspect that, in the case of James, at the battle of the Boyne, which is the principal ground of the charge of cowardice against him, his conduct did arise from his reluctance to fight against 'his brave English.'

The principal events in the life of James must be familiar to every one acquainted with the history of his country, and those minute details into which the historian cannot enter, have also frequently been before the public, and lately in a very ample manner, by Dr. Clarke's Life of this King, compiled from the Stuart papers in the Scots College, at Paris. The present biographer of James disclaims every bias of party, and modestly assures us, that all he has attempted has been 'a cursory, unadorned, but faithful relation of events immediately connected with the monarch.' This, we think, every one who peruses his work will readily admit, and will give him some credit for reducing such ample materials into so concise and complete a shape.

We shall not attempt to follow the author through the eventful life of James, but select such anecdotes as will best serve to exhibit his real character. He was born in 1633, and was only eight years old at the time that his father was obliged to quit London; and at the age of nine, he was not only present at the battle of Edgehill, but with his elder brother, the Prince of Wales, was in the most imminent danger. When the personal safety of the Princes became endangered by remaining longer in England, they joined their mother in France; and James, then Duke of York, when only seventeen years of age, obtained a commission in the army of Marshal Turenne; but it was with the utmost difficulty he could fit himself out, nor was this effected until a Gascon, of the name of Gautier, lent him three hundred pistoles and a set of Poland coach-horses. In 1653, the duke joined the French army at Châtres. In the campaign that ensued, he was always at the post of danger, and constantly attended Marshal Turenne; he afterwards served in the Spanish army, and, on the restoration of his brother, returned to England with him. He soon afterwards married Ann Hyde, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon, the chancellor, and on her death, was married to Mary, of Modena. The duke had, in the mean time, commanded the English fleet against the Dutch, and displayed great talents and courage.

On the death of Charles the Second, James ascended the throne. The state of parties at that time ran high, and although the restoration had been effected without bloodshed, yet time was wanted fully to consolidate the power of the Stuarts. The gaiety of Charles and his conciliatory manners, had kept both the religious and political parties tolerably quiet, but James was of a less flexible character, and as he neither disguised his religion or his politics, he had rendered himself unpopular during the life of his brother. On ascending the throne, he, in some degree, regained his popularity, but his open avowal of popery and his arbitrary measures soon led the English nation to look for a successor, in the person of the Prince of Orange, who was invited over.

When the council called by the Prince of Orange had assembled, they agreed that the king should not be permitted to reside in any of the royal palaces:—

“As soon as the prince received the resolutions of the council, as his warrant, distrustful any returns of compassion or respect, as well as the inconsistency of popular feeling, he sent the Count de Solmes, with his Dutch guards, to take the posts about White Hall. When James was informed of this, he would not believe it, but a visit from Lord Craven, at eleven at night, confirmed it*. The King, then sent to the count, and remonstrated, but it was unavailing, he could but obey the orders of his prince. Lord Craven declared he would be cut to pieces ere he yielded his post; but the King, to spare the effusion of blood, and to prevent a return of disorder, commanded him to withdraw his guards. The soldiers slowly and indignantly retired. The King now perceived he was entirely at the mercy of the prince, but in the present instance he evinced a greatness of mind worthy of him, and which ought to have induced his enemies to have listened to his proposals of retrieving his past errors. He was warned of the danger of sleeping, surrounded by Dutch guards, and that alter the prince had expressed his own suspicion of ill faith in not meeting him while surrounded by his English guards. Saying, he knew not that they were more dangerous than his own; he retired to rest, and appeared to repose in perfect tranquillity. “About one in the morning, Lord Middleton, who lay by the King, was called up by the Lords Halifax, Delamere, and Shrewsbury, to tell him they had a message from the prince to his Majesty, which they must immediately impart; and when my Lord Middleton would have had them stay till the King was awake in the morning, they answered that their business would admit of no delay. There was no arguing with men who were masters, so my Lord Middleton went to the King’s bedside, and found him so fast asleep, that putting by the curtain did not wake him, till kneeling down, he spoke pretty loud in his ear, by which his Majesty, at the first, was a little surprised; but immediately composing himself, asked what was the business? Which, when my Lord Middleton told him, he ordered them to be called in, who delivered a paper to the King, signed by the Prince of Orange, the purport of which was, that to avoid all disorder which his Majesty’s presence might cause in London, he thought fit he should go to Ham, (a house belonging to the Duchess of Lauderdale,) that very morning, he designing to be in town himself about noon; and this in few but positive words, My Lord Halifax added, he might take what servants he pleased with him, but must be gone before ten; yet the Prince of Orange would take care to appoint a suitable guard to attend him there, to secure him from any harm.” The King replied, he would comply, but he called the noblemen back, as they were retiring, saying, “he had rather go to Rochester, as Ham was an unpleasant winter residence.” His choice was probably a sudden thought, as the place would be more favourable for foreign communication, or escape, if requisite. Lord Halifax did not approve any alteration or deviation from the prince’s orders, but the King had the firmness to persist, and Halifax, at last, gave up the point most unwillingly. Lord Shrewsbury, in this midnight interview, behaved with all the respectful urbanity of a soldier, and Delamere stood silent and pensive, yet with an expression of chastened pleasure, at seeing a man who had punished him, feeling, as he might think, the power of retributive justice. The King preserved the most perfect equanimity during the visit, conversing coolly and unconcernedly respecting his removal, as if it had been a voluntary one.

* Lord Craven was one of the few great who never quitted London during the plague, having made himself, at that time, the constant associate of the great Duke of Albemarle, in relieving the miseries of that calamitous time. He was, at the period when he refused to yield his station, at Whitehall, seventy years of age.

James escaped into France at a time when his partisans in England and Scotland were numerous, and sincere in their attachment; and he afterwards

landed in Ireland, with means little calculated to enable him to regain the throne. Here he showed none of that energy or promptitude which had distinguished him in early life; and, instead of being the first to attack, waited until a battle was no longer unavoidable. The battle of the Boyne followed, which was lost principally through the disobedience and jealousy of the Irish. From our author’s account of this battle, we shall make an extract:—

“Callimotte, the faithful friend and follower of the great Schomberg, in all his fortunes, and who commanded the French protestants, was rode down desperately wounded. Schomberg hearing of his friend’s distress, and perceiving that of the centre, hastened from his station to their relief. Callimotte and his friend passed each other in the river unknown, and at a distance, one mortally wounded, carried off by his soldiers, and calling out to all that passed him, “A la gloir mes enfans, a la gloir!” The other on horseback, in the deepest of the river, rallying the French Protestants, and pointing out to them their countrymen in the Irish army, exclaiming, “Voila Messieurs vos persecuteurs!” In the meantime, that part of Hamilton’s dragoons which had entered the river, finding their career stopped, returned, and, in doing so, again broke through the French Protestants, wounded the gallant and venerable Schomberg, who, in the confusion, was borne on with them; and his own men, ignorant that he was among them, fired at the troop, and killed their own noble leader*.

* The Duke de Schomberg possessed a correct judgment, an exact probity, and an humble and obliging temper; a thorough knowledge of the world, and was as great in council as in the field. He appeared courteous and affable to all, and yet had an air of grandeur that commanded the respect of the proudest and most thoughtless. “He wrote,” says D’Hymple, “with the elegance and simplicity of Cæsar.”

Dunleek, quitted his station while the armies were yet fighting, leaving orders for the army to retire and defend the pass of Dunleek, and afterwards to fall back to the Shannon: he himself, with his principal officers, fled. On hearing this, William asked General Hamilton, then his prisoner, if he thought the Irish army would fight any more; Hamilton answered, "upon my honour I believe they will." The King, with that emphatic but under-tone which so peculiarly distinguished him, muttered, "your honour, your honour!" alluding to Hamilton's former breach of it towards himself*, and then ordered a pursuit in all quarters, in the confusion of which, the orders of the monarch who had abandoned them, were totally unobserved, and the defeat was complete. Two thousand of the Irish were killed, the English lost not more than a fourth of that number. The pusillanimous James, who thus so far departed from his youthful courage, and the example of many of his own noble followers, first went to Dublin, next to Waterford, breaking down all the bridges in his course, by the suggestions of his French officers, the companions of his flight. During the period of it, he received a letter written in Louis's own hand, giving an account of his own victories, and urging him to sail instantly for France, and leave the conduct of the Irish war to his officers, promising to land him in England with thirty thousand men. In the mean time the Irish army fled directly to the Shannon, where they were joined by the principal James's officers, who, having taken their farewell of him, returned to continue the war, and to explain the cause of his retreat. James having imprudently and ungratefully said, while he hastened through Dublin, "that he would never again trust his fate to an Irish army," his soldiers very truly and justly remarked, "Complaints of cowardice came very ill from the mouth of one who had been the first to fly from the battle, and the only person; not of foreign birth, who had fled from the kingdom, and that if the English would change kings with them, they would fight the battle over again."

James a second time escaped to France, and soon afterwards made his last effort to regain the crown of Eng-

* This anecdote reminds us of a delightful one recorded in the Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, which, although not connected with our subject, it is hoped will not be uninteresting. It was during the reign of Charles the Second, when the Lord Keeper, then Justice North, during his circuit, visited the Duke of Beaufort, at his princely seat at Badmington, "the Lord Arthur, then a child about five years old, was very angry with the judge, (he said) for hanging men. The judge replied, 'that if they were not hanged, they would kill and steal.'—No," said the little boy, "you should make them promise upon their honour they would not do so, and then they would not." How delicate must the noble principle have been in the breast of this infant noble, and how rich a soil wherein to plant and to cherish it!

land. A French fleet was fitted out, in which he embarked, but it was defeated by the united Dutch and English fleets:—

"During this memorable engagement, a generous exclamation burst from the heart of the agitated James. When he saw the seamen in swarms, scrambling up the tall sides of the ships from their boats, he cried out, 'Ah! none but my brave English could do so brave an action.' After both French and English had abandoned the vessels which were on fire, some of their guns went off at intervals, while the vessels were burning to the water's edge, and a few of the balls passed near the person of the unhappy King. He then said, mournfully, 'Heaven fights against me,' and retired in deep dejection to his tent, perhaps reflecting that his fate might serve as a warning to all future kings, that having once lost the affection and confidence of their people, little trust could be placed on wealth, alliances, fleets, or armies, to restore them to the throne they had forfeited."

James now retired to St. Germain's, where he passed the remainder of his life in the austerities of the Roman Catholic religion. Our author draws a very impartial character of this unfortunate monarch, and his work throughout displays great candour and liberality. The style of the work is easy and natural, and the reflections of the author are those of a man of good sense and discernment.

Christina's Revenge; or, the Fate of Monaldeschi; with other Poems.
By J. M. Moffatt. 12mo. pp. 208.
London, 1821.

WHATEVER degree of poetic talent Mr. Moffatt may be deemed to possess, he must at least be allowed the merit of having chosen very striking subjects for his muse. The principal poem in his volume is founded on one of the basest assassinations that ever was committed—a murder committed in France, by command of that disgrace to sovereignty and her sex, Christina of Sweden. This voluptuous female indulged her passions without restraint, and thought nothing of sending her favourites from her bed to a scaffold. Among the number of those who shared in the disgraceful partiality of Christina, was the Marquis Monaldeschi. When she quitted Sweden and retired to France, she took the Marquis in her suite, and while residing in the Palace of Fontainebleau, had him assassinated in one of the apartments there, by three men, who butchered him in the most cruel manner, while he tamely submitted to his fate.

When the murder had been committed, the abandoned Christina sent a hundred livres to the convent, to pray God for the repose of the soul of her victim. The narrative of this transaction, which Mr. Moffatt has subjoined to his poem, is very interesting. It is the memoir of Father le Bel, who was the confessor of the Marquis, and was present when he was murdered.

The poem adheres closely to the narrative, and the facts are there supposed to be related by Le Bel to a friend of Monaldeschi. Although the subject is necessarily so connected that it is not easy to detach a passage, yet we will quote one, which will afford a pretty correct idea of the general character of the poem:—

"The seaman, 'midst conflicting waves
Abandon'd, in a shatter'd boat,
While round him yawn dark wat'ry graves,
And not an hour he hopes to float,
Gains courage even from despair,
Since chance of human help is fled;
And calmly leaves each social care
To seek his place among the dead:
But when, by tantalizing fate,
Prospects of safety are displayed,
The wretch forlorn to cheer and cheat
With hopes of some protecting aid;
The slightest object then will move
The man before to death resigned;
And this suspended fate may prove
The greatest torment of the mind.
"Thus Monaldeschi, doom'd to feel
The executioner's sharp steel,
Could only with confusion view
A state to him so strange and new.
He fear'd to hope, yet could not bear
To yield to absolute despair.
Unnumber'd thoughts of various kind
In quick succession fill'd his mind;
And, flutt'ring o'er his features, cast
Some mark'd expression as they pass'd.
At length his heart sweet hope beguiles;
And, moved by her seductive smiles,
With falt'ring voice and eager eyes,
To me his supplications rises.
And while I listen'd to his words,
His dread attendants held their swords
Bared for the death-dispensing blow;
As it had been their wish to show
That soon should fate his life-thread cut,
And death his eyes in darkness shut.
Yet while thy friend his woes bewail'd,
Compassion's influence prevail'd
O'er him, whose charge it was to see Perform'd the cruel queen's decree.
He from the gallery took his way,
T'entreat his sovereign to display
Her mercy, ere it was too late,
Toward him to whom her voice was fate.
Soon he return'd in woful guise,
And tears stood glitt'ring in his eyes;
'Marquis,' he said, 'on God bestow,
And hopes that from his grace must flow,
Thy every future thought; and pray
For mercy at his judgment day.
The queen I fruitlessly besought
To pardon thy unhappy fault:
The pris'ner, like a man unaided,
A moment on the speaker gaz'd;
Toward me his haggard glance then turn'd,

Which show'd what horrid thoughts sojourn'd
Within his breast, where fiercely burn'd
Revenge, not dread of death could quell;
Such as might prompt the hideous yell
Of fends in quenchless flames who dwell."

The second poem in this collection is founded on a tradition which prevails in New England,—a country, above all others, fertile in marvellous stories and traditions, which, thanks to Dr. Cotton Mather, have been carefully perpetuated. The poem is called 'The Spectre Bark of Newhaven,' and, as the story is curious, we quote it. It is contained in a letter addressed to Dr. C. Mather, which he states to have been written by 'the reverend person who was the pastor of Newhaven,' at the time he published his 'Magnalia Christi Americana,' about fifty years after the phenomenon occurred. The following is the letter:—

"Reverend and dear Sir,

"In compliance with your desires, I now give you the relation of that apparition of a ship in the air, which I have received from the most credible, judicious, and curious surviving observers of it.

"In the year 1647, besides much other lading, a far more rich treasure of passengers (five or six of which were persons of chief note and worth in Newhaven,) put themselves on board a new ship, built at Rhode Island, of about one hundred and fifty tons, but so weighty, that the master (Lamberton) often said, she would prove their grave. In the month of January, cutting their way through much ice, on which they were accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Davenport, besides many other friends, with many fears, as well as prayers and tears, they set sail. Mr. Davenport, in prayer, with an observable emphasis, used these words:—"Lord, if it be thy pleasure to bury these our friends in the bottom of the sea, they are thine; save them!" The spring following, no tidings of these friends arrived with the ships from England: Newhaven's heart began to fail her. This put the godly people on much prayer, both public and private: "That the Lord would (if it was his pleasure) let them hear what he had done with their dear friends, and prepare them with a suitable submission to his holy will." In June next ensuing, a great thunder-storm arose out of the north-west; after which, (the hemisphere being serene,) about an hour before sun-set, a ship of like dimensions with the aforesaid, with her canvass and colours abroad (though the wind was northerly), appeared in the air, coming up from our harbour's mouth, which lies southward from the town, seemingly with her sails filled under a fresh gale, holding her course north, and continuing under observation, sailing against the wind, for the space of half an hour. Many were drawn to behold this great work of God: yea, the very children cried out, "There's a brave ship!" At length, crowding up as far as there is usually water sufficient for such a vessel, and so near some of the spectators, as that they imagined a man might hurl a stone on board her, her main-top seemed to be blown off, but left hanging in the shrouds, then her mizen-top, then all her masting seemed blown away by the board. Quickly after, the hulk brought into a career, she overset, and so vanished into a smoky cloud, which, in some time, dissipated, leaving, as every where else, a clear air. The admiring spectators could distinguish the several colours of each part, the principal rigging, and such proportions as caused not only the generality of persons to say, "this was the mould of their ship, and thus was her tragic end;" but Mr. Davenport also, in public, declared to this effect, "that God had condescended, for the quieting of their afflicted spirits, this extraordinary account of his sovereign disposal of those, for whom so many fervent prayers were made continually."

"Thus, I am, sir,

"Your humble servant,
"JAMES PIERPONT."

The only probable method of accounting this spectrum (if true), is to suppose that it was occasioned by atmospheric refraction, somewhat similar to the 'Giant of the Brocken,' seen on the German mountains, or the Fata Morgana, seen in the Faro di Messina. The ballad, written by Mr. Moffatt on the subject, possesses considerable merit, but, as it is too long to insert, we shall pass on to his shorter pieces, from which we select the two following. The first, the Sailor's Soliloquy, in some of the thoughts at least, will recall to memory the 'Poor Jack' of that truly loyal and neglected British Minstrel, the late Charles Dibdin:—

'There is a Pow'r that rules on high,
When storms and death surround us:
Should thunders roar and lightnings fly,
Yet let not that confound us.

Each bolt its destin'd office knows,
Across the welkin darting:
This, unresisted, harmless goes;
That, soul and body parting.

Above, beneath, on ev'ry side,
What dangers ever face us!
Some gust may plunge us in the tide,
And with the dead may place us.
Sometimes destruction o'er us lowers,
Yet still we are protected;
Elsewhere its rage the tempest pours,
'Gainst other heads directed.

'To rear the flag, or shift the sails,
In storms the seaman soars;
If courage or his footing fails,
May sink 'midst billows roaring.
He mounts, and to the top-mast clings,
And knows no fears of falling;
His confidence from duty springs,
He's lab'ring in his calling.

'When 'cross the crowded blood-stain'd deck
Are balls and bullets flying,

What does the sense of danger check,
And chase the dread of dying?

'Th' duty still that prompts the brave
To bold and noble daring,
With these to find an honour'd grave,
Or these the vict'ry sharing.

'That Providence, whose power extends Throughout the wide creation,
Beholds what good or ill impends
O'er all, in ev'ry station.
To those in duty's path he will Give strength, or else protection;
Whatever he gives, 'his mercy still,
Or blessing, or correction.'

We shall now give a specimen of our author's elegiac talents in the—

"LINES ON THE DEATH OF A LADY.

'Fair as the dew-bespangled rose,
That sheds its fragrance o'er the dale
Mild as the silver ray that throws
Its lustre on the passing sail,

'She was:—but what avails it now,
To tell her virtues or her charms,
Since death's cold hand has laid her low—
Has torn her from my circling arms!

'Yet hold! fond memory still has power
At least to sooth my grief-worn breast,
And in faint traces to restore
The glowing beauties she possess'd.

'No more for me that bosom heaves,
No more I hear the issuing sigh;
Nor press the vermeil lip, that leaves
The rapt delights gold ne'er could buy.

'No more those eyes, than morn more bright,
On me shall dart the glance of love—
Those eyes whence beam'd the diamond light,
Mix'd with the softness of the dove.

'But why should I those beauties trace,
Which oft relentless time destroys?
Time will deform the loveliest face
Of her who length of years enjoys.

'Those charms which long my bosom fed,
I thought almost beyond compare;
Though warmest love those charms inquest,
Their loss excites not grief or care.

'The sparkling eye, the blushing cheek,
And all the purple light of youth—
T'enchanted heart their power is weak,
Compared with constancy and truth.

'There is an intercourse of souls—
Delightful, heavenly, pure, sublime—
Which no external power controls,
No change of circumstance or time.

'Such was the tie that bound my heart
To her's whose loss e'en now I mourn;
No chance, not e'en her death, shall part
That bond, till I to dust return.

Some spirited translations from Anacreon, Horace, Metastasio, and a specimen of a new Version of the Æneid, close the volume. The poems of Mr. Moffatt are of a very varied character, both as to their subjects and their merits, which are somewhat unequal. To us they do not appear to possess much originality of thought, but the author has considerable facility of versification, and some of his songs and other minor pieces are certainly pretty.

Sketches of Manners, Scenery, &c. in the French Provinces. With an Essay on French Literature. By the late John Scott, Esq. London, 1821.

THE literary character of Mr. Scott, and the unfortunate events which led to his death, are sufficiently known to render it unnecessary for us to criticise the one or enter into a detail of the other. The volume now before us is a posthumous work, and, like posthumous works in general, adds little to the reputation of the writer. Although it is very natural for affection and friendship to cherish the relics of a favourite, yet it is as injudicious to bring an unfinished book as an unfinished picture before the public, for it almost invariably exhibits the author to great disadvantage.

A few years ago, Mr. Scott published a 'Visit to Paris,' which passed through two or three editions; the volume of 'Sketches' was intended as a sequel to that work, had the author lived to finish it; but a considerable portion of it consists of loose memoranda only, which a gentleman of Mr. Scott's literary tact, would, we doubt not, have worked up into a very pleasing volume; even as it is, some of his sketches are interesting; the following, for example:—

'We went to see the fine castle of Vitré. It is in ruins, the rooms having been destroyed in the revolution; but the walls and towers are magnificent. Its ditch is large and deep; it stands upon an elevation of rock, and looks down upon the lower town from a great height; while the view it affords of the country is highly beautiful. The elegant salon had been entered by a flight of stairs. There was a large and fine suit of rooms below the level of the castle-yard, with windows looking out upon the lower town; the stairs to the salon were destroyed; its gilded walls were blackened with fire; the beams that supported its floor had tumbled into the rooms below, or hung over them in a broken and threatening state. Even the towers of stupendous strength had suffered. The walls they could not hurt; but the stone floors were broken in, and fire had been used here; so that the undertaking of ascending to the top of these grand buildings, was attended with considerable danger. The yard of the castle bears the most imposing look of antiquity. It has the profound draw-wall, the arched gateway, the watch-tower—all in the finest old style. The Prussians had bivouacked here, and occupied the few lower apartments that are still defended from the weather. An old woman resides in a small porter's lodge, close to the draw-bridge, who shows the ruin to strangers. She was moved to tears when she described the place in its ancient splendour, which she had seen. She was on the establishment of the castle in her youth, and recounted the horrors of its fall with strong emotion. The destroyed rooms were converted into a revolutionary prison; and the kitchen was destined for those condemned to die. Some of the unfortunate family to whom it belonged, were here held in captivity; and from hence were taken to the place of death. While our guide was describing these things, she spoke in a solemn whisper, as if surrounded by the state of past days, and overheard by the spirits of her murdered masters. In one strong room, near the outer gate, the police confined a mischievous madman; and his howling execrations, directed against the visitors, whom he heard near him, mingled themselves with the old woman's sad story, delivered in a low tone of voice, thus producing an indescribably awful effect. It brought the contrast between the present and the past with almost overpowering force on our feelings. We left the place, very much struck with what we had seen and listened to. Among other things, we were told, that some part of the family, now re-established at Paris, was suspected to have lately visited the ruins of the superb possession, incognito. They walked through the decayed salons, and stumbled over the fragments of their glory, with looks of melancholy grief; and, on going away, a young man gave a handsome donation to the aged porteress. She has since had good reason to believe that this was the lord whose infancy she had nursed. She wept bitterly as she told us this; and declared she would have died consoled for all the past if she had but known him, and could have kissed his hand.'

Mr. Scott's tour was not confined to France, but extended to Italy, where, among other sketches and observations, he gives the following account of an Italian preacher:—

'Going past the door of the church, I heard a priest's voice declaiming with most sonorous force. On entering, I saw the commanding fine figure of a sturdy capucin, with a rope round his middle, sandals on his feet, naked above, and placed not, as is usual, in a pulpit, but on a stage, with an elegant chair behind, his whole body from the head to the feet exposed, and his action, thus becoming more commanding than it can possibly be when only half the person appears out of a round tub, which pulpits in general are. This was the first instance of this stage-preaching which I had seen in Italy; but the effect was so fine, that I am surprised it is not more general. According to custom, there was a crucifix by the side of the orator, and his action of hand was with more force than respect directed towards the effigy. He seemed to know that his hearers, gaunt women, with flat linen cloth on their heads, and wild-looking men from the Appenines, and from the long pestilential flat between the town and sea, probably forming the brigand population of this singular country, required strong doses; his eloquence was of the unflinching kind; his object seemed to be, to shake their souls as one would shake a phial, without stopping to look if it were all right. His congregation was numerous and most attentive.'

These extracts may serve to give some idea of the work, which, if completed, would, we doubt not, have added to the reputation of its author.

THE mission of Captain Cox to the court of Amarapoora was not without its difficulties; the king showed a strong partiality towards the English, and treated him with great attention, but the ministers threw every obstacle in his way of access to the monarch, and sought to exact concessions and humiliations to which it was impossible for him to submit, without compromising his own character and the interests of his country. An interview with the whoonghee, or minister, was as difficult to obtain, and conducted with almost as much state and ceremony as an audience with the king himself; indeed, the whoonghee took particular pains to impress Captain Cox with a high sense of the great honour he had conferred upon him by an audience, assuring him that there was no precedent for it in the annals of the Burmhan history. The minister, and, indeed, all the officers of state were very avaricious, and begged almost every thing he saw; but the king centered almost all his wishes in one request, which was, that the Governor-General of India would obtain for him the tooth of Gauderna, a Burmhan law-giver, which was deposited in the principal pagoda of Ceylon!

Among the trifling presents which Captain Cox received from the whoonghee were two horses, one of which died soon after, and the carcass was begged by the Burmhans to eat:—

'The tribe of smiths, including all the artificers in metals, are particularly fond of horse-flesh, supposing it best calculated to recruit the strength wasted by working at their forges. Animals that have died from disease are, in general, eaten by the inhabitants of the country who are fond of flesh; but as metempsychosis, they are prohibited from killing animals for food. In this they resemble their neighbours, the Chinese; and I apprehend this filthy custom of eating the flesh of diseased animals is the cause of a dreadful disorder which attacks the extremities with ulcerous sores, which soon mortify, and leave those who survive disgusting and mutilated objects. The beggars of the country are chiefly composed of this class, and wander about the country in groups; assembling at the feasts of the principal pagodas, where they are relieved by the bounty of the devout and humane. Coming up the river, we met two or three squadrons of little boats belonging to these wretched pilgrims, going with their families to the southward; except these it is rare to see a beggar in the Burmhan dominions. They seem to be licensed by their peculiar misfortune; the other poor, as far as I can learn, are subsisted at the baws or cottages of the poonghees; for which purpose the poonghees of each monastery make a procession early every morning to appropriated quarters of the town, to collect the donations of the charitable, which, in general, consist of boiled rice, vegetable curries, and fruit.

The Burmhans are excessively mean and covetous. With a Burmhan you are never welcome without a present; be it ever so trifling, the etiquette is fulfilled. Captain Cox says, while at Mheeghoon,—

'In the evening, the Enga Tekaing's people came, and took away the lattice frames from before my door. I was informed, that they were wanted to inclose some ground or court, during a ceremony which annually is practised on washing the Enga Tekaing's head; and that they would be returned when the ceremony was over. I mention the circumstance as a trait of the mixture of inconsiderate meanness which attends all the actions of this people. The fence was deemed necessary to keep the multitude off from my house, and considered as a compliment paid me; the whole value of them is not twenty rupees, yet to save these twenty rupees, the compliment to me is done away, and I am again left exposed to the obtrusion of the multitude. The same spirit prevails every thing. If the king, &c. makes you a present, you must pay or give in presents double the value of it, to those who bring it. If boats are provided, you must fee the understrappers to expedite the dispatch, pay for the materials necessary for fitting them up, and reward the crew. It is no excuse to say the superiors are not privy to this conduct, suppose the defence true, which it is not; as they give no wages, they are at least tacitly consenting, as their servants have no other source of remuneration.'

Mr. Burnett, who accompanied Captain Cox, and made an excursion a few miles in the interior, describes the country above Mheeghoon, as very rugged and barren, and his majesty's accommodations as very wretched:—

'What is called his palace, is a mere hut of bamboos, thatched with straw, infer-rior to the shed I lived in while at Mheeghoon, which afforded shelter neither against sun or rain. These huts, or as they are styled by the Burmhans, travelling palaces, are constructed at the end of every stage that his majesty makes; they are not begun until his boat puts to the shore, when they are finished in a few hours; he counted seven between Amara-porah and Keounmoun, and was informed there were five more higher up the river, so that he computes his majesty's excursion to have been seventy-eight miles in extent. The king's grandson and presumptive heir to the throne, had a hut of the same construction as that of his majesty, built near his grandfather's, to denote the equality of his rank, or rather the rank to which the dotage of his grandfather has raised him. He is about eleven or twelve years of age, has an extensive territory at his sole disposal, and a court composed of boys chosen from his playmates, who are denominated whoonghees, woodlocks, &c.; the other princes of the blood are dispersed at great distances, above and below his majesty, and the army, if it may be so denominated, is scattered round them. If they amount to ten thousand men altogether, it is the outside; and Mr. Burnett informs me, they are the same kind of wretched ill-armed rabble that I saw at Mheeghoon.

The service they have been employed in, was cutting down bamboos and fire-wood, and transporting it to Mheeghoon. The hills on the west side of the river terminate about sixteen miles above Mheeghoon, where commences a high plain, rugged, and in general uncultivated, or unsusceptible of cultivation. He saw only one considerable village on his way, situated on the west bank: the eastern range of mountains extended beyond the limits of his journey. The morning after his arrival he was admitted to an audience of his majesty, whom he found seated on a common mat on the floor of his bungalow, with pillows covered with green velvet to lean upon. He was dressed in an open jamma of white cloth, a common silk lungie round his loins, his hair gathered into a knot on the crown of his head, in the Burmhan style, without any handkerchief round his head. The courtiers and Mr. Burnett were arranged on the same level, but on the bare bamboos. The levee commenced before sun-rise, and as the whoonghee and Mr. Burnett had to cross the river, it had begun before they arrived. The conversation had taken a religious turn, in consequence of the examination of some of the heads of keouns, or priests, which had passed the day before. It appears they had been found very ignorant, and his majesty was much dissatisfied with them. Among the observations that were made by him on the subject, he said, that he feared too many resorted to a religious life from a love of indolence; that he did not pretend to be learned in these matters himself, but, as the head of the religion of his dominions, it was his duty to see that those immediately intrusted with its rites were well informed; and, in consequence, he gave orders that candidates for the superiorities of keouns should in future undergo a more strict examination. His courtiers maintained a humble and profound silence, except when occasionally answering in the affirmative. It appears that his majesty is much dissatisfied with the present state of religion in his dominions, and meditates some great changes. He has found the priesthood in general miserably ignorant; even his arch-priest cannot satisfy his doubts. He says, they read over their canonical books, when they first enter on the monastic life, as a task imposed on school boys; and, although they have no other employment to engage their attention, they never afterwards investigate or inquire into the mystical meaning of their rites; so that they are totally unfit to instruct the people. Hence the various abuses that have crept into their religion; the building of small pagodas, the use of beads, &c.; all of which are cloaks for hypocrisy, and unauthorized by the tenets of their ancient faith. These he means to forbid; also the practice of the poonghees taking servants with them to carry the provisions they collect in the morning, and to restrain the number of poonghees. These severe strictures and meditated reforms alarm his courtiers very much: they dare not remonstrate, and are afraid to obey. Mr. Burnett informs me that his majesty is a hale-looking man, rather corpulent, with an arch and penetrating eye. He frequently glanced a look at his audience, as if he would read their minds. Religion has been the constant theme during this excursion, and has precluded all other business. He often looked at him, but asked no questions, when he was present. The levee lasted about two hours; he then retired, and the court broke up. Some time after Mr. Burnett was seated, the king's grandson came in and seated himself on his majesty's left hand. His majesty put his arm round him and kissed him. The prince of Prone's daughter seated herself on his right hand. She is the intended wife of the grandson, and their nuptials are soon to be celebrated. Three or four of the king's daughters also came into the court, bowed to the ground, and then seated themselves opposite his majesty, in a line with the mhee whoonghee. Mr. Burnett was seated in a line with the woodlocks. After the king's levee, Mr. Burnett went with the whoonghee to pay his respects to the grandson. He did not take off his shoes until within the shade of the hut. He informs me that he is a smart looking boy, was seated on a cot, seemed rather embarrassed, and asked no questions while he was there. If his majesty is ill-lodged, his courtiers are still worse off, and the situation of the poor rabble of soldiers miserable indeed; they have nothing to screen them from the weather but their own cotton clothes, supported on bamboos, and shiver like so many half-drowned rats during every shower. The whoonghee had only a miserable hut, about sixteen feet by twelve, surrounded by the walls of the tent I had given him; the whole court are disgusted with their situation and labour, and ardently sigh for his majesty's return; and, as his beloved grandson and many of the ladies of his family are sickly, it is expected he will move immediately that there is water for his boats. People are constantly employed in sounding the channel, and fixing marks where there is the deepest water. The whoonghee invited Mr. B. to club dinners with him, saying, if he would find cook, he (the whoonghee) would find provisions; however, in the end, Mr. B. was obliged to find both, for their bazar afforded nothing but a little rice, fetid oil, blanchong, salt fish, and a few poor mangoes. His excellency is of a convivial turn, acknowledged himself fond of good living, and, among other things, he was desirous I should procure a couple of good cooks and a book of cookery. But books and cooks would soon be useless, for the expense of one good dinner would frighten them from any further essay.

The day of the moon's change is a holiday with the Burmians, who pay their devotions and make offerings at the shrine of their divinities. On the 25th May, Captain Cox writes,—

‘ Since the 10th of April, I have regularly distributed alms every morning to one hundred and fifty ponghees, according to the Burmian custom; and at every full and change of the moon, have had twenty-one ponghees to partake, as it is called, of a charitable feast. This morning, as usual, the appointed number came, my great hall was carpeted, and wooden trays arranged the whole length of the room, four for each ponghee; in the first contained fried fish, ballehiong, turtle eggs, curries, &c. dressed after the Burmian style, made up in little plates of leaves; the second pancakes, and Burmian sweetmeats; the third, mangoes and other sweetmeats; the fourth, bunches of plantains, a green cocoa-nut, betel leaves and nut, tobacco, chinam, &c. &c. After the ponghees had been seated a few minutes, their servants and scholars brought in the bowls which they carry in making their daily collections of rice, &c.; these they placed before them; the mewjerry, who is my master of the ceremonies, then presented to the headponghee, who was seated in the centre, two cups of water. Out of the first he took water to wash his mouth and drink. He then put the points of his fingers in the other, and prayed over it in a low voice; the mewjerry then took away the water, and my Burmian attendants put the contents of the first row of trays into their bowls, which signified their acceptance of the feast. Their servants and scholars then took away the bowls, and the remainder of the trays to the outer verandah, to put the contents in baskets, and carry them away; the mewjerry, &c. then presented to the chief ponghee three trays, one with a pyramid of boiled rice on it, the other with fruit, and the third with betel, &c.; these he touched with the points of his fingers, and appeared to bless them; in turn they were presented to each of the ponghees, who performed the same ceremony; they were then put apart as consecrated, to be exposed near a temple, on an open altar, for the benefit of the crows and pian dogs; (this is one of the usages which his majesty ridicules and condemns.) On these occasions the neighbours assist at the house where the feast is made. Several men and women were assembled at my house; these now advanced and kneeled in two groups before the line of ponghees, the women to the right of the men; the mewjerry gave a few grains of parched paddy to each, which they held in their hands closed, with the palms together, a little elevated, in a supplicating posture; they then repeated a prayer after the chief ponghee, in the manner of part of our service; the chief ponghee then prayed, and other ponghees placing their fans of palm-leaves before their faces, accompanying him; after this prayer was finished, the chief ponghee delivered a kind of lecture in an audible tone of voice—a lesson I suppose from some of their books of divinity, and, if I might judge from the chanting tone, was in a kind of metre. This lasted about ten or fifteen minutes, when they arose and walked off without ceremony. The river has fallen again three cubits.’

‘ About half-past ten the head of the procession began to pass by; first, a string of his Majesty's elephants; next, a body of foot soldiers, each with a rusty musket on his shoulder, clothed like the common people of the country; they marched, or rather walked, in two Indian files, without any regularity; next followed the King's grandson, on a very lofty elephant; he sat on the neck of the elephant, and held the guiding-hook himself, but in fact the animal required no guiding. A well-dressed mobait sat behind him, and supported him in his arms. The young prince was naked from his waist upwards, having on only a silk lungee, and an embroidered handkerchief on his head, gold bangles on his ancles and wrists, and several chains set with stones, &c., on his neck. After him came several gilt palkees, with women of the palace, &c.; at a distance behind him, followed a son of the King's, by a favourite concubine, on a small elephant, which he guided himself; after him followed five of the King's elephants, with war-howdahs, having large shields on each side of the howdah, painted red and gilt; then followed his Majesty's troopers, in their war-

dress, but very shabby, and on wretched half-starved, small horses; of these there might be sixty or eighty; then several gilt brass three-pounders, on field-carriages, drawn by men, with several red-painted and gilt ammunition carts, drawn by two horses each; on each side after these marched foot soldiers, armed and clothed as those before mentioned; then followed the carriage I brought, drawn by men; and immediately after it, his Majesty, with the first queen in his old carriage, drawn by four led horses; the blinds down. He laughed, and spoke out loudly while passing, seeming well pleased with my attention. I was seated in a chair at the door of the hall, and when he came in front I rose up, took off my hat, bowing and placing my hand on my breast; Mr. Burnett and Mr. Rowland standing on either side, and bowing at the same time. The rest of my suite were arranged on either hand of the verandah. Before the front of my house I had made a railing of bamboo lattice-work, covered on the outside with yellow cloth, and over it gold and silver tange was spread; immediately in front of the veranda, was a portico forty-eight feet long, covered on the top with scarlet cloth, hanging down to ward the front about three feet, with gold tange along the front, dropping about three feet below the red cloth. The bamboo pillars, &c. covered with yellow silk, and a screen of yellow silk curtains along the front of the verandah, so as entirely to cover the piers, leaving the doors open. The house was also newly white-washed, and the road levelled and sanded before the door; and just before his Majesty passed, I had the road strewn with gold leaf; the crowd were kept clear of the front by a Burmian peon; and, on the whole, for this place, we made a very fine show. The intent, however, was every thing, and it being wholly unexpected. He was highly gratified, saying aloud to his courtiers, ‘ Ah, this is the company, that is my resident,’ and kept his eyes on me the whole time he was passing. On each side his Majesty's carriage marched spearmen, and it was surrounded by a crowd of his courtiers, &c. &c.; immediately after it, followed foot soldiers, troopers, and war-elephants, but the whole too irregular and insignificant to make any impression on me.’

The Queen Mother received honours equal to the king himself, as appears from the following account of her procession on the 26th of June:—

‘ Early in the morning the queen-mother, in a superb palkee of state, borne by thirty-six men, and attended by a great number of the ladies of the palace in their palkees, passed by on their way to accompany the Assamese princess to court; also a party of troopers, musketeers, spearmen, &c. The fronts of all the houses in the high street; through which the procession is to pass, are ornamented with verandahs of bamboos and mats, so constructed as to form a double roof open towards the street, ornamented with painted borders; and the shops filled with their best goods, which were to be sold to the prince's retinue at reduced rates. Cannon were planted at all the cross streets; plain trees and sugar-canes planted on each side the street, and the street clean swept. About half-past seven a. m. the procession began to pass by. First in order were spearmen, then musketeers, then Burmah bramins, then music, then state chattries of a particular construction, then the queen-mother's state equipage of beaten gold, then the queen-mother in her state palkee, very high and large; on the platform of the palkee two young women, richly dressed, knelt in front, and two in the rear, facing inwards, with their hands closed palm to palm, and raised to their foreheads, in the Burmah mode of paying homage. Men bearing gilt chattries surrounded the palkee. After the queen-mother's palkee followed a small body of cavalry, then spearmen and musketeers, then men carrying the prince's dowsy, consisting of elephants' teeth, jasper stones, Assamese arms, chests of clothes, bedding, &c. &c.; and then followed several Assamese bramins, with white turbans, and long white jammahs. Then two woodcocks, and several other Burmah officers; then women dressed in white, beating large tom-toms, with crooked silver souathas, others sounding silver trumpets of various forms, others playing on silver cymbals; then followed the prince's state equipage of beaten gold; then the princess, in a superb state palkee, borne as the queen-mother's, with two young women kneeling in front and rear; the curtains were of Chinese flowered gauze, so that she might see without being seen; immediately after her followed another party of Burmah horse, then about twenty palkees, with court ladies, and the whole was closed by musketeers, spearmen, &c. The front of my house was ornamented, and Burmah dancers and musicians exhibited in the front verandah. I had my breakfast-table placed in the front verandah, at which we were seated when the procession passed.

The Exiles of Damascus. By John Cochrane, Esq. 8vo. pp. 63. London, 1821.

Few of our readers, we presume, are unacquainted with the melancholy events which attended the siege of Damascus, in the seventh century, and the wanton butchery of those unfortunate inhabitants who, preferring poverty and exile to submission to the conqueror, quitted their native city on the faith of a capitulation. The circumstances are related by Gibbon with great pathos and elegance, and they have formed the subject of at least one drama. But Hughes, who was the author of the tragedy entitled the 'Exiles of Damascus,' to suit the taste of the players, altered the catastrophe, and considerably weakened the effect. Mr. Cochrane, in the poem before us, has also deviated considerably from the path of history; but we really consider the original story so affecting, and so full of interest, that we deem every deviation from it as an injury to the whole. The author, in an introduction, apologizes for the irregularity of the composition, but says he has 'now no longer spirits or health to dwell on its revision;' we regret this much, as his poem is the crude production of a man of genius, who, by a due cultivation of his powers, might attain some degree of eminence. We detach one passage from the description of the slaughter of the exiles, by the ferocious Calad and his Arabs:—

'The grey clouds on the hills were bending:
The shadows of the night descending;
Those streaks, which gild a twilight grey,
Were swiftly vanishing away;
When, from the turn of yon dark bill,
The loud shout echoed 'mid the evening still:
All heard, yet could not fly—behind us rose
The lofty mountains, near us were the fies;
'Tis vain to tell the shouts, the mingled cries,
The yells of triumph, and the fearful sighs,
The wild disorder, the despairing shrieks,
The frenzied eyes—the cold and bloodless cheeks—
The tramp of squadrons, with the gathering crash—

The cries of women, while the horsemen dash
In blood and slaughter o'er the fainting crowd,
Whose outstretched arms implored their grace aloud:

Such, to those cold barbarians, plead in vain—
The mother fell beside her husband slain,
And as she died, still trembling sought to save
At least her offspring from the common grave—
Yet these they butcher'd at the parent's breast, While playful the young child her cold dull cheek caressed,

Beat down its little arms with gestures rude,
Those murderers of a multitude.'

CHAP. I.

Containing much important information; more particularly as concerneth the Family Pedigree and Derivation—Evidence of Pure Blood—My Mother and Aunt Rebecca—the Anxiety of the Latter—My Birth and Dr. Timotheus Nehemiah Payne—his Portrait, &c.—the Finale.

If it were my pleasure to make known the glory and renown of my fore-fathers, I should have but little else to do than to point in silent exultation to our unblurred pedigree, and the thing were accomplished in a minute. My good departed Aunt Rebecca (rest her ashes!) was wont to say, that such a pedigree was never before seen; and I believe her.—Its length, breadth, and dimensions, were absolutely staggering; infinite, however, was her converse with it, and infinite were her pains to instruct those whom it concerned in that mysterious and important branch of family antiquity—to impress upon the mind the unquestionable necessity of a thorough acquaintance with our direct origin;—not a knowledge slight and superficial, mind you, but a deep and hearty familiarity with every fibre of every leaf of every branch of the genealogical tree. She drew it with her own slender fingers, and it was astonishing to hear how clearly she could explain away supposed defections. She would hold forth thereupon (for no earthly reason but the edification of others!) three hours upon the stretch, ever fresh and ever willing. But whether it arose from the native stupidity of our apprehensions, from its peculiarly somniferous effects (poppies were nothing to it!), or from other causes which are not to be named, her auditors, somehow, never did much in the way of proficiency; nor for the soul of them could they understand what the Greys of Lewton Lodge had to do with Ethelgrystone, Prince of Saxe—something. But Aunt Rebecca declared, upon her honour, that we, on the maternal side, were the literal descendants of that celebrated Saxon.—Who could doubt a lady's word of honour? or who could have, therefore, contested their claim to some of the purest blood that ever streamed in the veins of mortal flesh. The thing was beyond notoriety. Besides;—to this vast body of admissible evidence were collateral proofs, which must have carried conviction to the most sceptical:—these were certain ruby-like hillocks which heaved themselves in proud preeminence upon her respected nose, and glowed with an effulgence all their own. Foolish people would persist in terming them carbuncles,—could any thing be more absurd? But such malicious whispers were soon silenced; for, apparently conscious of their high destinies and exalted mission, these hereditary gems would just, an' it were on purpose, regulate their resplendence in exact proportion to the virulence by which they were attacked!

Yes!—I could say much on the sort of ancestral dignities—but I am a modest man touching family science, and, therefore, pass to other more relevant matter. Previous to my birth, this long and illustrious line of ancestry had terminated in the persons of two maiden ladies; of whom one was destined to be my father's wife, the other—Aunt Rebecca. The husband of the former, however, even in those degenerate days, thought less of her hereditary purity than of certain golden attractions, descended with her honours, equally pure, no doubt. In those accomplishments which render loveliness still more lovely, few might have contested superiority with her, and her fair form well bespoke her mental sweetness. But these were evanescent properties, and unworthy the consideration of a London merchant, and a man of business withal. They were married; and from an union of beauty, wealth, and unsullied blood on the one hand, and worth and sturdy honesty on the other, what might not have been expected. The blossom that sprang from a root so promising, was—could be but—myself!

Many things occur in family affairs, which it is ungracious to bring before the cold glances of the public eye—things which intrinsically are regardless and of no moment, but which, still, would afford a sensible pain to those of whom they were disclosed. Just such a consideration precludes me from speaking of many little matters which are incident to my object—absolutely not worth mentioning, and yet which I could wish revealed. Else could I tell how that Aunt Rebecca was my mother's senior (she allowed by twelve years, which, in matters of a lady's age, are equal to five-and-twenty all over the world)—and how that Aunt Rebecca (this I whisper) malgré her sisterly affection was conjectured to have been an aunt long before my birth. And how that she had been once lamentably disappointed (I mention not in what)—and how that she continued to dwell with her luckier sister, notwithstanding certain seriously entertained anticipations as to bridal duties, much to the prejudice of her said sister, but in no manner of wise to her own inclination,—and how that the political propensities of the household (time out of mind, without the pale of the salique law) were therefore under her immediate sovereignty—and discussion—and how that she was the kindest-hearted body in the universe, and the best humoured to boot (always providing the napkins for the dinner-table, were fully adjusted, and that her frilled cravats held their exact effusion of starch), and many other 'hows' and 'therefores' equally edifying and important,—but that I take it unseemly to divulge the mysteries of a family sanctum sanctorum.

As the time of my appearance approached, the cares of Aunt Rebecca augmented with every coming day; she was a perfect vision, and was to be seen at all times and in all places. From the drawing-room to the kitchen, from chamber to chamber, and from closet to closet (never mind for what reason), was she discoverable, disseminating her restrictions, orders, and injunctions in every possible variety. I verily believe she literally felt as much as though she had a personal share in the forthcoming calamities.

At length the day, the important day arrived—not, indeed, that upon which Aunt Rebecca for some preceding months had, from the nicest calculation fixed, but subsequently by a whole week. How, why, or wherefore this could be, she could not, for her very life, define. 'Why, good gracious me,' she would say to my poor mother, 'why, good gracious me, child, were you not wedded in May, and are there not June; July, three, four, five, yes, to be sure; and is not this leap year, and do we not so lose one day; and is not—&c. &c.—who would contend?'

On the second day, or rather night, of a month of February, then I first saw the light, not the light of heaven, it is true, but all the blaze which wax and tallow could bestow—

* * * * *

There was an old oaken stair-case leading from the great hall to the regions above, and very pleasant it was to see, after the proper distribution of directions and prescriptions in all the diversity of modes, common and special, Dr. Timotheus Payne's that-day descension thereupon.

Gently hinting that the required refreshments would be doubly delectable from the hand and under the superintendence of Miss Rebecca Seraphina Grey, Dr. Timotheus had with difficulty dissuaded her from a personal attendance en haut; and, therefore, this paragon of virginity, with my father at her right hand, awaited, with as much serenity as the occasion inspired, that intelligence which was incommunicable to mortal ears, until the great man's heel had kissed the floor. Dr. Timotheus Nehemiah Payne, although he upon all occasions had an eye to the dignity of his calling; sought, in an event like the present, to blend in his countenance the expression of suitable solemnity and smiling gratulation. His face was not quite so extended as a barrel's head, but would yield nothing thereto in circular symmetry; whilst, therefore, he schooled his portentous brows into a fitting profundity of frown, he essayed at gathering into his sweetest possible smile, (cousin germain to a broad-grin,) a mouth whose dimensions were truly liberal, and upon a principle most cavern-like. Nothing but an anxiety the most intense could have restrained the risibility which the doctor's appearance was well-calculated to excite. His voice, too, bearing a considerably less analogy to the music of the spheres, than to the mellifluous accents of an amorous sow, assisted the general effect; and when honest Timotheus grasped my father by the hand, and assured him that 'all was as it should be,' the muscles of the latter relaxed to their extremest width, and openly laughed out his gratitude for the doctor's attentions. The pleasure of aunt Rebecca, however, was expressed by a less distention of feature; but gracefully and graciously offering her hand to the doctor's politest service, the trio proceeded to make inquiries, if not so anxious, at least more tangible and solid.

[As with the assistance of our worthy condutor, Dr. Timotheus Nehemiah Payne, we have brought into existence a personage of much subsequent notoriety, we must not disturb the quiet of the necessaries in the chambers above, but rather retire to the participation of those refreshments, mental and corporeal, which are even now vanishing before the talismanic presence of our Æsculapian friend.—Biog.]

EGOTISM.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Mr. Hazlitt has often been accused, by your contemporary periodicals, of writing articles and answering them himself; however, it seems, if this be true, his friend, Mr. Leigh Hunt imitates his example. It is well known that the long paper in Baldwin's London Magazine for July, on the Fine Arts, was written by the ycleped king of cockney poetry. But would any person think the same hand would write in the Examiner, No. 707, in the following strain of himself? 'Fine Arts hears the grass grow, like his half name-sake in the Fairy Tale. He loves nature and art, in doors and out of doors, trees, books, and pictures, poetry and music, and fine eyes; finds enjoyment for himself and others at all seasons, &c. His style is very pleasant and off-hand, with a dash of the supergentee, which suits him very agreeably, as long as he does not let it intrude into fastidiousness, &c. We have read his last article twice over, besides dippings, and mean, some day or other, if we are rich enough to cut out all which the above writers have contributed to the magazine, &c. For me, sir, to extract the whole of the two articles to which I allude, would fill your pages: therefore, as the newspaper and magazine are usually seen by readers, my chief object is to give them the clue, and leave the application to the convictions of their understanding.

Your's, &c. MODESTUS.

POPULAR QUOTATIONS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Agreeably with the promise I made in a former communication, I shall now offer some remarks on a few popular quotations, the authors of which are not generally known, although I do not presume to say that they have never before been discovered.

The first that occurs to me is the line,—

'Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim.'

There is scarcely any quotation more common than this; and those who use it, for the most part, ascribe it to Virgil or Ovid, or some one of the classical writers. At least this, I know, was my case for many years, during which I would have risked any wager that I had actually read it in some part of the Metamorphoses of the last-mentioned poet. The fact, however, is, that the line in question is to be found in the 'Alexandrics' of Philip Gaultier, a French poet of the 13th century, whose works were printed at Lyons, in 1558. It forms part of a passage in which the poet addresses Darius, when, in his flight from Alexander, he falls into the power of Bessus. Consequently, the line in the original is,—

'Incidit in Scyllam,' &c.

Another Latin quotation, by no means uncommon, and generally ascribed, I believe, to Horace, is 'Semel insanivimus omnes.' It forms part of a verse, however, in an eclogue of Mantuanus, an Italian poet, 'De Honesto Amore': the whole is as follows:—

'Id commune malum, semel insanivimus omnes.'

Mantuanus was, as the name imports, a native of Mantua, and flourished during the fifteenth century. His works were first published at Paris, in three folio volumes, in 1513.

The following line,—

'Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat,' is, perhaps, as frequently quoted as either of the preceding, and, no doubt, is commonly considered to belong to one of the classical writers of Rome. But it is no more than a literal version of a Greek iambic, in one of the fragments of Euripides. And, I believe, I may add to this, that there is no classical authority for the verb demento as here used.

I now proceed to mention one or two English quotations in popular use, and which are not commonly appropriated to their original authors. That beautiful line in the 'Pleasures of Hope,'—

'Like angel-visits, short and far between,'

if borrowed literally from Blair's 'Grave,' where we have—

— 'its visits,

Like those of angels, short and far between.'

Yet, I remember, in a review of the 'Pleasures of Hope,' I believe in the 'British Critic,' this fine thought was highly praised for its originality. This merit, however, does not belong to Mr. Campbell.

Goldsmith's lines,—

'Man wants but little here below,

Nor wants that little long,'

are stolen from Young, who has, in his 'Night Thoughts,'—

'Man wants but little, nor that little long.'

Yet the quotation is always considered to be the property of Goldsmith alone.

I will merely add, at present, to the foregoing notices, by observing, that the hackneyed quotation from Shakespeare,—

'We ne'er shall look upon his like again,' appears to be almost a literal translation of the—

'Quando ullum invenient parem?'

of Horace, which, if our great poet did not understand in the original, he might have borrowed through an English version. Yet the thought, after all, is sufficiently natural not to be a plagiarism.

On some future occasion I will, with your permission, recur to the subject of literary imitations, of which I have made a few curious gleanings.

REPREHENSION.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

MOMUS (according to the Heathen records) was the God of Reprehension. His father was Sleep, and his mother Night. He did nothing himself, but was employed to look upon and view the works of others and reprove them, when necessary; therefore he reprov'd Vulcan's man, for not having a window in his breast, through which his heart and thoughts might be seen; he reprov'd Neptune's bull for not having horns on his shoulders, rather than on his head; he reprov'd Minerva's house, for not being made moveable, and the slippers of Venus, for making too much noise.

He was called the son of Night and Sleep, to shew that they who carp and are idle, are generally dull, obscure, and stupid fellows, fitter for the night than the day, to be a-sleep than to converse among men; therefore, as Virgil speaks of Fame, that she usually flies abroad at midnight, intimating that rumours and reports are whispered in dark corners, and have secret beginnings; so these Momus vilify those things in private which they dare not in public, for even the best and most useful works and actions are by such traduced, nor do they think any thing well done which they do not themselves perform. The sun and the moon have spots; Venus her mould; and the fairest day some clouds.

Though Momus be peevish and thwarting, yet he is sometimes useful in prince's courts. Therefore, Jupiter, in Lucian, gives him leave to speak boldly; but, when he had spoken, he was slighted and rejected as being a mad and prating fool. Great men cannot endure to bear their faults reprov'd, their vices exposed, their wounds lanced. Euterpe, the smooth-tongued goddess of flattery, is only in request among them; for truth is bitter and unpleasant, but falsehood sweet. Persius calls truth biting; Sidaonius, a reproving speech, peppered words; and Menander concludes, that truth is 'kicked out of great men's doors, and flattery only is esteem.' How useful would it be if great men would remember Solomon's words, that, 'better are the wounds of a friend than the kisses of an enemy, and yet they would suffer wine as well as oil to be poured into their wounds;' for bitter pills are no less useful to the health of the body, than comfortable cordials; therefore it might be said, Jupiter did nobly, who gave Momus leave to tell every one his faults, and not to speak in ambiguous but plain terms, not even to spare himself, but to tell him wherein he had done amiss; and truly a great man does not shew his greatness more than admitting a free reproof; for every man is apt to flatter himself, and others are more quick-sighted in our actions than we are ourselves; therefore Augustus complained exceedingly that Varus being dead, no man was left to tell him the truth, which made Louis the Sixth of France go abroad in a disguised habit, to learn the truth, seeing he could not learn it at home; and for this cause Louis the Eleventh complained that truth was the only thing which was wanting in his court; and may we not venture to make the same complaint for the august personage who rules our nation, though, doubtless, that monarch is miserable whose ears are stopped from hearing the truth.

If we descend from the prince to the subject, we still lament how difficult it is to convey truth to the satisfaction of the receiver and the monitor. The sot will not return thanks to be told he is a drunkard; the miser that he is deficient in benevolence. But, notwithstanding, whatever offence might be given, it is sometimes necessary to reprove, and never more seasonably than self.

PUCERON.

DESCRIPTION OF SANS SOUCI, THE CAPITAL OF HAYTI.

CAPTAIN COUDRY, who has recently returned from Hayti, gives the following account of Sans Souci, and the citadel built by Christophe, the late Emperor:—

This city, except in the Palace Royal and its spacious gardens, has the appearance of but a poor country village; and presents a striking contrast between wealth and poverty, in the one stately edifice, which, in magnificence and splendour, may equal, if not surpass, any in Europe, rising above a thicket of wretched looking cottages and huts by which it is surrounded, and which served as habitations for the dignitaries of Christophe's court.

There is a surprising grandeur in the whole plan and structure of the palace; and the money expended in its building and furniture must have amounted to an immense sum. But it is now going to ruin, more by the hand of violence than by that of time, and stands a melancholy emblem of the downfall of ambition and power. At the time of my visiting it, the idle and hungry soldiers were stripping it of its rich mahogany floors, wainscoatings, and ceilings, and selling them for whatever they would fetch, to prevent the necessity of labouring for subsistence.

Some of the frames of the superb mirrors of twelve by six feet, with which the rooms were almost lined, were still hanging, and their glasses, with the brilliant lustres, chandeliers, &c. with which every part of the palace was ornamented, lay in scattered fragments on the ground, where the soldiers, in their insatiation, had wantonly dashed them in pieces on the night of the suicide of Christophe.

A few schools have been founded at Sans Souci, which abroad have the names of colleges, and for which professors from Europe were solicited, when common village school-masters were, in fact, all that were necessary to supply them.

Having surveyed the palace and the city, we began our route up the mountain to the citadel. It was early in the morning, and when we had gained the height on which this truly formidable and astonishing fortification stands, the dense vapour that rises from the extensive plains below, entirely hid it from view. The road up the mountain is extremely bad, and to me seemed scarcely passable; it is so rugged as to render it exceedingly fatiguing to ride, and in many places, the ascent so steep, that we were obliged to dismount, and drive our horses up before us. After much exertion, we at length reached our place of destination, and were soon admitted into the citadel, which for many years I had earnestly wished to behold, but which I had despaired of ever being able to visit, as the commandant of Sans Souci has strict orders from the president to prohibit the entrance of all foreigners; nor should I now have gained admission, but for the interest of my friend O—, whose influence procured me liberty to enter the city.

A deep silence reigned in the citadel, which had long echoed to the din of arms, and the tools of the wretched mechanics, who were doomed by the cruelty of Christophe to drag out a miserable existence in slavery; obliged to spend their days in labour, and their nights chained in horrid dungeons, without being able to obtain a sight of their families or friends for whole successive years.

It is impossible for description to give an adequate idea of this stupendous structure, which looks like the work of centuries; and its whole appearance has a character of sublimity and power which cannot fail to fill the mind of the beholder with wonder, admiration, and awe. Its walls in some places are thirty feet thick, and the north-east end is two hundred and fifty feet high. The numerous pieces of artillery with which this fortress is furnished, are so heavy, that it could hardly be deemed practicable to convey them by the steep and uneven road, which is the only passage to the summit of the mountain.

The lower battery is mounted with seventy heavy 32-pound pieces of bronze, each piece traversing with great facility to its given angle; on a second breast-work are mounted about forty pieces of twenty-four pounds each, which are also of bronze, and arranged on the same principle as those below, with all their apparatus ready for use; to the third breast-work, which remains unfinished, are embrasures, and arrangements for pieces much lighter than the others; and above that, at about two hundred paces from the ground, barracks are constructed for the garrison. In short, the whole plan is so well laid and executed, as to render it, as a military position, impregnable to all the forces of Europe; and for imprisonment and servitude, well worthy the appellation of the 'Bastille of Hayti.'

Under the cover of its guns, vegetables may be cultivated to supply its garrison; and the large reservoirs that are constructed in many places in the exterior of the walls, are always kept filled. Many thousand barrels of flour, are constantly kept in the vaults, in large French jars, air-tight, which, added to the pulse, rice, and salted provisions, would have been sufficient to maintain the garrison for twenty-five years.

Original Poetry.

TO ———.

Nor a sigh should be heard from this bosom
so true,

If I knew that he lov'd you sincerely;
Not a tear should be seen these eyes to bedew,
If he lov'd you as I love you dearly.

But in secret and silence this lone heart must pine

For the solace thy heart has denied it;
Yet assure me that grief is a stranger to thine—
And I'll ask for no solace beside it.

Though his love may glow warmly, 'twill vanish as soon

As the sun from the wintry sky, love,
That shines bright on the morn, but looks chill
on the noon,

And as coldly he'll soon look on thy love,

But the flame that burns here, love, shall never grow dim,
Though all hope has this bosom forsaken;
Oh! then, whilst you are lavishing smiles upon him,
Spare a sigh for this heart that is breaking.

YESTERDAY.

THE shadowy form, whose fleeting smile
So late endeared it to my heart;
No longer shall that breast beguile,
No more shall joy and peace impart.
But as it lessens on the view,
And melts within the void of time,
Shall memory the scene renew,
And shew it always in its prime.
Each blessing Heaven bestows record,
But virtuous deeds as incense rise;
And happily be the sweet reward
Of kindred spirits in the skies.

TO DAY.

Pleas'd let me trace the present hour,
In gay delight and pleasure drest;
And e'er the vision shall be o'er,
Partake the joy that makes me blest.
Once more the light of day is mine,
The night's oblivious shade is flown;
But soon shall dark'ning clouds combine
To form again his dawn throne.
The treasures Nature's hand bestows,
Speaking in the distant kindling ray;
And as the scene more vivid grows,
Appear to hint 'be wise to-day.'

TO-MORROW.

Say, what art thou, uncertain form,
That steal'd upon my waking sight;
Art thou the distant airy storm
That follows in the train of night?
No, thou art not a shapeless dream,
For soon shall Time's unceasing wing,
Within the next reviving beam,
Thy form to just proportion bring.
But not for me that beam may shine,
This tongue its joy no more may tell;
To-day alone is truly mine,
The curfew may proclaim my knell.

E. G. B.

REMEMBER ME.

If e'er to distant climes to roam,
Should, Sylvia, chance my lot to be,
Oh! may those friends then left at home,
And thou, 'bove all, remember me.
In life's bright spring we once were young,
And Philomela from the tree
For us in plaintive warbling sung,
Or seem'd to sing, remember me.
Yes, sorrowing hind, remembrance still Lists to thy strain, so sad, so free;
And oft methinks yon murmuring rill
Says, as it flows, remember me.
The floods in icy chains confined,
Greet the young spring, so dear to thee;
And every whispering breeze of wind
Sighs 'mid thy grove—remember me.
Thus, while all nature owns how sweet
A boon remembrance joys must be;
Still, dearest, tho' no more we meet,
Remember me—remember me.
And should it, at some distant year,
Be thine my humble tomb to see,
I ask not memory's useless tears,
Enough,—that thou rememberest me.

LINES

Written immediately after arrival at Oxford.

Lo! where thy antique spires arise
Mid classic domes and cloister'd shade,
I turn—and with admiring eyes
Court wisdom, that celestial maid!
Here learning soars with eagle ken,
As science holds her proud domain,
High converse with the deeds of men,
And knowledge her extended reign!

There tufted groves and waving trees,
In monumental grandeur peer,
And far as thought extended sees
The god of each revolving year!

O, lead my steps these bowers again,
Where poesy, immortal guest,
Seeks, from the crowd's ignoble throng,
Calm peace and meditative rest!

Let no intruding passions strain
To discord one discordant string,
But virtue and her sister train
O'er me her hallow'd influence fling.

As wrapt in contemplation sweet,
I pace thy studied winding maze,
Where no obtrusive eye may meet
The muse's melancholy gaze.

'With looks commercing with the skies,'
Thus let me live and calmly die,
All nature's license gently rise,
Inspiring love and melody.

HATT.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Notwithstanding that the town was scarcely ever so depopulated of its fashionables, to say nothing of visiting a winter theatre in the dog-days, the Coronation still attracts good houses; the exhibition of this splendid spectacle, at the present moment, might suggest much reflection for the moralist—an audience, principally dressed in mourning for the death of a queen, laughing and cheering a representation of the crowning of the king. The Coronation is the sole ground of attraction, for no effort is made to produce any thing else worth seeing at the same time; this niggardliness in amusement is the bane of our large theatres. On Monday, a Mr. Power, from Dublin, made his first appearance in the character of Tristram Fickle, in the farce of the Weathecrook, and was favourably received, but we must see him in other characters before we can speak decisively of his talents.

HAYMARKET.—The comedy of Rise and Fall suffers no fluctuation in the public favour. Indeed, there is so much genuine comic humour and so much good acting in this piece, that it could not fail to be popular. On Tuesday, O'Keefe's comedy of Fountainbleau was performed, in which Mr.
Leoni Lee sustained the character of the lover, with considerable ability.
Jones, in Lackland, did not lack a house, for its approbation was decidedly his. Oxberry's Tallyho was very good, and Miss Carew, Miss R. Corn, and Mrs. Tayleur, gave the few songs in their parts, in very good style. The comedy was altogether well performed, and elicited much applause.

ENGLISH OPERA.—The *Miller's
Maid* increases nightly in attraction.
The objection we stated in our last has been removed, and it may now be fairly considered as one of the most effective pieces of its character on the stage. On Wednesday, we saw for the first—we do not know what time—the admirable comic opera of Free and Easy, and, we confess, we were a much pleased as when it first allured us by the double charm of novelty and humour. The accommodating case of Wrench, the fretful misery of poor
Bartley, the arch playfulness of Miss Kelly, and the simplicity of Wilkinson, who has made Thomson's Seasons almost as much laughed at as admired, all combine to render this one of the most pleasing dramas on the stage; nor must we forget the lovely representative of Eugenia, in the person of Miss E. Blanchard, who made us not even regret the absence of Mr.
Chatterly, who so long and so ably sustained the character.

SURREY THEATRE.—The benefits have commenced at this theatre, and, although very little novelty has been produced at them, yet the merits of the respective performers and the popularity of the stock pieces, have drew good houses.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Egerton shows a good deal of bustling activity as well as good taste, in the piece which, with rapid succession, he brings out at this theatre. A burlesque, founded on the farce of the Panel, was extremely well acted, particularly the part of Beatrice, by Mrs. Egerton.
The French Hercules and the water-piece add to the other attractions, and insure a good portion of visitors ever evening.

Literature and Science.

By some recent American newspapers we learn that the New Monthly Magazine, the Percy Anecdotes, and the novels of Calthorpe and the Mystery, are reprinting in New York. The two novels have also been published in Paris in French, by the gentleman who translated the Scottish novels sometime ago.

A discovery has been recently made of a new application of the air-pump by Mr. John Oldham, of the Bank of Ireland, that promises to lead to some useful advantages. The sizing of paper in large quantities, as now usually practised by the manufacturer, is a process tedious, uncertain in its effects, and destructive to its original texture. By the improved method the difficulties and mischiefs proceeding from the causes stated, are effectually obviated: thus, let paper of equal dimensions, to any amount, from the coarsest to the finest substance, be piled as evenly as possible, and placed within an air-tight vessel, in such a manner as to be prevented from floating upon any of the fluids to be used, that are then to be poured in, until the pile is covered to the depth the paper occupies, but which should not entirely fill this vessel. When the lid is closely fitted and fastened thereon, proceed to exhaust the space over the fluid with a suitable air-pump; the air within, on becoming rarified, will cause what is contained within the paper to rush out on all sides to the top, which will consequently escape with the rest through the valves of the pump by its continued action. On re-admitting the atmosphere, the fluid prevents the ingress of the air again into the paper or substance to be saturated, and can only serve by the pressure natural to it to force the denser element into the possession of every minute receptacle it previously so tenaciously held. By this means every sheet becomes equally impregnated, without loss or injury to the fabric; paper when made, can be uniformly dyed any colour by the same process. Also silk, flax, cotton, and woollen staples, either raw, spun, or when woven, and in the most superior manner. All kinds of animal and vegetable substances can be much better preserved, than by the usual tedious and uncertain method commonly resorted to of boiling, soaking, and pickling, air being the great enemy to all such preparations. The air being discharged in the first instance, as mentioned, the briny fluid will immediately strike into the most intricate interstitial joints of every kind of meat, and by pricking the outsides of the larger vegetables with any sharp instrument, the acids, in the same way, will instantaneously enter into every pore. The outside of meat intended to be preserved fresh by pyroligneous acid, can be much better impregnated to the depth of the meat's surface that is required, than by the method proposed, of dipping, soaking, or painting the joints with this acid and a brush. In short, every thing that requires to be partially or wholly impregnated with the fluids to be appropriated to their respective uses, must always be effected infinitely better by this plan than any other at present known. A complete apparatus of this kind is now erected in the printing-offices of the Bank of Ireland, for wetting bank-note paper preparatory to its being printed on, that fully answers in practice the end proposed. Ten thousand sheets of the thinnest description of bank-note paper, perhaps ever made, is wet at once with scarcely any delay, and no loss or injury whatever is now sustained, as formerly.—Mon. Mag.

Supposed Roman Bridge in Drenthe.—The intelligence about the ancient wooden way discovered in Holland, in 1818, is very old, and wants much correction. Indeed, the first impression the Dutch newspapers made on the minds of some respectable Antiquaries was, that this could be only the Roman pontes longi minutely described by Tacitus: and, in fact, the similarity in many points was striking. Very soon, however, a different conjecture was laid before the public, which, it should be said, had been formed before the discovery was generally divulged; for the way itself had long been known among the inhabitants of that spot, who chiefly are turf-diggers. This conjecture was, that it seemed to be the path made by Bernard Van Galen, Bishop of Munster, in one of his wars against the Republic. In this diversity of opinions, one of which removed the date of its construction as far as the first century of our era, another as near as the 17th: a committee was formed out of the second and third classes of the Royal Institute of Sciences and the Fine Arts, at Amsterdam (the second class belonging to the Dutch, and the third to Classical Literature). Another opinion arose in the meantime, which was also adopted by Mr. Spandaw, the reporter of the combined committee, the result of which was, that the way led to the ruined Monastery of Ter Apel, situated on the provinces of Groningen and Drenthe: and we learn, that this opinion, against which no reasonable objections have been made, was lately corroborated by proofs from ancient charters by Professor Ypey, of Groningen University. Both those dissertations have been published among the Dutch Tracts of the Institute.

It is but natural that the discovery of a way about eleven miles in length, under ground, should strongly excite the public interest in Holland, as, from the nature of the soil, the great population of the country, and the want of ground in most provinces of the former republic, scarcely any very ancient architectural monuments remain at the present day. It is to be regretted, that it is impossible to lay open the whole of the way, as any pit in that track of the turf-moors would, in a few hours, fill with water.

LUCRETIVS.

Origin of Doggett's Coat and Badge.—In the year after George I. came to the throne, Thomas Doggett, a comedian, who was zealously attached to the House of Hanover, gave a waterman's coat and silver badge to be rowed for by six watermen, on the anniversary of that king's accession to the throne, and, at his death, bequeathed a certain sum of money, the interest of which was to be appropriated annually, for ever, to the purchase of a like coat and badge to be rowed for in honour of that day. Doggett, as an author, has left behind him a comedy, called the 'Country Wake,' 1696, 4to. which has since been altered into a ballad farce, under the title of 'Flora,' or 'Hob in the Well.' He died in 1712. David's Sow.—'As drunk as David's sow,' a common saying, which took its rise from the following circumstance: one David Lloyd, a Welshman, who kept an alehouse at Hereford, had a living sow with six pigs, which was greatly resorted to by the curiouse; he had also a wife much addicted to drunkenness. One day David's wife having taken a cup too much, and being fearful of the consequences, (her husband being in the habit of giving her a little discipline for her cure,) turned out the sow, and laid down to sleep herself sober, in the sty. A company coming to see the sow, David ushered them to the sty, exclaiming 'there is a sow for you! Did any of you ever see such another?' all the while supposing the sow had really been there; to which some of the company, seeing the state the woman was in, replied, 'it was the drunkenest sow they had ever beheld,' whence arose the saying, 'As drunk as David's sow.'

Jack of Legs.—a tall long-legged man; also a giant, said to be buried in Weston church, near Baldock, in Hertfordshire, where there are two stones fourteen feet distant, said to be the head and feet stones of his grave. This giant, says Salmon, as fame goes, lived in a wood here, and was a great robber, but a generous one, for he plundered the rich to give to the poor; he frequently took bread for this purpose from the Baldock bakers, who catching him at an advantage, put out his eyes; and afterwards hanged him upon a knoll in Baldock field. At his death he made one request, which was, that he might have his bow and arrows put into his hand, and, on shooting it off, where the arrow fell they would bury him, which being granted, the arrow fell in Weston church-yard. About seventy years ago, a very large thigh-bone was taken out of the church chest, where it had lain many years for a shew, and was sold by the clerk to Sir John Trevelkin, who, it is said, put it up among the rarities of Oxford.

Shenstone.—This poet used to thank God that his name was not liable to a pun; it has proved, however, obnoxious to a Frenchman's rhyme, which is something worse. M. Girardin has placed this inscription to his memory, at Ermenouville.

This plain stone

In his writings display'd
A mind natural,
At Leasowes, he laid

Firm Footing in America.—A traveller, on his return from the state of Ohio, where he had been to purchase a farm in that 'land of milk and honey,' gave this account of the state of 'promise':—Sir, as I was driving my team, I observed a lat in the path: I leaped with my whip-stick to take it up from the mud. 'What are you doing with my hat?' cried a voice under it. I soon discovered, under the chapeau, a brother emigrant, up to the ears in the mire. 'Pray let me help you out,' said I.—'Thank you,' said the be-mired traveller, 'I have a good long-legged horse under me, who has carried me through worse sloughs than this: I am only stopping to breathe my nag, as this is the firmest footing I have found in fifty miles.'

Clerical Modesty.—A correspondent assures us of the truth of the following anecdote. We certainly cannot doubt it, but as it may be found in our old friend Joe Miller, it induces a suspicion that the parson is a plagiaristic wag.

The clergyman who preached at Winterbourne, a village in the west of England, a few Sundays ago, had read the liturgy and was about to ascend the pulpit, but he found that he had left his sermon at home. He whispered the clerk for an expedient, when, on recollecting himself, he addressed his parishioners in this manner:—'My brethren, I have not my sermon with me to-day, but I will read you a chapter out of the book of Job, which is worth two of my discourses!' He did so and gave general satisfaction. P.

Sketches of India. Written by an Officer on Fire-side Travellers at Home. 8vo. pp. 329. London, 1821. THE author of the 'Sketches of India' has essayed to give what was much wanted, a 'familiar picture of Indian scenery and manners;' and if he has been less successful than he might have been, considering the excellence of his plan, yet he has done more than tourists generally accomplish. The work was written at Fort George, where the author continues to reside, and his work has been transmitted to England for publication; this is sufficient evidence of its genuineness, did it not internally prove its authenticity beyond all doubt; if we except that the author is rather intolerant in religion, and that he attempts to moralize too much, his work will be found of a very pleasing character, written apparently with the force of first impressions, and hence with more vigour than could be expected from the pen of a long resident. His sensations on first arriving in India, and his account of the neighbourhood of Madras, are well described:—

'No,—I shall never forget the sweet and strange sensations which, as I went peacefully forward, the new objects in nature excited in my bosom. The rich broad-leaved plainfain; the gracefully drooping bamboo; the cocoa-nut, with that mat-like looking binding for every branch; the branches themselves waving with a feathery motion in the wind; the bare lofty trunk and fan-leaf of the tall palm; the slender and elegant stem of the areca; the large aloes; the prickly pear; the stately banyan, with its earth-seeking and reproductive 'drop branches; and among them, birds all strange in plumage and in note—save the parakeet (at home, the lady's pet-bird in a gilded cage), here spreading his bright green wings in happy fearless flight, and giving his natural and untaught scream. These, and more than I can name, were the novelties we looked upon. My dream of anticipation realized gave me a delight which found no expression in words. I felt grateful that I had been led and permitted to see India; I wondered at my own ignorance, and at the poverty of my imagination, when I reflected how much the realities around me differed from what my fancy had painted them. How some things surpassed, and some fell short of my foolish expectations; and yet how natural, how easy all appeared! All so fitted and adapted by the hand of the bountiful and wise Creator, that other than they were they had deformed instead of decking the face of nature. It was late and dark when we reached Poonamallee; and during the latter part of our march we had heavy rain. We found no fellow-countryman to welcome us, but the mess-room was open and lighted, a table laid, and a crowd of smart roguish-looking natives seemed waiting our arrival to seek service.

'Drenched to the skin, without changes of linen or any bedding, we sat down to the repast provided; and it would have been difficult to have found in India, perhaps, at the moment, a more cheerful party than ours.

'Four or five clean-looking natives, in white dresses, with red or white turbans, ear-rings of gold, or with emerald drops, and large silver signet rings on their fingers, crowded round each chair, and watched our every glance to anticipate our wishes. Curries, vegetables, and fruits, all new to us, were tasted and pronounced upon; and, after a meal, of which every one seemed to partake with grateful good-humour, we lay down for the night. One attendant brought a small carpet, another a mat, others again a sheet or counterpane, till all were provided with something; and thus closed our first evening in India.

'The morning-scene was very ludicrous. Here a barber, uncalled for, was shaving a man as he still lay dozing; there another was cracking the joints of a man half-dressed; here were two servants, one pouring water on, the other washing, a Saheb's hands. In spite of my efforts to prevent them, two well-dressed men were washing my feet; and near me was a lad dexterously putting on the clothes of a sleepy brother officer, as if he had been an infant under his care.'

Of the antiquity of the Hindoo manners, he says,—

'While our forefathers were clad in wolf-skin, dwelt in caverns, and lived upon the produce of the chase, the Hindoo lived as now:—as now, his princes were

* 'Sabab, a gentleman, "Sir," or "Master," used by the natives of India when addressing or speaking of their superiors.'

clothed in soft raiments, wore jewelled turbans, and dwelt in palaces.—As now, his haughty half-naked priests received his offerings in temples of hewn and sculptured granite, and summoned him to rites as absurd, but yet more splendid and debauching than the present. His cottage, garments, household utensils, and implements of husbandry or labour, the same as now. Then, too, he watered the ground with his foot by means of a plank balanced transversely on a lofty pole, or drew from the deep bowrie (well) by the labour of his oxen, in large bags of leather, supplies of water to flow through the little channels by which their fields and gardens are intersected. His children were then taught to shape letters in the sand, and to write, and keep accounts on the dried leaves of the palm or cocoa, by the village-schoolmaster. His wife ground corn at the same mill, or pounded it in a rude mortar with her neighbour. He could make purchases in a regular bazaar, change money at a shroff's*, or borrow it at usury, for the expenses of a wedding or festival. In short, all that the traveller sees around him of social or civilized life, of useful invention or luxurious refinement, is of yet higher antiquity than the days of Alexander the Great. So that, in fact, the eye of the British officer looks upon the same forms and dresses, the same buildings, manners, and customs, on which the Macedonian troops gazed with the same astonishment.'

The docility of the elephant is well known, yet we cannot avoid quoting one or two anecdotes on the subject:—

'While breakfast was getting ready, I amused myself with looking at a baggage elephant and a few camels, which some servants, returning with a general's tents from the Deccan, were in the act of loading. The intelligent obedience of the elephant is well known; but to look upon this huge and powerful monster kneeling down at the mere bidding of the human voice; and, when he has risen again, to see him protrude his trunk for the foot of his mahout or attendant, to help him into his seat; or, bending the joint of his hind leg, make a step for him to climb up behind, and then, if any loose cloths or cords fall off, with a dog-like docility pick them up with his proboscis and put them up again, will delight and surprise long after it ceases to be novel. When loaded, this creature broke off a large branch from the lofty tree near which he stood, and quietly fanned and fly-flapped himself, with all the nonchalance of an indolent woman of fashion, till the camels were ready. These animals also kneel to be laden.*

* 'Shroff, an Indian banker, or money-changer.'

It is generally known, that this noble animal beats jungle for large game; and, although we met with none, still I had the opportunity of seeing into how thick and apparently impervious jungle it will force its way. But it was the perfect dog like manner in which she put up small game that surprised me; carefully putting up from the low tufted grass in which they nestle, those smallest of game-birds, the quail. My companion killed from his howdah in this manner, without dogs, both hares and black partridge, a few yards only from the road-side.

Our traveller proceeded up the Ganges to Benares; and he gives the following sketch of this ancient seat of Brahminical learning, and the present school of Hindoo theology:—

‘The city is only to be visited on horseback or in a palanquin. I decided, at the recommendation of my friend, on a tonjon, or open sedan-chair; as thus only can you leisurely survey every thing, from the extreme narrowness of the streets, and the crowds in them, through whom your way must be cleared by a police-trooper in your front.

‘In the heart of this strange city, you are borne through a labyrinth of lanes, with houses of six or seven stories high on either side, communicating with each other above, in some places, by small bridges thrown across the street. These houses are of stone or brick; and many of them are painted either in plain colours or stripes, or with representations of the Hindoo deities. Every bazaar or street containing shops, you find a little, and but a little, wider than the others. Shops here stand in distinct and separate streets, according to their goods and trades. In one, all are embroiderers in muslin, which they work here in gold and silver most beautifully; in another, silk-merchants; in another are displayed shawls; in some, shops filled only with slippers; in one, jewel-merchants; in the next, mere lapidaries. Several contiguous streets are filled entirely with the workmen in brass, who make the small brazen idols; also the various urns, dishes, vessels, lamps, which the Hindoos require either for domestic or sacred purposes. These shops make a very bright and showy display; and, from the ancient forms, various sizes and patterns of their vessels, attract your attention strongly. You meet numbers of the naked officiating brahmins indeed, but you also see here a distinct class of wealthy brahmins, most richly dressed in fine muslin turbans, vests of the most beautiful silks, and valuable shawls. Their conveyances out of the city are the open native palanquins, with crimson canopies, or hackrees, sometimes very handsome,

‘The women in Benares (for many of high cast fetch all their own water) are beautifully formed, wear garments of the richest dyes, and walk most gracefully. But these are minor features;—innumerable Hindoo youth, of high cast, are sent hither for education. They have not colleges or schools, but reside six or seven in each brahmin’s or pundit’s house, and pursue the studies which he enjoins. There are eight thousand houses in Benares belonging to brahmins: what number may receive students I know not; perhaps not more than one thousand.’

We shall now only quote one or two passages more; the first relates to the Mahabratia camp, near Gualior:—

‘It is not quite, perhaps, what you expect: for it presents the appearance of an immense village, or rather collection of villages, with about a dozen chunamed buildings, shapeless, coarse, without any air of ornament; and here and there many small trees and hedges of the milk-plum, all of quick growth and late planting, but yet giving the whole a fixed and settled aspect. At the second gate, however, you see interspersed many tents and palls, flags and pennons; in some parts, hutted lances and piles of arms; in one range, a large regular park of artillery; in all the open spaces, horses irregularly picketted, strings of camels, and a few stately elephants. On the skirts of this large mass, a few smaller and more regular encampments belonging to particular chiefs, with their followers better armed and mounted. The sounds, too, of neighings, of drums, of horns, and fire-arms; and, occasionally, the piercing trumpet of the elephant, mingled in confusion with the hum of a population, loud, busy, and tumultuous, tell you, convincingly, the trade here is war: the manufacturers are of arms.

‘Many years, however, has the Mahabratia camp happily been stationary. Nor is there treasure in the coffers, or energy in the counsils of Scindiah, who now stands a power, isolated, helpless, and without hope ever again effectually to set it in motion. From a prodigious host, it has dwindled in numbers greatly; in efficiency and readiness of equipment, still more: perhaps not more than seven thousand mounted men are in his camp; about three brigades of infantry; his artillery alone fine, and disproportionately so; his stores miserably low.’

‘In traversing this rude irregular encampment, the groupes we met were horses picketted in circles with the rider’s spear planted in the ground at each head-rope; men lying on their horse-furniture, pillowed on their shields, or busy cooking, or cleaning their horses and arms. Their women making fires, fetching water, and bringing in grass; their children of all sizes at play in the dust naked. All these were features, to the eye of the European officer, strange and interesting.

‘As we passed back round the fort, we were fortunate enough to meet Scindiah returning from the chace, surrounded by all his chiefs; and preceded or followed by about seven hundred horse. Discharges of cannon announced his approach, and a few light scattered parties of spearmen were marching before the main body. We stopped our elephants just on one side of a narrow part of the road, where the rajah and chiefs, with his immediate escort, must pass.

‘First came loose light-armed horse, either in the road, or scrambling and leaping on the rude banks and ravines near; then some better clad, with the quilted poshauk*; and one in a complete suite of chain armour; then a few elephants, among them the hunting elephant of Scindiah, from which he had dismounted. On one small elephant, guiding it himself, rode a fine boy, a fountaining protégé of Scindiah, called the Jungle Rajah; then came, slowly prancing, a host of fierce haughty chieftains, on fine horses, showily caparisoned. They darted forward, and all took their proud stand behind and round us, planting their long lances in the earth, and reining up their eager steeds to see, I suppose, our arrival. Next, in a common native palkee, its canopy crimson, unadorned, came Scindiah himself. He was plainly dressed, with a reddish turban, and a shawl over his vest, and lay reclining, smoking a small gilt or golden calcan. We stood up in our howdah and bowed; he half rose in his palkee, and salaamed rather in a courteous manner. At this there was a loud cry of all his followers near, who sung out his titles and the honour he had done us, &c. And all salaamed themselves profoundly.

‘I looked down on the chiefs nearest us, and saw that they eyed us most laughingly, which very much increased the effect they would otherwise have produced. They were armed with lances, scymials, and shield, creese and pistol; wore, some shawls, some tissues, some plain muslin or cotton; were all much wrapped in clothing; and wore, almost all, a large fold of muslin, tied over the turban-top, which they fasten under the chin; and which, strange as it may sound to those who have never seen it, looks worthless, and is a very important defence to the sides of the neck.’

Of the death of Settoo, the Pindarrie Chieftain, who, with a large army, plundered the Deccan, we are told,—

‘He escaped from the fortress of Aserghur, a few days before our troops invested it. Without followers, without friends, he crossed the Nerbuddah, and directed his flight northwards. A few days afterwards, his horse was found wandering without a rider; and, on the border of the jungle, near some bye-road,

* A garment of cloth, or silk, quilted and stuffed with cotton, so as to render it impervious.

the corpse of Seetoo, evidently killed and preyed upon by a tiger, and since torn by jackalls. His arms, so often bathed in the blood of others, had lain useless by his side, and were stained with his own. A few jewels and money, provided for his flight, were in his scrip. 'They would not bribe the fierce and savage lord of these wilds from his foul meal. Papers and passports, framed and prepared with art to ensure safe conduct through populous and peaceful districts, had failed him here; where, under the fangs of an irresistible and powerful wild beast, only less blood-thirsty and cruel than himself, he perished, as hopelessly as the trembling female or tottering infant, under his lifted spear.'

We shall conclude with a description of the Bheela, who are supposed to be the Aborigines of the provinces of Guzerat:—

'They lived by the chase and rapine; on the roads they never shew themselves armed; the bow and arrow and javelin, are their weapons; but I never saw any remarkable for size or strength. They are a short thick-set people, with hideous countenances, flat noses, and thick lips, but far less handsome and finely formed men than the Africans; neither have they the very dark complexions, and that fine clear shining black; their hair is straight; they look stupid, to speak of them as men, but yet have a quick little piercing eye, such as would discern the far-off deer, the deep-swimming fish, the lofty bird's-nest, or the wild bee-hive. Their women are even more hideous than the men; these you meet more frequently, and in larger groups, carrying bundles of wood for sale. The favourite haunts of this half-barbarous people, are in the deepest and most unknown recesses of the jungles. They often plunder and murder on the roads, and seemed to hold no fellowship with any other race.'

These extracts will show the general character of the work, and will, we doubt not, create a very favourable opinion of the whole, which, notwithstanding the slight objections we have mentioned, is a very entertaining volume.

Reflections on viewing Brandenburg House, the Residence of her late Majesty. By S. R. Jackson, Author of 'The Lament of Napoleon,' 'The Fall of the Crescent,' &c. 8vo. pp. 14. London, 1821:

ALTHOUGH we have more than once had occasion to notice Mr. Jackson's poems very favourably, yet his present production, we think, presents stronger claims to our approbation than any that have preceded it. The author is a warm advocate of her late Majesty, and expresses himself in bold and manly indignation against her persecutors.

There is much genuine feeling and true poetry in the whole poem, which commences with an address to Brandenburg House, on the immortality it has acquired, by being the residence of one 'whose sufferings have made it sacred'; for, exclaims the poet,—

'What is it hallows temples, cities, towns? Not the pale marble which their forms compose,

But their proud owners' spirits, that influence ours,

And sacred bones that in their walls repose. Greece had not been rever'd, nor Rome been held

Holy, but for the mighty minds that sway'd Their sceptres—minds that tyranny repell'd: How glorious once! but now how lowly laid! All faded, but their fame—and that can never fade.'

After noticing the immortality which the ancient heroes, poets, &c. have conferred on particular places, the author thus apostrophizes Britain:—

'These have been glorious,—are so still, and we,

Perchance, with other nations, may go down, Though not unspotted, to posterity:

For Albion has high names, that give renown To her,—unfading jewels in her crowns,

That bore her glory o'er the wave afar; The proudest nations trembled at their frown—

Gods of the ocean, thunderbolts of war, From old Hispania's scourge to him of Trafalgar.

'Hampton, and Sydney, Raleigh, Spencer, Gower,

The mighty Magian† and immortal pair‡, Our own blind bard||, of poetry the flow,

Gray, Butler, Erin's minstrel¶, minds that were

All matchless in their line, and who will bear And bid her name to future ages bloom;

Thomson, M'Pherson, Ramsay, Burns, and Blair,

Robertson, Smollett, Beattie, Scott, and Hume,

With him to whom as yet his country gives no tomb*.

'With others, equal in their lustre, whom Our craving eyes would almost wish to see,

Bursting the dull cold fetters of their tomb, Before us stand in all their majesty.

Fond, but vain wish, alas! that ne'er can be! Great as they were, their names alone remain

For us to admire, and our posterity To reverence, when from this world we are 't'en

To lay our fading dust, perchance, where theirs has lain.'

We quote two stanzas towards the conclusion, in allusion to the persecutions of her late Majesty:—

* 'Drake.' † 'Nelson.'

‡ 'Shakespeare.' § 'Beaumont and Fletcher.'

¶ 'Milton.' ¶ 'Goldsmith.'

|| 'Falconer. It is a stain upon his country, that a poet like Falconer, should be without a monument to his memory. Not that the bard needs the aid of the sculptor, to carry his name to future ages; for even when the dust of Colonna has mingled with the sand that is washed by the wave that wrecked him, it will survive.

'Greatness of soul should to the great belong; If not, to whom?—and surely 'twas not well To hate so closely (even had she done wrong)

While living; base, when death had rang her knell.

But when did Mercy with the powerful dwell?

In life's hot pride the adder deadliest stings. Oh, 'tis enough to make the blood reek.'

When we behold that noblemen and kings Have less in them of gods than meaneer earthly things.

'Peace to her spirit! in another clime, More worthy of her than our own, she lies,

Far from the land of meanness and of crime, And the proud dwellings of her enemies.

High to her memory the song shall rise In after years, when purer hearts shall come,

And offer up their generous sympathies; The wreath of sorrow o'er her dust shall bloom,

When weeds alone shall grow round her oppressor's tomb.'

We have drawn somewhat too freely on so short a poem, and, therefore, shall conclude with recommending it as a beautiful tribute to the memory of the late Queen, and one that reflects great credit on the poetical talents of its author.

In our last we gave an account of the taking of the republican capital of Washington, an event which the Americans represent as entirely tarnishing the glory of the British arms, and an indelible stain upon our national character.

We certainly wish that the work of destruction had not been so extended as it was, but still we doubt that our army did anything contrary to the laws of nations; and besides, the facts have been much exaggerated.

Our author, who was an eye-witness, and who writes with great candour, says he could not help admiring 'the forbearance and humanity of the British troops, since, irritated as they had every right to be, they spared, as far as possible, all private property, not a single house in the place being plundered or destroyed, except that from which the general's horse had been killed, and those which were accidentally thrown down by the explosion of the magazines.' The general's horse, it will be recollected, was killed from under him, when accompanying a flag of truce. But one of the most serious charges against the British was that they destroyed the bridge—a noble structure, of nearly a mile in length: now let us hear our author on this point. Speaking of the entry of the British troops, and the dismay occasioned in Washington, he says,—

'They were taken completely by surprise; nor could the arrival of the flood be more unexpected to the natives of the antediluvian world, than the arrival of the British army to them. The first impulse of course tempted them to fly, and the streets were in consequence crowded with soldiers and senators, men, women, and children, horses, carriages, and carts, loaded with household furniture, all hastening towards a wooden bridge which crossed the Potomac. The confusion thus occasioned was terrible, and the crowd upon the bridge was such as to endanger its giving way. But Mr. Maddison, having escaped among the first, was no sooner safe on the opposite bank of the river, than he gave orders that the bridge should be broken down; which being obeyed, the rest were obliged to return, and to trust to the clemency of the victors.'

So that, after all, Mr. Maddison was the republican Rostopchin; and the English were no more guilty of destroying the bridge at Washington, than Bonaparte was of setting fire to Moscow.

The next object of our army, after it had effected a safe retreat from Washington, was to attack Baltimore. Our author paints with much feeling the eve of a battle:—

'There was something in this state of preparation at once solemn and exciting. That we should obtain possession of a place so important as Baltimore, without fighting, was not to be expected; and, therefore, this arming, and this bustle, seemed, in fact, to be the prelude to a battle. But no man, of the smallest reflection, can look forward to the chance of a sudden and violent death, without experiencing sensations very different from those which he experiences under any other circumstances. When the battle has fairly begun, I may say with truth that the feelings of those engaged are delightful; because they are, in fact, so many gamblers playing for the highest stake that can be offered. But the stir and noise of equipping, and then the calmness and stillness of expectation,—these are the things which force a man to think. On the other hand, the warlike appearance of every thing about you, the careless faces and rude jokes of the private soldiers, and something within yourself, which I can compare to nothing more nearly than the mirth which criminals are said sometimes to experience and to express previous to their execution; all these combine to give you a degree of false hilarity. I had almost said painful, from its very excess. It is an agitation of the nerves, such as we may suppose madmen feel; which you are inclined to wish removed, though you are unwilling to admit that it is disagreeable.'

At the very commencement of the attack on Baltimore, General Ross, who, as soon as the firing began, rode to the front, was shot by a rifleman. The Americans, our author says, are, individually, as brave as any people in the world; and their general had taken a good position, but they had not been accustomed to a general action; and hence,—

'It was curious to observe their dread of every spot where a cannon-ball had struck. Having seen the shots fall, I kept my eye upon one or two places, and perceived that each company, as it drew near to those points, hung back; and then assuming, as it were, a momentary courage, rushed past, leaving a vacancy between it and the company which next succeeded.'

Though the Americans maintained themselves with great determination, and stood to receive our fire till scarce twenty yards divided them, yet they would not hazard a charge; but the whole army fell into confusion:—

'Infantry, cavalry, and artillery, were huddled together, without the smallest regard to order or regularity. The sole subject of anxiety seemed to be, which should escape first from the field of battle; inasmuch, that numbers were actually trodden down by their countrymen in the hurry of the flight. Yet, in spite of the short duration of the action, which lasted little more than two hours from its first commencement, the enemy's loss was severe. They stood, in some respects, better than they had done at Bladensburg; consequently we were more mingled with them when they gave way, and were thus enabled to secure some prisoners; an event which their more immediate flight had on the other occasion prevented. In the capture of guns, however, we were not so fortunate. Their pieces being light, and well supplied with horses, they contrived to carry off all except two; both of which would have also escaped, but for the shooting of the leaders.'

'But, considering the nature of the ground which they occupied, the number of killed and wounded in the American army was enormous; while in ours the casualties were much fewer than might have been expected.'

One or two anecdotes connected with this engagement are amusing:—

'It is said that when Admiral Cockburn, who accompanied the army, and attended poor Ross with the fidelity of an aide-de-camp, was in the wood where the latter fell, he observed an American rifleman taking deliberate aim at him from behind a tree. Instead of turning aside or discharging a pistol at the fellow, as any other man would have done, the brave admiral doubling his fist, shook it at his enemy, and cried aloud, "O you d—d Yankee, I'll give it you!" upon which the man dropped his musket in the greatest alarm, and took to his heels.

'It is likewise told of an officer of engineers, that having overtaken an American soldier, and demanded his arms, the fellow gave him his rifle very readily, but being ordered to resign a handsome silver-hilted dagger and silver-mounted cartridge-box which graced his side, he refused to comply, alleging that they were private property, and that by our own proclamations private property should be respected.'

Our army now advanced on Baltimore, but finding that the naval force could not assist them, as nothing but the lightest craft could make their way within six miles of the town, all idea of storming the enemy's lines was given up; the army, therefore, retreated, and the regiment to which our author belonged sailed for Jamaica. While at Kingston, he witnessed, for the first time, one of the beautiful peculiarities of a tropical climate. Darkness had set in, and—

'The air was filled with fire-flies, which emitting a phosphoric light, something similar to the light of the glow-worm, only more red and brilliant, danced around me like sparks from a smith's anvil, when he is beating a bar of red-hot iron. These creatures flutter about with a humming noise, and frequently settle in large swarms upon branches of trees, giving to them the semblance of so many pieces of timber taken newly out of a fire. When viewed by day-light, they are in no way remarkable for their elegance, resembling in the shape of the body a long beetle, which may be seen in the fields after sun-set, without wings or scales. In colour they are a dingy brown, and, like the glowworm, carry their light in the tail.'

'As I had not before chanced to see any thing of the kind, and forgot at the moment that such an insect as the fire-fly existed, I was for a few minutes at a loss to what cause to attribute the phenomenon; and was at last indebted to my negro guide for refreshing my memory on the subject. The effect, however, cannot be conceived without being witnessed. A cluster of two or three glow worms shine so brilliantly, that they will furnish subject for the commendatory eloquence of any one fortunate enough to perceive them together; but their brilliancy is as a farthing candle to the sun, when compared with that of the fire-fly. Not two or three, but thousands of these creatures dance around, filling the air with a wavering and uncertain glimmer, of the extreme beauty of which no words can convey an adequate conception.'

Jamaica was the general rendezvous of the expedition destined to attack New Orleans. This place, though not fortified, presents the greatest obstacles to an invader; and it was, therefore, determined to effect a landing on the banks of the lake, and pushing directly on, to endeavour to get possession of the town, before any effectual preparation could be made for its defence. A flotilla of fifty open boats, under the command of Captain Lockier, was destined for this service:—

‘It was not long before the enemy’s guns opened upon them, and a tremendous shower of balls saluted their approach. Some boats were sunk, others disabled, and many men were killed and wounded; but the rest pulling with all their might, and occasionally returning the discharges from their comrades, succeeded, after an hour’s labour, in closing with the Americans. The marines now began a deadly fire charge of musketry; while the seamen, sword in hand, sprang up the vessel’s sides in spite of all opposition; and sabring every man that stood in the way, hauled down the American ensign, and hoisted the British flag in its place.

‘One cutter, however, which bore the commodore’s broad pendant, was not so easily subdued. Having noted its pre-eminence, Captain Lockier directed his own boat against it; and happening to have placed himself in one of the lightest and fastest sailing barges in the flotilla, he found himself alongside of his enemy before any of the others were near enough to render him the smallest support. But, nothing dismayed by odds so fearful, the gallant crew of this small bark, following their leader, instantly leaped on board the American. A desperate conflict now ensued, in which Captain Lockier received several severe wounds; but, after fighting from the bow to the stern, the enemy were at length overpowered; and other barges coming up to the assistance of their commander, the commodore’s flag shared the same fate with the others.’

The troops were landed on a wretched swamp, incapable of furnishing even fuel to supply their fires, and exposed to a cold pelting rain. While the troops were thus assembling, an embassy was sent to the Chactaws, a tribe of Indians then in alliance with the British:—and our author, who accompanied the embassy, describes it as a most amusing expedition. Having arrived at the settlement, which consisted of about thirty huts, two men came to meet them:—

‘These proved to be the chief and the principal warrior of the tribe; the first an elderly infirm person, and the last a man of fierce countenance, probably about the age of forty. They were not, however, distinguished from their countrymen by any peculiarity of dress; being arrayed, as the others were, in buffalo hides, with a loose scarf of cotton thrown over one shoulder, and wrapped round their loins; the size of their ornaments alone indicated that they were persons of consequence, the King having two broad pieces of gold suspended from his ears, and bracelets of the same metal round his wrists; while the warrior’s ears were graced with silver rings, and a whole Spanish dollar hung from his nose. With these men, Colonel Nickolls, of the marines, who conducted the embassy, was well acquainted, having been previously appointed generalissimo of all their forces; and they, therefore, extended to us the right hand of friendship, and conducted us into the largest hut in the town.

‘The rest of the warriors were by this time roused from their lethargy, and soon began to crowd about us; so that in a few minutes the hut was filled with upwards of an hundred savages, each holding in his hand the fatal tomahawk, and having his scalping knife suspended from a belt fastened round his middle. The scene was now truly singular. There is a solemnity about the manner of an Indian chief extremely imposing; and this, joined with the motions which were meant to express welcome, compelled me, almost in spite of myself, to regard these half-naked wretches with veneration.’

‘Having brought with us an interpreter, we were informed by him that the King declined entering upon business till after the feast. This was speedily prepared, and laid out upon the grass, consisting of lumps of buffalo flesh, barely warmed through, and swimming in blood; with cakes of Indian corn and manioc. Of dishes and plates, there were none. The mirth was brought in the hand of the females who had dressed it, and placed upon the turf; the warriors cut slices from it with their knives; and holding the flesh in one hand, and the cake in the other, they eat, as I thought, rather sparingly, and in profound silence. Besides these more substantial viands, there were likewise some minced-meats of an extraordinary appearance, served up upon dried hides. Of these the company seemed to be particularly fond, dipping their hands into them without ceremony, and thus conveying the food to their mouths; but for my own part, I found it sufficiently difficult to partake of the raw flesh, and could not overcome my loathing so much as to taste the mince.

‘When the remnant of the food was removed, an abundant supply of rum, which these people had received from our fleet, was produced. Of this they swallowed large potations; and, as the spirit took effect, their taciturnity gave way before it; till at last, speaking altogether, each endeavoured, by elevating his voice, to drown the voices of his companions, and a tremendous shouting was the consequence. Springing from the ground, where hitherto they had sat cross-legged, many of them likewise began to jump about, and exhibit feats of activity; nor was I without apprehension that this riotous banquet would end in bloodshed. The king and chief warrior alone still relained their senses sufficiently unclouded to understand what was said. From them, therefore, we obtained a promise, that the tribe would afford to the expedition every assistance in their power; after which we retired for the night, to a hut assigned for our accommodation, leaving our wild hosts to continue their revel as long as a single drop of spirits remained.’

The two chiefs accompanied the embassy back to the army, which was then disembarking with great spirit, on Pine Island; a landing was afterwards made in another place, and the army marched forward to the attack in the dead of night, when it was soon surrounded by a very superior force, and no alternative remained but either to surrender at discretion or beat back the assailants. Such a battle then ensued, as the annals of modern warfare can hardly match:—

‘All order, all discipline, were lost. Each officer, as he was able to collect twenty or thirty men round him, advanced into the middle of the enemy, when it was fought hand to hand, bayonet to bayonet, and sword to sword, with the tumult and ferocity of one of Homer’s combats.

‘To give some idea of this extraordinary combat, I shall detail the adventures of a friend of mine, who chanced to accompany one of the first parties sent out. Dashing through the bivouac under a heavy discharge from the vessel, his party reached the lake, which was forded, and advanced as far as the house where General Keane had fixed his head-quarters. The moon had by this time made her way through the clouds, and though only in her first quarter, gave light enough to permit their seeing, though not distinctly. Having now gone far enough to the right, the party pushed on towards the front, and entered a sloping field of stubble; at the upper end of which they could distinguish a dark line of men; but, whether they were friends or foes it was impossible to determine. Unwilling to fire, lest he should kill any of our own people, my friend led on the volunteers whom he had got around him, till they reached some thick piles of reeds, about twenty yards from the objects of their notice. Here they were saluted by a sharp volley, and being now confident that they were enemies, he commanded his men to fire. But a brother officer, who accompanied him, was not so convinced, assuring him that they were soldiers of the 95th, upon which they agreed to divide the forces; that he who doubted should remain with one part where he was, while my friend, with the rest, should go round upon the flank of this line, and discover certainly to which army it belonged.

‘Taking with him about fourteen men, he accordingly moved off to the right, when falling in with some other stragglers, he attached them likewise to his party, and advanced. Springing over a high rail, they came down upon the left of those concerning whom the doubt had existed, and found them to be, as my friend had supposed, Americans. Not a moment was lost in attacking, but having got unperceived within a few feet of where they stood, they discharged their pieces, and rushed on to the charge. In the whole course of my military career, I do not recollect any scene at all resembling that which followed. Some soldiers having lost their bayonets, laid about them with the butt end of their firelocks; while many a sword, which till to-night had not drank blood, became in a few minutes crimsoned enough.

The English and the Americans were so mingled, that they could scarcely know friends from foes, and more feats of individual gallantry were performed in the course of this night, than many campaigns might have afforded. We lost more than five hundred men, and the field of battle was dreadful. Our author says,—

‘I have frequently beheld a greater number of dead bodies in as small a compass, though these, indeed, were numerous enough, but wounds more disgusting or more horrible, I certainly never witnessed. A man, shot through the head or heart, lies as if he were in a deep slumber; insomuch, that when you gaze upon him, you experience little else than pity. But of these, many had met their death from bayonet wounds; sabre cuts, or heavy blows from the butt ends of muskets; and the consequence was, that not only were the wounds themselves exceedingly frightful, but the very countenances of the dead exhibited the most savage and ghastly expressions. Friends and foes lay together in small groups of four or six, nor was it difficult to tell almost the very hand by which some of them had fallen. Nay, such had been the deadly closeness of the strife, that in one or two places, an English and American soldier might be seen with the bayonet of each fastened in the other's body.’

On the arrival of Sir Edward Pakenham to take the command, a new attack was made, but with force and means quite inadequate. Instead of every thing being ready for the assault, not a ladder or fascine was upon the field:—

‘Seeing that all his well-laid plans were frustrated, Pakenham gave the word to advance, and the other regiments, leaving the 44th with the ladders and fascines behind them, rushed on to the assault. On the left, a detachment of the 95th, 21st, and 4th, stormed a three-gun battery and took it. Here they remained for some time in the expectation of support; but none arriving, and a strong column of the enemy forming for its recovery, they determined to anticipate the attack, and pushed on. The battery which they had taken was in advance of the body of the works, being cut off from it by a ditch, across which only a single plank was thrown. Along this plank did these brave men attempt to pass; but being opposed by overpowering numbers, they were repulsed; and the Americans, in turn, forcing their way into the battery, at length succeeded in recapturing it, with immense slaughter. On the right, again, the 21st and 4th being almost cut to pieces, and thrown into some confusion by the enemy's fire, the 93d pushed on and took the lead. Hastening forward, our troops soon reached the ditch; but to scale the parapet without ladders was impossible. Some few, indeed, by mounting one upon another's shoulders, succeeded in entering the works, but these were instantly overpowered, most of them killed, and the rest taken; while as many stood without were exposed to a sweeping fire, which cut them down by whole companies. It was in vain that the most obstinate courage was displayed. They fell by the hands of men whom they absolutely did not see; for the Americans, without so much as lifting their faces above the rampart, swung their firelocks by one arm over the wall, and discharged them directly upon their heads. The whole of the guns, likewise, from the opposite bank, kept up a well-directed and deadly cannonade upon their flank; and thus were they destroyed without an opportunity being given of displaying their valour, or obtaining so much as revenge.

‘Poor Pakenham saw how things were going, and did all that a general could do to rally his broken troops. Riding towards the 44th, which had returned to the ground, but in great disorder, he called out for Colonel Mullens to advance; but that officer had disappeared, and was not to be found. He, therefore, prepared to lead them on himself, and had put himself at their head for that purpose, when he received a slight wound in the knee from a musket-ball, which killed his horse. Mounting another, he again headed the 44th, when a second ball took effect more fatally, and he dropped lifeless into the arms of his aide-de-camp.’

Every thing that the most determined bravery could accomplish was effected; but, after performing prodigies of valour, our army was compelled to abandon an attack upon works evidently beyond their strength:

‘As soon as the whole army was reunited, and the broken regiments had recovered their order, a flag of truce was dispatched, with proposals for the burial of the dead. To accomplish this end, a truce of two days was agreed upon, and parties were immediately sent out to collect and bury their fallen comrades. Prompted by curiosity, I mounted my horse and rode to the front; but of all the sights I ever witnessed, that which met me there was beyond comparison the most shocking, and the most humiliating.

Within the small compass of a few hundred yards, were gathered together nearly a thousand bodies, all of them arrayed in British uniforms. Not a single American was among them,—all were English; and they were thrown by dozens into shallow holes, scarcely deep enough to furnish them with a slight covering of earth. Nor was this all. An American officer stood by smoking a segar, and apparently counting the slain with a look of savage exultation; and repeating over and over to each individual that approached him, that their loss amounted only to eight men killed, and fourteen wounded.’

The army effected a good retreat, and safely re-embarked; and, soon after, intelligence of peace arrived from England. Our author makes some very acute remarks on the failure of the attack on New Orleans, which was partly owing to the many errors committed, to the misconduct of one regiment, and to the plan of operations being known and anticipated by the enemy.

Although this work is published at a time when the subject has lost much of its interest, yet, as it explains many circumstances respecting the American war, little known or much misrepresented, it will be read with pleasure by every one proud of his country or zealous of the glory of the British arms.

The Modern Church; a Satirical Poem; comprising Sketches of some Popular and Unpopular Preachers.
By John Laureus Bicknell, F. A. S.
8vo. pp. 63. London, 1820.

THE modern church is a most ample field for satire, perhaps no subject more fertile, whether we consider the peculiarities of preachers, the formalities of sects, or the absurdities of their creeds. Mr. Bicknell, though evidently acquainted with all the points on which a satirist might dwell, treats the various ‘modes of faith’ with respect, and only rebukes what less lenient satirists would convert into ridicule. Notwithstanding the grounds on which many secede from the established church, some we admit from very conscientious motives, yet the preachers in all are very much alike; and the illiterate fellow who ‘holds forth’ in a place not larger than a cobbler's stall, which he profanely calls ‘a house of God,’ is as anxious to levy contributions on his hearers, and to obtain a larger field of action, as ever a dean of the church of England was for a mitre.

The ‘Modern Church’ is divided into three parts; the first is a dialogue between a Churchman and a Presbyterian, in which are given 'sketches of some popular and unpopular preachers;' their names are rarely given, but we doubt not there are many who will recognize the fidelity of the portraits; indeed, we think they might have been mentioned by name, as there is so much good nature and christian charity in the satire, that few could take offence at it.

The second part treats on the advantages of the Sabbath, with the description of a country church, and a village tale, not unworthy the muse of Crabbe or the elegant pen of Geoffrey Crayon. The third part enumerates the various religious superstitions of different ages and countries, and concludes with showing the superiority of the Christian religion over all others. The following extract will show the spirit in which the poem is written, and forms a summary of the whole:—

'Oh! that in Christian land, dissent's roots Should strike so deep, and yield such bitter fruits;

That from one sacred code, all good, all wise,
Sect after sect, in daily growth should rise;
Mysterious notes divide and subdivide,
Till jostling tenets push clear faith aside—
That man to scorn his fellow man should dare,
For some fond fancies, "trifles light as air;"
Some verse misprinted, or translator's blot,
A colon added, or a point forgot.'

'This strange, in modern times, the human brain

Such motley whims and fancies should maintain;

That men, who differ wide as day from night,
Should each presume that he alone is right.

'A would-be wisdom, greater than our sire's,
Starts from the sin of steeples and of spires;
Where stood the village stocks, trim meetings
stand,

And chapels, thick as mushrooms, strew the land—

Some man of trade the new-built pulpit mounts,
His nightly struggles with the Lord recounts, Draws from the neighbouring church each brother calif,

Becomes the Seeker of the village chaff;
With triumph seeks, how'er in books unskill'd,
The church deserted, and the meeting filled.

'Oh! silly flocks, may heaven forgive the pride,
That, fondly cherished, turns your steps aside;
That bosom sin, which leads you to prefer,
Under the cloak of gospel minister,
The man who draws your teeth, or mends your cloge,

Or shows your horses, or who worms your dogs.

'So many sects such different creeds profess, (To me scarce known their names, their tenets less.)

I dare not tread the complicated maze,
Enough for me, an uninspired, to gaze.
If, in peculiar points, a hidden charm
In mystery works their wavering zeal to warm;
What fancy paints to them I cannot see;
Their holier rites are still "sealed books" to me,

'Field preachers with the gown and cassock quarrel,
And for the vulgar pulpit mount a barrel,
Symbolic tubs will with the crowd prevail,
Who sometimes think of heav'n and sometimes ale;

But if our faith be sound, our doctrines true,
For men of common sense the church may do.

'Seceders from their church, a leap-frog sect,
Jumpers by name, our sober forms reject;
Caper and dance to some discordant hymn,
As if religion rose from strength of limb.
Here it, ye bellies, who grace the nightly ball,
Ye know not how religion moves ye all!
Your heads or hearts no thought of pleasure fills,
Devotion prompts your waltzes and quadrilles.

'It cannot be for want of written guide,
That erring judgment turns her steps aside;
On every shelf what various books invite,
To clear the mist and set our doctrine right.
Notes, comments, annotations, Scripture facts,
Octavos, quartos, magazines, and tracts,
In boards or bound, of every size and strength,
Of every doctrine, and of every length.
From these may all their helps congenial choose;

Churchmen, Dissenters, Quakers, Deists, Jews.
Here each fanatic mounts his wire-wove throne,
And grasps a shadowy sceptre of his own.

'Though doubtful points their judgment may beguile,
And texts distorted raise your passing smile;
If in essentials ye believe the same,
Their errors shun, but still with caution blame.
The God that pities you, will pardon them,
Nor for an erring head, a soul condemn.

'Still through the mists and storms, which intervene

To cast a transient shade across the scene,
The Scripture, like a phœnix, pure and bright,
Dispenses o'er the world its kindling light;
Proclaims in every tongue the will of Heaven,
And, through the Saviour's love, man's guilt forgiven.

'Amidst a world, which smiles but to betray;
Amidst the bliss that glides our little day;
Amidst the garlands love or marriage binds,
(Blossoms and fruits inconstant as the winds,) Amidst the scenes where joy's gay streamer
waves,

And brilliant meteors light us to our graves:—
Or, 'midst the storms which adverse fortune sends,

To glut our foes, and prove our summer friends;
Amidst the gloom of overwhelming cares,
When nature shudders, and faith almost despairs;

Amidst the deeps, where fallen angels wait
To tempt the struggling soul, and seal its fate;
If to our mental sight unsullied shine
The sacred banner waved by Constantine,
Then, be the conquered world our friend or foe,
We still shall smile, though death direct the blow.'

We could have selected passages of great poetic merit; but those we have quoted need no praise in that respect. The author is evidently a churchman, but without intolerance. What we admire most is the temper and spirit in which the poem is written; and for this it cannot be praised too highly.

THE Chinese were scarcely more pertinacious in exacting from our ambassadors, Lords Macartney and Amherst, the performance of the kou ton, than the Burmhan ministers were in making Captain Cox take off his shoes in entering the wretched palace of the sovereign. He yielded to it through friendship in the outset of his negotiation, but, notwithstanding, protested against the humiliation, and demanded that it should not in future be expected from him. Of the dreadful tyranny of the Burmhan monarch, Captain Cox observed several instances, but none more striking than the following:—

'August 20. In the morning I sent my interpreter to make a last effort with the attahoon of the palace, to deliver a letter from me to his majesty; but both of those he saw positively refused, saying that they dared not. One of them said, his majesty's sword is too sharp; you see a rich man was beheaded but yesterday without committing any fault. He then stated his case; the unfortunate man had been renter of a considerable district, and amassed wealth by oppression; complaints were lodged, he was tried, found guilty, mulcted, and declared incapable of serving his majesty, who ordered him to retire from court, and never appear before him again. Unfortunately for him, his ambition would not permit him to remain quiet in obscurity; his wealth enabled him to find patrons, and through them he twice petitioned his majesty for permission to reside at the capital, and be enrolled as one of his merchants; these petitions were rejected. He, notwithstanding, persevered to a third attempt, and, to insure success, offered a considerable bribe to one of his majesty's favourite daughters to present it, which she undertook. The king, on receiving the petition, was extremely enraged, and exclaimed, I have repeatedly ordered this villain not to presume to approach me; let him be immediately apprehended and confined. This order was given at four o'clock in the evening, and immediately executed. The man, too late dreading the effects of his majesty's wrath, immediately began to scatter his wealth among the royal family; money and jewels were sent to all such as were supposed to have influence; the bribes were received, and he was told not to suffer any apprehension; however, at seven, the same evening, his majesty ordered that he should be beheaded, and his property confiscated. The sentence was immediately carried into execution, and the myrmidons of the palace took possession of his property. His body is exposed above ground, pinned to the earth, where it is left to rot; the king's doctor cut off the tip of his nose, ears, lips, tongue, and fingers, which, with some of his blood, is to form a compound in some medicine of wonderful efficacy in insuring longevity and prosperity to those who are so happy as to obtain a portion of it from his majesty's bounty. This is one of the palace nostrums, of which there are many others equally mystic in the preparation, and wonderful in the operation; these his majesty occasionally dispenses to the credulous multitude. The fall of a rich man proves a source of revenue beyond the amount of his immediate assets. His books are carefully examined, and all whose names are there entered, whether the account has been settled or not, are sued for the full amount of the entry, and are obliged to pay the demand, without daring to demur or question the legality of the action; and names are often inserted on the occasion.

It is a part of the Burmahan policy to give young ladies of the court in marriage to the heirs of the most powerful subjects, with a view to secure their fidelity or report their defection or mal-practices. For this purpose, the queen mother, the queens, and princesses take the courtiers under their protection, and educate them in their respective palaces; a plan which the parents readily agree to, as affording a certain provision for their daughters. Alchemy is a favourite study at the Burmahan court. The mayhoon, who, as well as most of the royal family, is fond of this study, sent to Captain Cox some quicksilver, which was given to him by Mr. Keys:—

His excellency produced a mixture of drugs, which he had been preparing, which was to make people invulnerable; and when perfected, a little held in the hand, would make a person's countenance resplendent with glory, and enable him to fly; and, in spite of all Mr. Keys' arguments, persisted in believing that the transmutation of metals was known in Europe. Mr. Keys told him, that he hoped his excellency would let him into the secret when he had acquired it; which produced another general laugh, and his excellency was so much pleased that he told him, that in case I left the country, if he would stay with them, he would do every thing in his power to make the Burmahan dominions agreeable to him: detailing many sensual temptations, which make the suni of a Burmahan's happiness. Previous to his going to the mew whoon, Mr. Keys had called on the eng's whoon, and had been equally successful in conciliating his good will; he gave him some vulnerary balsam, salves, and lint, and shewed him how to use them; and pleased the old man so much that he made him promise to pass the next Burmahan Sunday at his house, as he should then be at leisure to hear him all day. The Burmahan Sunday, or day dedicated to rest and prayer, falls on the days of new and full moon, and the days of the moon's quartering, so that there are four in each lunar month.

September 28. In the morning, according to appointment, Mr. Keys waited on the eng's whoon, who received him with particular attention, seated him on a couch-bed beside him, and had prepared a collation for him. Baha Shein Atto-whoon, of Hunzawaddy, and some other persons of middling rank were present, and seated on carpets on the floor: the conversation first turned on alchemy; the eng's whoon said that many Burmahans had ruined themselves by such pursuits without being a sufficient warning to others, as they still remained impressed with a belief, that if they could find a certain root they should succeed; but this root was not to be found, and many lives had been lost in searching for it. Niebuhr, I think, mentions a similar opinion prevailing in Arabia, where he met with some miserable adepts, who described a plant that grows on the mountains of Yemen, and tinges the teeth of animals feeding on it yellow, as a species of the plant, the desideratum of alchemists: and, I apprehend, the modern rage for alchemy amongst the Burmahans has been introduced by the Mahomedans itinerant or settled amongst them, who have also impressed them with a belief of the sovereign efficacy of confections, of rubies, the precious metals, and others, the farrago of nostrums which have so long been a fruitful source of profit to the empires of the western world.

I do not, by this, mean to ascribe to the Arabians the invention of these follies, but the renewal of them; as we have indubitable proofs of their having been practised in the east from the earliest periods of time, and the Burmahans themselves boast of ancient books amongst them which treat of the science of transmutations. As a proof of this assertion, it may be sufficient to quote the Shanacrit Ashlogue, translated by Mr. Halhed, in his preface to the Code, or Digest, of Hindoo Laws:—

"From the insatiable desire of riches I have digged beneath the earth, I have sought by chemistry to transmute the metals of the mountains.

"I have traversed the queen of the oceans, I have toiled incessant for the gratification of mousarchs.

"I have renounced the world, to give up my whole heart to the study of incantations; I have passed whole nights on places where the dead are burnt.

"I have not gained one cowry;—be gone, O avarice! thy business is over."

Captain Cox experienced the utmost difficulty in getting his business transacted at the Burmahan court; at length he determined to take his leave. On his return, he passed the new city of Gucayne, and afterwards stopped at the ancient city of Pegann or Pokh-gone, the ruins of which he thus describes:—

"I climbed to the top of an old pagoda, by several flights of narrow ruinous stairs. The two lower stories have a flight in each angle, arched over and steep. The first, about a yard broad, and, in height, from the steps to the top of the arch, about five feet, ending in a small turret placed over the angle, and from the door of which only they receive light. The height of the whole of the first flight and story is about forty feet; the height of the second nearly the same, but the arch lower, and passages narrower; the rest of the steps are on the outside, leading to the top of three other stories, from whence the dome rises. The first two stories are surrounded by a Gothic arched gallery, along which are arranged various images of their deities. The building itself is quadrangular, each face fronting the four cardinal points of the compass, with a projecting portico, and corresponding niches within, wherein is placed on a throne, or altar, a colossal gilt figure of Godoma. The principal figure seems uniformly to be placed to the east, where there is the greatest projection for the shelter of those who come to pay their devotions.

"From the top of this pagoda, I commanded a full view of the remains of the city and adjacent country, which, as far as the eye can reach on the eastern side of the river, is rugged downs; sterile, uncultivated, and covered with scrubby bushes, &c. To the south-east, about three miles inland, a rugged ridge of hills rise abruptly from the common level of the country, and extend about five or six miles north and south. The ruins of the pagodas extend about four or five miles along the banks of the river, and inland, about one mile and a half.

"I counted to the south of me fifty; and to the northward there might be seventy more, distinguishable, of various forms and sizes; but numberless others have sunk into indistinguishable masses of rubbish, overgrown with weeds; and the plain is every where covered with fragments of their materials. Immediately above the bank, where my boat lay, is a part of the wall of the western curtain of the fort; and, about a quarter of a mile to the eastward, parallel to it, I passed through a breach in the eastern curtain, and think I saw the north angle bastion, about seven hundred yards from me. It is probable, therefore, that the fort was not larger than the present one at Amarapura; or they may have fixed dimensions for their imperial forts.

The wall is composed of small bricks and mud, about four cubits thick; and has the remains of a dry fosse without. I sketched the figure of one of the most perfect and the largest I saw. My view is of the base, west front, which measures, at the base, about one hundred and eighty-three feet; and, as nearly as I can judge by my eye, is about two hundred feet in height. Its interior is similar to one I have described, but in better preservation. It is built of bricks of two dimensions; the largest, which are used in the body of the building, are seventeen inches long, eight and a half broad, and three and a half thick. The least are fourteen and a half long, seven and five-eighths broad, and one and a half thick. They are well burnt, and joined together with great skill and nicety. Their surface and edges being ground, perfectly correspond, and lie so close as that not the least cement can be seen between them; if any was used, it must have been a very fine gluten. As far as relates to the exterior surface of the body of the building, the masonry is the best I have ever seen, but I doubt much whether this holds good throughout; perhaps it is only observed in the cannon revetments. The whole building has been plastered over in the usual manner, and it is where this plaster has scaled off, that the workmanship is to be observed.

A little further to the eastward, without the walls of the fort, is another, about the size of the one I sketched, but somewhat different in form. It has been repaired and beautified by the present Prince of Pagan, and is deserving of more attention than any time or circumstances would permit me to bestow on it. It is also quadrangular, but its porticoes project further, and the spire is loftier, and it has two vaulted galleries surrounding it, in the walls of which are numerous niches, filled with various images of their deities. In the four principal centric-niches, are four erect colossal gilt images of Godama, about twenty-five feet in height, standing on the lotos flower. It is remarkable that these have all crisped hair! the poonghees deny that they have any affinity with Caffres. But say that, when Godama assumed the religious habit, he cut off his hair with his sword, leaving it rugged or furrowed, and the features of a genuine Burmian have a good deal of the Caffre cast. These principal niches form a kind of sanctum sanctorum, and are raised off, so as to prevent the too near approach of the multitude. Over each figure is suspended a chattré of dominion. In the vestibule of the western front, is a large stone, with the prints of the feet of Godoma. These are only representations of those sacred impressions which he has left in various parts of the earth, particularly in the Burmian dominions. The following are the rough dimensions which I took of the building, to form a ground-plan from. The outer wall of the portico, fourteen feet thick, breadth of the passage ten feet. Portico or vestibule, length forty feet, breadth twenty-one, height thirty-five, passage of ditto to first cloister or gallery, fourteen feet in length, breadth ten feet. First gallery, greatest length one hundred and forty-three feet, breadth eighty-six, passage thence to the inner gallery fourteen feet, breadth ten feet; inner gallery, greatest length one hundred and one feet ten inches, breadth eight feet six inches. Niche for the idol, breadth twenty feet, depth seventeen feet, height thirty-five or forty feet. The partition wall between the two galleries, and the outer wall also, had several small arches for the passage of air and light at different heights. To get to the second story, it was necessary to creep along a cornice, about fourteen feet above the pavement, and only sixteen inches broad, a risk which neither our devotion or curiosity could tempt us to encounter. I have only to add, that the avenues to the inner cloister, had great folding grated gates; but the only precautions used, are seemingly intended to keep out cattle. We were permitted to traverse and examine every thing without molestation; a few persons, who, I suppose, were slaves to the pagoda, attending us out of curiosity. However, to reconcile them to our measuring, &c., I told them we had nothing of the kind in our country; and if I was not particular in writing down the length, breadth, &c. the people there would not believe that there was such a building in the world. In the two galleries of the lower story, I think there are at least two thousand images in the niches, of stone and wood gulf, the carving tolerable; and in little compartments on the outside of the surbase, were figures in relief, of green varnished pottery, and also on the frieze of the cornice.

With this extract we close as original a work as any that has come before us. While it presents a singular picture of oriental manners, it furnishes much important information for the guidance of future embassies to the Burmian empire.

THE PERCY ANECDOTES.

The twenty-first part of this popular work is devoted to Anecdotes of Beneficence, and contains numerous instances of the exercise of this godlike virtue. It is very appropriately dedicated to Mrs. Fy, who is termed 'the female Howard of her times.' An elegant portrait, and an interesting anecdotal memoir of this distinguished lady, are given in the part. The following are extracts:—

Delicate Generosity.—A French Abbé, celebrated for his wit as well as his political knowledge, was much embarrassed for the sum of five hundred louis d'ors. The Abbé was high-minded, and being constantly at Versailles, he carefully avoided every thing that might lead to the discovery of his embarrassment. Some person, however, whispered the secret to the Queen, the beautiful but unfortunate Marie Antoinette. On the same evening, her Majesty meeting the Abbé at the Duchesse de Polignac's, engaged him in a party at tria-trac, her favourite game, in which she contrived in a short time to lose the sum which her partner wanted; then, smilingly she rose from the table, and relinquished the game, while the astonished Abbé was lost in admiration.

Benevolent Gamblers.—A very respectable gentleman, who had an aversion to cards, but did not wish to seem unfashionable in a family where he often visited, and where public days for play were set apart, found himself under the necessity of playing deep. It was his good fortune, however, generally to be successful. After some years of intimacy, the master of this family took him aside one day, and imparted to him the melancholy secret, that his affairs were in a most embarrassed state. The gentleman expressed his concern at his friend's distress, and entreated him not to despair.

On his return home, he opened a private drawer in his bureau, in which he had highly deposited his winnings at the card tables in his friend's house; and the next day, insisted on refunding the sum this inconsiderate man and his family had lost. It was sufficient to save his friend from instant imprisonment, and to give a turn to his affairs; but he restored it only on condition that they should never play at cards again.

The late General Scott, so celebrated for his success in gaming, was one evening playing very deep with the Count D'Artois and the Duke de Chartres, at Paris, when a petition was brought up from the widow of a French officer, stating her various misfortunes, and praying relief; a plate was handed round, and each put in one, two, or three louis d'ors; but when it was held to the general, who was going to throw for a stake of five hundred louis d'ors, he said, "Stop a moment, if you please, sir, here goes for the widow!" The throw was successful; and he instantly swept the whole into the plate, and sent it down to her.

Many years since, a Mr. Bradshaw had won about 200l. at a gaming table. A gentleman standing behind him, exclaimed, "How happy should I be with that sum!" Bradshaw, without looking at him, handed the purse of money over his shoulder. The stranger took it, fitted himself out for India, and in a few years acquired a large fortune. On his return to England he waited on Mr. B., to whom he made himself known, and offered restitution. Mr. B. however, declined accepting it; but he soon afterwards received from the gentleman a present of much greater value.

A similar incident to the preceding is related of the Comte de Montmorency. He was at an assembly at Montpelier, where there was very high play at Bassot. A poor gentleman who was behind, and saw the constable put three thousand pistoles upon a card, said softly to one who was near him, "Oh, what a sum! it would make me easy for life!" It happened that the constable won; when, turning quick upon the gentleman who spoke, he said, "Sir, I made that stake for you;" and gave him the six thousand pistoles.

Kosciusko.—The hero of Poland once wished to send some bottles of good wine to a clergyman at Solothurn; and as he hesitated to trust them by his servant, lest he should smuggle a part, he gave the commission to a young man of the name of Zeltner, and desired him to take the horse which he himself usually rode. On his return, young Zeltner said that he never would ride his horse again, unless he gave him his purse at the same time. Kosciusko inquiring what he meant, he answered, "As soon as a poor man on the road takes off his hat and asks charity, the horse immediately stands still, and will not stir till something is given to the petitioner; and as I had no money about me, I was obliged to feign giving something, in order to satisfy the horse."

Farniello.—The celebrated Italian singer, Farniello, who was a great favourite with Philip the Fifth of Spain, going one day to the King's closet, to which he had at all times access, heard an officer of the guard curse him, and say to another that was in waiting, "Honours can be heaped on such scoundrels as these, while a poor soldier like myself, after thirty years' service, remains unnoticed." Farniello, without seeming to hear the reproach, complained to the King that he had neglected an old servant, and procured a regiment for the person who had spoken so harshly of him in the anti-chamber. On quitting his Majesty, Farniello gave the commission to the officer, telling him that he heard him complain of having served thirty years; but added, "You did wrong to accuse the King of neglecting to reward your zeal."

Prince Leopold of Brunswick.—In the year 1785, Prince Leopold of Brunswick, son of the reigning duke, lost his life in endeavouring to relieve the inhabitants of a village that was overflowed by the Oder, which had burst its banks in several places, and carried away houses, bridges, and every thing that opposed its progress. This amiable prince was standing by the side of the river, when a woman threw herself at his feet, beseeching him to give orders to some persons to go and rescue her children, whom, bewildered by the sudden danger, she left behind in the house. Some soldiers who were in the same place, were also calling out for help. The prince endeavoured to procure a flat-bottomed boat, but none could be found to venture across the river, although he offered large sums of money, and promised to share the danger. At last, moved by the cries of the unfortunate inhabitants of the suburbs, and being led by the sensibility of his disposition, he took the resolution of going to their assistance himself. Those who were about him, endeavoured to dissuade him from the hazardous enterprise; but, touched to the soul by the distress of these miserable people, he nobly replied, "What am I more than either you or they? I am a man like yourselves, and nothing ought to be attended to here, but the voice of humanity." Unshaken, therefore, in his resolution, and in spite of all intreaties, he immediately embarked with three watermen in a small boat, and crossed the river; the boat did not want more than three lengths of the bank, when it struck against a tree, and in an instant they all, together with the boat, disappeared. A few minutes after, the prince rose again, and supported himself a short time by taking hold of a tree; but the violence of the current soon overwhelmed him, and he never appeared more. The boatmen, more fortunate, were all saved, and the prince alone became the victim of his humanity."

How to Spend a Saturday Evening.—The late Mr. James Bundy, of Bristol, who, from humble poverty, raised himself to circumstances of great affluence, was in the regular habit, on Saturday evenings, of visiting the markets; not as an idle observer, but to do good to the poor. If he beheld a poor person at a butcher's stall inquiring the price of a piece of meat, and then turning away for want of more money, he would call him back, saying, "What can you afford to give?" On being told how much, he would produce the additional sum, and enable the poor man to make the purchase. He would then go in quest of other persons of the same description, and assist them in like manner. It was thus Mr. Bundy spent his Saturday evenings, relieving promiscuously the wants of the poor, who, in return for his humanity and benevolence, offered up prayers and poured blessings upon him. After he had gone round distributing his bounty, he would then purchase pieces of meat for his own poor, or those indigent families whom he visited at their own homes. When he had finished this work of charity and labour of love, he would return home with a glad heart, and recount the blessings he enjoyed above others."

VINDICATION OF DR. GOLDSMITH AND MR. LEIGH HUNT.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR,—A correspondent of yours, two numbers back, charges Goldsmith with having borrowed his 'Hermit' from Dr. Percy's 'Friar of Orders Grey'; if he had consulted the letter to the printer of the St. James's Chronicle, written by Goldsmith, which usually precedes the first-mentioned ballad, he would then have found the charge reversed; but I will quote the doctor's own words:—"Another correspondent of your's accuses me of having taken a ballad I published some time ago, from one by the ingenious Mr. Percy. I do not think there is any great resemblance between the two pieces in question. If there be any, his ballad is taken from mine. I read it to Mr. Percy some years ago; and he (as we both considered these things as trifles at best,) told me, with his usual good humour, the next time I saw him, that he had taken my plan to form the fragments of Shakspeare into a ballad of his own." The delicacy of the doctor in not charging his friend with a plagiarism, and the rest of the letter, are well worthy of the imitation and the perusal of your correspondent.

I will take this opportunity, too, of refusing another accusation of a seer but not less idle kind. A correspondent in your last, who signs himself MODESTUS, first asserts that Mr. Leigh Hunt is the author of a paper on the Fine Arts, which appeared in the London Magazine for July, and then charges him with the gross vanity of writing a laudatory critique on that article in a late Examiner. Now, besides the internal evidence that the original article is not from Mr. Hunt's pen, (for it bears no marks of his peculiar style, and, though it is certainly a very clever paper, is not quite so good as any of the worst productions of his versatile mind,) it is very well known to be from the hand of a Mr. Wainwright, a very young and promising writer, who will, I hope, prove himself all that may be wished, when time and a severer taste have corrected some errors.

But your correspondent, in his hurry to catch Mr. Hunt tripping, has not mentioned the very essence, marrow, and best intention of the article in question; namely, the generous offer of 10l. in favour of a subscription for a very worthy artist: now this is unfair, to say no more of it. It gives me pleasure, therefore, to be able to turn away the brand of disgrace from the forehead of Mr. Hunt, and, at the same time, to drop on the head that deserves it, the crown of approbation. Mr. H., with all his literary faults, is I am glad to say, as incapable of the act charged against him, from intellectual honesty and uprightness, as he is, I am sorry to add, incapable of doing the liberal thing unnoticed, from the superior calls of a large family, and the deprivations which long illness and an inability to use his pen were likely to produce.

It would be as well for both your correspondents not to be in so great a hurry, in future, to charge either a dead or a living author with a gross literary sin.

Wishing 'Modestus' more charity, or no mistaken occasion for displaying his want of it,

I remain, your's, &c. C. W.*

HAPPINESS.

(A Sketch.)

* Some fleeting good, which mocks me with the view.—GOLDSMITH.

HAPPINESS is the goal of each man's progress through life, the boundary which terminates all exertions, fatigues, and undertakings, the certain something which is to compensate for all anxieties; and yet it is that, which few, if any, are satisfied with the possession of. To define what true happiness is would be an Herculean labour. How varied are the ideas which different persons form of this much-desired treasure! and how diversified are the roads which, in their several opinions, lead to it. As on all other subjects of disputation, so it is particularly observable in this case, that the supporters of each side of the question manfully uphold their own peculiar views of happiness, and pursue them with determined vigour. Seldom is reflection suffered to occupy a place in forming this resolution, which is invariably founded on those principles which have predominated in their education, produced their early habits, or created in their imaginations, susceptible of any impressions, a certain character, or personification, of what is familiarly termed HAPPINESS. This, perhaps, may account for so much disappointment to many, when they have realized their utmost hopes, and have actually grasped the object which they had marked out as the climax of their wishes. Did men but examine before they proceed; would they but look more into their own dispositions, than to what they erroneously think will suit them, there might, perhaps, be less dissatisfaction. But men in general do so mistake themselves; they so little understand their own disease of wants and desires, that they, of course, apply an improper remedy, and thereby render abortive their attempts at a cure. The existence of a definite good, denominated happiness, adapted

* Always anxious to correct any error into which we may either have fallen ourselves or been led by our correspondents, we give ready insertion to this letter. We confess that we had neither seen the 'Examiner,' nor read the article in the magazine, but inserted the letter of 'Modestas' on the faith of his accuracy, as we believe him to be very incapable of intentionally accusing any man wrongfully, or of withholding 'honour to whom honour is due.'—Ed.

to all possible cases of the human system, is not denied; the point at issue is, that persons are misled by hasty judgments to choose the wrong path, and consequently arrive at an object, but that object fails to answer their anticipations. Let them exercise discretion, and indulge reflection, in selecting the method, and it is more than probable that the possession will be commensurate with their desires, and prove what they have so anxiously wished, namely, TRUE HAPPINESS. AN ELEGANT EPISTLE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Biography.

MRS. INCHBALD.

It is very rarely that the lives of individuals who devote themselves to literature, present that variety of incident which give interest to biography; to those who wish to trace the progress of the human mind, they, indeed, furnish abundant scope for reflection. It is not, however, merely so with the subject of the present memoir; for although, as a female and an author, she stood in the very first rank, yet her history is not only highly interesting, but in no small degree romantic.

Elizabeth Inchbald was the daughter of Mr. Simpson, a respectable farmer at Staringfield, an obscure village about five miles from Bury St. Edmund's. She was born in the year 1756, and at an early age was remarkable for the beauty of her person and her fondness for reading; to this she was the more inclined, as she unfortunately had such an impediment in her speech, that she was scarcely intelligible to those who were not acquainted with her, and, therefore, she went very little into company.

Having lost her father in her infancy, she was left under the care of her mother, who continued to occupy the farm, and brought up the children with strict attention to their morals. During her many solitary hours, Miss Simpson applied herself sedulously to books, and, anxious to become acquainted with the world of which she read so much, she formed the romantic resolution of visiting the metropolis; but finding her intention did not meet with the approbation of her friends, she seized an opportunity, early one morning, in February, 1772, of eloping from her family. She had previously packed up a few necessary articles in a band-box, and with these she ran about two miles across some fields, and there waited with impatience for the stage that was to convey her to London.

This first important step in her life, will doubtless by many be reckoned a rash and imprudent one. But the common rules of custom and prudence are not the ordinary standard by which minds bent on adventure and experiment are regulated. The difficulties to be encountered form an apology in the breast of the adventurer, and if success attend the experiment, it is followed with admiration.

Miss Simpson was at this time about sixteen years of age, and remarkable for the beauty of her features and the elegance of her figure. On her arrival in London, she sought a distant relation, who had lived in the Strand; but on reaching the place, she was, to her great mortification, told that he had retired from business, and was settled in Wales. It was near ten o'clock at night, and her distress at this disappointment moved the compassion of the people of the house where she inquired, who at her request generously accommodated her with a lodging. This civility, however, awakened suspicion; she had read of various modes of seduction practised in London, and apprehended that she was in a dangerous house. While the poor people were whispering their pity for her youth, and praising her beauty, she, alarmed at her situation, seized her hand-box, and without uttering a single word, rushed out of the house, leaving them to stare at each other, and think their compassion had been misplaced.

Miss Simpson now ran she knew not whither, but being much fatigued and alarmed, she knocked at a house where she saw lodgings to let, and was just on the point of being admitted as a milliner's apprentice, when, to her great surprise and confusion, she saw at her elbow the tradesman from whose house she had just escaped, and who, impelled by curiosity, had followed her. Confounded by this detection, she attempted another escape, but the door was locked, and she was detained as an impostor. Sincerity was all that she had now left, and with a flood of tears she candidly confessed her real situation; but even now her truth was doubted, and, after a threat of being sent to the watch-house, the fair adventurer was dismissed, and left again to wander through the streets of London.

She now walked where chance directed, exposed to all those insults which unprotected females must encounter. At two o'clock in the morning, she found herself at Holborn Bridge, and seeing the stage set off for York, which she understood was full; she entered the inn, pretended that she was a disappointed passenger, and solicited a lodging. Here she remained for the night, and next day was told that the York stage would set off again in the evening. This intelligence having been delivered with an air of suspicion, which was extremely mortifying, she immediately took out all the money she had, to the last half-crown, and absolutely paid for a journey she did not intend to take. The landlady, now satisfied, invited her to breakfast, but this was declined, saying she was in haste to visit a relation. Thus she escaped the expense of a breakfast, and on returning to the inn, said her relation wished her to remain in town a few days longer. By this means she secured her apartment, and while she daily took a walk to purchase what she could afford, it was supposed by the people of the inn that she was feasting with her relation; but, alas! at this time she fasted not, but was in the utmost distress; so much so, that during the last two days of her residence at the inn, she subsisted on two halfpenny rolls, and the water which the bottle in her bed-room contained!

During one of her daily rambles in the metropolis, Miss Simpson attracted the notice of a performer at Drury Lane, who, with some difficulty learning her situation, recommended to her the stage as the most probable means of support, and offered to instruct her. A few meetings having convinced her that his designs were not honourable, she prudently declined his company, but determined to follow his advice. Accordingly, she applied to Mr. King, of Drury Lane, the manager of the Bristol theatre, and having communicated her intention with much stammering, which was increased by her anxiety, the comedian listened to the fair candidate with natural astonishment. She rehearsed a part before him, and many whimsical jests have been related respecting this interview. It seems, however, that Mr. King did not discourage the lady, though he declined to give her an engagement. She next applied to Mr. Inchbald for advice. This gentleman, with whom she had hitherto been unacquainted, but whom she had frequently seen at Bury St. Edmunds, introduced her to another performer, who had purchased a share of a country theatre, and who, struck with her beauty, gave her an immediate engagement without trial. He became also her instructor, and in him she imagined she had found a friend, but she soon discovered the nature of his friendship. Indignant at the dishonourable proposals which he dared to make to her, she hastened to Mr. Inchbald, whose kindness had inspired her with confidence, and informed him of every circumstance. Afflicted by her sorrow, this gentleman endeavoured to soothe it, and recommended marriage as her only protection. 'But who would marry me?' cried she. 'I would,' replied Mr. Inchbald with warmth, 'if you would have me.' 'Yes, sir, and would for ever be grateful.' 'And for ever love me,' rejoined he. The lady hesitated—but not doubting her love, in a few days they were married, and thus unexpectedly she became both a wife and an actress.

Mr. Inchbald first introduced his wife on the stage at Edinburgh, where she continued four years, and performed the principal characters, when she was but eighteen years of age; from which it may be inferred that her previous unsuccessful attempts had proceeded principally from natural impediments and private prejudices. For one who could with tolerable acceptance appear at so early a period as a principal actress, must have possessed a considerable degree of intellect and no common insight into the human character.

At length Mrs. Yates, who had been long in possession of the public favour in London, visited Edinburgh, and became the formidable rival of Mrs. Inchbald, whom she is said to have treated with great incivility: in consequence of which, she and her husband quitted Edinburgh, and passed two years at York.

Mrs. Inchbald's health being now much impaired, a tour to the south of France was recommended, and, after staying abroad about a year, she returned with her husband, with whom she lived in the most perfect harmony. Two years after their return, Mr. Inchbald died. She now returned to London, and continued to act for four years at Covent Garden Theatre. She next visited Dublin, and performed under Mr. Daly's management for some time.

On quitting the Dublin theatre, Mrs. Inchbald returned, once more to Covent Garden, where she continued to act for some years, but suddenly relinquished it, and remained in London in great poverty and obscurity. It was now that she began to devote her attention to dramatic writing. Having written a comedy, she read part of it to Mr. Harris, who disapproved of the piece, and sent it anonymously to Mr. Colman, the manager of the Haymarket, with whom it remained nearly three years unnoticed. Notwithstanding this neglect and discouragement in the outset, she persevered, and, availing herself of the rage for balloons, which existed in the year 1784, she sent him her farce of 'A Mogul Tale; or, the Descent of the Balloon.' The subject, probably, induced Mr. Colman to pay this piece more attention. He read, approved, and accepted it. Its success induced Mrs. Inchbald to remind him of her dormant comedy; on which he immediately replied, 'I'll go home this moment and read it.' He did so, and having approved of it, he gave it the title of 'I'll tell you what,' wrote a prologue for it himself, and brought it out in 1785.

Much has been said relative to Mr. Colman's not having read the comedy when first sent to him; the truth is, that according to that gentleman's own words he admired modest merit, and seldom attended to the five-act productions of anonymous writers, which generally proved the vain attempts of ambitious authors; but he delighted in encouraging young beginners, who, like himself, began with pieces of one and two acts.

The tide of Mrs. Inchbald's fortune now began to turn; no longer perplexed as an actress by precarious engagements—no longer mortified by the neglect of her literary talents, she now saw her prospects brighten. Accordingly, she began to enlarge her rules of economy, and changed her humble lodgings for others more suitable to her circumstances; for it was one great excellence in the conduct of this amiable woman, that she always studied economy, and, accommodating her mode of living to her circumstances, she preserved, even in her humble fortunes, a high sense of moral dignity and independence.

The comedy of 'I'll tell you What' was soon followed by others of a similar character, that of genteel comedy, which was the forte of Mrs. Inchbald, and she seems never to have attempted tragedy, or even tragi-comedy. Her province was humour and satire, occasionally interspersed with the serious, agreeably to the custom of modern comedy. Mrs. Inchbald also wrote several farces, but free from the caricature, buffoonery, and extravagance of farce in general; and they might more properly be termed comedies in one, two, or three acts. We shall now enumerate the dramatic productions of this lady, which will show the fertility of her genius. To those already mentioned, she has added,—Appearance is against Them, a farce, acted at Covent Garden, in 1785.—The Widow's Vow, a farce, acted at the Haymarket, 1786. Such things are a Play, acted at Covent Garden, 1717.—The Midnight Hour, a petit comedy, acted at Covent Garden, 1789.—All on a Summer's Day, a comedy, acted at Covent Garden without success, 1787.—Animal Magnetism, a farce, acted at Covent Garden, 1788.—The Child of Nature, a comedy, ditto, 1788.—The Married Man, a comedy, acted at the Haymarket, 1789.—The Hue-and-Cry, a farce, acted without success, at Drury Lane, 1791.—Next-door Neighbours, a comedy, acted at the Haymarket, 1791.—Young Men and Old Women, a farce, ditto, 1782.—Every One has his Fault, a comedy, acted at Covent Garden, 1793.—The Wedding-Day, a farce, acted at Drury Lane, 1795.—Wives as they were and Maids as they are, a comedy, acted at Covent Garden, 1797.—Lovers' Vows, a comedy, altered from Kotzebue's 'Child of Love,' acted at Covent Garden, 1798.—The Wise Man of the East, ditto, 1799—and To Marry or not to Marry, 1805.

Of all these productions, the very pleasing comedy intitled 'The Child of Nature,' seems to have been the favourite of the fair author, as she appears to have had her eye on it, in one of her later works, of a different character, as well as in her alteration of 'Lovers' Vows;' for the character of Amansia, in the former, may be fairly supposed to have given a turn to the character of Amelia, in the latter.

Mrs. Inchbald retired from the stage in 1789, and from that period until the year 1805, it will be seen she was very actively employed in dramatic writing. In the year 1806, she was engaged to edit a new edition of the British Theatre, with biographical and critical remarks. This work, which consisted of upwards of a hundred plays, acted at the Theatres Royal, was published in twenty-five volumes, 12mo. between the years 1806 and 1809. These were followed by a collection of farces, on the same plan, in seven volumes, and the Modern Theatre, in ten volumes.

There is another department of literature in which Mrs. Inchbald has been no less successful than in her dramatic compositions. We mean novel writing; for, although she has not thought proper to call the pleasing story intitled 'Nature and Art,' a novel, yet it certainly belongs to that class; the story is interesting—the characters are accurately drawn, and the morality sound—its satire is just, the language sprightly, but not fantastic, and the reflections serious without affectation. The 'Simple Story,' and the novel by our author, is characterised by the same simplicity and spirit both as to style and manner, as the former, but the characters are more various, the passions more interesting, and the plot is more intricate and surprising. The story is said to have been a favourite with Mrs. Inchbald, and we are not surprised at it, since we are much mistaken if some of the leading incidents in her own life have not furnished the basis of some part of the story, though diversified by numerous peculiarities, and concealed with much ingenuity.

We have hitherto only spoken of Mrs. Inchbald's literary character, but of her conduct as a woman of honour, even amidst all the gaiety of youth and the powerful influence of a most fascinating person, there is but one opinion. During the whole period of her theatrical engagements, she maintained an unblemished character; and, although the incidents of her life have been the subject of much conversation in the gay world, they never could expose her to the censure of even the most rigid and severe moralist. The worthy part of both sexes, who were honoured with her acquaintance, highly esteemed her worth; her connexion with Mrs. Siddons and Lady Derby strengthened into friendship; and Mrs. Inchbald has left behind her a character that may stand in opposition to the prejudices of such as think that an actress cannot be a virtuous woman. Nothing argues greater illiberality than this common assertion, for it is but justice to observe, that among those who have devoted themselves to a theatrical life, are to be found many persons of the most exemplary conduct.

This distinguished lady, whose talents were of the highest order, and who was an ornament to her sex and country, died at Kensington, on Wednesday, the 1st of August, after a few days' illness. It is matter of sincere regret, that memoirs of her eventful life, written by herself, were destroyed by her own positive direction at her death. Her remains were deposited in Kensington Church Yard, agreeably to her request in her will, which is written with her own hand, and dated the 30th of April, 1821.

This will was registered in the Probative Court on the 17th inst. Probate being granted to Frances Phillips (wife of John Phillips) and George Huggins (her nephew), the executors; her personal property was sworn to be under 6000*l.* in value. Amongst the legacies are—50*l.* to the Covent Garden Theatrical Fund; 50*l.* to Mrs. Isabella Mattocks, late of that theatre; 100*l.* to the testatrix's god-daughter, Miss Cummins, of the Theatre Royal, York; and 20*l.* per annum to a person calling himself Robert Inebald, the illegitimate son of her late husband; 50*l.* to the Catholic Society, for the relief of the aged poor; 20*l.* each to her late laundress and hairdresser, provided they should inquire of her executors concerning her decease; 100*l.* to Mr. Taylor, oculist, of the Sun Office, in the Strand, &c. &c. The residue is bequeathed to her nephew and niece, George Huggins and Ann Jarrett. The testatrix desired to be buried in Kensington Church Yard, between the hours of eight and eleven in the morning; that three mourning coaches may attend her hearse; and that mass and other sacred ceremonies may be performed, usual upon the decease of a Roman Catholic Christian. The will is written with her own hand, and dated the 30th of April, 1821.

SONG,

By a Highlander, the only person saved of the crew of a vessel wrecked on an uninhabited island, in the Northern Ocean, in the year 1703.
FROM THE GALLIC.

Ye storms, whose rude blasts have entomb'd
In the deep,
My friends and companions, why leave me to Weep?
Unshrouded on ocean's green bosom they sleep,
While I live their fate to deplore.
Yet to live amidst those wild, lone, bleak, and Austere,
The loss even of country and friends I could Bear,
But Fate from my bosom my Morag to tear!
'Tis done—and what can Fate do more?
Ye breezes that murmur around my dark cave,
And sport on light wing o'er the soft curling waves!

Do ye visit the vale of the fair and the brave,
By Locklaggan's green flowery shore?
If ye visit that vale, tho' wide seas 'twixt us roar,
Wait my wishes to her I must ever adore—
Ah! heart-rending thought! must I ne'er meet her more
By Locklaggan's green flowery shore!

AULD DOWNIE.

THE BARD'S WISH.

When age descending decks my head
With scattered tresses silvery grey,
And furrowed lines, by sorrow made,
Speak to the gaze a toil-worn day:
Calm may I find some ready bower,
Where contemplation, maid serene,
Brings gladly as her votry's dower,
Fair images of spotless mien!
Though life hath been a rugged way,
And chilly blasts have numb'd my frame—
Spare, Heaven! warm fancy's radiant play—
O spare my heart to sorrow's claim!
Oft 'mid the scene, in frolic mood,
May youth and beauty light disport,
Pleased to beguile the solitude,
Where waning years the virtues court;
With many a song and touching lay,
Renew the memories of my youth,
When fancy saw a brighter day
Than ever shone in hues of truth.
And when my stifling bosom heaves
Its prison'd inmates late farewell,
May spring returning wave her leaves
O'er my lone grave in greenwood dell.

IRISH NEWS,

You may boast of your ladies in feathers and

You may strut in the park overmother'd with

Or sit at the shades drinking wine in its crust;
We have Derry from London and busting at Derry,
And, like good King Stephen, our monarch is merry!
His mind seems so light in its cumbrous day,
It is constantly dancing engagements away.
He is toasted in whiskey, and whiskey inspires
him!
One lady attracts him—another admires him;
One, always supposed he look'd older by years!
And another, how hucksome the actor had appears!

From the cabin to castle his praise is the theme,
Whilst he smiles in the bliss of a flattering dream.
He shakes Larry O'Brien and Paddy O'Whack, And squeezes the hand without coat to the back;
Takes a shock with delight, yet is shock'd to the core,
When they cry—taxing glass is a pig and a hog!
But his heart is real Irish, his speeches the same,
So they drink to St. Patrick, the shamrock, and flame.
The gentry in stars, constellations of earth,
The nobles in garbs of titles and birth,

The deans and their chapters, which seldom are read,
Soldiers forging still in pursuit of their bread;
All are happy! why not so? ay, surely—'tis not quite,
For a troublesome urchin, call'd Cere, is their sprite:
He dodges and haunts them wherever they go—
They would kill him in wrath, but they cannot, you know!

He dozes and wakes, and, as great as a king,
Sits first at the feast and is last on the wing;
In secret or openly, still is he chief,
And joy, where he reigns, is but sudden and brief.

Here are marquesses, baronets, dukes, and esquires,
Arrayed in their honours and full of desires—Desires? yes, I learn from their bowing and scrapping,
And even their servants their betters are spinning:
Place, place! is the theme, friend, I do not mean fish,
Yet 'tis fishing for place, too; some catch as they wish;
Now, for me, I have caught, for my dancing is night,
A fine cold! and, perhaps, you will say, 'that is right'!

I have lost, too—my money? ay, plenty, but more—
Do not laugh—what I never again can restore!
You may guess what a youth, in a splendid hall
Full of beautiful ladies, may lose at a ball,
Where the fanciful shapes and the lightness of feet

Tap and spring on the sleek boards to melody's best;
But of this, more hereafter;—you know I have gone

To see the great bog at Kill-Judy move on;
Jokers say that the King and his suit are afraid Let this bog should approach ere the visit be paid;

But his ladies declare, e'en the consorts of C, Such a movement to England delicious would be!

However, when evening is calm on the coast,
And the leaves of the woods are but gently in motion,

I steal from the bustle of joy for one hour,
To be present with absence, and gather a flower!

As to mornings, like London, the city is still,
Save a few orange-peasants up-climbing the hill,
A few straggling soldiers relieving the guard,
A few noisy fellows unlocking the ward,
A few broken heads lying close to the walls,
A few early wars cried with comical squall,
A few woollen cloaks round their owners' ankles,
And the infants, their baggage, wrapped up in a hoop.

I have seen a few fights with the bludgeon and flint,

And 'tis something more strange—perhaps shook hands and kiss'd!
Ere the combat began—'twas for love to be sure!

And the Irish like cats, cause a wound for a wound.

I saw a few priests hurrying off to the shrine,
With their mouths full of masses, on fuller of wine!

The calling of vigils, the folks but half dead,
To the chapel must lie, to cross forehead and brow.

And I've often seen there a dark feminine eye,
Glimpse humanly, feelingly, archly, and shy.

When her beads she hath dropped to her ground-touching knee,
For the love of her heart, who knelt only to see,
And to mingle his tones, in the chaunt for the day,
With those very sweet whispers so early to pray.
Here are counts and levees, here are dinners and races,
Ungracious partakers, and takers of graces;
Some kiss but the glass and the cup,—there are many
But taste of the lip, which is sweeter than any!
Here are concerts, where music and singing are heard,
And the heart is engaged to the voice of a word;
Cannon firing, bells pealing, mayors trotting about,
Billy Curtis hazzling with angelised shout;
To make us all glad, or to drown us in eyes,
Thalia is mask'd or Melpomene dies;
Of course, exits and entrances, prompters and chat,
With Keen imitations in acting, so Pat.
What with scene-shifting, tongue, my dear,
blarney and honey,
We have thousands of ways to get rid of our money!
I have heard you have inquiries in quest of the truth,
But, in Ireland, such things are but sudge!
and, in south,
What with bob-wig, big-wig, little-wig, and pig-tail,
I care not how soon to old England we sail:
Till we come, may your prospects of pleasure be fair,
But, if clouded in woe, give them hope for despair.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—A new farce was produced at this theatre on Tuesday night, under the title of Five Hundred Pounds. As there is neither novelty in the plot nor merit in the dialogue, we shall briefly observe, that the story turns upon a young spendthrift, who, after devising various expedients to get 500l. at length obtains it by a fraud upon his uncle. The actors did all they could for the piece, but it was received with much disapprobation, and lived but two nights.

HAYMARKET.—On Saturday, after the opera of Fountainbleau, which is admirably performed, a new farcical interlude, in one act, was produced, intitled Match-making. The story, though brief, possesses more interest and variety than usually belong to pieces of this class:—

Mr. Matchem (Mr. Terry), an old bachelor, is possessed with the mania of making matches for all the single people of his acquaintance, though the greater part of them had ended in divorce and separate maintenance. He has a large list of names destined for wedlock: but the chief object of his care is Lady Emily

Courser (Mrs. Chatterley), his niece. He has projected for her a union with Capt. Belmont (Mr. De Camp), a gentleman he has never seen since he officiated as sponsor for him, and whose person, therefore, is quite unknown to him. He sends to the head-quarters of the regiment to which he belongs, to invite him to his house, and the invitation is accepted. But Col. Rakely (Mr. Jones), the commander of the regiment, a man of intrigue and dissipation, gains sight of Belmont's letter, and, in a frolic, determines to circumvent him with his mistress. He employs Belmont on some service, which must prevent, for a few days, the prosecution of his amour, and himself visits Lady Emily, under the assumed name of his inferior officer. Unfortunately for him, Lady Emily, disgusted with the absurd projects of her uncle, determines to accept no lover of his proposing. Rakely, therefore, whose character as a man of gallantry would otherwise have paved the way to his success, loses all chance by personating Belmont. When he is about to declare himself in his own person, Belmont arrives, and, both officers being equally unknown in the family, he is taken for Rakely. Some amusing equivoc arises, which leads to the discovery of the real rank and pretensions of each. Belmont is selected as the happy man by the capricious Lady Emily, partly because Rakely, though under an assumed name, had the misfortune of being first proposed by her uncle, and because, too, she recognizes in him a gentleman who had rendered her an essential service on some former occasion. The chief agent in the different disguises and discoveries is Shuffie (Mr. Oxberry), an old servant of Rakely's.

The merit of this little piece is entirely in the story and in its dramatic situations, for the dialogue does not contain a single attempt at wit or humour. The acting was indeed excellent; the performers were few, but every one seemed a principal, and the success of the piece was complete. When Mr. Matchem, at the conclusion, said that, however he might have hitherto failed in match-making, he hoped in this he had succeeded, the applause was loud and enthusiastic. The house was (as it now is almost every evening) extremely full; but, from the excellent manner in which it is ventilated, the heat was less oppressive than might have been expected.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—A new farcical operetta was produced at this theatre, on Thursday night, intitled A Cure for Coxcombs. It has not the slightest plot, and its merits, in any other respect, are more than equivocal. It was received very coolly, and cannot possibly last more than a few nights.

Literature and Science.

A society for the encouragement of arts, upon a plan nearly similar to that of the British Institution, Pall Mall, has been established at Glasgow.

Gas tar, mixed with yellow ochre, makes an invisible green paint, very useful for preserving coarse wood-work, or other articles where more ornament is required than art alone.

Important Invention.—Mr. William Wood, of Bow, Middlesex, has discovered, that a light felt of hide-hair, or mixture of hide-hair and wool, when saturated with tar, is highly elastic and water-proof, and conceiving the useful application of the substance as a lining for the sheathing of ships, he manufactures it in an expeditious and economical manner, in sheets of suitable size for that purpose; such sheets, being attached to the external sides and bottom of the ship by simply nailing with scupper nails, are covered with planking. The substance he terms adhesive felt. It possesses the property of elasticity in so considerable a degree, as to stretch uniformly without fracture or injury either to its texture or its complete imperviousness to water, whenever the ship's seams are opened by straining in hard weather, or, in more dangerous cases, of the starting of planks or the breaking of timber, as in standing. In all such cases, when, with the usual mode of sheathing, water would necessarily be admitted, to the certain destruction of the vessel, this material forms an impenetrable and elastic case or garment for the whole ship's bottom, and in case of opening the seams by straining, it recovers its first dimensions with the return of the part so opened, or the release of the strain; in such cases it generally falls into the openings in a certain degree, so as to render them afterwards more secure against a recurrence. He also finds it to be a complete protection against every description of worm in all climates; this destructive animal is never known to penetrate the material in the slightest degree. The material, hair, or hair and wool, is prepared for felting by the operation of dressing and bowing, as in the practices of hat-making, and it is felted in the usual manner. Sheets or portions thus felted, are dipped into the melted tar or pitch in certain stated proportions to each other, and then undergo a slight compression, to take away the extraneous or dripping quantity of the material; they are then exposed for a short time to dry and cool, and are then considered fit for use.

New Medicine.—Dr. Siemerling, jun. of New Brandenburg, has published in the Prussian State Gazette, a cure which he has discovered for the wasting of the windpipe. The remedy consists in the use of the milts of pickled herrings, and the manner of employing them is pointed out by the learned doctor, whose wife, it seems, laboured under, and was in the last stage of, this dreadful disease. Upon her the husband made trial of his panacea, which is thus described:—“The patient took every morning, an hour before her coffee, the milt washed in water, and as the use of all other medicines was suspended, the effects of the new remedy could be more accurately observed. For a fortnight her situation remained as before; but from the end of that period, the herring milts being persevered in, all the bad symptoms of a dangerous malady gradually disappeared, and she was wholly recovered in three months; though, in the opinion of the doctor and other physicians, she could not have been expected to linger six weeks at the utmost, in a state of extreme suffering.”

LUCRETIVS.

Austerity, a state of rigid mortification. It is distinguished from severity and rigour thus. Austerity to the manner of living; severity to the manner of thinking; rigour to the manner of punishment. To austerity is opposed effeminacy; to severity, relaxation; to rigour, clemency. A hermit is austere in his life; a casuist severe in his application of religion or law; a judge rigorous in his sentences.

The following epitaph is copied from the tombstone of R. T. Crossfield, M.D. in Hendon Church Yard.

Beneath this stone Tom Crossfield lies,
- Who cries not now who laughs or cries;
- He laughed when sober, and when mellow
- Was a harum scarum heedless fellow;
- He gave to none designed offence,
- So boni soli qui mal y pense.

Bonaparte.—The Gazette of Parma contains the following official order of the widow of Napoleon for going into mourning for his death. On the occasion of the death of the most serene spouse of our august sovereign, which has taken place at St. Helena, on the 5th of last May, her Imperial Highness, the knights and ladies comprising the interior service of the court, the persons of the ducal household and livery, shall wear mourning for three months, divided into three periods or classes, from 25th July to 24th of September, from 5th September to 2nd October, and from the 3rd to the 24th of October. The obsequies shall take place in the chapel attached to the Villa di Sala, the present residence of her Imperial Highness.

P. W. C. C. treats what is evidently a joke seriously; our authority was an American paper, and the double insertion an oversight.

We shall not, this week, follow what W. S. calls ‘the Blackwood way of answering correspondents, by nihil;’ but we really do not understand him. If it is the address to the Deity, to which he alludes, we must observe that it is very unlike any thing we have seen by Klopstock.

Review of New Books.

Letters to Richard Heber, Esq. containing Critical Remarks on the Series of Novels beginning with 'Waterley,' and an Attempt to ascertain the Author. 8vo, pp. 255. London, 1821.

We recollect, in one of Mr. Dibdin's pieces at the Surrey Theatre, a scene between a manager and a dramatic poet, in which the latter is cautioned so to arrange his story, that the audience may not be let into the plot before the half-price. The author of the present work, however, acts differently, for, in the very outset, he develops his whole story, by declaring that the Scottish novels are by the author of Marmion, that is, by Sir Walter Scott, to whom common fame has so long ascribed them. He commences with some general reasons for his belief, and then enters into those details which give it sanction. The instances from which he draws the inference are carefully enumerated in the table of contents, and are principally as follow:—Resemblance between the novelist and the poet in their tastes, studies, and habits of life, as illustrated by their works—both Scotchmen—habitual residents in Edinburgh—poets—antiquaries—German and Spanish scholars—equal in classical attainments—deeply read in British history—lawyers—fond of field-sports—of dogs—acquainted with the most manly exercises—lovers of military subjects—the novelist apparently not a soldier—both men of good society—both their works distinguished by good morals and good sense—both excel in grand and complicated scenes—both have, in many instances, resorted to the same sources of information, and borrowed the same incidents—both fond of mentioning their contemporaries—both delight in frequently introducing an antiquated or fantastic dialect. These are some, though by no means all the points of similarity, on which the author grounds his proof of the works being from the same pen; there are several others still more minute, and all of which tend to the same conclusion. Believing, as we long have done, that Sir Walter Scott, and no other person could be the author of the Scottish novels, we feel comparatively little interest in an essay, labouring to prove that of which we never entertained a doubt, notwithstanding the ingenuity and industry the author has displayed to establish his point.

Although it has not been denied that the Scottish novels passed through the hands of Sir Walter, yet some have asserted, that they are all written by his brother, a major in the army; this we never, for a moment, credited. The author of the work before us does not allude to this report, but he shows, and we think very clearly, that however much the novelist excels in the rich and animated pictures of martial life, yet they are not those of a professed military man, but "exactly such as might have been expected from a man of genius, who had recently conversed with the triumphant warriors of Waterloo, or the field of their achievements, and commemorated those achievements both in verse and prose."

The similarity of incidents between the poet and the novelist, which our author enumerates, are less striking than those of description and peculiarity of expression, a few of which we shall quote. In their battle scenes,—

"In most instances, the conflict is described as seen by persons looking down upon it from a commanding point, and not mixed in the tumult themselves. The situation of Morton and his companions at Loudon Hill, and of Queen Mary, Seyton, and Græme, at Crookstone, are precisely the same with that of the lady and two 'squires, at Flodden; the first shock of battle, at Bannockburn, is witnessed by Edith, from the Gillies Hill; Rebecca watches the attack on Torquillstone, from a window of the castle; and Allanbane looks down upon the battle of Beal-an-doe from a height overlooking the Trosacks: The natural sublime comparison of hostile ranks engaging, in an agitated sea, is introduced in the four passages last referred to, in Rivingham's Narrative of the battle of Marston Moor, in the description of the British line charging at Waterloo, and in the account of a similar movement by the French in Paul's Letters. An approaching body of troops is likened to a dark cloud. "God and the cause!" "God and the King!" are the cries at Marston Moor. At Langside, "God and the Queen!" resound from the one party; "God and the King!" thundering from the other. That fine incident in the battle of Flodden,—

"—Fast as shaft could fly,
Bloodshot his eyes, his nostrils spread,
The loose rein dangling from his hand,
Housing and saddle bloodied red,
Lord Marmion's steed rush'd by,"

is introduced again in the engagement at Loudon Hill.—

"At length horses, whose caparisons showed that they belonged to the Life Guards, began to fly masterless out of the confusion. Dismounted soldiers next appeared, forsaking the conflict, and"—

It is thus a third time touched upon:—"But ere I cleared that bloody press,
Our northern horse ran mangled."

Rodney. Canto 1.

"And again is the Lord of the Isles—"

"The curl hath won the victory.

Lo! where you stood run masteless,
His banner towers above the press."

Canto 6.

"In the fight by Lock Katrine, the armies suddenly shift their ground:—

"As the dark caverns of the deep

Suck the wild whirlpool in,

So did the deep and darksome pass

Derog the battle's mingled mass;

None linger now upon the plain,

Save those who ne'er shall fight again."

Lady of the Lake.

"And thus in the battle of Inverlochy:—

"Allan's threats had forced his own clan from the spot, and all around had pressed on toward the lake, carrying before them noise, terror, and confusion, and leaving behind only the dead and dying."—Legend of Montrose.

"Again,—

"In speaking of the moon as seen in a tempestuous sky, the novelist says, that "she waded amid the stormy and dusky clouds, which the wind, from time to time, drove across her surface."—Antiquary.

"Thus, too, the poet,—

"The wading moon, with storm pretinging gloom,
Now gave and now withheld her doubtful beam."

The Poacher.

"In a clear night,—

"—"The cold light's uncertain, show'et streams," &c.—Lay of the last Minstrel.

"There's a silver shower on the elder's dank."—Monastery.

'The following image in the description of a torrent :—

"Each wave was crested with tawny foam,
Like the mane of a chequered steed."

Lay of the last Minstrel,

is thus in part repeated,—

"She could see the crest of the torrent flung loose down the rock like the mane of a wild horse."—Heart of Midlothian.

Passing over the similarity of description, we shall proceed to notice a few peculiarities of expression which are peculiar to both :—

'The word "peril" is continually used as a verb by both writers.

"Nor peril aught for meagre."

Lady of the Lake.

"I peril'd thus the helpless child."

Lord of the Isles.

"Before that adventure be peril'd and won."

Harold the Dane.

"Were the blood of all my ancestors in my veins, I would have peril'd it in this quarrel."

Waverley.

"To avoid perilling what I prize so highly."

Bride of Lammermoor.

"The person of least consequence—were better perilled."

Abbot.

"I were undeserving his grace, did I not peril it for his good."

Frankoe.

"You may peril your own soul, if you list."

Kenilworth.

Another word of frequent occurrence in both writers, is 'despite.'

"Despite the uncertainty of my situation."

Rob Roy.

"Despite the asseverations of Edie Ochiltree."

Antiquary.

"Despite my Dutch education."

Guy Mannering.

"Despite thine arrows and thy bow."

Lay of the last Minstrel.

"Despite those tides, power, and pelf."

Ibid.

We might pursue the subject much further, but what we have already quoted will suffice to shew the general character of the work, and the minute details to which the author extends his researches in support of his assumption. We have already stated that there is much ingenuity displayed in this essay, and we ought also to add, there is a good deal of silly trifling, and the whole work is much laboured, particularly when we consider it is only to prove a fact which is now scarcely questioned.

Report relative to the Views and Proceedings of the Cymrodorion, or Metropolitan Cambrian Institution, established in May 1820. 8vo. pp. 62. London, 1821.

THAT a society established for the express purpose of 'preserving and illustrating the remains of ancient British literature, and for promoting its present cultivation,' should have been established in London under the patronage of his Majesty, must not only be a matter of congratulation to every Cambrian, but to every one who feels an interest in the literary history of his country. Although little more than twelve months have elapsed since the formation or rather re-establishment of the Cymrodorion*, yet the time has not been wholly occupied by mere measures of regulation; several valuable books and MSS. have been collected, subscriptions to works tending to disseminate a knowledge of ancient British literature have been obtained, and a medal for the best Welsh ode on the revival of the society, has been awarded to one of the seven candidates who contested for it.

The Report contains an account of what has been done already, and what is still in contemplation, and it is enriched with a very able essay on 'Antiquity of the Welsh Tongue,' from the elegant and classical pen of John Humphreys Parry, Esq. who, we believe, has been principally instrumental in establishing the institution. The length of this essay precludes our giving it insertion, and we will not injure it by an abridgment; we shall, therefore, quote some lines written by Mrs. Hemans, the author of the 'Sceptre,' and other poems, entitled—

'THE WAKENING OF CAMBRIA,

Inscribed to the Cymrodorion Society by Mrs. Hemans, on her admission as an Honorary Member of the Institution.

"It is a glorious hour to him

Who stands on Snowdon's monarch brow,
When twilight's lingering star grows dim,
And mist with morn's resplendence glow;

"And, rolling swift before the breeze,
Unveil to his enraptur'd eye,
Girt with green isles and sparkling seas,
All Cambria's mountain majesty!"

"But there hath been a mightier hour!"

"Was when her voice from silence broke,
And, as an eagle in its power,
The spirit of the land awoke!"

"From the far depths of ages gone,
From the low chambers of the dead,
It woke! and brightly moving on,
A sun-beam o'er the mountains spread.

"There were sounds, where'er it passed,
O'er Druid rock and Feiry dell,
Of song upon the rushing blast,
Of minstrelsy's triumphant swell!"

"While, as Eryn's torrent-waves
With joyous music hail'd its way,
Ten thousand echoes from their caves
Burst, to prolong th' exulting lay.

"And thou, O harp! to whose deep tone
Was given a power, in elder time,
A might, a magic all thine own,
The burning soul of Cambria's clime;

"Thou, hallow'd thus by freedom's breath,
To guard her fastnesses on high,
With sounds, inspiring acorn of death,
Instinct with immortality:

* The word signifies 'Associates.'

"Thou to the winds, at that proud call,
Didst pour thine old majestic strains,
As when they fr'd, in bower and hall,
The hounds that were not born for chains.

"And deeply yet that music thrills!"

"Yet lives there, in each pealing close,
Some memory of th' eternal hills,
With their pure streams of radiant snows!"

"The hills, where freedom's shrine of old Hail'd the storm dragon stood;
The streams, which, proudly as they roll'd,
Bore to the deep heroic blood;

"The snows, in their unstain'd array,
Bright o'er each eagle summit spread;
Oh! who shall view their haunts, and say
That inspiration thence hath fled?"

"It is not thus!—each mountain's brow
Bears record of undying names!
How shall your sons forget to glow,
Ye mighty! with your quenchless flames?"

"It is not thus!—in every glen
The soil with noble dust is blest!
Of fearless and of gifted men
The land is one high monument!"

"And think ye not, her hills among,
That still their spirit brightly dwells?
Be thou immortal, soul of song!"

By Dery's waves, in Snowdon's dell's!

"Yes! 'midst those haunts, in days gone by,
The deep wind swell'd with prophetic lore,
Scenes mantled with sublimity,
Still are ye sacred, as of yore."

With our best wishes for the success of an institution, laudable in its plan, and calculated to render no inconsiderable service to literature, we take our leave of the First Report of the Cymrodorion.

Ballantyne's Novelist's Library. Vols. 1, 2, and 3. Royal 8vo. Edinburgh, 1821.

So many editions of the British novels have already appeared, that it seemed almost difficult any longer to present them under a new aspect; this, however, has been done by Mr. Ballantyne, an enterprising bookseller of Edinburgh, who has died since they were commenced. The 'Novelist's Library' is edited by Sir Walter Scott, that extraordinary genius,—

"— whose prolific quill

Can every mouth, with ease, a volume fill."

The three volumes that have already been published, contain the works of Fielding and of Smollet, including, by the former, Joseph Andrews, Tom Jones, Amelia, and Jonathan Wild, which fill the first volume. The second and third are devoted to Smollet, and contain Roderick Random, Peregrine Pickle, Humphrey Clinker, Count Fathom, Sir Launcelet Graves, and the translation of Don Quixote. The labours of the present very able editor, which add an increased value and interest even to works so decidedly popular, consist of biographical notices and critical remarks; the former are brief anecdotal sketches of some of the most prominent features, or most strikingly illustrative of the characters of the individuals. Of the qualifications of the author of the Scottish novels, as a critic on novel writing, no person will doubt; we shall, therefore, leave him in both cases to speak for himself. From the prefatory memoir to Fielding we quote the following extracts:—

‘Fielding, the first of British novelists, for such he may surely be termed, has thus added his name to that of Le Sage and others, who, eminent for fictitious narration, have either altogether failed in their dramatic attempts, or at least have fallen far short of that degree of excellence which might have been previously augured of them. It is hard to fix upon any plausible reason for a failure, which has occurred in too many instances to be the operation of mere chance, especially since, a priori, one would think the same talents necessary for both walks of literature. Force of character, strength of expression, felicity of contrast and situation, a well-constructed plot, in which the development is at once natural and unexpected, and where the interest is kept uniformly alive, till summed up by the catastrophe,—all these are requisites as essential to the labour of the novelist, as to that of the dramatist, and, indeed, appear to comprehend the sum of the qualities necessary to success in both departments. Fielding’s biographers have, in this particular instance, explained his lack of theatrical success, as arising from the careless haste with which he huddled up his dramatic compositions; it being no uncommon thing with him to finish an act or two in a morning, and to write out whole scenes upon the paper in which his favourite tobacco had been wrapped up. Negligence of this kind will no doubt give rise to great inequalities in the productions of an author so careless of his reputation, but will scarcely account for an attribute something like dullness, which pervades Fielding’s plays, and which is rarely found in those works which a man of genius throws off ‘at a heat,’ to use Dryden’s expression, in prodigal self-reliance on his internal resources. Neither are we at all disposed to believe, that an author, so careless as Fielding, took much more pains in labouring his novels, than in composing his plays; and we are, therefore, compelled to seek some other and more general reason for the inferiority of the latter. This may, perhaps, be found in the nature of these two studies, which, intimately connected as they seem to be, are yet naturally distinct in some very essential particulars; so much so as to vindicate the general opinion, that he, who applies himself with eminent success to the one, becomes, in some degree, unqualified for the other, like the artisan, who, by a particular turn for excellence in one mechanical department, loses the habit of dexterity necessary for acquitting himself with equal reputation in another, or as the artist, who has dedicated himself to the use of water-colours, is usually less distinguished by his skill in oil-painting.

It is the object of the novel-writer, to place before the reader as full and accurate a representation of the events which he relates, as can be done by the mere force of an excited imagination, without the assistance of material objects. His sole appeal is made to the world of fancy and of ideas, and in this consists his strength and his weakness, his poverty and his wealth. He cannot, like the painter, present a visible and tangible representation of his towns and his woods, his palaces and his castles; but, by awakening the imagination of a congenial reader, he places before his mind’s eye, landscapes fairer than those of Claude, and wilder than those of Salvator. He cannot, like the dramatist, present before our living eyes the heroes of former days, or the beautiful creations of his own fancy, embodied in the grace and majesty of Kenble or of Siddons; but he can teach his reader to conjure up forms even more dignified and beautiful than theirs. The same difference follows him through every branch of his art. The author of a novel, in short, has neither stage nor scene-painter, nor company of comedians, nor dresser, nor wardrobe,—words applied with the best of his skill, must supply all that these bring to the assistance of the dramatist. Action, and tone, and gesture, the smile of the lover, the frown of the tyrant, the grimace of the buffoon,—all must be told, for nothing can be shewn. Thus, the very dialogue becomes mixed with the narration; for he must not only tell what the characters actually said, in which his task is the same as that of the dramatic author, but must also describe the tone, the look, the gesture, which their speech was accompanied,—telling, in short, all which, in the drama, it becomes the province of the actor to express. It must, therefore, frequently happen, that the author best qualified for a province, in which all depends on the communication of his own ideas and feelings to the reader, without any intervening medium, may fall short of the skill necessary to adapt his compositions to the medium of the stage, where the very qualities most excellent in a novelist are out of place, and an impediment to success. Description and narration, which form the very essence of the novel, must be very sparingly introduced into dramatic composition, and scarce ever have a good effect upon the stage. Mr. Poff, in The Critic, has the good sense to leave out “all about gilding the eastern hemisphere;” and the very first thing which the players struck out of his memorable tragedy, was the description of Queen Elizabeth, her palfrey, and her side-saddle. The drama speaks to the eye and ear; and when it ceases to address these bodily organs, and would exact from a theatrical audience that exercise of the imagination which is necessary to follow forth and embody circumstances neither spoken nor exhibited, there is an immediate failure, though it may be the failure of a man of genius. Hence it follows, that though a good acting play may be made by selecting a plot and characters from a novel, yet scarcely any effort of genius could render a play into a narrative romance. In the former case, the author has only to contract the events within the space necessary for representation, to change the most striking characters, and exhibit them in the most forcible contrast, discard from the dialogue whatever is redundant or tedious, and so dramatize the whole. But we know not any effort of genius, which could successfully insert into a good play, those accessories of description and delineation, which are necessary to dilate it into a readable novel. It may thus easily be conceived, that he whose chief talent lies in addressing the imagination only, and whose style, therefore, must be expanded and circumstantial, may fail in a kind of composition where so much must be left to the efforts of the actor, with his allies and assistants, the scene-painter and property-man, and where every attempt to interfere with their province, is an error unfavourable to the success of the piece. Besides, it must further be remembered, that in fictitious narrative an author carries on his manufacture alone, and upon his own account; whereas, in dramatic writing, he enters into partnership with the performers, and it is by their joint efforts that the piece is to succeed. Copartnership is called; by civilians, the mother of discord; and how likely it is to prove so in the present instance, may be illustrated by reference to the admirable dialogue between the player and poet in “Joseph Andrews,” book iii. chap. 10. The poet must either be contented to fail, or to make great concessions to the experience, and pay much attention to the peculiar qualifications, of those by whom his piece is to be represented. And he who in a novel had only to fit sentiments, action, and character, to ideal beings, is now compelled to assume the much more difficult task of adapting all these to real existing persons, who, unless their parts are exactly suited to their own taste and their peculiar capacities, have, each in his line, the means, and not unfrequently the inclination, to ruin the success of the play. Such are, amongst many others, the peculiar difficulties of the dramatic art, and they seem impediments which lie peculiarly in the way of the novelist who aspires to extend his sway over the stage.

‘After the publication of “Joseph Andrews,” Fielding had again recourse to the stage, and brought out “The Wedding Day,” which, though on the whole unsuccessful, produced him some small profit. This was the last of his theatrical efforts which appeared during his life. The manuscript comedy of "The Fathers" was lost by Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, and, when recovered, was acted after the author's death for the benefit of his family. An anecdote respecting the carelessness with which Fielding regarded his theatrical fame, is thus given by former biographers:—

"On one of the days of its rehearsal, (i. e. the rehearsal of the "Wedding Day,") Garrick, who performed a principal part, and who was even then a favourite with the public, told Fielding, he was apprehensive that the audience would make free with him in a particular passage, and remarked, that as a repulse might disconcert him during the remainder of the night, the passage should be omitted."—"No; d—n 'em," replied he, "if the scene is not a good one, let them find that out." Accordingly, the play was brought out without alteration, and, as had been foreseen, marks of disapprobation appeared. Garrick, alarmed at the hisses he had met with, retired into the green-room, where the author was so-lacing himself with a bottle of champagne. He had by this time drank pretty freely; and, glancing his eye at the actor, while clouds of tobacco issued from his mouth, cried out, "What's the matter, Garrick? what are they hissing now?"—"Why the scene that I begged you to retrench," replied the actor; "I knew it would not do; and they have so frightened me, that I shall not be able to collect myself again the whole night."—"Oh! d—n 'em," rejoined he, with great coolness, "they have found it out, have they?"

"Miller published "Amelia" in 1751. He had paid a thousand pounds for the copy-right; and when he began to suspect that the work would be judged inferior to its predecessor, he employed the following stratagem to push it upon the trade. At a sale made to the booksellers, previous to the publication, Miller offered his friends his other publications on the usual terms of discount; but when he came to "Amelia," he laid it aside, as a work in such demand, that he could not afford to deliver it to the trade in the usual manner. The ruse succeeded—the impression was anxiously bought up, and the bookseller relieved from every apprehension of a slow sale."

As we do not mean to enter into any connected biography of either Fielding or Smollett, we shall only quote one passage relating to the life of the latter, and some of the editor's critical remarks on his works:—

"The person of Smollett was eminently handsome, his features prepossessing, and, by the joint testimony of all his surviving friends, his conversation in the highest degree instructive and amusing. Of his disposition, those who have read his works (and who has not done so?) may form a very accurate estimate; for in each of them he has presented, and sometimes under various points of view, the leading features of his own character, without disguising the most unfavourable of them. Nay, there is room to believe, that he rather exaggerated than softened that natural turn of temper, which was the principal fault of his disposition, and which engaged him in so many quarrels. It is remarkable, that all his heroes, from Roderick Random downward, possess a haughty, fierce, irritability of disposition, until the same features appear softened, and rendered venerable by age and philosophy, in Matthew Bramble. The sports in which they most delight are those which are attended with disgrace, mental pain, and bodily mischief to others; and their humanity is never represented as interrupting the course of their frolics. We know not that Smollett had any other marked failing, save that which he himself has so often and so liberally acknowledged. When unseduced by his satirical propensities, he was kind, generous, and humane to others; bold, upright, and independent in his own character; stooping to no patron, suing for no favour, but honestly and honourably maintaining himself on his literary labours; when, if he was occasionally employed in work which was beneath his talents, the disgrace must remain with those who saved not such a genius from the degrading drudgery of compiling and translating. He was a doting father and an affectionate husband; and the warm zeal with which his memory was cherished by his surviving friends, shewed clearly the reliance which they placed upon his regard. Even his resentments, though often hastily adopted, and incautiously expressed, were neither ungenerous nor enduring. He was open to conviction, and ready to make both acknowledgement and allowance when he had done injustice to others, willing also to forgive and to be reconciled when he had received it at their hand."

The following admirable remarks are made on two of Smollett's works, Peregrine Pickle and Count Fathom. Speaking of the former, Sir Walter says,—

"The splendid merit of the work itself, was a much greater victory over the author's enemies, if he really had such, than any which he could gain by personal altercation with unworthy opponents. Yet by many his second novel was not thought quite equal to his first. In truth, there occurs betwixt Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle a difference, which is often observed betwixt the first and second efforts of authors who have been successful in this line. Peregrine Pickle is more finished, more sedulously laboured into excellence, exhibits scenes of more accumulated interest, and presents a richer variety of character and adventure than Roderick Random; but yet there is an ease and simplicity in the first novel which is not quite attained in the second, where the author has substituted splendour of colouring for simplicity of outline. Thus, of the inimitable sea-character, Trumion, Pip, and even Hatchway, border upon caricature; but Lieutenant Bowling and Jack Rattlin are truth and nature itself. The reason seems to be, that when an author brings forth his first representation of any class of characters, he seizes on the leading and striking outlines, and, therefore, in the second attempt of the same kind, he is forced to make some distinction, and either to invest his personage with less obvious and ordinary traits of character, or to place him in a new and less natural light. Hence it would seem, the difference in opinion which sometimes occurs betwixt the author and the reader, respecting the comparative value of early and of subsequent publications. The author naturally prefers that upon which he is conscious much more labour has been bestowed, while the public often remain constant to their first love, and prefer the facility and truth of the earlier work to the more elaborate execution displayed in those which follow it. But though the simplicity of his predecessor was not, and could not be, repeated in Smollett's second novel, his powers are so far from evincing any falling off, that in Peregrine Pickle there is a much wider range of character and incident, than is exhibited in Roderick Random, as well as a more rich and brilliant display of the talents and humour of the distinguished author."

"To a reader of a good disposition and well-regulated mind, the picture of moral depravity presented in the character of Count Fathom, is a disgusting pollution of the imagination. To those, on the other hand, who hesitate on the brink of meditated iniquity, it is not safe to detail the arts by which the ingenuity of villainy has triumphed in former instances; and it is well known that the publication of the real account of uncommon crimes, although attended by the public and infamous punishment of the perpetrators, has often had the effect of stimulating others to similar actions. To some unhappy minds it may occur as a sort of extenuation of the crime which they meditate, that even if they carry their purpose into execution, their guilt will fall far short of what the author has ascribed to his fictitious character; and there are other imaginations so ill regulated, that they catch infection from stories of wickedness, and feel an insane impulse to emulate and to realize the pictures of villainy which are embodied in such narratives as those of Zeluco or Count Fathom."

The concluding remarks of the prefatory memoir to Smollett, which consists of forty-two pages, are devoted to a comparison of the merits of that able writer with Fielding:—

"Fielding and Smollett were both born in the highest rank of society, both educated to learned professions, yet both obliged to follow miscellaneous literature as the means of subsistence. Both were confined, during their lives, by the narrowness of their circumstances,—both united a humorous cynicism with generosity and good nature,—both died of the diseases incident to a sedentary life, and to literary labour, and both drew their last breath in a foreign land, to which they retreated under the adverse circumstances of a decayed constitution and an exhausted fortune.

• Their studies were no less similar than their lives. They both wrote for the stage, and neither of them successfully. They both meddled in politics; they both wrote travels, in which they shewed that their good humour was wasted under the sufferings of their disease; and, to conclude, they were both so eminently successful as novelists, that no other English author of that class has a right to be mentioned in the same breath with Fielding and Smollett.

• If we compare the works of these two great masters yet more closely, we may assign to Fielding, with little hesitation, the praise of a higher and a purer taste than was shewn by his rival; more elegance of composition and expression; a nearer approach to the grave irony of Swift and Cervantes; a great deal more address or felicity in the conduct of his story; and, finally, a power of describing amiable and virtuous characters, and of placing before us heroes, and especially heroines, of a much higher as well as pleasing character, than Smollett was able to present.

• Upon the whole, the genius of Smollett may be said to resemble that of Rubens. His pictures are often deficient in grace; sometimes coarse, and even vulgar in conception; deficient, too, in keeping, and in the due subordination of parts to each other; and intimating too much carelessness on the part of the artist. But these faults are redeemed by such richness and brilliancy of colours; such a profusion of imagination—now bodying forth the grand and terrible—now the natural, the easy, and the ludicrous; there is so much of life, action, and bustle, in every group he has painted; so much force and individuality of character, that we readily grant to Smollett an equal rank with his great rival Fielding, while we place both far above any of their successors in the same line of fictitious composition.

We ought to add, that this edition of the British Novelists, in addition to the enhancement of its value by its editor, is elegantly printed at the Border Press of Mr. James Ballantyne, brother of the publisher. It appears in bulky volumes with double columns, and is published at a price somewhat moderate.

Summer; an Invocation to Sleep; Fairy Revels; and Songs and Sonnets: By Cornelius Webb. 12mo. pp. 48. London, 1821.

We once noticed a small collection of sonnets, by Mr. Webb, which we thought, gave indications of genius that his present work does not confirm; there is a good deal of natural beauty and simplicity in his poem of 'Summer,' but it shows great carelessness in the language. Some writers may think the inspirations of their genius sufficiently polished, as they emanate, but we will venture to say, that no man ever became a great poet without much care and attention. Of 'Fairy Revels,' we can say nothing better than of Summer. The lament about the fall of England, in the 'Emigrant's Farewell,' is ridiculous; and we think we may safely assure Mr. Cornelius Webb, that allowing him to reach a good old age, he will never live to see the strength of England 'a cause for sport,' any more than it is now, what he says it is, a cause 'for tears.' Some of the sonnets, and a song, in this little volume, are, however, pretty, and we quote the latter in conclusion; as exhibiting our author rather favourably:—

SONG.

'I saw her but a lover's hour,
That beauty without beauty's pride,
As humble as the wayside flower
That blushing droops when fondly eyed—
Her hair was like the golden rays
That fall on mountain-heads of snow;
And angels might with wonder gaze
Upon the whiteness of her brow.

'Her eyes were like twin violets,
The violets of the sunny south,
Which dewy morn delighted weets,
And kisses with delicious mouth.
Her cheek was pale as the wan moon,
The young moon of the virgin year,
When as her night is past its noon,
And the warm-kissing sun is near.

'Her closed mouth was like a bud
Full of the balmy breath of May;
Her voice was like a summer flood
That noiseless steals its gentle way;
Its sound on memory's ear will start
Like to a sweet forgotten tune,
Whose echoes live within a heart
That what it loves forgets not soon.'

Curiosities for the Ingenious: selected from the most Authentic Treasures of Nature, Science and Art, Biography, History, and General Literature. 18mo. pp. 192. London, 1821.

This is a very neat and cheap little volume, and superior in general interest to 'Endless Amusements,' to which we suppose it is intended as a companion. The ample range the editor has taken, has afforded him a store of 'curiosities for the ingenious,' and ingenuities for the curious; and although there are a few 'flat, stale, and unprofitable' articles, yet the selection is, on the whole, made with discrimination and good taste. We select a few articles:—

• Ancient and Modern Prices—In the year 712 and 727, an ewe lamb was rated at one shilling, Saxon money, till a fortnight after Easter. Between 900 and 1000, two hides of land, each containing about one hundred and twenty acres, were sold for one hundred shillings. In 1000, by King Ethelard's laws, a horse was rated at thirty shillings, a mare or a colt of a year old at twenty shillings, a mule or young ass at twelve shillings, an ox at thirty pence, a cow at twenty-four pence, a sow eight pence, a sheep one shilling. In 1043, a quarter of wheat was sold for 60 pence. From these and other similar facts, it is computed that in the Saxon era there was ten times less money, in proportion to commodities, than at present; so that the price of every thing, according to our present language, must have been thirty times cheaper than it is now.

• In the reign of William the Conqueror, commodities were ten times cheaper than they are at present; and hence we cannot help forming a very high idea of the wealth and power of that monarch. For the revenue of William the Conqueror was four hundred thousand pounds per annum, every pound being equal to that weight of silver. Consequently, the whole may be estimated at one million two hundred thousand pounds of the present consumption, a sum which, considering the different value of money between that period and the present time, was equivalent to twelve millions of modern estimation.

• The most necessary commodities do not seem to have advanced their price from William the Conqueror to Richard I.

• The price of corn in the reign of Henry III. was nearly half the price in our times. Bishop Fleetwood has shewn, that in the year 1240, which was in this reign, four pounds thirteen shillings and sixpence was worth about fifty pounds of our present money. About the latter end of this reign, Robert de Hay, rector of Souldern, agreed to receive one hundred shillings, to purchase to himself and successors the annual rent of five shillings, in full compensation of an acre of corn.

• Butchers' meat, in the time of the great scarcity in the reign of Edward II. was, by a parliamentary ordinance, sold three times cheaper than our mean price at present; poultry somewhat lower, because being now considered as a delicacy, it has risen beyond its proportion. The mean price of corn, in this period, was half the present value; and the mean price of cattle, one eighth.

• In the next reign, that of Edward III. the most necessary commodities were, in general, about three or four times cheaper than they are at present.

'In these times, knights, who served on horseback in the army, had two shillings a-day, and a foot archer sixpence, which last would now be equal to a crown a-day. This pay has continued nearly the same, nominally, (only that during the commonwealth, the pay of the horse was advanced to two shillings and sixpence, and that of the foot to one shilling; though it was reduced again at the restoration,) but soldiers were comparatively of a better rank formerly.

'In the time of Henry VI. corn was about half its present value; other commodities much cheaper. Bishop Fleetwood has determined, from a most accurate consideration of every circumstance, that five pounds in his reign were equivalent to twenty-eight or thirty now.

'In the time of Henry VII. many commodities were three times as cheap here, and in all Europe, as they are at present; there having been a great increase of gold and silver in Europe since his time, occasioned by the discovery of America.

'The commodities, the price of which has risen the most since, before the time of Henry VII. are butchers' meat, fowls, and fish; especially the latter; and the reason why corn was always much dearer in proportion to other staples, according to their prices at present, is, that in early times agriculture was little understood. It required more labour and expense, and was more precarious than it is at present. Indeed, notwithstanding the high price of corn in the times we are speaking of, the raising of it so little answered the expense, that agriculture was almost universally quit for grazing, which was more profitable, notwithstanding the low price of butchers' meat. So that there was constant occasion for statutes to restrain grazing, and to promote agriculture; and no effectual remedy was found, till the bounty upon the exportation of corn; since which, above ten times more corn has been raised in this country than before.

'The price of corn in the time of James I. and consequently that of other necessities of life, was not lower, but rather higher than at present; wool is not two-thirds of the value it was then, the finer manufactures having rather sunk in price by the progress of art and industry, notwithstanding the increase of money.'

The same letter communicated an account of an extensive natural hot-bed near Dudley, in Staffordshire, which is heated by means of the slow combustion of coal, at some depth below the surface. From this na-

ON THE MODERN POETS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

OUR readers may, perhaps, recollect the grave declaration of the Edinburgh Review, in an article on Scott's edition of Swift, that the writers who flourished in the reign of Queen Anne had been completely outwitted by authors of the present day, and that they had no chance of ever regaining the estimation in which they were formerly held.

The reason alleged by the ingenious critic for this victory of the moderns was, that there now existed a taste for stronger excitement and deeper emotion than such writers as Pope, Swift, and Addison could supply. Now, without stopping to inquire whether this 'taste' denotes a sound and healthy or a depraved and sickly appetite, and admitting the fact that Scott can boast of more readers than Pope, the real reason appears plainly this, that the reading public has increased at least a hundred fold since the last century, by a prodigious influx from the middle classes, whose taste, very naturally, leading them to delight in novels, romances, and the 'hoc genus omne' of the circulating library, it as naturally leads them to delight in Ladies of Lakes and Lords of Lies;—for what are these meritorious productions to an English reader, but romances in rhyme?

There is, however, another and a numerous class of readers, principally consisting of young ladies in the higher circles, to whom grim barons and bald-headed monks are but tame and insipid personages. Their double distilled, highly rectified feelings cannot be satisfied but by the perpetual adhibition of that 'strong excitement' furnished by the stimulants of rage, lust, despair, madness, and murder: happy England, when such are the longings of thy daughters; and happier still, when a British Peer is raised up to gratify them.

In such a state of things, can any one be surprised that Wordsworth is not popular? i. e. popular in the Edinburgh sense, which estimates a man 'non pondere sed numero' of his admirers. In this sense he never can be popular; for to suppose him a universal favourite, would imply that every individual was gifted with the power of appreciating the highest excellencies of poetry,—an event very desirable, but not very probable. Mr. Wordsworth may, however, console himself under present neglect, by reflecting that such was the fate of his great model, to whom at last the centuries to come were yielded for renown. For, after all, good poetry is sure of obtaining, in the end, the applause it deserves. The public has often raised some authors to undue eminence, and depressed others who ought to have been exalted, but a succeeding age has seldom failed to rectify the error. Who was more popular in his day than Darwin, and yet who reads him now?

It is observable that Mr. Southey, in some of his earlier productions, was borne away by the stream of popular taste and wrote in compliance with it, as may be seen in his Thalaba, Curse of Kehama, &c. His Roderic, however, is more than an atonement for the temporary subjection of his genius to models which his better taste must have condemned.

From Mr. Southey the transition is natural to Mr. Coleridge, and in speaking of this gentleman must it not be deeply lamented, that one who can write so well, should write so little? that the author of the finest tragedy our stage has seen for a century, should remain totally inactive, at a time too, when he might walk the course? Those who consider the influence (and it is by no means a small one) of the theatre over taste and morals, will not think the assertion extravagant, that he who, in the drama of Remorse, could display such powers of exerting and purifying the passions, is not morally justified in allowing this precious talent to rust unemployed, when so noble a field is open for its exertion, and in which he has absolutely no competitor.

Of Thomas Moore, who can deny that he possesses an unlimited empire over grace, elegance, and beauty; pathos might be added were it not too often deformed by a pining, whining, effeminacy, totally repugnant to the strong, but manly (and perhaps somewhat rugged) feelings of Englishmen, who, in general, look with very unequivocal contempt on the 'charming agonies of love.' And this will always be an insuperable bar to Mr. Moore's attaining the height of his fame; his muse is decidedly oriental. Had he been born in the flowery regions of the East he would have recited his lays to enraptured monarchs, contending who should bestow the highest honors on him,—a guedon, we fear, he cannot look to receive from any European potentate.

It now only remains to speak of Crabbe, an author, who disdaining all the common-place characters of poetry, has shewn what powerful effects may be produced by agents hitherto supposed too homely and vulgar to excite any of the loftier passions; who, that has once read it, can forget the terrible emotions aroused by this poet in the fate of Peter Grimes? What is principally remarkable in Mr. Crabbe, is the great range of his powers; he can describe guilt and suffering, innocence and joy, the hardened ruffian and the gentle country maid, with the same forcible pencil. There is also another peculiarity in him. His dramatic personae are all thoroughly and completely English, so English, that it may be doubted if a foreigner could ever enter fully into their spirit. This nationality (similar to that of Scott's novels*), will secure the existence of Mr. Crabbe's poems, as long as the English character remains unchanged. T. G.

* We say Scott's novels, for it is absurd to ascribe ignorance on the subject. There is no other person capable of writing them but Sir Walter, and they will be his sure and certain passport to posterity.

ESSAY ON METRICAL PROSE.

THE vocabulary of polite literature has but three names to designate all the various compositions which are included by that species of language, called poetry, viz. metrical prose, blank verse, and rhyme. The first is emphatically called metrical, though, in fact, metre or measure is common to all three, as they are all species of poetry, which, properly speaking, is measured prose.

Of these, rhyme is clearly distinguished from both the others, by the attribute of symphony in its final syllable, i. e. that if pronounced simultaneously, they would have the same sound. The distinction between metrical prose and blank verse is not quite so obvious, but a little consideration will shew us in what respect they differ, as though they are both metrical, yet it is easy to see that their metre is of a very different kind.

I do not know if any writer ever attempted to give a precise criterion, whereby we might distinguish these two poetical sisters; but to me it appears evident that it consists in this—that in blank verse the metre observes a given law; in the other it observes none. The regular return of the same metres, in the same order, and at stated periods, or after a certain number of intervening lines, I call the law of that metre. It is this regular return of the same metres, which constitutes blank verse, and by this it is always distinguishable from what is usually denominated metrical prose. Thus the law of the Miltonic metre, which is the simplest possible, is that in which the same metre returns every line. In the following lines:—

There was a little bird upon that pile,
It perch'd upon a ruined pinnacle,
And made sweet melody,
The song was soft, yet cheerful and most clear,
For other note none swell'd the air but his,—
A lonely anchorite!

The law of this metre is, that the same metre shall return every third line; and, therefore, three lines are the period of this law.

Having thus settled this criticism, which, heretofore was, I confess, to me a desideratum, we may now proceed to compare these two species of language, with respect to the excellence possible to be attained in each, by beings of our finite abilities. I would here caution my reader against supposing that I mean to institute any comparison between blank verse and the metrical prose of the moderns. This latter is only a species of metrical prose, and which being devoted exclusively to the expressing of passion or sentiment, I would beg leave to call by the name—rhapsody, i. e. the irregular expression of passion. But it is no reason that because moderns have chosen to confine this species of language to the expression of passion alone, it should, therefore, be incapable of embracing much higher subjects than our passions, and engaging much higher faculties of the mind than our imagination. The Bible is a continued series of reasoning, in most eloquent metre.

But to return, the reader will do well to recollect the rule which I gave in my last paper for determining that species of language in which the greatest excellence is possible to be attained by finite beings such as we are. It was this: that in which the proportion of pleasurable qualities possible to be by us attained, to the difficulties necessarily incurred by attaining these qualities, is greatest; for it will be granted, I presume, that the language into which we may infuse most pleasurable quality, with the least difficulty, is that most likely to be brought to the highest perfection among us.

Now, in order to apply this rule to the subject under consideration, let us compare the pleasurable qualities possible to be by us infused into both metrical prose and blank verse, as also the difficulties in their composition; or in other words, since, as I have shewn, blank verse is only metrical prose under the restraint of a given law, let us inquire what the latter gains and what it loses, what new difficulties are created and what old ones avoided, by the introduction of that law?

The only qualities possible to be introduced by a regular return of the same metres, are two; uniformity of sound, which, to a certain degree is pleasing to the ear; and order or system, which is an intellectual gratification.

The qualities lost, are variety of sound, simplicity of structure, and freedom of expression. Of these, the two first are necessarily opposite to the above two qualities introduced by the law, and, moreover, are lost exactly in the proportion that these latter are gained. So that, so far, the introduction of the law cannot be considered either as an advantage or a disadvantage. But there remains still, on the side of the quality lost, freedom of expression, ease or natural grace; so that, on the whole, metrical prose is a loss in pleasurable quality, by the introduction of a law or regularity in its metre.

Again; the difficulties of composition are wonderfully increased by this law, as is evident. The necessity of so disposing and choosing your words, as that they shall agree in their order to a given rule, introduces a difficulty not only in the selection of your words, but moreover in that of your ideas. You are compelled absolutely to reject beautiful ideas, on account of the impossibility of expressing them in words which will preserve the law of the metre.

There might be a good deal more said upon this subject, but I believe I have already fatigued the reader with this abstract speculation; and, therefore, I will conclude these essays by observing, that as it has appeared from investigation, that metrical prose, by subjecting itself to the law of blank verse, diminishes its pleasurable qualities, and increases the difficulties of its composition; it thereby renders less excellence attainable by us finite agents, than when in its primitive state.

I feel no hesitation, therefore, in saying, that it is yet in the power of man, to carry this species of language to an extent of perfection which no other yet invented could attain.

A touch at sublimity—infancy—its follies—internal commotion—its consequences—school ation.

How sweet, how doubly sweet are the days of childhood; how pleasant the scenes of those young years, when all is life and lightness, and joys come trooping on in all the richness of variety; what streams of laughing gladness flow into the remembrance, at the mention of that time,—that beloved time of buoyancy and brightness, which trips up our very sorrows with a smile, and founds our pleasures on the ruins of a tear. Alas! how fleetly do they pass away; how evanescent their delights: springing into existence in all the glow, and splendour, and gay revelry of some soft fairy vision, so soon—too much in its similitude—to die away into the air. Oh! golden time; oh! happy days; why do you fly so quickly? why do you leave us for dreary shadows and fearful sorrows, for cares, and troubles, and vexations of spirit? Earth! earth! thou art the same; thou art still as fresh, as blooming, and delightful; thy fields are as green; thy flowers do bloom as beautiful, the sun shines upon thee as brightly; and yet dost thou seem changed. Oh! man! here is thy wisdom! Oh! sin, here is thy curse!—

Oh! Pegasus! oh! most valorous Pegasus, whither, in the names of all that is wonderful, art thou wending; verily, thou hast been prosing, Pegasus; yea, and that woefully, and if we go on at this rate, heaven only knows where we shall be by-and-by! Let us descend into denser regions, my most sweet Peg, ere we do dislocate our respective noses—try we a trot, just a dog-trot or so, and then shall we right-pleasantly proceed. Once more!

As I progressed my way into days and months, I of course became the idol of every heart; the theme of every tongue; as usual, there never had been, nor would be, so sweet and beautiful a babe;—perfection! I beat all to nothing; I was fed upon sugar and honey, and all that was sweet did they administer unto me; eager as to anticipate my infant whims before they could be expressed, so to stifle the wants which thickened with every growing moment, so to pamper my green appetite to utter loathing, they speedily exhausted all that could fascinate, and lost all power to please. Unluckily, the pith of things in the eye of childhood is variety, sweet variety; when, therefore, they could no longer satiate my unharnessed desires, and no more glut my passionate cravings, what could I do but roar! 'roar as it were any nightingale; then was I hugged and comforted, then was I so kind and be-prattled, that my young ears, loathing all human caresses, spurned at the very hand that fostered me. And yet my poor mother thought me an angel—and so indeed did other folks; the only difference was the kind.

To recount all the beautiful exploits of my veriest infancy, or to enumerate those delightful traits, which, whilst they picture me at home as but few removes from an actual cherubim, displayed me to all beside as a supreme pest—is, to say nothing of a somewhat treacherous memory with respect to such remote periods, not my intention; the pleasure might be nothing to speak of, and the profit, perhaps, questionable. My parents, however, loved me with exceeding great love, and each had a distinct and trifling elaborate method in its display : but the worst of it was, they could never agree about the right one. Your cherubims are, certes, mortal enemies to household quiet. Thus, as I grew into years, home became a scene of eternal petty civil and contention, arising only from a mis-applied and over-reaching tenderness ; and that which had been regarded as the prospect of a future blessing, sunk into the reality of an ultimate curse. It is hard, it is bitter for the heart to question a parent's discretion, or to murmur at the consequences which a loose and unrestrained affection will assuredly entail ! Too often, alas ! are we thus compelled, and feel with redoubled severity the ills to which they have made us so sensibly alive, and from which they have vainly striven to shield us by their over-kind and fallacious endeavours. Oh ! did they but reflect how wholesome to a child is salutary correction, surely their hearts would prompt the exercise of a sterner love. My good Aunt Rebecca would now and then lift up her hands and eyes with a simple 'good gracious,' and pass on wondering how all would end. My father, from a doating fondness, began to regard me almost with apathy ; and my mother, thinking me neglected and forsaken, clung to me with a more impassioned tenderness, cherished me under all his cold reproofs, and nourished and encouraged me in all the extravagancies of youth. I became, in a word—and it is a simple and eloquent one—a spoiled child. My father, sickened by such 'foolery,' determined on the expedient of a public school, and bitter to my mother's heart was our parting ; there, however, I exhibited pretty nearly the same attributes which had characterised me when a cherubim ; was the same headstrong, fiery, and ungovernable imp as ever ;—corrections and reproofs, to say nothing of more tangible arguments, were continually flowing from the master's lips and cat-o'-nine tails ; but where, where is the lash that can eradicate the propensities of an uncultivated heart. Every cut and every chiding seemed but the more deeply to infix the inclination to obstinate and determined mal-practice. I do not mean to say that my disposition was radically evil, or that I was criminally culpable ; but, as I had disregarded the endowments of private commendation, so I spurned at the application of public chastise-

ment. Admonition might here have effected all, because my pride would have then been pleased, but that was a commodity they dealt not in. Disgrace followed all my pretty pranks, in every form an aged head couvenant in such matters could devise ; and, at last, I considered myself as fairly goaded on to the acceptance of every opportunity which occurred in frolic and mischief. I had, at various occasions, received many threats, that my offences should be made the subject of parental examination, and an accident soon effected the due execution of these so often-repeated promises.

Some handful of academic ragamuffins, of whom, as usual on such occasions, I was the chosen leader, had been indulging in the harmless recreation of relieving some apple trees from the burthen of their fruit, in a delightfully secluded orchard in the neighbourhood—nothing could equal, as we had imagined, the security in which we were performing this charitable office ; a rascally cobbler, however, secreted in the hedge (for what purpose he, and the ditch beneath, best knew), had witnessed the whole proceeding. Oh ! had we witnessed him!—from the most disinterested motives imaginable, he disclosed the crime and perpetrators to the farmer, who of course, preferred his dolorous complaint ;—a sneaking coward, to save his own ignominious back, turned king's evidence, and I of course stood forth in all my wrosted glory. The menaced punishment was soon performed, and the next post brought me a packet of heavy denunciations, accompanied by the usual discretionary powers to the chief priest of the synagogue. Indigestible tasks and corporal inflictions speedily followed. I was removed to the solitude of a small chamber, exquisitely situated for the indulgence of pensive meditation. Here I was permitted to revel in the exuberance of my fancy, and luxuriate in all the charms which darkness could afford. There was one thing, however, which solaced me in my gloom and cheered me in all the hours of my imprisonment. The cobbler, that thrice-acursed cobbler,—schemes, plans, and devices came thronging to my mind in every form that revenge, deep and delicious, could project ;—of these, one presented itself as a fit preliminary to the connected series I intended at different opportunities to perform—for my brain, unable to select one as equaling the measure of his villainy, sought by a mass of embryo expedients to effect in number what it needed in magnitude. My punishment could not last for ever, and I patiently awaited the day of liberation. I came—and my first business was to reconnoitre the strength and forces of the enemy, and calculate the method of attack. I was not long in drawing the proper conclusions, nor was it difficult to secure the assistance of certain staunch friends, on whose integrity I could rely.

Crispin's abode formed the corner of a small and unfrequented street, and his shop or rather shed seemed admirably contrived for our purpose. It projected from the house, and was deliciously calculated to display, from three points of the compass, all that passed within,—a hedge lay at a few yards distance, to which we could soon fly to observe the result of our manoeuvres. The elder boys of the school were allowed a short ramble of an evening, whom, from the deep contrition I had evinced, I was soon allowed to join ; and as my desires to make to my benefactor all proper acknowledgments, were urgent and impetuous, the first night of my release was to witness the commencement of our operations. By means of a day-boy, we had procured an old pistol, slightly loaded with blank cartridge, the exercise of which was to fall, with all its consequences, to my peculiar province ; two others were to be provided with a couple of decent-sized syringes, well charged with sheep's blood, whose noses were to be fitted to the bolt-holes of the window so as to effuse the little man with their contents at the moment when the pistol was discharged ; we were then to seek concealment in the opposite hedge, and await the result of this partial requital for past services. The evening at length came,—beautifully dark it was ; the neighbours, from the silence and quiet of all around, appeared to be more than ordinarily industrious. Hard at his vocation, and piously chaunting a hymn to the god of gin-and-twopenny, sat the snug rascal, nothing dreaming of his destroyers without. Silently we crept beneath the glass and paper frame-work of the shed, there to abide the most auspicious moment. To give more freedom to some exquisite quaver which ever and anon proceeded from his thrush-like throat, Crispin would elevate his visage, cast up his huge grey eyes, and throw a dying look towards some cobweb in the corner of his stall. This was the signal for dispatch. In an instant the pistol was fired—the blood poured in upon him in all directions, and he rolled upon the ground, like a cask of table-beer, struck with mute astonishment. His hymn was soon changed into a bull-like bellowing, and lustily did he roar out, 'Murder, murder! thieves! help! fire, murder!' The screams of his ribs, and the lamentations of the victim, speedily brought the neighbourhood about their ears. Oh! it was very pleasant to behold the mighty rush and gathering of the town,—all was now dimmy and consternation, nothing was heard but the shriekings of the women and the queer yells of the men,—whilst dozens of frightened souls rushed around all quarters, proclaiming the murder of Peter Puckle, the cordwainer; whole hots of surgeons, physicians, and 'pharmacians, flew in all directions. Into the shed they poured, and poor Peter was well nigh strangled in the universal endeavour to disrobe his outward man; the multitudinous thronging of the charitable reached pretty nearly to absolute suffocation. The strings of Peter's apron had somehow become embarrassed round his shoulders, (such he had none,) so that conflicting parties were making rapid strides towards extinguishing what little remained of life in their opposite exertions to remove the all-resisting agas; and had not some thoughtful dog, with a happy presence of mind, seized a knife which lay close by, the joke had soon been tragically terminated; this, therefore, he laid about him in all directions, to the infinite peril of all around, and thus was a new fire opened. The unhappy rascal of a cobbler had clapped his waxy hands upon his face immediately on the original salute, which subsequently straying, in his trials at extrication, had literally covered him with blood all over; so that the doctors were at a dead fault in search for the wound,—it baffled every effort,—nor until a notable little barber had suggested the propriety of mowing down the bristles on his pate, could they devise any expedient to clear up the mystery. This was adopted in no time, and now the unfortunate devil was to be subjected to a new torture; luckily he had long been motionless, and the barber, bating the wiry quality of the stubble, performed the operation without resistance or inconvenience, excepting every now and then an occasional jerk of the elbow, occasioned by the anxiety of the spectators to view the spectacle below. A plentiful supply of soap and water, with the incidental application of a scrubbing brush, at length completed the process; when lo! and behold, never pumpkin exhibited a more unbroken uniformity. It was now clear that the wounds were lower down, and to work again they went; ladies, of course, here withdrew; but, alas! their efforts were vain and not until all possible means had been exhausted was the pursuit relinquished as utterly hopeless. After a lapse of some little time, however, Crispin began to show some signs of animation, and a deep long-winded and dolorous sigh bursting from the very bottom of his bowels, seemed to afford him an evident relief. The good people soon began to smell something very like a hoax, and turned to each other with looks of amazement and inquiry; and it was not till the young folks began to joke and titter, and the old to drop off one by one, that we thought it prudent to depart, and chuckle in secret at the success of our exploit.

*PRETTY MAIDS!!

THIS is a call that most good early rising cockney house-wives, at six o'clock of life or another, obey. 'It conveys so much sweetness and good-humour, that all who hear it hurry up from the kitchen, or down from the garret, to be its recipients. It has stronger charms than the toilet, is more effective than the romance, and combines all the powers of the Athenian oracle. 'Milk! below,—pretty maids!' uttered from a red-faced Cambrian girl, in a court, one morning, so completely toned my feelings for beauty, that I have relinquished the idea of studying lectures on the fine arts, or anatomy at Brookes's. Perhaps the reader would wish for an instance or two of 'pretty maids!' For his edification in his warfare towards the realms of prettiness, he may have five or six, since it was my lot to be arrested by many. The first pretty maid! that came to the door to be greeted by day-light and mild cream, most delicately thin, was an old decrepit Frenchman, who, from his remarkable appearance, could be none other than a lineal descendant of the famous Monsieur Tomon, 'that the jocosse king said was never heard of more!' 'Vare cold, vare cold,' said he, as he pulled his night-cap over his ears, took his milk-jug, and withdrew. I shall never forget how much I was captivated with this pretty maid!

The second tender-looking creature was a Mrs. Angel, who kept a coal-shed, and, from her familiar acquaintance with King Coal, Coke, and Blackwood, I felt no hesitation in classing her immediately with her predecessor, as a 'vare pretty maid'!

But the third must have been handsome is that handsome door;—he was a native of those eastern climes where the face is black, and the teeth are white, whose hair could not imitate the fretful porcupine nor tongue catch Tully's bonied eloquence. The milk-maid had called him 'pretty maid!' many times before he shewed 'his shining morning face,' and, it should seem, 'like snail, he crept unwilling to'—the door; for another almost invisible 'pretty maid' was exercising that elegant weapon, a mop, at his heels, with the sweetest accents that ever drop from a smoke-jack.

The fifth, delectable enchantment was an uxorious member of that society of vestals, commonly called Quakers. The gracious friend, O. N., was eclipsed in this 'pretty maid'! From this 'intercourse of looks and smiles' which Milton gave to the happy pair in Paradise, from 'Lady Ananias' and 'Isabel Leers,' the spirits and the Beasts never exchanged with purer brightness than between the bonny lass and this 'pretty maid'! The meeting and the farewell were both silent;—the operations passed, as if by the influence of mechanism; with a yoke so easy the pails grew light.

It was with difficulty I obtained even a side-long look at the sixth 'pretty maid'! It was Miss Moses. She was a neat little figure, or rather had been so the previous night, at Master Levi's wedding. By half concealing herself behind the door, I guessed she had a pretty carriage. An accident which is sometimes very useful to beauty, caught her sleeve in the chain of the passage, and its effect was truly riveting to me. She smiled and I was slain; she laughed and I revived. I determined to visit the Rabbi, and bless her with sulems, but the charm was dissolved. She wanted an eye and 'a' that.

Now, reader, it is evidently clear, how many 'pretty maids!' there are to be met with in this populous world. Go to the exhibition—pretty portraits!—but they are not for anybody's! Oh shut. Go to the theatre—but scenes are full of illusion;—it is candle light. Go and mix with the quality; glance round the elevated circles, they are over-painted. Then extend your research into the best educated classes of society, where scientific reading is cultivated with domestic precepts, passions are checked by sweetness of temper, hearts are won by improving conversations, duties practised for great moral purposes, and the whole deportment regulated for the wisest ends. Here,—here, I have at length found a 'pretty maid!'—Go and do likewise; nor place any reliance on the capricious invocations of the milky daughters of Erin and Cambria.

VULGAR ERRORS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I believe, in an early number of your journal, you corrected some vulgar errors in the law. I now send you a list of a miscellaneous description; and though, perhaps, in town they may not be prevalent, yet I can assure you, there is scarcely one that I have enumerated, which is not fully credited in the country. I am, &c.

EBORACENSIS.

There is a vulgar error that the hare is one year a male and another female; and that the wolf, if he see a man first, suddenly strikes him dumb. To the relations of this, Scaliger wishes as many blows as at different times he had seen wolves without losing his voice.

That men are sometimes transformed into wolves, and again from wolves into men. Of this vulgar error, which is as old as Pliny's time, that author exposes the falsehood.

That there is a nation of pigmies, not above two or three feet high, and that they solemnly set themselves in battle to fight the cranes. Strabo thought this a fiction; and our age, which has fully discovered all the wonders of the world, as fully declares it to be one.

The race of giants, too, seems to have followed the fate of the pigmies; and yet what shall we say to the accounts of Patagonia?

A writer in the Gentleman's Magazine, for June, 1771, vol. 41, p. 231, refutes the following errors, asserting that the scorpion does not sting itself when surrounded by fire, and that its sting is not even venomous: 'that the tarantula is not poisonous, and that music has no particular effects on persons bitten by it, more than on those stung by a wasp;' 'that the lizard is not friendly to man in particular, much less does it awaken him on the approach of a serpent;' 'that the remora has no such power as to retard the sailing of a ship by sticking itself to its bottom;' 'that the stroke of the cramp-fish is not occasioned by a muscle;' 'that the salamander does not live in fire, nor is it capable of bearing more heat than other animals;' 'that the bite of the spider is not venomous,—that it is found in Ireland too plentifully,—that it has no dislike to fixing its web on Irish oak,—and that it has no antipathy to the toad;' 'that the porcupine does not shoot out his quills for annoying his enemy, he only sheds them annually, as other feathered animals do;' 'that the jackall, commonly called the lion's provider, has no connection at all with the lion,' &c.

The following may also be noticed as vulgar errors:—That should a glass-house fire be kept up, without extinction, for a longer term than seven years, salamanders would be generated in the cinders. That the mole has no eye, nor the elephant any knees. That a barnacle, a well-known kind of shell-fish, which is found sticking at the bottom of ships, should, when broken off, become a species of goose; old writers, of the first credit in other respects, have fallen into this mistaken and ridiculous notion; and we find no less an authority than Holinshed, gravely declaring that with his own eyes, he saw the feathers of these barnacles, 'hanging out of the shell, at least two inches.' That it is not lawful to go about with a dark lantern; this error probably originated from Guy Fawkes's lantern, in the Gunpowder Plot. That the manna sold by the apothecaries is of the same sort as that which fell from heaven to feed the Israelites. That the tenth wave is greater or more dangerous than any other, and that the tenth egg is the largest. That swans sing sweetly a little before their death, and that the basilisk is generated from a cock's egg hatched under a toad or serpent. All these are vulgar errors of considerable antiquity, and although they are contrary to common sense and every day's experience, yet are they traditionally conveyed from parent to child with the utmost fidelity.

ADDISON'S IMITATIONS.

[The following letter, which we quote from the Monthly Magazine, was written by that able commentator and critic, Bishop Warburton. It is highly curious, and addressed to Mr. M. Concanen, who, it will be recollected, assisted Warburton in his attacks on Pope, for which he obtained a place in the Dun-ciad. The letter had been successively in the hands of Dr. Mark Akenside, and Mr. Malone.—Ed.]

Letter from Mr. W. to Mr. M. Concanen. DEAR SIR,—Having had no more regard for those papers which I spoke of, and promised to Mr. Theobald, than just what they deserved, I in vain sought for them through a number of loose papers that had the same kind of abortive birth. I used to make it one good part of my amusement in reading the English poets, those of them I mean whose vein flows regularly and constantly, as well as clearly, to trace them to their sources; and observe what ore, as well as what effluve and gravel they brought down with them. Dryden, I observe, borrows for want of leisure, and Pope for want of genius; Milton out of pride, and Addison out of Modesty. And now I speak of this latter, that you and Mr. Theobald may see of what kind those idle collections are, and likewise to give you my notion of what we may safely pronounce an imitation; for it is not, I presume, the same train of ideas that follow in the same description of an ancient and a modern, where nature, when attended to, always supplies the same stores, which will authorize us to pronounce the latter an imitation; for the most judicious of all poets, Terence, has observed of his own science, Nihil est dictum quod non sit dictum prius: for these reasons, I say, I give myself the pleasure of setting down some imitations I observed in the Cato of Addison.

Addison. A day, an hour of virtuous liberty is worth a whole eternity in bondage.

Act 2, scene 1.

Tully. Quod sit immortalitas consequens presentia periculi fugam, tamen ex majore an fugienda esse videatur, equo distulit esset servitus.

Philipp. Or. 10.

Addison. Bid him disband his legions, Restore the commonwealth to liberty, Submit his actions to the public censure, And stand the judgment of a Roman senate: Bid him do this, and Cato is his friend.

Tully. Pacem vult? Arma deponat, regem, deprecietur. Neminem equiorum reperiet quam me.

Philipp. 5.

Addison. — But what is life?

'Tis not to stalk about, and draw fresh air From time to time—

'Tis to be free. When liberty is gone, Life grows insipid and loses lost its relish.

Act 3, scene 3.

Tully. Non enim in spiritus vita est: Sed in nulla est omnino servitute.

Philipp. 10.

Addison. Remember, O my friends, the laws, the rights,

The generous plan of power delivered down From age to age, by your renowned forefathers,

O never let it perish in your hands.

Act 3, scene 5.

Tully. Hanc (libertatem acit) retinente quæso, quiritis, quam vobis, tanquam hereditalem, majores nostri reliquerunt.

Philip. 4.

Addison. The mistress of the world, the seats of empire,

The nurse of heroes, the delight of gods.

Tully. Roma domus virtutis, imperii dignitatis, domicilium gloriæ, luce orbi terrarum.

De Oratore.

The first half of the 5th sc. 3d act, is nothing but a transcript from the 9th book of Lucan, between the three hundred and the seven hundred lines. You see by this specimen the exactness of Mr. Addison's judgment, who, wanting sentiments worthy of the Roman Cato, sought for them in Tully and Lucan. When he would give his subject those terrible graces which Dion Hallicar complains he could find no where but in Homer, he takes the assistance of our Shakespeare, who, in his Julius Cæsar, has painted the conspirators with a pomp and terror that perfectly astonishes. Hear our British Homer:—

Between the acting of a dreadful thing

And the first motion, all the soul's rim is

Like a phantasm, or a hideous dream.

The genius and the mortal instruments

Are then in council, and the state of man

Like to a little kingdom, suffers then

The nature of an insurrection.

Mr. Addison has thus imitated it:—
O, think what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods!
O, 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
Filled up with horror all, and big with death.

I have two things to observe on this imitation: 1. the decorum this exact master of propriety has observed. In the conspiracy of Shakespeare's description, the fortunes of Cæsar and the Roman Empire were concerned. And the magnificent circumstances of—

'The genius and the mortal instruments
Are then in council,'

is exactly proportioned to the dignity of the subject. But this would have been too great an apparatus to the description of Syphax and the rape of Sempronius, and therefore Mr. Addison omits it.

2. The other thing more worth our notice is, that Mr. A. was so greatly moved and affected with the pomp of S.'s description, that, instead of copying his author's sentiments, he has, before he was aware, given us only the marks of his own impressions on the reading him. For,

'O, 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
Filled up with horror all, and big with death,
are but the affections raised by such lively images as these.

— All the int'rim is Like a phantasm, or a hideous dream.'

And
'The state of man, like to a little kingdom, suffers then
The nature of an insurrection.

Again, when Mr. Addison would paint the softer passions, he has recourse to Lee, who certainly had a peculiar genius that way. Thus his Juha—

'True, she is fair, O how divinely fair!
coldly imitates Lee, in his Alex: thus,
'Then he would talk: good gods, how he would talk!'

I pronounce the more boldly of this, because Mr. A. in his 39th specimen, expresses his admiration of it. My paper fails me, or I should now offer to Mr. Theobald an objection against Shakespeare's acquaintance with the ancients, as it appears to me of great weight, and as it is necessary he should be prepared to obviate all that occur on that head; but some other opportunity will present itself. You may now, sir, justly complain of my ill manners in deferring till now, which should have been first of all acknowledged due to you, which is my thanks for all your favours when in town, particularly for introducing me to the knowledge of those worthy and most ingenious gentlemen that made up our last night's conversation.

I am, sir, with all esteem,
Your most obliged friend and humble servant,
W. WARBURTON.

AN INFANT SOVEREIGN.

HENRY VI. was only nine months old when he began his reign. At the first Parliament that was held, Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, declared the cause of calling it, and, in allusion to the king, said, 'that as all perfections were comprised within the small number six, since God had made all things in six days, so his divine majesty was to accomplish the good beginnings of the famous 5th Henry, in the 6th Henry, his son.' In the third year of this king's reign, when the war against France was still carried on with various success, the Protector and Council thought it necessary, in order to engage both lords and commons more zealously in their interests, to bring the infant king into the house; and, accordingly, on the day of their meeting, he was carried through the city, on a great horse, to Westminster. Being come to the palace, he was from thence conducted to the House of Lords, and sat on his mother's knee on the throne. 'It was a strange sight,' says Speed, 'and the first time it ever was seen in England, an infant sitting in his mother's lap, and before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of sovereign direction in open parliament.' The Commons being called, the Bishop of Winchester, then Lord Chancellor, opened the cause of the summons. For the head of his discourse, he chose these words, gloria, honor, et pax, omni operanti bonum, which he divided into three branches. On his second division, relating to sound counsel, he urged this text, Salus ubi multa consistit, and told them that an elephant had three properties: the one in that he wanted gall; the second, for that he was inflexible, and could not bow; and the third, in that he was of a most sound and perfect memory; all which properties he wished might be in all counsellors. That for their wanting a gall, they might be thereby free from all malice, rancour, and envy; by being inflexible that they should not stoop to any reward, nor in judgment respect any person; and of a sound memory, that they, by calling to mind dangers past, might prevent perils to come. His last topic for the relief of the king; he urged that it ought to be done with all readiness of mind, considering that God, by the young prince, his chosen vessel there before them, had not only governed them in safety, but had also given them many honourable victories and conquests; all which ought to enforce them more willingly to offer, that their grants should be more readily taken.

KENILWORTH.

In the Bodleian Library there is a small volume, printed in 1584, entitled 'the Copie of a Letter, written by a Master of Arte of Cambridge, to his Friends in London, about some proceedings of the Earle of Leicester, and his Friends in England.'

This letter contains the following brief notice of the death of the Countess of Leicester, which, it will be recollected, forms the basis of the romance of Kenilworth.

'Onlie for the present I must advertise you; that you may not take holde so exactlie of al my L. doings in women's affairs, neither touching their marriages, neither yet their handbndry.

'For first his Lordship hath a special fortune, that when he deireth any woman's favour, then what person so-er standeth in his way hath the luck to die quicklie, for the finishing of his desire. As for example; when his lordship was in full hope to marrie her Ma: and his own Wyfe stood in his light, as he supposed; he did but send her said, to the house of his servant

 Foster of Cummor by Oxforde, where shortly after she had the chauce to fall from a paire of staires, and so to break her neck, but yet without hurting of her hooide, that stood upon her heade.—But Sir R. Varney who by commandment remayned with her that day alone, wyth one man onlie, and had sent away perforce all her ser-vantes from her to a market two miles off, he (I say) with his Ma. can tel how she died, wth Man being taken afterward for a fellowie in the Marches of Wales and offering to publish the manner of the murder, was made away priville in the prison. The wyfe also of Balde Butler, Kinsman to my L. gave out the whole fact a little before her death. But to returne unto my purpose, this was my Lorde's good fortune to have his wyfe die at that time when it was like to turne more to his profit.'

FAREWELL.

TUNE.—Largo Water.

FRIENDS of my soul! friends of my heart!
 Since fate declares we soon must part,
 Let mirth and humour, ere we go,
 Once more give smiles to every brow;
 This festive hour be friendly's shrine,
 And from this sparkling rosy wine,
 Once more libations let us pour,
 Before we part to meet no more.

(Thou first best gift of heaven above!
 Thou bright celestial beam of love!
 How quick, at thy benign controul,
 Despair and anguish fly the soul!
 Hail, friendship! hail! without thy aid,
 This world were all a dreary shade;
 Thy voice can every ill beguile,
 And teach e'en grief to wear a smile.)

Farewell! a long and last farewell!
 What pangs within that word 'farewell'!
 Ye dear companions of my heart,
 We meet no more, alas! we part—
 Yet let us rejoice that we have met,
 And in our breasts remembrance sweet
 Pull off arise, till life decays,
 Of former happy happy days.

Adieu for me, where'er I go,
 The social hours I've spent with you,
 When sparkling wit and smiling mirth
 Forgot that care was on the earth;
 And friendship crown'd the generous bowl,
 And sweetly flowed from soul to soul,
 Shall in my glowing bosom dwell—
 And so farewell! a last farewell!

ALDO DOMING.

TO *****.

Come, dry those tears, enough has been
 To sorrow paid by those blue eyes;
 Enough of grief we have seen,
 To bid us softer moments prize.
 Come to my heart, it ne'er has beat
 For others as it beats for thee,
 And let me hear thy lips repeat
 Their vows of faithful love to me.

Come, cease those sighs, I cannot bear
 The heaving of thy breast with mine;
 Thou feel'st the heart that throbbeth there,
 And know'st that it is solely thine.
 Then lay to mine thy burning cheek,
 From thee I feel no wish to roam,
 Nor will thy heart another seek
 Than mine, its lov'd its dearest home.

Come raise those eyes of tender blue,
 And let them bleed with mine their beams,
 And dream that woe we never knew,
 Our grief is lighter than it seems.
 Another and a better day,
 A happier one is ours, I ween,
 When all our care shall fade away,
 And seem as it had never been.

FLATTERY.

Founded on an incident in the Sentimental Journey.

'Delicious essence! how refreshing thou art to nature.' STERNE.

In shelter from a pelting shower,
 Two ancient ladies stood
 Waiting until the rain should cease,
 And stop its pouring food.

In mean attire a man advanced,
 Their charity to crave;
 In accents sweet, with humble voice,
 The suppliant begs their aid.

'Ladies, between you both,' said he,
 'Two shillings do me give—
 May every blessing on you show't,
 Contended may you live.'

'Two shillings,' shrill exclaimed the one,
 And 'shillings two,' the other;
 'It ne'er can be—why, sure the man
 Must be a very robber.'

'A robber, lady fair, I'm not,
 But a poor man and true,
 I scarce could ask a smaller sum
 From such great dames as you.'

A little softened by his words,
 'We have no change,' said one,—
 'I'd gladly do't,' the other said,
 'But pause I've left at home.'

'My fairest ladies, say not so,
 The poor assist to live;
 God prosper then the joys that give
 Can, without change, man give.

'Tis lovely charity that makes
 Your eyes the morn eclipse,
 'Tis goodness makes the ruby's glow
 Seem paler by your lips.'

No more they now dispute the point,
 'T' relieve they both are willing,
 And differ who shall have the praise
 That duty of fulfilling.

The contest's o'er—two gave the one,
 The other gave two more;—
 Our suppliant bows,—instead of two,
 Sweet Flattery gained him four.

TO ———.

THE bee is chidden, for that in his providence
 Of the merely selfish things of life, he hath neglected the pleasures thereof and its sweeter enjoyments, leaving to others the more delectable office of collecting these sweets, whilst he is dull within his cell. Inducements are mentioned, and at the name of his favourite flower, his bosom rising, and he goes forth singing and very lively; but he is rebuked, for that this flower is in possession of another, and advised rather to return than seek such unholy loves.

From th' intricate tho' gainful,
 Thy wax-wrought knavery,
 From sweetness and from painful,
 Come forth, thou drowsy bee!
 Long season thou'st been rearing
 Thy scientific bowers,
 And o'er the future peering,
 Forget the present flowers.
 Come, rouse thee from thy slumbers,
 And shake thy trumpet wing,
 In small sonorous numbers,
 Thou thou poet, sing!
 O'er od'rous bells and blossoms,
 See others how they fly!
 And pillow'd by sweet bosoms,
 They murmur as they lie.

The coronet fresh o' the fountain,
 The lily l' the vale,
 Queen daisy on her mountain,
 And primrose prink the dale.
 The time's scythe-mocking myrtle,
 The rose in blushes dress'd,
 Like virgin without kirtle,
 Laid in her lover's breast.
 Sweet-pea's blanch snood—thou minion!
 Aye, now thy breast's on fire!
 Thou spread'st thy flimsy pinion,
 And wak'st thy meadow lyre.
 Thou fool! will nought content thee
 Less than such flow'r divine?
 Repent ye, ah! repent ye,
 Whilst yet the pow'r is thine.
 What, tho' aspirant aerys
 On most Hyblæan wing,
 With rival breath, sweet favours
 Into her bosom bring!
 Her beauteous head reclining
 Upon majestic stem,
 Ambitious pale, entwining
 Her floral diadem.
 Tho' odours amaranthine,
 Rapt on empyreal bowers,
 Her slender limbs might grant thine,
 'The Queen o' graceful flowers!
 Yet see! churl coyness gathers—
 Back, to thy cell again!
 Her bosom is another's,
 Thy song is all in vain.

LOVE IS LIKE AN AIR-BALLOON.

ELLEN's face is soft and fine,
 Ellen's voice is pretty.
 Underneath the cluster'd vine,
 Far, far away from city;
 She sang and harp'd a doctile tune,
 'Love is like an air-balloon.'

First, with gas, the silk is fill'd,
 And its cords are broken,
 Then Cupid, for the voyage skill'd,
 Mounts upwards with the token:
 Ah! thus I lost my heart so soon;—
 'Love is like an air-balloon.'

Through the regions high in wind,
 Soaring under heaven—
 Leaving the earth and all mankind
 With their spirits riven;
 Signs are heathen and tears are strewn:—
 'Love is like an air-balloon.'
 If it homeward safely turn,
 And is true to feeling,
 Hope and joy delight to learn
 That hearts are won by stealing:
 Then happy, happy honeymoon—
 'Love is like an air-balloon.' J. R. P.

TO FANNY NANKIN,
 THE MILLINER.

WHEN first I received the dear beam of thine
 eye,
 What rapture my gladdened soul drank in;
 But that rapture is changed to the soul-telling sigh,
 That breathes for thee, dear Fanny Nankin.
 That sigh but announces the heart's pensive
 plaint,
 For the passion it heedlessly sank in,
 And morns that so blooming and lovely a saint
 Is a saintly cold Miss Fanny Nankin.
 O saint, could thy feelings with my feelings feel,
 How my feelings thy feelings would thank,
 in
 Their fulness of feeling, their feeling of zeal,
 To find thee a feeling Miss Nankin.
 But O, if I find from the scorn of those eyes,
 That my ticket will prove but a blank in
 This lottery of love—I shall die for the prize
 I have lost in thee, dear Fanny Nankin!

I KNEW BY THE BEAM.

I KNEW by the beam in thy soft eye of blue,
 When we parted thy heart was my own, and felt bliss'd;
 And I knew that the heart was as gentle as true,
 And happy laid down on the cold deck to rest.
 The wind whistled shrilly, the wave it roll'd high,
 And my bark on its bosom in wildness was tost;
 The deep crashing thunder spoke loud in the sky,
 But to me all its far-spreading terrors were lost.
 No infant in cradle was e'er lull'd to sleep
 So soundly as I by the white breaking surge, Till the bright star of morning beginning to peep,
 I saw its fair brow o'er the billow emerge.
 It woke me to gladness, it brought to my view
 My own native island and all I held dear:
 It rose as if beck'ning me homeward to you,
 And fancy, tho' absent, depictur'd you near.
 Oh! beam on and brighten sweet beacon, I
 cried,
 Fair hope of the mariner still give thy light,
 Till my full gladdened eye o'er the blue-bo-
 som'd hide,
 Behold my own land rising soft on my sight.
 It heard me, or seem'd to the wind it blew fair,
 And the land of my fathers in midocean appear'd;
 And true as I left thee, my heart met thee
 there,
 With all that was unto my bosom endear'd.

Now nothing shall part us, the past shall appear
 A vision, so lovely the future shall be;
 Still, still shall our love be as warm and sincere,
 Thon dear to my bosom as I unto thee.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The Coronation, though not honoured by such good houses as it brought for the first week or two, is still attractive, perhaps as much so as any thing that could be offered at present; and if a little more attention was devoted to selecting good pieces to be played with it, the manager would, we suspect, find it still more to his advantage.

HAJMARKET THEATRE.—On Wednesday, this theatre had a more crowded and elegant audience than any assembled within its walls since its erection, which sufficiently proves that the public taste for the drama in its higher walks is more intense than some critics are willing to allow. The play was Venice Preserved, and the principal interest of the evening was excited by the first appearance of a lady in the character of Belvidera. Mr. Conway played Jaffier, and Mr. Terry, for the first time, the well-drawn and arduous part of Pierre. The lady's graceful manner and elegant form deeply interested the audience, and her throbbing bosom evidently displayed the strong agitation of her feelings upon the first greetings of a liberal and generous public. Her first efforts, sweetly and delicately expressive of her firm affection for her beloved Jaffier, kindled into flame the favour that had betrayed itself, and the most enthusiastic plaudits through the first three acts, amply acknowledged and repaid the talents of the debutante:—her articulation is distinct, her pronunciation elaste, and her manners unaffected and elegant; but her voice is feeble—too feeble, we fear, to be distinctly heard in a larger house, and, perhaps, incapable of conveying with due energy the expressive force essential to the frantic tones of distraction or despair; and the latter part of her performance was, consequently, less effective than the commencement. Due allowance must be made for difficulties peculiarly attendant upon the first appearance of a lady—but when a candidate for public fame boldly steps into the first rank, it is the duty of a public writer to declare whether she will grace the proud pinnacle to which she aspires; our first impression is that she might have chosen a part more suited to her powers, that her talents will place her among the best performers of the day, but her Belvidera cannot be considered of the first order.

Mr. Conway whined over his troubles as Jaffier most pitifully. Jaffier's character is in itself so contemptibly weak and irresolute, that correct feeling would induce us to wonder how he could ever obtain the friendship of the firm and courageous Pierre, and Mr. Conway's representation did not help it into our favour. Although several of his scenes were very good, the whole did not please us, and we thought him too long in dying. But Mr. Terry, as Pierre, produced a different effect: his performance was equal and excellent; he never lost sight of the character he was unfolding; his whole manner—his energetic declamation—his expression of contempt or hatred—his manly firmness, patriotic ardour, and sense of friendship, were admirable. The other characters deserve no particular notice.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—We are glad, for the sake of the liberal proprietor of this theatre, to whom we wish every success, that the public opinion is rather at variance with our's, and that, contrary to our expectation, the Corsair for Coxcombs has been played every night since it was produced. The Gipsy of Derneleugh, The Miller's Maid, and The Adopted Child, in which Emery plays Record with powerful effect, are played alternately, and, with the mixture of lively farces and brisk operettas, of which this house has a store, draw good houses.

SURREY THEATRE.—This house closed for the season on Tuesday last.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The performances of the present week, at this theatre, boast an unusual degree of interest, and we are happy to add, they are nightly attended by very crowded audiences. The Witch of Derneleugh is another version of Guy Mannering, differing materially from the original opera, and, in many respects, from the new drama at the English Opera House. Mrs. Egerton's Meg Morries is too well known and too much admired to require any thing of commendation from us; but those who have often seen it, will still derive much pleasure from witnessing it in a theatre where the advantage of seeing and hearing distinctly can be so easily obtained. The opera is got up well in all its characters, and the scenery is peculiarly appropriate and tasteful.

Literature and Science.

The Observer Newspaper.—It is a remarkable circumstance, and unparalleled in the history of the newspaper press, that the Observer of Sunday, the 23d of July, which was published on two sheets, and contained an account of the commotion, sold no fewer than 61,500 sets, thus using 133,000 four-penny stamps, and yielding to the revenue the enormous sum of £216l. 13s. 4d.

A young person of the name of Davenne, deaf and dumb, was lately presented to the King of France, and laid before his Majesty the model of a grand Chateau in pasteboard. It had about two hundred windows, with curtains and trimmings, beneath which were discerned the interior and well furnished apartments. The design was altogether imaginary, and cost three years' labour, with rule, penknife, and compass.

Mexican Flora.—At the last anniversary sitting of the Helvetic Society of Natural Science, M. de Candolle presented to the society a Flora of Mexico, consisting of 1740 leaves, and forming thirteen large folio volumes. The following account of this work is given in the Morgenblatt, published at Stuttgart:—M. M. Sesse, Mocino, and Cervantes had travelled over New Spain, with the view of collecting a Mexican Flora. They made a drawing of each plant on the spot where they found it. M. Mocino had returned to Madrid, in order to have the drawings thus obtained engraved, when the first troubles in Spain obliged him to seek refuge with his Flora at Montpellier. M. de Candolle, who was then at Montpellier, became acquainted with M. Mocino, and assisted him for eighteen months in arranging systematically his numerous collection. M. de Candolle afterwards went from Montpellier to Geneva, and M. Mocino gave him the Flora along with him, that he might one day send it forth to the world. The new aspect of affairs in Spain having induced M. Mocino, however, to return to his native country, he wrote lately to M. de Candolle, requesting to have the Flora back. The French naturalist, unwilling to run the chance of losing all trace of so valuable a treasure, immediately requested some friends to copy part of the rarest drawings for him. No sooner was this known in Geneva, than numbers of persons, of both sexes, offered their services; and in the end, every person capable of managing a crayon or pencil, was occupied with the Mexican Flora. They worked with such zeal, the ladies especially, that in the short space of eight days there was not a single drawing remaining to copy.

Submersion of the Village of Stron.—The following account of this singular and melancholy event, is related in a letter from Winkler. The village of Stron, in the estate of Fermian, in Bohemia, is situated on a declivity, in the north-east of the valley of Eger, about a league from Sautz, partly near the river, and partly near a gorge that descended towards the Eger. On a hill that forms a border to this gorge, were the church and parsonage-house, and the village descended along the gorge parallel to the Eger, towards the north-west. This hill contains beds of an earthy pit-coal, that spread through the country, and are covered with strata of sand and alluvion. The Eger flows at the distance of about two hundred toises from Stron. Previous to the accident, it formed a bay alongside of Stron, edged with hills of moving sand, not very lofty, but steep. On the higher part of the declivity were a number of springs, that were quickly lost in the sands.

These springs have proved the cause of a calamity, which, in these countries, where glaciers and earthquakes are unknown, may be deemed unique in its kind. The water of the springs has gradually perforated large subterranean cavities in the strata of sand, so that, at length, the whole surface of the soil, with the church, the houses, and the gardens, rested only on some detached columns of sand that were daily diminishing. Whether subterranean combustions of pit-coal may not have co-operated, is a point hitherto undecided.

For a length of time the earth had been sinking in different places. Crevices appeared in the walls of the buildings; the doors would no longer shut, and some weeks ago a great noise was heard in the middle of the night. The people are roused from their sleep; a singular movement of the earth advancing forward, and at the same time sinking, is observed. The inhabitants flee, remove their cattle, &c. and at some distance from the village wait for the morning. Its appearance displays an image of destruction; half of the village had disappeared; where no houses had ever been, roofs and chimnies were seen rising from the ground. The hill, the church, and the parsonage, were no longer to be found; and at some distance appeared a chaos of parcels of earth, intermixed with ruins and crevices.

The church is eighty feet below the scite it formerly occupied; it is divided into two, half of it buried in ruins. Here lies a steeple overthrown, and there a confused medley of statues, images of saints, stables, &c. The river is thrown out of its channel, and where it formed a bay, there is now an accumulation of earth. The churchyard is thrown into a shapeless heap, and the whole territory bears another aspect. In different patches are seen layers of a fat earth, over which the sand has glided. It seems that the Eger must have crumbled the props on which the hill stood, as they had ever an inclination towards the river.

A number of things have been fortunately preserved, and, with the exception of some cattle, no lives were lost. Fifteen houses are yet standing; but the soil is insecure, and the downfall will probably be universal.

I was at a loss, at first, to recognise the country; and from the inhabitants I could only learn that they had been disturbed by a tremendous crash, and that they sought refuge by flight. The people were rich; their loss, in point of furniture, is not so considerable as in the superficies of the soil.

The village is now a sort of central spot for pilgrimage to the whole of Bohemia; the curious flock thither from every quarter, to explore the effects of this phenomenon. It is impossible to form a just idea of it without inspection.—Phil. Mag.

Letters from Naples mention a prodigy: a boy ten years of age, of a noble Hungarian family, named Sigismund de Praun. He recently made his appearance at Rome, at the Theatre Argentina, when he executed in perfection a sonata on the violin, in which the celebrated Paganini often chose to display his talent in execution. But what is infinitely more surprising, the young Sigismund is not less versed in literature and the sciences than in music. After he had discoursed on public theses on the most important questions, the Archi-Gymnasi awarded him a large gold medal. This wonderful child was presented to his holiness, who, delighted with his answers, conferred on him the order of the Golden Spur, and also nominated him a Count of the Apostolic Palace.

Poetical Essays on the Character of Pope as a Poet and Moralist; and on the Language and Objects most fit for Poetry. By Charles Lloyd. 12mo. pp. 70. London, 1821.

WHEN we reviewed the pamphlets of Lord Byron and Mr. Bowles, we considered the character of Pope so fully discussed, and the subject become so trite, that we determined not to notice any thing more that might be written upon it. We are, however, induced to deviate from our first intention, in order to pay our court to a new and a very able champion, who has entered the lists—one who, taking no notice of the previous controversy on the subject or the personality of the disputants, calmly sits down and investigates the character of Pope with the feelings of a poet, the acuteness of a critic, and the calm and dispassioned reasoning of a philosopher.

Mr. Lloyd is himself a poet of some eminence, and the author of 'Nugæ Canonæ' and 'Desultory Thoughts in London;' works, however, which rather stamp him as an amiable man than a great poet. His style is certainly not the most correct, and he is rather too metaphysical: but the one never extends to vulgarity, nor the other to what is too often the bane of metaphysics—infinity.

Mr. Lloyd is of opinion, and we agree with him, that sense and imagination are the highest characteristics of true poetry; to Pope he accords the first, but denies that he possessed imagination or sensibility—that sensibility at least which implies sympathy with others. The merits of Pope he first sums up, before he enters on those qualities in which he conceives him deficient. He says,—

“ Though we see in Pope Wit the most keen, of sense the simplest scope, Though he can be, if it so chance he please, Mighty from energy, and gay from ease; Though in a dialect perspicuous, terse, He sense can marry to immortal verse, And, with consummate elegance, combine Force intellectual, through each nervous line;

Though in the antithetic he can charm, With wit perplex us, and with splendour warm; Though his that playful malice, which, with grade, Can strip pretension of its grave grimace; Though he in numbers, tuneful as the spheres, Can make c'en crabbed themes enchant our ears; Though he can charm us to a pleasing trance, With quick meteoric lights, which love to dance To Fancy's eye;—though, eloquently bland, For him refinement all her stores expand; Yes, though thus opulent in many a dower; In feeling, in imagination's power, He is deficient; in each glorious gift, 'Bove earth, which doth the ravi'd spirit lift. One power has Pope. One, eminently his.— And, of all powers, the one, with emphasis, Which gives th' ephemeral child of Fancy's birth The claim to currency, the stamp of worth. This power is sense.”

After shewing the superiority of sense over mere harmony of numbers, Mr. Lloyd dwells on the value of sensibility:—

“ Which to the poet gives, Beyond imagination, power to explore Its deep recesses, to the inmost core Of the human heart.”

This power he denies to Pope, whose feelings were too much associated with self-love, to intitle them to the name of sensibility, and who ‘always rather delights to analyse vice, than to suppose virtue.’ He also objects to Pope, in that he rather chose the subjects of his muse from art than nature; as this has been a subject of much controversy, and although it forms a distinct poem in this little volume, we shall here quote Mr. Lloyd's opinion:—

“ Now, let us ask, where, throughout all the range Of Pope's soft numbers, do we find him change For scenes of art, the country's quiet grace? Where paints He nature? Whither may we trace

That he has ever, with a raptur'd eye, Look'd on the forests or the silent sky? We're elsewhere said, and we the thought repeat, Objects of art for poets' theme are meet, As well as those of nature; but in sense Subordinate, and meek subservience. We scarcely can conceive, how man can claim A poet's power, much less possess the flame Of pure imagination, nor fond themes From nature draw, for his poetic dreams.

There is, oh Nature, in thy aspects mild; There is, oh Nature, in thy aspects wild; There is, in favour of a summer day, There is, in last gleam of the evening ray; There is, oh! ocean, in thy weltering roar, There is, in wave which chafes thy pebbly shore; There is, when sun-beam on thy surface dances, And on thy prismatic water swiftly glances; There is, in all the company of clouds, When in the west the setting sun it shrouds; When hues of gold and purple richly spread, Proudly pavilion his declining head; And when, like threads of light, from it repair The splendours shaken from his golden hair; There are in these, and thousand objects more, Charms which might make the hardest heart adore; Our bard never one of these doth sing, Or, to praise Nature, imp his soaring wing.”

The second part of Mr. Lloyd's Essay is a criticism on the Essay on Man, rather too metaphysical for our taste, and more remarkable for good sense than elegant poetry. The following extract nearly embodies the whole of Mr. Lloyd's theory:—

“ Man is a being, in whom various modes Of feeling rule. In his breast's dim abodes, The passions are the elemental source Of that which gives its character and force To action. What these passions are, each learns, Whose introverted eye one moment turns Into himself; ambition, love, the glow Of fame; the filial and parental throes; Self-preservation; last, and far most high, Those instincts, which, with heav'n, our souls ally.

To these is added reason. As this takes A large excursive range, as still it makes An ample orbit, as in its wide aims— White love of all creation it inflames,— And most, of Him who all creation made,— It feels an interest, where'er it can aid: The great doth venerate; protects the small; With all it couples self, and self with all; “Self, that no alien knows,” feels sympathy, “As far diffus'd as fancy's wing can fly; So much as it does this, tis healthful, just; ‘Tis the pure reason, freed from self's low gust. Reason is truth, with sympathies thus wide— Reason is error, with self-love allied. Benevolence is reason; 'tis supreme, Even for self-protection; 'tis no dream, That he, who, in his universal heart, Feels that he is, of all, the smallest part, And loves all sentient things, and God above, With holy self-annihilating love; Oh, he is pillow'd ever on the breast Of dove-like peace: he finds a downy nest, Whether he travel Araby's parch'd sands, Or Whether he sail where shoreless seas expand;

Whether he journey 'mid the arctic snows;
Or whether through the torrid sunroom slows:
While he, whose introverted puny keen Thinks of himself—and thinks—and thinks
—again;
Baffled in that, to which he but aspires,
Self-immolated, tediously expires.

— The second Essay in this volume, is 'On the Language and Objects most fit for Poetry.' Our readers are fully aware of the nature of the controversy on this subject, between Lord Byron
Mr. Bowles, Mr. Gilchrist and Mr. Campbell. The question is one not worth the ink and paper that has been used upon it, and is like the two chivalrous knights who met and disputed on the colour of a post; one maintaining that it was black, and the other that it was white; when, after they had fought and nearly killed each other, they ascertained that it was both.
To us it appears to be a question which can never be settled, and must always remain as one of opinion—for some poets will succeed best in depicting nature, while others will be more successful in describing the sublimity and ingenuity of art. In this opinion, we appear to have the sanction of our author, who says,—

'We know a man, a man of genius, too,
Who says, that he had rather walk the streets
Of London; than from thence there can accrue
To him more strong emotion, than when —grets
His eye: mountain region; when retreats Day's glare, the lamps shine, and the windows blaze

With crescents bright, when at each step he meets
A tide of population, whose thick maze
And multitudinous heart deep human feelings raise.

'We've heard him say, that, at such hour as this,
Stronger emotion, London! he hath known
In thy haunts; more felt with emphasis "His bosom's lord-sit" proudly "on his throne,"

Than when his eye, with glories all her own,
Romantic nature greeted. Now attend:—
For this man well we know. Is he thus prone
To give to art precedence, virtue's friend?
Says would he personate her, would he have ought to mend?

'To us it seems, then, an erroneous plan,— Though one from philanthropic feeling —sprung,—

One sprung from a deep feeling, that, in man,
As man, source of true interest lies: one
—wrong

From the conviction that, round old and young,

There is more, however different our estate,
Of sanctity indelible hung:—
More of resemblance 'twixt the small and great;
More which may universal sympathy create;

'Tis of discordance,—yet, to us, it seems
An error, though one which we reverence,
To hold up personals for poetic themes,
As fit exclusively; and, consequence —Of this, the works of art to banish thence:—

And to this ostracism add beside,
Proscription to all scenes, for eloquence
Of the true bard, save those where are desecrated Mountains, and lakes, and rocks, and nature's sterner pædæ.

'Methinks that, in the argument to which
These lines reply, there is one error clear;
Wherein it says, that natural objects teach
The peasant's soul; that with "their passions" there

'The permanent, the beautiful" appear
"Incorporate"; that they are nature-taught:—
But is't a fact, experience test to bear,
That forms external are in spirits wrought, Proportion'd to the time they have been near them brought?

'Tis in an effervescent state, the mind
Receives impressions; oft from contrasts rise
The strongest ones; and oft those most inclin'd
To adore the country, love it, in its skies,
Since their town's native smoke doth not arise;

It is not opportunity to see;
They are our passions, which, or open eyes
Or close them; who, for "hard-ear'd penny fee,"

Doth toil, for scenes the most sublime what cattle he!

'We then affirm, let one with leisure blest,
From distant region gorgeous scenes explore,
And in the very circumstance, confess'd
A cause will be, why he should love them
more.

Since then such scenes first taught his heart to soar:

While Ule rude natives, who, though they have eyes,

As those who saw not, see; if he his score
Profusely pay, each claim which round them lies

Will sooner far forget, than their propitious prize.'

Here we will once more take leave of the controversy on Poets, but without making any pledge that a new discussion may not again compel us to notice it.

The Expedition of Orsua and the Crimes of Aguirre. By Robert Southey,
Esq. 12mo. pp. 215. London, 1821.

THE expedition of Orsua, which Mr.
Southey calls 'a frightful but salutary story,' was printed in the Edinburgh Annual Register some years ago. That it is a frightful, every one who reads it must admit, but we much doubt that tales of vice and crime have a salutary effect, except, perhaps, on the mind of the philosopher, who draws the proper inferences from them; but among readers how few are philosophers! The tale relates to an expedition undertaken in 1560, by Don Pedro Orsua, one of those ferocious knights, who, by their cruelties in South America, brought indelible disgrace on the Spanish name.
It was directed against the Omaguas,
a nation in the interior of South America, which was represented as rich in gold and diamonds. Orsua's force consisted of three hundred Spaniards, and a more ferocious band never went on a scheme of murder and plunder.

Orsua took with him his mistress, Donna Ines, and several more of the troop also took women with them.
This was fatal to the chief, who, when the band had arrived on the Orellana, about seven hundred leagues distant,
was assassinated by some of his associates.
Vargas, the second in command;
and several of the associates of Orsua, were also murdered, and though Gus-man was selected king of the banditti, yet Aguirre, who had been the chief cause of all these massacres, acquired the chief authority:—

'This man, so unhappily notorious in American history, had supported himself in Peru, by the trade of breaking in horses. In the rebellion of Don Sebastian de Castilla, he had borne so active a part that he was sentenced to death, and would assuredly have been executed could he have been taken; but when a pardon was offered to all offenders who would join the king's standard against Giron, he took advantage of the proclamation and came from his hiding place. For some subsequent villainy he was again condemned, together with Zaldueño, and would have been hanged at Cuzco; but he broke out of prison and remained in the woods till he found an opportunity of joining Orsua. His hope was that Orsua would rebel; being disappointed in this, he laid a plan for murdering him. Such had been the general irregularity of his conduct, that in Peru, he was commonly called Aguirre el Inco, the madman; and assuredly, his after atrocities were such,
that it is only to madness they can be imputed.'

Valdera and Zaldueño, who had contended for Donna Ines, were successively assassinated, as was also the lady herself, the elected king Guzman, and several others; and Aguirre having attained the supreme command, determined no longer to go in quest of El Dorado, but to return and conquer
Peru.

When the wretch Aguirre, who was stained with so many murders, and the remains of his ferocious band arrived at Margarita, he possessed himself of the island by treachery, and became even more wanton in his butcheries than he had been on the Orellana. An alarm of invasion gave a new whet to his cruelty:—

'He ordered the governor and those persons whom he had at first made prisoners, being the chief magistrates of the city, to be brought from the apartment where they were confined into a lower hall. They, suspecting that they were led to death, came with a mortal melancholy in their countenances, which the tyrant perceived, and bade them have no fear, giving them his word, that, even if the fiar were to land more men than there were trees and thistles on the island, and he himself and all his companions were to perish, not one of the prisoners should be hurt. This was just as night had set in; about midnight he sent Carrion, the murderer of Donna Inez, with a set of fit companions, to strangle these persons, whose lives he had so lately and so solemnly promised to preserve. Their dead bodies were covered with mats. Aguirre assembled his soldiers in the hall; the mats at his command were then removed, and the bodies exposed by the light of torches, "here, my Maranones," said the tyrant, "you see another of the king's governors, and these, his magistrates, lying dead: Let no man among you deceive himself with any hopes of pardon for such crimes as we have committed, nor suffer himself to be deceived by fair promises. In no part of the world can you possibly be safe, except in my company."

When Aguirre went out to meet the attack, he left Perez, an associate worthy of such a chief, in charge of the fortress. Some of the soldiers, during the absence of Aguirre, inquired who should take the command, in case he should be slain or taken by the provincial. Upon which Perez answered, "here am I, who can do my duty if the old man should fail:—

"This was enough; the tyrant called 'or one Chaves, a lad, with scarcely a hair upon his chin, who was yet old enough in crimes to be charged with such an office, and bade him get some companions, and put the camp-master to death as soon as he entered the fortress, whither he sent to call him. Perez, little suspecting that his hour was come, hastened in obedience to the summons, and Chaves, getting behind him, shot him with a harquebuss. The wound was not immediately mortal; the other murderers fell upon him, and he ran from them about the fort, crying out for confession, and shrieking with the pain of a horrible wound, till he fell at length, and Chaves dispatched him by cutting his throat.

The prisoners hearing his shrieks, expected that this was the commencement of the general massacre which Aguirre had threatened; they hid themselves under the beds, and in holes and corners, not some threw themselves from the windows and battlements. The soldiers in the square were not less astonished, hearing his cries, and being ignorant of the cause. Aguirre spoke to them from a window, telling them not to be alarmed at what they had heard, for he had been obliged to put his son and Camp-master, Larin Perez, to death, for conspiracy against him. Llamoso, who had been named as an accomplice in the plot, happened to pass by as he was speaking.

"They tell me, my son," said Aguirre, "that you also were in the conspiracy; was this then your friendship, and this all the regard you have for the great love which I have borne you?" Chaves and his comrades, whose weapons were yet red and reeking from the last murder, expected that they were now to have another victim, and drew near him, looking up to Aguirre for the signal to strike. Llamoso, as of all these wretches he most resembled his master in ferociousness, so was he the only one who was sincerely and faithfully attached to him; and of this attachment Aguirre seems to have been sensible, by the manner in which he addressed him. He protested his innocence with the most horrid imprecations. The countenance of this suspicious tyrant did not yet relax; and Llamoso, in the strong passion of his fear, and his indignation at the charge, exclaimed, "as for this traitor, who would have committed such a crime, I will drink his blood!" and throwing himself on the ground, he applied his mouth to a wound in the Camp-master's head, like a dog ravenous with hunger. The very murderers who stood by drew back, sickening at the sight, and Aguirre no longer entertained a doubt of his fidelity."

When Aguirre left Margarita, and landed on the main, with the frantic view of subjugating this great continent, his followers, already much thinned by mutual assassination, became still more so, and soon were too much reduced to undertake any enterprise with success. The native troops continually harassing them; several deserted. Aguirre having arrived at Baraquimoto, sent a detachment against the Royalist General Paredes, and gave the command of it to Espindola. Aguirre, who was watching the success of this detachment, saw the men mingle in the enemy's ranks instead of attacking them, and shouting "the king for ever." The last scene of this tragic drama is the death of the monster, who has played so distinguished a part in the whole:—

"Juan de Aguirre still remained in the fort, and intended to complete his crimes by killing the tyrant, whose ready instrument he had been in so many murders; but not finding him at hand, and thinking all delay dangerous, he hastened to join Paredes; and while Aguirre was outside of the fort, all the others, who were now only those whom he suspected, and kept under watch, got out by a door which had been closed up, but which they broke through. One alone, of all the Maranones, remained by Aguirre's side; it was Llamoso: none of these wretches had exceeded him in guilt, but he was faithful to the last to the tyrant whom he had sworn to serve. Aguirre asked him why he also did not go to enjoy the king's pardon; he replied, he had been his friend in life, and would be so in death. Aguirre made him no answer, but went into a chamber where his daughter was sitting in company with a young woman called La Torralva, who had come with her from Peru. "Say thy prayers, child," said he, "for I must kill thee!" "Why, sir," she exclaimed. He replied, "that thou mayst never live to be reviled, and called the daughter of a traitor." La Torralva had courage enough to rise and take his harquebuss from him, thinking thus to prevent him from executing his desperate purpose; but he, lightly surrendering it, drew out a dagger, and stabbed his daughter repeatedly, till her sufferings were for ever ended. Then going out into the anti-chamber, he perceived that the king's troops were entering, and leaning against a sort of cane-bedeast, without attempting to resist, he waited for what might befall him. An inhabitant of Tocuyo, who first came into the room, called to Paredes, "here, sir, I have taken Aguirre." The tyrant answered, "I do not yield to such a knave as thou art!" and then seeing Paredes himself, he added, "Sir Camp-master, you are a cavalier; I beseech you let the terms be kept with me, for I have things to communicate which are of importance to the king's service." But his own men cried out that it was for the Camp-master's honour to cut off his head before the governor came up, upon which, two of these Maranones were ordered to shoot him. Juan de Chaves and Christoval Galindo are said to have put themselves forward for this service, that Aguirre might not have time to make confessions, which would show how greatly they were implicated in the atrocities that had been committed. The first shot made only a slant wound: "that's badly done," said he; the second he received in his breast, and exclaiming, "this will do," fell, and died immediately. Custodio Hernandez, a wretch who had enjoyed his favour, then cut off his head, and taking it by the long hair, carried it to the governor, in hopes of obtaining something by such a service.

Paredes then advanced to meet the governor, trailing after him the banners of the rebels. The governor ordered Aguirre's daughter to be buried in the church; his own body was quartered, and the quarters set up by the way-side. His head was sent to Tocuyo, and exposed in an iron cage. When Pedro Simon wrote, the skull was still remaining; his banners also were preserved in that city, and the robe, gown, and kirtle of yellow silk which his daughter had on when she was slain, rent by the dagger, and stained with blood. The people of Merida and of Valencia, who were in the camp, petitioned each for one of his banners, as a memorial of their loyal services; each had a hand of the traitor given them instead, which they bore away on the point of a lance. These trophies became offensive on the way; the one was thrown into the river Motalan, the other cast to the dogs. The banners were taken to Spain by Paredes, who hung them over his father's monument. The house in which he was born was pulled down, as having been the birth-place of a traitor, and a monument was erected on the spot, to record his crimes and his fate.'

The promise given to the Marañones, was observed by Collado with the most rigid honour; but in the ensuing year, orders came from Madrid to send them all prisoners to Spain. Some of them had time to secure themselves, and others were taken and executed. Aguirre, whose crimes made a deep impression upon the people of Venezuela, is still spoken of in those countries as El Tyrano, the tyrant, and it is believed by the people that his troubled spirit still wanders over the scenes of his guilt, in the form of that fiery vapour which is frequently seen in the island of Margarita, and in the plains of New Andalusia, and which is to this day called the soul of the tyrant.

Such was the expedition of Orsua, and such the crimes of Aguirre, a tale too horrible even for a melo-drama, and not to be contemplated in reality without shuddering. Mr. Southey, who has dilated on the subject considerably, has certainly not lessened the effect by his narration, which is in many parts quite dramatic.

Napoleon and other Poems. By Samuel Gower, Esq. 8vo. pp. 156. London, 1820.

*STANDING, as I now do, on the threshold of public opinion, I cannot say I feel any fears for my reception; the deeds of the provident should reward themselves. The poems that are marked with figures I devote to posterity; of the rest, some to chance—more to oblivion.'

Such is the modest declaration of Mr. Gower in the commencement of his preface; what chance his productions have of the destination he assigns them, we shall be able to show by-and-by. We confess we have seldom ventured on any work with greater reluctance than on this; we have had it in our hands at least a dozen times, and laid it down again, exclaiming, 'We'll have none o'nt'; but at last found ourselves so fairly beset that we could not avoid it. This will, perhaps, appear strange to many of our readers; but the cry of 'copy' by a printer's devil is imperative, as, according to the old proverb, 'we needs must when the Devil drives.'

But we commenced with Mr. Gower's

Preface, and, as it is the most amusing part of his work, (for bad poetry is seldom amusing,) we shall not leave it yet. He tells us that some of his friends have palmed on him the attributes of his Napoleon, and yet he doubts that Napoleon himself will like his sonnets. We doubt it, indeed! but he consoles himself for this supposed neglect of Bonaparte by his poetic genius, by telling us, that 'the thoughts of men like him [Napoleon, not Mr. Gower] are only to be comfortably endured in their remotest results;' and 'in illustration of this,' he transforms two lines of bad poetry into half a page of dull prose. Mr. Gower acknowledges his has been a very daring attempt. 'But,' says he, and who can withhold their admiration of his modesty, 'though notorious deliquia of thought as well as of expression are acknowledged occasionally to intervene, the authors of the Koran have no where given so magnificent an idea of their prophet, as the three paragraphs [sonnets] above alluded to, afford of Napoleon, had nothing else been said besides those paragraphs written.' One extract more from the preface, and we have done:—

'The Miscellaneous Poems require no further remark than that the Queen Elizabeth is not the Elizabeth of Kenilworth, but the dust and ashes of what she once was, and, lying, as was thought, of a broken heart;—and that, with regard to satire, I will be quiet if they'll let me alone;—if not, when a little misbehaviour may be ill-natured, the who misbehave may have cause to wish me in heaven.

'One thing more remains, indeed, gentle reader, who has been faithful to me to the end of this preface, for I won't end in this surly way; it is all affection—the more shame for us—no matter—'

'Whichever way I turn, a barrier of impassable gates at present frowns before me, through which I cannot pass; but I hope to pass them—and in the meanwhile beg of every reader not to hang or drown himself till this time next year, by which time—wherever I may have met with happiness, whoever he is, he shall be made to share it with me.'

The poems (for so the author calls them,) entitled Napoleon, consist of eighteen different pieces, eight of which are among those which Mr. Gower devotes to posterity; it would be unfair in quoting not to give him a chance, and, therefore, we select the first of those chosen productions, Napoleon's Address to Josephine:—

'Well, soveraeen, would'st thou see my soul unblest:
To be in all my purposes unknown,
In all my plans uncouncill'd and alone,

My glory is—my fame's high sacrament:

My heart to beauty never to have lent,

Nor ever risk'd for love my peerless throne,

My character still searchlessly my own,—

My pride. Of this I never shall repent.

So, far Delilah, of my strength unborn

I live—and mean to live—the bane and fear,

Or love—no matter which, of men. To scorn

Their praise or censure is my shield and spear.

Illustriously friendless and forlorn,

Thus won I kingdoms.—More thou may'st not bear.'

If our readers understand this wretched jargon, we shall be happy; for ourselves, we caudally confess that we can neither make 'fish nor flesh of it.'

The 'Miscellaneous Poems,' of which nearly one half are also devoted to posterity, consist of pieces which, we are told, are in imitation of the styles of Byron, Southey, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Ben Johnson, Shakespeare, &c. Of the similarity, let the following extracts, from a 'Soliloquy of Queen Elizabeth,' in imitation (what treason against the majesty of the great bard!) of Shakespeare, bear witness:—

'No! I can never rest an hour in peace—

Yon dunce I made a bishop of last year

Advising me—confound his impudence!

By G—d! but I'll unfrock him if he dares
Mention me again—And then these wretches,
Who just because they've learnt to write and read—

(I wish I were a Papist for a fortnight,

To Smithfield some of them) suppose they're able

To think forsooth about affairs of state.'

'But for these citizens—they never buy

A hoop to thatch in an unwieldy wife,

But they must talk of taxes—'

If they choose
To dress their calves-heads up as if they were queens,

They ought to pay for it—somebody must pay,

And they're unfit to rule—afraid to fight,

And growing too luxurious to work,

And little given to praying for themselves—

And where God is not—as in many a land

Of Romish darkness—there the Devil is—

And there assassins, as in Italy—

(A land the righteous scorn of God and man)'

This is another of the precious productions which Mr. Gower thinks will be immortal; but no wonder, for if a man has the insanity to print such trash, it ought not to excite surprise that he is in love with it. After the threat Mr. Gower holds out in the preface, we may be suspected of temerity in daring to provoke his ire; but we can honestly assure him, that his work is the most wretched production that ever came under our notice; and, as he candidly confesses, 'the sooner the chaff of a man's productions is blown away the better,' he surely cannot feel offended in subjecting his performances to the fan of criticism.

Letters on Ancient History; exhibiting a Summary View of the History, Geography, Manners, and Customs of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Median, Persian, Egyptian, Israelitish, and Grecian Nations. By Anne Wilson. Third Edition. 12mo. pp. 312. London, 1821.

THE work before us having already received the stamp of public favour, we have pleasure in noticing the improvements of the present edition, which seem to consist chiefly in adopting the plan of adding questions at the end of each letter, for the purpose of examining the reader upon its most prominent points; this addition has been made avowedly from the success of the plan in Pinnock's Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, and is certainly well suited to impress the memory and assist the scholar in self-examination. We consider the editor's comments on the study of history, in the preface, neat and judicious, and shall, therefore, subjoin an extract:—

'A knowledge of Ancient History carries us back to primal ages, triumphs over time, opens to us the experience of antiquity, and introduces us to those great and distinguished personages whose actions will ever be held up to admiring posterity as worthy of imitation; while it presents us with innumerable instances of misguided ambition and lawless violence, which ought to serve as beacons to warn us of the fatal consequences of deviating from the principles of honour, truth, and justice. In short, the true use of history is to enable us to profit by the experience of those who have gone before us, to avoid their errors and prejudices, and so to regulate our actions that they may best conduce towards our individual happiness and the important ends of humanity.'

And again,—'The study of history is no less a source of amusement than instruction. What argument can be advanced—what anecdote related—what conversation entered upon—wherein a knowledge of history will not come seasonably to our aid; affording either validity to our assertions or illustration to our arguments; rendering the most commonplace subjects interesting, and furnishing us with the means of enriching the most barren topics of discourse!'

The editor further remarks, that the epistolary style has been preferred, in order to narrate in the most familiar language, those important events which demand attention, and that 'a plain unvarnished tale' has been throughout attempted.—The work is particularly suited for youth, and merits the attention of all who are engaged in education.

IN a recent number we mentioned that the novel of 'Calthorpe, or Fallen Fortunes,' which, it will be remembered, we noticed favourably and at some length a few months back, had already been translated into French and reprinted in America. Our opinion of the work is on record, and we are only induced again to advert to it in order to make a few remarks on the French translation, which is now before us.

The translator of the novels ascribed to Sir Walter Scott, under whose auspices 'Calthorpe' has appeared in Paris, has acquired a great reputation among his countrymen by his efforts in this way, and the address with which he has got over the greatest difficulties in the way of rendering an English work into French, entitle him to the applause he has received. He well understands that a translation must not, in every instance, be strictly literal, and he frequently makes use of bold equivalents with success. But occasionally he takes upon himself to alter the arrangement of the original,—to omit and to add to his author. He seems rather anxious to guard against too much decoration. Where the author indulges in a figure, he is in several instances cut short by his translator. For example, Brinkman says, in the English,—

'It was midnight; a storm raged without, and the winds were alternately heard, now hoarse and loud as the thunder of heaven—now soft and sad as the sigh of a dying infant.'

This is rendered very different:—

'Il étoit minuit, et le bruit du tonnerre et des vents se faisoit alternativement entendre.'

When Henry flies to tell Lonisa, who is at her devotions, that her father is less culpable than he supposed him to be, the author makes him say, apologizing for interrupting her,—

'Such tidings I could not withhold; but anticipating that beaming smile of virtuous joy, I have ventured even to arrest your devotions, as the bold patriarch of old, to gain a blessing, scrupled not to detain for a moment an angel from his God.'

The translator leaves out this and the description of Lonisa, and merely says that Henry hastened to undeceive her, and the reader can best imagine the joy with which his intelligence was received.

The author makes Practical play off some indecorous pranks, but is careful to avoid the disgusting. The translator, in giving the sentences which the player writes on the dusty moveables in Bandy Juliet's parlour, indulges in a grossness which is at once bad in itself, and wholly unlike the original. Immediately after, he adds more than a page which is purely his own, and sends Practical back to the house of Sir James Deneville, after the escape, for a portmanteau, for no other purpose than to make the hero more comfortable on his journey from Derbyshire to London, than the author cared to render him.

One alteration he has made, which is decidedly an improvement. Le Blun, in the original, cut five buttons from his gaiters, each of which furnished an English guinea to pay for a dinner and other refreshments at Duber. The translator makes him take off but one button, which contains a forty franc piece. With Le Blun's French ideas of cheapness, this is undoubtedly more probable than the production of a larger sum.

Expert as the translator must be, from the practice he has had, and elegantly faithful as he is in most places, it is laughable to see how little idiomatical peculiarities sometimes mislead one so competent to read our language. Where the manager is told that he might aspire to personate 'The Jack of Clubs,' the translator is completely baffled, and he renders the valet de trefles 'Jack de Club,' evidently misled by the meaning attached to the word club in other cases.

We cannot enlarge on this subject, or there are other peculiarities which it might be amusing to point out. Justice requires that we should state the principal scenes are translated with spirit and closeness to the original. It is curious to infer the different tastes of the two countries from the changes made. We see that the translator, for the satisfaction of French readers, has thought it necessary to marry Henry and Lonisa. The English author felt that this would be rather too bold an experiment, and contented himself with pointing to that event, as one which might take place at a future period, and then dropped the curtain, that his hero might not be seen united to the daughter of one so stained by crime as Brinkman.

Anecdotes of Exile.

FROM the twenty-second Part of the Percy Anecdotes, which is devoted to Exile, and contains a good portrait of Bonaparte, we select the two following anecdotes, both relating to the family of the Stuarts:—

'Dundee's Officers.'—When King William was advised to send a great body of troops to Scotland, after the defeat of Killcranky, he said, "It was needless, the war ended with Dundee's life." The observation was just; for though the Highland army descended into the low countries of Scotland, under the Generals Buchan and Cannon, and were engaged in several actions, yet these actions were indecisive; and, after two languid campaigns, a peace was concluded. The castle of Edinburgh had been surrendered some time before by the Duke of Gordon, whom the superiority of Dundee's genius was no longer at hand to direct. But the duke, in the manner of his surrender, preserved the dignity of his rank and of his ancestors. He said, "he had so much confidence in the descendants of James I. that though he must insist on a pardon for his garrison, he would stipulate no terms for himself." Upon the peace with the Highlanders, the common men retired to their homes, but many of their officers were, in consequence of a capitulation, landed in France.

The conduct of these officers while in exile, was worthy of the happiest days of Athens or Sparta. The officers were a hundred and fifty in number, all of honourable birth. Attached to their chiefs and to each other in their political principles, only to blame, yet glorying in them. Upon their arrival in France, pensions were assigned to them by the French king. But upon the conclusion of the civil war, these pensions were withdrawn, because the object no longer existed for which they had been given. Finding themselves, therefore, a load upon the late King, whose finances could scarcely suffice for himself, they petitioned that prince for leave to form themselves into a company of private sentinels, asking no other favour, than that they might be permitted to choose their own officers. James assented. They repaired to St. Germain to be reviewed by him, before they were incorporated into the French army. A few days after they came, they posted themselves in accoutrements borrowed from a French regiment, and drawn up in order, in a place through which he was to pass as he went to the chape, an amusement of which he became passionately fond after the loss of his kingdom. He asked who they were? and was surprised to find that they were the same men with whom, in garbs better suited to their ranks, he had the day before conversed with at his levee. Struck with the levity of his own amusement, contrasted with the misery of those who were suffering for him, he returned pensive to the palace. The day he reviewed them, he passed along the ranks, wrote in his pocket book every gentleman's name, and gave him his thanks in particular, and then removing to the front, bowed to the body with his hat off. After he had gone away, still thinking honour enough was not done them, he returned and bowed again, but burst into tears. The body kneeled, bent their heads and eyes steadfastly upon the ground, and then starting up at once, passed him with the usual honours of war, as if it was only a common review they were exhibiting. They were sent from thence to the frontiers of Spain, a march of nine hundred miles on foot. Wherever they passed, they were received with tears by the women, and with admiration by the men. They were always the foremost in battle, and the last in retreat. Of all the troops in the service, they were most obedient to orders. Twice only they disobeyed; the first time was at the siege of Roses, where they had fallen into diseases, and been ordered to quit the camp for their recovery; but they delayed to obey, until they had sent a remonstrance to Marshal Noailles against what they termed an affront. The second instance of their inattention was upon the following occasion: the Germans had made a lodgment in an island in the Rhine; the French, from an opinion that the river was impassable without boats, had ordered a number for the passage. Among other troops intended for the service, this company was ordered to keep a station opposite to the island, until the boats should arrive. But finding, upon examination, the ford, though difficult, not impassable, they, according to the custom of the Highlanders in wading through rivers, joined their hands together; entered the river in a line with its current, the strongest men in the upper part, and the weakest in the under, so that those who were highest up the stream broke all its force; and thus, with their arms and clothes on their shoulders, they passed to the island in the sight of both armies on the opposite banks, and drove ten times their number from the lodgment. The French cried out in admiration, "A gentleman, in whatever station, is still a gentleman." "Le gentilhomme est toujours gentilhomme." The place is called 'Isle d'Ecosse to this day.

All collective human virtues are sullied with the selfishness of individuals. The officers to whom they had yielded their independence, and whom they had chosen to command their equals, cheated them of their pay, poor as it was, of their clothes, and of the presents which the generous had sent them. The French, inattentive to their patience, fatigues, and services, sent them from the frontiers of Spain, to Alsace, a march as long as the former. In this route their clothes fell to tatters. After they passed Lyons, the country was covered with snow; they often wanted the necessities of life; yet no complaints were heard amongst them, except for the sufferings of him whom they accounted their sovereign.

After six years' service, they were broke, when the peace was concluded, on the higher part of the Rhine, fifteen hundred miles from their homes, and without any provision made for them. At that time only sixteen of them had survived the fate of their companions, and of these, only four arrived in Scotland, to give warning by their example to their countrymen, though to too many of them in vain, to distrust for ever the promises and flatteries of France.

'The Pretender.'—When the last effort of the exiled House of Stuart to recover the throne of Great Britain, had been defeated by the fatal battle of Culloden, the Pretender was surrounded by armed troops, who chased him from hill to dale, from rock to cavern, and from shore to shore. Sometimes he lurked in caves and cottages, without attendants, or any other support but that which the poorest peasant could supply. At others, he was rowed in fishing-boats, from isle to isle, among the Hebrides, and often in sight of his pursuers. For some days he travelled in woman's attire, and even passed through the midst of his enemies unknown. Understanding that his disguise was discovered, he assumed the habit of a travelling mountaineer, and wandered about among the woods and heaths with a matted beard, and squalid looks, exposed to hunger, thirst, and fatigue, and in continual danger of being discovered.

It is a strong proof the integrity of the Scottish peasantry, that he was obliged to trust his life to the fidelity of fifty individuals, many of whom were in the lowest paths of life; and although they knew that a price of 30,000*l.* was set upon his head, and that by betraying him they should gain wealth and affluence, yet they disclaimed the thought of obtaining riches on such terms, and ministered to his necessities with the utmost zeal and fidelity, even at the hazard of their own destruction.

In the course of these peregrinations, he was more than once hemmed in by his pursuers, in such a manner as seemed to preclude all possibility of escaping, yet he was never abandoned by hope or presence of mind; he still found some expedient that saved him from captivity and death, and through the whole course of his distresses, he maintained the most surprising equanimity and good humour.

At length, a privateer of St. Malo, hired by the younger Sheridan and some other Irish adherents, arrived in Lochranach; and on the 28th of September, this unfortunate prince embarked in the habit which he wore for disguise. His eye was hollow, his visage wan, and his constitution greatly impaired by famine and fatigue. He was accompanied by Cameron of Lochiel, and his brother, with a few other exiles. They set sail for France; and after having passed unseen, by means of a thick fog, through a British squadron commanded by Admiral Leacock, and being chased by two English ships of war, arrived in safety at Roscoff, near Morlaix, in Bretagne.

The remainder of the life of the Pretender, is but one continued scene of disgrace and misfortune. His heart, that had been proud of his exalted lineage, was broken; his high and chivalrous spirit was entirely subdued; and from the time of his leaving Scotland, all his acts are those of a man driven to desperation.

It is a fact, often doubted until the recent publication of Dr. King's Anecdotes, that the Pretender was in England in the year 1750. The impatience of his friends who were in exile, had formed a scheme which was impracticable; but although it had been as feasible as they had represented it, yet no preparation had been made, nor was any thing ready to carry it into execution. He was soon convinced that he had been deceived; and, therefore, after a stay in London of five days only, he returned to the continent.

Dr. King, who was one of the staunchest adherents of the Pretender, and who had many interviews, as well as a constant correspondence with him for some years, draws a very unfavourable character of him, after the failure of his enterprise had blasted all his hopes, and he had acquired vices in his misfortunes which he never afterwards overcame.

'He had not,' says the doctor, 'made the belles lettres, or any of the finer arts, his study, which surprised me much, considering his preceptors, and the noble opportunities he must always have had at that nursery, of all the elegant and liberal arts and science. I never heard him express any noble or benevolent sentiments, the certain indications of a great soul and a good heart; or discover any sorrow or compassion for the sufferings of so many worthy men who had suffered in his cause. But the most odious part of his character is his love of money, a vice which I do not remember to have been imputed by our historians to any of his ancestors, and is the certain index of a base and little mind. I know it may be urged, that a prince in exile ought to be an economist; and so he ought; but nevertheless, his purse should be always open, as long as there is any thing in it, to relieve the necessities of his friends and adherents. King Charles the Second, during his banishment, would have shared the last pistole in his pocket with his little family. But I have known this gentleman, with two thou- and louis d'ors in his strong box, pretend he was in great distress, and borrow money from a lady in Paris, who was not in affluent circumstances. His most faithful servants, who had closely attended him in all his difficulties, were ill rewarded. Two Frenchmen, who had left every thing to follow his fortune, who had been sent as couriers through half Europe, and executed their commissions with great punctuality and exactness, were suddenly discharged without any faults imputed to them, or any recompense for their past service. To this spirit of avarice, may be added his insolent manner of treating his immediate dependants, very unbecoming a great prince, and a sure prognostic of what might be expected from him, if ever he acquired sovereign power. Sir J. Harrington and Col. Goring, who suffered themselves to be imprisoned with him, rather than desert him, when the rest of his family and attendants fled, were afterwards obliged to quit his service on account of his illiberal behaviour.'

'When his father died at Rome, in 1766, Charles demanded to be recognized as King of England, in the same manner that his father had been; but the congregation established by the Pope for deciding on the manner in which he was to be received and treated, declared that the sovereign pontiff had too many measures to keep with England, on account of the Roman Catholics in the British dominions in Europe and America, to acknowledge him King of Great Britain.

'Orders were accordingly given, that no person should presume to give the title of King, to the Chevalier Charles. This order, however, was neglected, or rather disobeyed, by the friars of San Tomaso degli Inglesi, who had a college for the education of English Roman Catholics, the Scotch College, and the two Irish convents; who all, on four successive days, thought fit to receive him with that kind of ceremony which is only usual towards the Pope and crowned heads. His holiness, when informed of the circumstance, banished the superiors of all those colleges and convents from Rome.'

In passing through this part, we could not help observing how much it confirms an observation of Lord Bolingbroke, that to a rational mind banishment is not a severe punishment; the exile excites so much sympathy, that it goes far to compensate for the loss of home.

The New Union Spelling Book or British Youths' First Instructor, being a Plain and Easy Guide to Spelling and Reading, containing the Beauties of Dilworth, Fenning, and Vyse. By Horatio Murray. pp. 144. London, 1821.

This spelling-book is printed with a bold type, and contains numerous cuts descriptive principally of the reading; the words are well arranged, and though we are not certain that the beauties of Dilworth, Fenning, and Vyse, are here exhibited, yet the contents are such as are well calculated to engage a child's attention, while they will very much facilitate its progress in education. We advise the publisher, in his second edition, to substitute matter of more permanent and general utility for the 'poem' which is printed on the last page.—On what authority does Mr. Murray spell center for 'centre,' and introduce participles as simple words? lying, for instance; let him consider of this.

ORIGINAL LETTER

FROM A CORRESPONDENT AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Cape Town, May 31, 1821.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—After sixteen months interval of suspense, and may I say anxious doubt, I learn that, in September last, I had friends who cast a thought on the uncertain destiny of *., and offered a wish and fervent prayer for success to his enterprise.

I had expected early in the present year to have my bones given to manure the barren fields of Africa; but have been spared to struggle with adversity a little longer. I am now, thank Heaven, in tolerable health, and no way low in spirits, although my prospects are destroyed as a medical man; and as a farmer, I am without ground to cultivate, or skill to cultivate it, if in my possession. No professional man can succeed here unless he possesses some portion of independent property, or is on half pay from the army or navy; such men do well, but all others fail. General merchants and farmers, with mechanics, who depend on these two for employ, and boys also may insure success. There are already too many medical practitioners here, and the Dutch, who are very numerous, prescribe for themselves. I am, therefore, an unsettled settler; and, as Macbeth says, I believe I shall very soon 'throw physic to the dogs.'

The original mode of dividing the lauds is by time instead of measurement; the hours are generally formed at distances, increasing from half hours on horseback, and from the intervention of high mountains, it frequently occurs, that places within pistol shot of each other, in actual distance, cannot be visited in less than one or two hours, unless a baboon were the courier: of these there are enough, could we make any use of them. I have met, on the road, twenty to fifty at a time; they always scamper to the heights of the rocks, which every where surround us, and then one of them turns round to watch the motions of the intruder, making a noise somewhat like the barking of a dog, only louder and more harsh; always when at rest, they have one set as a watch, and should he fail to give notice of any approach, he receives a hearty thrashing from the company or family. Of other animals and venomous reptiles I need not write; they are very abundant, and are the dread of the farmers for the ruin which they create.

To convince you that I do not wholly mis-spend my time, since here I have acquired sufficient knowledge of Dutch to be able to read the 'Death of Abel,' in the original language, which I find in general is much finer than the English translation. It was singular that parts of my letter* were again transcribed from the public papers, and read to me from an epistle by a gentleman here, which he had received from the farthest part of Ireland, Nov. or Dec.: this assured me you were in existence.

I will trespass on you officially to communicate to the Literary Chronicle the following

History of the Colonization of Clanwilliam District of Tullagh, Cape of Good Hope.

On the 1st of May, 1820, the Fanny, transport, containing the parties of John Ingram, Esq. and twenty-six articulated men, with their families, in all sixty-nine persons; Captain Thomas Butler and his twelve families; and Captain Walter Synnot, with ten families, anchored in Simon's Bay, and rejoined the East Indian, which had on board Mr. Parker and seventy-six families. This gentleman had, in London, presented a plan to government for forming a new sea-port town at the mouth of the Nysa, to be called 'New Cork,' as may be seen by referring to some of the London papers of August and September, 1819. In consequence he received letters, recommending the government of this colony to comply as far as possible with his wishes; but the parties on board the Fanny having no connection with him, had no expectations but of going to Algoa Bay,

* This very interesting document alluded to, is inserted in No. 69 of the Literary Chronicle, in which it first appeared, and was afterwards conveyed into several of the diurnal papers without the slightest acknowledgment (the Herald excepted).—They order these matters better in France! The Revue Encyclopédique, which borrows from us less freely than many of our countrymen, acknowledges the obligations, in the following terms, which we confess are too flattering for our modesty; and we only quote the passage in order to show how much our neighbours the French surpass our English cotemporaries in liberality:—'Ce journal, qui paraît depuis quelque temps, et auquel nous empruntons quelquefois des articles, est entièrement consacré à la littérature et aux beaux arts. Il contient des analyses d'ouvrages, des articles originaux, des aperçus de mœurs, des morceaux de poésie, enfin les nouvelles des théâtres, &c.; il est habilement rédigé.'—Vide Revue Encyclopédique, Paris, Mars, 1821.—L.D.

which, they were informed by Lord Bathurst, was their destination, and had made their preparations accordingly—and, supposing the Nysa to be pre-occupied, his expectations were similar. But, to the disappointment of all parties, on presenting their letters to Col. Bird, the Colonial Secretary, he informed them, the lands of the Nisa were the private property of George Rex, Esq. and, therefore, the government, willing to locate the Irish parties distinctly from the others, had appointed them lands in Jan Deyssel's Valley, on the banks of the Oliphant's river. The remonstrances of Mr. Ingram and others, unconnected with Mr. Parker, were silenced by the assurance that these lands were the most fertile in the whole colony, and that the river being navigable thirty miles up, offered a ready passage for produce to the Cape market. Mr. P. not approving of an inland location, determined on examining the place before he took his party up, and therefore proceeded over land, while we in the ships returned round Cape Point to Saldanha Bay, for debarkation. When Mr. P. rejoined us, the account he brought was by no means agreeable, as he declared the lands unequal to the support of half the persons destined to be located thereon; and he immediately remonstrated with the government, and positively refused to accept them. Captain Synnot and Captain Butler were inclined to do the same, but Mr. Ingram knowing that where Mr. P.'s speculations were thwarted, his judgment was not always good, said, 'If we refuse the lands appointed for us without trying them, we cannot expect our views to be further gratified, whereas, if, on trial, they prove deficient, I know the English government too well to suppose it will make us sufferers for yielding to its wishes; I am ready to land.' This conduct influenced the others so far, that Captain B. followed him the next day; Captain S. on the following; and a great party of Mr. P.'s party a few days afterwards.

We were divided into four parties, of ten, twelve, twelve, and sixteen, ox-waggons, for the use of which it was given us to understand, we were to pay after the rate of two six-dollars, or four shillings each wagon for every travelling hour; but it has never been demanded. After a tedious journey of seven days, we arrived at the promised land, but, alas! found it no 'land flowing with milk and honey.' However, the time of our arrival (being the 2nd of June), when vegetation wears its brightest hues, the abundance of bushes and blossoms which every where abounded, gave the whole country a very pleasing appearance, especially when viewed at a small distance, and, therefore, when at daylight, and in the morning, we surveyed from the open plain (where we had arrived at mid-night), the oak trees spreading their luxuriant branches, and the orange trees displaying their golden fruit in the garden of the Drosdy, we were all delighted, for we had previously determined to find Jan Deyssel's Valley a beautiful place, and were unwilling to be disappointed. But, in less than a month, when the novelty had worn off, when we had examined every hill and dale more closely, and when we had conversed a little with the old inhabitants, we were obliged to own that all the lands given to one hundred and twenty-five families were not worth so many pounds, as from eight miles in length by two and a half to four in breadth, six hundred acres of arable land could not be obtained, and for each family to have a small garden, that dear object of independence which had tempted them to so great a distance from their native home, was impossible: on the portion allotted to me and my servant, I could not have grown a cabbage, so I left it where I found it and as I found it, except that I cut a walking stick from one of the wild almond trees growing in the Oliphant's river, which runs by its side.

We now found we had been sent here before government had received the report of the commissioner who had been to examine as to the extent and quality of the place, and that could the king err (for the colonial secretary is an almost despotic king here), he would have repented of what had been done; indeed, a short time after our arrival, when Mr. P. positively refused the allotment offered him, an order was sent to the landrost, directing that, in case Mr. Parker did not accept the lands destined for his seventy-six families, they should be given in addition to Mr. Ingram's, who has only twenty-seven! At length, in consequence of the repeated complaints of Messrs. Parker, Ingram, and Synnot, the latter received an addition of all land belonging to the Drosdy, excepting only the garden and about two acres before the house, with other advantages, and promises of patronage and favour: and a circular letter was addressed to the others containing a sort of reproof for their impatience and dissatisfaction; but containing an offer to remove them, or so many of them as chose to be removed to the Zwireveld, their original destination, there to be victualled at the expense of the government until the next harvest (which must be at least eighteen months). This was accepted by two-thirds of Mr. Parker's party, and Captain Butler, with the whole of his men, and Mr. Ingram would also have gone, but, expecting to obtain the lands of Parker, he had commenced building, purchased timber, farming stock, and utensils, &c. &c., and the corn he had sown and the vegetables he had planted looked well, for all which he demanded to be repaid; but this demand was not listened to, and the only advantage he obtained was the land vacated by Capt. Butler, after paying this gentleman four hundred rix dollars, for what had been done upon it during the two months he possessed it.

Mr. Ingram, at this time, stood high in the governor's opinion, for his activity and abilities, and several objects proposed by him for the benefit or convenience of the settlers, were promoted, and his plans adopted; such as facilitating matrimony and the appointment of a magistrate of minor powers, intended to assist the Dutch in giving justice to the English, and also to act where admissible as arbitrator, or rather umpire, between disputing parties; and on the minister receiving his appointment, he offered to build him a church and house, but on conditions which could not be complied with, until it received the sanction of the Government at home. He was also received as the friend of the landrost, and resided in the Drosdy's house. All this awakened the jealousy of Capt. Synnot, between whom and Ingram a disagreement had existed from on board the ship, and who, with his wife and children, had hitherto resided at a farmer's, two hours and a half from his location, until a cottage could be furnished for their reception; this was nearly completed when he stopped its progress and rode off to Cape Town, made a piteous complaint, and was allowed an appointment of Special Heemraad, or English Magistrate. About his time, early in October, the effects of the uncommon dryness of the season began to display itself, as the crackish nature of some parts of the grounds had already done; dissatisfaction became visible among Ingram's men, who, seeing all benefit from their labours vanish,—that even the potato-bed, like the corn-field, would yield them no harvest, and hearing that good workmen might obtain high wages amongst the farmers, availed themselves of any excuse for endeavouring to break the contract, under which they are bound to serve Mr. I. three years. The remaining members of Parker's party also began to clamour at not having received a proper division of the settlement since the departure of the others, and which could not be made without the presence of their head, who had continued in Cape Town and its vicinity, annoying the Government with plans and propositions equally vague and fruitless, until he was ordered to visit and do his duty by his party; this order he refused to obey; and, in consequence, a notice was served on him and them, that Government would no longer consider him head, but directed them to choose another, and that the district surveyor should, under the direction of the landrost and Capt. S., divide the lands among them; but this could not immediately be done, as the land-surveyor was not present, nor did he choose to return to his duty, so that, after a suspense of four months, a new one was appointed. The troubles and discontent excited by these causes, was, by a little dexterous management, directed to annoy in the extreme the very worthy landrost, whose most anxious wish was to promote the interests of all parties and unite them in friendship, and who never exerted the rigour of law but with the greatest reluctance. Capt. Synnot is a man who, with a very specious outside, pursues the objects of his comfort, interests, or ambition, without for a moment regarding how far the comfort or interest of other persons are injured. Mr. Bergh is old, and perhaps a little indecisive in his proceedings. Government intimated, or at least Capt. S. reported, that if they could find an excuse for displacing him, he should have the appointment; it therefore became his object to bring him into disgrace or to induce him to resign, and to one of these ends were all his endeavours directed. The landrost's cattle were pounded, if they came on Capt. Synnot's land, while his cattle were allowed to feed good where they could find it,—and the landrost's garden was the only place, until he had not a blade of vegetable to place upon his table. Such conduct, its object, and effect, was much easier seen and felt than it is described, and it raised to its height Mr. Ingram's indignation and contempt, whose noble mind, ever disregarding of himself, is watching opportunities to benefit those around him, to relieve the distressed, to support the weak, and to free the oppressed; and he was further stimulated to oppose it by feeling that the character of his country was injured thereby. This gentleman's opposition being found in some measure effective, it became an object with the assailing party to lessen the regard which he had hitherto obtained from all parties: he was misrepresented to Government, which, without deigning to account for its conduct, cast him off.

In November, the corn harvest having failed almost throughout the colony, from the excessive drought, but particularly in the district of Clan William, the Government found it necessary to supply the settlers with provisions, and sent a commissary to attend to their distribution, but, unfortunately, chose for this purpose a man highly arrogant and self-conceited, and destitute of those honourable principles or that polite education, which alone can render the society of such a person bearable; add to this, he is a Dane, and in politics a rank radical. On his arrival, Mr. Ingram did every thing to facilitate the objects of Government,—and much was in his power; but not being inclined to flatter the vanities of others, it was not long that he and the commissary could agree, especially as Ingram was a strong government-man, and his brother a lieutenant at the assault of Copenhagen; and another person, being desirous of causing or encouraging any disagreement between them, humoured the foibles of the aggressing; disputes arose in the end; such representations were made of Mr. I. to the Government, that he was ordered to quit the Drosdy House, where he had occupied a small sleeping room, and to reside on his lands, although they are not a pistol-shot distant; and Capt. Synnot is allowed to reside off from his lands, and in a government building. The arbitrary nature of this order will be better understood, when it is known that Capt. S. has discharged nearly all his men, while Mr. Ingram, in obedience with his instructions and conditions of his coming here, continues to relieve the whole of his men, and even was receiving into his employ two of Mr. Parker's and one of Capt. Synnot's men, whom the one could not support, or the other had discharged, in consequence of his large family, but arrived lately; as he did so, Mr. Commissary discontinued issuing the government rations to these persons. These circumstances induced Mr. I. to write very warm letters to the Government against the Commissary, and demanding that his own character and conduct should be investigated; but no notice being taken of this through the regular channel, he at length, seeing three families, including, in all, seventeen persons, nearly in a state of starvation, and that provisions for them could not be purchased, wrote a very indignant letter to the government, marking it 'private.' For some expressions this contains, he has been summoned to town, to answer, first, for writing and publishing a seditious libel against the Government and certain its civil servants; but, afterwards, it was thought well to leave out the word 'seditious,' as his loyalty is too well known. A complaint made by several of his men, some time ago, has also been taken up now, and forty-nine persons have been brought this immense distance, hoping to crush him by the weight of expenses and by the sentence which it is determined, if possible, to give against him, and stigmatise his character before the representation he has sent to Lord Bathurst can be attended to. But, it seems, all is contrary to their expectations;—he is not new to a court of law, and he clearly proves, that whatever happens from our location at Clanwilliam, it is the fault of those who sent us there, and must by them be answered for.

Adieu. Your's ever, J. A.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

MY DEAR .—Among several inquiries, you desire to have a description of Bartholomew Fair. First, then, imagine to yourself a large irregular built square, on each side of which are booths, decorated with gilt gingerbread, representing kings in their crowns and dolls in their teens; in which all kinds of stationery, turnery, confectionery, haberdashery, and imagery are to be sold. At the back of these booths are tables, baskets, small carts, and planks, all full of, or laden with, fruits of the season, among which oysters are enumerated. After going once round, and being driven at a slow pace in a motley group, think yourself exceedingly happy, if your shoes are not down at heel, your pocket-handkerchief lost, and you have escaped insult for the lack of elbow-room. Well, muster up courage and follow the visitors 'where they lead the way,' and you will presently be found in the centre of a confused mass of people of both sexes and all descriptions. The din of trumpets, and almost all other wind and string instruments, will fill your ears with discord and your eyes with wonder, while you lift them at the elevated troops, courts, and assemblies of actors, posture-masters, mountebanks, conjurers, ventriloquists, equestrians, tumblers, and jugglers. Take it for granted, that you are witnessing the better parts of the performances free of expense; for, of what is called fun and drollery, wit, satire, and jolliness, the most is displayed 'to their elegant and fashionable audience,' as a metropolitan play-bill would word it,—outside. On a platform, you may witness the 'Coronation!' without a five or fifty guinea ticket. I cannot convey an idea of this splendid pageant; but it is a mock-heroic, tragico-comico, procession. Naturally enough, some gawky and dumpty herbwomen, as good, perhaps, as their originals, for both, you know, were suitably painted; whether Aurora and Flora had a hand in this, is another question; then the earls' marshals, and afterwards follows a coronet of the Queen, carried on a cushion by a most beautifully bewitching creature; next, a dozen officers of state—the champion keeps their rear, mounted on leg-back, and armed cap-a-pie. My conscience, how his tin armour shines in the gorgeous display of royalty! Superb! superbly brilliant, indeed! Then the crown of the King, the sceptre, with other regalia; and, under a canopy, majesty itself! How graciously this royal monarch smiled on the people! It was really delectable to witness his condescension! Then followed the high prelate, his grace the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and other bishops in their gowns and wigs; the Spanish ambassador, with a long train of nobility, or rather substitute, mobility. Harlequin, clown, and pantaloon, closed this gratifying national recreation. What pleased me best,—as soon as the princely train had passed into St. Bartholomew Abbey, (Westminster), and returned into Smithfield Hall, (Westminster), the archbishop and bishops came (as a satire I suppose) and gazed with ineffable delight on the dance of the clown, now transformed into a miller. Then the sports began, and two Indians, I suspect coloured for the fair opportunity, combatted very dexterously with swords: this was the best thing I observed during the whole relati in speculum of the afternoon. But to proceed. Many pictures larger than life were hung enticingly gay in other parts of the fair. There was a giant with well-contrasted dwarfs by his side; I dare say all old acquaintances to those who annually visit here. There was much good dancing every where, very laughable tricks, though somewhat clownish, and tumbling in all directions, even where nobody was directed to tumble.

I now come to the wild beasts, as they are called. If representations of animals fighting and conquering one another were sufficient, no child would muster courage to venture near the pictures even; but I determined to enter the deserts of Arabia, and the uttermost parts of the earth, and, as it will appear, not only came home in safety, but much gratified. Lions playing with children, tigers shaking hands with their keepers, monkeys capering for nuts, are really remarkable, but still more so that of the unkindly elephant, only eleven years old, who bolts and unbolts doors, takes money and even pins in her delicate trunk, discharges a blunderbuss, and does several other feats equally surprising.

You will perceive by my paper, that I must be abrupt; and, upon the whole, I think the fair this year has been got up nothing inferior to those times when under the historic control of Benny Johnson and other worthies of the 'olden time.' I am aware that I have omitted many wonders, particularly of the mighty splendour and exquisite dialogues which charm the ears of the groundlings. Not venturing forth at unreasonable hours, however reasonable the opportunity,—the rest must be reserved for a better pen and other inclinations.

Your's ever, NICHOL. NOVICE.

P.S. I would observe, the polar bear is obliged to be watered every five hours, to keep it alive; the dogs, so recently brought over by Captain Parry, are very fine looking animals. As you have seen so many snakes in the grass in the country, I will not describe any of this race.

SUBMARINE ENGINE.

SUBMARINE navigation appears to have been first thought of by Napier, of Merchiston; and Cornelius Drebbl, who lived in the reign of James I. endeavoured to reduce it to practice on the River Thames; but the most successful attempts have been those of Bushnell and Felton, in America.

It was during the revolutionary war that David Bushnell, of Saybrook, Connecticut, invented a machine for the purpose of navigating underwater, with a view of blowing up British ships of war in the American ports and harbours. Bushnell has been dead some years, and no satisfactory account of his life has been published; but in a recent number of Professor Silliman's 'American Journal of Science,' there is an interesting description of Bushnell's submarine-boat, accompanied by an account of an attempt made with it to destroy a British frigate lying in New York harbour, in the year 1776. The account is taken from the mouth of Mr. Ezra Lee, the man who went in the boat under the ship, who is probably the only person living from whom it could have been obtained.

It was in the month of August, 1776, when Admiral Howe lay with a formidable British fleet in New York bay, a little above the Narrows, and a numerous British force upon Staten Island, commanded by General Howe, threatened annihilation to the troops under Washington, that Mr. Bushnell requested General Parsons, of the American army, to furnish him with two or three men, to learn the navigation of his new machine, with a view of destroying some of the enemy's shipping.

General Parsons immediately sent for Lee, then a sergeant, and two others, who had offered their services to go on board of a fire-ship; and on Bushnell's request being made known to them, they enlisted themselves under him for this novel piece of service. The party went up into Long Island Sound with the machine, and made various experiments with it in different harbours along shore, and after having become acquainted with the mode of navigating it, they returned through the Sound; but during their absence, the enemy had got possession of Long Island and Governor's Island. They, therefore, had the machine conveyed by land across from New Rochelle to the Hudson River, and afterwards arrived with it at New York.

The British fleet now lay to the north of Staten Island, with a large number of transports, and were the objects against which this new mode of warfare was destined to act; the first serene night was fixed upon for the execution of this perilous enterprise, and Sergeant Lee was to be the engineer.

After the lapse of a few days, a favourable night arrived, and at eleven o'clock, a party embarked in two or three whale-boats, with Bushnell's machine in tow. They rowed down as near the fleet as they dared, when Sergeant Lee entered the machine, was cast off, and the boats returned.

Lee now found the ebb tide rather too strong, and before he was aware, had drifted him down past the men of war: he, however, immediately got the machine about, and by hard labour at the crank for the space of five glasses by the ship's bells, or two and a-half hours, he arrived under the stern of one of the ships at about slack water. Day had now dawned, and by the light of the moon he could see the people on board, and hear their conversation.—This was the moment for diving; he accordingly closed up overhead, let in the water, and descended under the ship's bottom.

He now applied the screw, and did all in his power to make it enter, but owing probably in part to the ship's copper, and the want of an adequate pressure, to enable the screw to get a hold upon the bottom, his attempts all failed; at each essay the machine rebounded from the ship's bottom, not having sufficient power to resist the impulse thus given to it.

He next paddled along to a different part of her bottom, but in this manoeuvre he made a deviation, and instantly rose to the water's surface, on the east side of the ship, exposed to the increasing light of the morning, and in imminent danger of being discovered. He immediately made another descent, with a view of making one more trial, but the fast approach of day, which would expose him to the enemy's boats, and render his escape difficult, if not impossible, deterred him; and he concluded, that the best generalship would be to commence an immediate retreat.

He now had before him a distance of more than four miles to traverse, but the tide was favourable. At Governor's Island great danger awaited him, for his compass having got out of order, he was under the necessity of looking out from the top of the machine very frequently to ascertain his course, and at best made a very irregular zig-zag track.

The soldiers at Governor's Island espied the machine, and curiosity drew several hundreds upon the parapet to watch its motions. At last a party came down to the beach, shoved off a barge, and rowed towards it. At that moment Sergeant Lee thought he saw his certain destruction, and, as the last act of defence, let go the magazine, expecting that they would seize that likewise, and thus all would be blown to atoms together.

Providence, however, otherwise directed it; the enemy, after approaching within fifty or sixty yards of the machine, and seeing the magazine detached, began to suspect a Yankee trick, took alarm, and returned to the island.

Approaching the city, he soon made a signal; the boats came to him and brought him safe and sound to the shore. The magazine, in the mean time, had drifted past Governor's Island into the East River, where it exploded with tremendous violence, throwing large columns of water and pieces of wood that composed it high in the air. Gen. Putnam, with many other officers, stood on the shore spectators of this explosion.

THE TULIP MADNESS.

It has been observed that we live in an age wherein all kinds of extravagance are embraced and applauded by the ignorant as well as the learned; but it may be safely affirmed, that in this respect, the neighbouring countries have been no less remarkable for their follies than we for our's, and were there no other instance of it in existence, that of the Tulip madness in the seventeenth century would be sufficient.

The love of tulips and the anxiety to possess those which were rare, raged to such an extent in Holland, from the year 1634 to 1637, that the Dutch of all ranks, from the greatest to the meanest, neglected their occupations and sold their manufactures, and mechanics even their tools, to engage in the tulip trade. Accordingly, we find in those days that they fetched the most extravagant prices:

The Viceroy was sold for	£250
Admiral Leifken	440
Admiral Von Eyck	160
Greber	148
Semper Augustus	350

Whether there was any thing in the name, or it was the peculiar beauty of the flower which enhanced the price, does not appear certain; it is enough to prove the folly of the age, to know that such prices were obtained. In 1637, a collection of tulips of Wouter Brockholmenster, was sold by his executors for £9000.

Of all the tulips the Semper Augustus was the favourite, and the price we have assigned it was much less than it frequently produced. A fine Spanish cabinet, valued at 1000*l.* and 300*l.* besides, were once given for a Semper Augustus; and another gentleman sold three stocks of the same flower for 1000*l.* each. The same gentleman was offered for this flower 1500*l.* a-year for seven years, and every thing to be left as found, only reserving the increase during that time for the money. Another gentleman, by the sale of his tulips, got the sum of 6000*l.* in less than four months.

The tulip madness at length raged to such a pitch, that the Government deemed it necessary to interfere; accordingly, in 1637, a great check was put to it by an order of the state for invalidating their contracts; so that a root was then sold for 5*l.*, which, a few weeks before, produced 500*l.*

As a proof of the extent to which the tulip trade was carried, it is related, that in one city in Holland alone, in a period of three years, they had traded for a million sterling in tulips. It is further related, that a burgomaster had procured a place of considerable profit for his friend, a native of Holland, when the latter offered to make him any amends in his power, which the Burgomaster generously refused, and only desired to see his flower-garden. In about two years afterwards, the gentleman, on a visit to the Burgomaster, perceived in his garden a scarce tulip, which had been clandestinely obtained from him, on which he flew into such a passion that he resigned his place of 1000*l.* per annum, went home, tore up his flower-garden, and quitted the country.

INDESTRUCTIBLE WARRIOR.

(From Thuanus.)

DURING the wars of religion in France, when the Catholics besieged Rouen, in 1562, Francis Civile, one of the bravest gentlemen of the Catholic party, received a wound which made him fall from the rampart into the city, quite senseless. The soldiers, who believed him dead, stripped him and then buried him with that negligence which is common on such occasions. A faithful domestic, anxious to procure for his master a more honourable sepulture, went to see him. Not being able to recognise him among many mutilated bodies that he found, he covered them again in the ground, but so that the hand of one of them still lay exposed. As he returned, in passing the last, he observed this hand. Fearing that such an object might excite the dogs to fall on the dead body, he returned with a view of covering it. At the moment that he was about to execute his pious office, a moon-beam enabled him to perceive a diamond-ring that Civile wore on his finger. Without loss of time, he raised up his master, who still breathed, and carried him to the hospital for the wounded; but the surgeons, oppressed with labour, and considering the man as dead, would not examine his wound. The domestic then found himself obliged to carry him to his inn, where he languished four days without any assistance.

About this time, two physicians had the complaisance to visit him; they dressed his wound, and, by their kind attentions, he soon began to recover. The city being taken by assault, the conquerors had the barbarity, on finding Civile, to throw him out of the window. Fortunately, he fell on a dung-hill, where, abandoned by all the world, he passed three days more. His father, Ducroiset, finding him, had him secretly removed, during the night, to a country house, where he was properly taken care of. There, after so many species of deaths, he recovered his health so perfectly, that he survived all these accidents forty years!

Thuanus, who gravely relates this anecdote, says the peculiar providence which preserved this man from so many perils presided also at his birth. His mother dying enccinte during the absence of her husband, was buried without attempting to abstract the child by the Cæsarian operation. The day after the funeral the husband returned, and learned with surprise the death of his wife, and the little attention that had been paid her. He immediately had the body disinterred, when, though his wife was for ever lost to him, he recovered a child in the person of Civile, who was preserved alive!!

Original Poetry.

MERLIN'S CAVE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Your favourable reception of my former communication induces me to send you the following poetical fragment, which is the composition of a young friend of mine, now unhappily no more; and, if the partiality of my own judgment has not deceived me, you will agree with me in thinking it not unworthy of the public eye. It was written, as appears from certain dates, in the latter part of the year 1814, soon after the memorable riot of Spa Fields, and was intended to form the commencement of a poem, which had the writer lived to complete his design, (of which I have seen the outlines,) would, I think, have supplied no contemptible specimen of the mock-heroic. But, be this as it may, if you should deem the following fragment to possess sufficient merit for publication, its appearance in your columns would greatly oblige me. I shall subjoin a few notes, which the proper illustration of some passages seems to require. I remain, Sir,

Your obliged and obedient,

RALPH DOUGLAS.

MERLIN'S CAVE,*

OR A TALE OF SPA FIELDS:

A Fragment.

Argument.—Midnight—Spa Fields and its enchanted Castle—march of the pilgrims—the ancient Spa and the wizard's cave—Merlin's prophecy—modern temple described, together with the divinity and his votaries—approach of the pilgrims to the temple—his entrance therein—their chieftain portrayed—the sacred orgies and sacrifices of the pilgrims—the propitious omen of the divinity.

CANTO I.

'Twas midnight, and o'er all the town
Darkness had flung her sable gown,
And Silence, too, her sister-queen,
Had spread around her reign serene—
Save where the sentinels of night
Proclaimed the hour's unerring flight;

* The celebrated mansion of this name, which opened wide its hospitable portals to the pilgrim-traveller, cannot fail to be fresh in the remembrance of all, who took any interest in the numerous events of Spa Fields at the period to which this poem refers. I much fear, however, that in five short years, it has fallen a sacrifice to the destroying hand of Time. At least, in a pilgrimage, which I recently made to this memorable field, I could discern no traces of it; nor was I able to identify the spot, which had erst been the birth-place of so much patriotic eloquence. The H—ts, the W—ts, the G—e J—ts, the W—d—ts, and the H—ts—ts, where they all thought it their voice hath passed away with the years, and their place knows them no more. The consecrated ground, where once stood the temple

Save where was heard the watch-dog's howl,
Responsive to the hooting owl,
Or where Grimaldian's wanton yell
Scram'd through the haunts of Clerkenwell:
'Twas midnight—yea, 'twas past the time,
For long St. Paul's had ceased to chime,
When near yon wall-encircled pile,
Where oft hath groined, in 'dunance vile,'
Full many a fumed and errant knight,
Fame or repute by dunder and might,
Whom thicker some enchanter's spell
Had borne, in 'donjon-keep' to dwell,
And vainly captive knight might hope
With such enchanter's power to cope:
(A varrunt some have called his spell,
And eke the 'keep' a felon's cell;
But where is place, or thing, or name,
That Calumny will not defame?)
Beneath these walls, in thick array,
A host of pilgrims wound their way,
By ear noneard, unseen by eye,
Save by the bat, that fitted by,
Or night-bird lurking for his prey,
Or ought beside, that shuns the day;
Darkling and noiseless as the fogs,
That traverse the Hiibernian bogs,
Or like, of old, Hell's rebel throng,
They pour'd their gloomy tide along,
With in-drawn breath and wary tread,
As though they feared to rouse the dead,
That slept within the charnels near,
Or dressed some hobgoblin's ear;
Yet 'twas not charnel-bones or ghost,
But flesh and blood they dreaded most,
But chiefly feared the gipping claw
Of such rude minions of the law,
As, wand'ring near yon fatal dome,
Might chance across their path to roam,
And bear them to that spot a prey,
Where many a spell-bound champion lay,
Kinsman or friend or comrade dear,
Who else had swell'd their phalanx here.
But, unobserved the midnight train
Securely paced the silent plain;
For none across their path-way stole,
Watchman, thief-taker, or patrol,
Save whom fell Conscience conjured nigh,
To eat or o'erlet rustled by,
And then his muttered curses deep
In prison-wall and 'donjon-keep.'
'In ground they trod, though it may yield
To many a war-enobled field,
'um of Reform, from whence harangued the randiloquent of the land, is now usurped (O deplorable contrast!) by sheep-pens and cannage-gardens. Thus passeth away the glory of the world; and who, in perambulating this sere of pristine renown, would not adopt the athetic exclamation of the Roman poet, and say,— FUGIT ILLUC ET INGENS

Glacia Trucesces? —
• This building has had the good fortune to serve the work of revolution, which has taken place in its vicinity; and, however obnoxious certain pilgrims who have the misfortune to be inveigled within its enchanted precincts, promises, from its strength, to bid a long demure to the assaults of Time. Out of the annals of Parnassus it is known by the unusual name of Cold-Bath Fields.
† Had my lamented friend, the author of an immortal effusion, lived to this day, he might, no doubt, have made an improvement this illustration, by adopting, instead of the per-migrating fogs, the hogs of Hiibernia himself, which have recently evinced so wretched a disposition to look out for new artisans.

In such proud meed as war may claim,
Yet is it not unknown to Fame.
For there of yore (so poets sing)
Once stood a wonder-working spring,
Whose virtues, true or fabled, made
A crafty Esculapian's trade;
And fools there met to drink the spa,
As since have knaves to mend the law,
As though the spot gave inspiration
To quacks of each denomination,
And taught to cure the state, as well
As wind or colic to dispel.
In memory of its pristine fame
The Spa still gives this field a name.
Within this plain, too, gossips tell,
Was known of old a wizard's cell:
Tradition calls it Merlin's cell;
But says, it seemed more like his grave,
For but at night would he repair,
To hold his tranced vigils there,
And what he sang, or what he said,
Seemed but as parlance of the dead,
So solemn and so strange the sound,
That issued from his den profound,
Nor deeper sounds nor stranger came
From Cirith's cave*, so noised by fame.
Of would be scare the curious throng,
That listen'd to his wayward song,
With tales, wrapt up in mystic rhymes,
Of nameless deeds and fondest crimes,
That slumber'd yet in Fate's dark womb,
Or long had sunk into her tomb.
And still tradition loves to tell
Of oracle both dark and fell,
Of ancient date and portent grave,
Which erst had birth within this cave,
Which erst, like leaf of Sibyl thrown,
By many an envious blast was blown,
'Till, torn and torn by Time's rude gale,
'Twas but the relic of a tale.
• 'Avant, avant, ye race impure,'
(So runs the prophecy obscure)
• Pollute no more this sacred grove,
Cease, cease to weave your midnight plot;
Avant, avant, the deed is done,
Your doom is seal'd, your thread is run,
I see you fall, I see you soar †,
Accursed tribe, your reign is o'er.
So runs the legend, and some deem,
That Time hath realized the dream,
Though dim the traces that remain,
To mark the mischief-boding strain,
Yet of our song the end must be
To solve this wizard mystery.
* 'Tis now (to trust Tradition's lore)
Full twice six hundred years or more ‡.

• For a full account of this celebrated cave,
I must beg to refer the reader to that high and learned authority, 'Lempriere's Classical Dictionary,' not having the necessary time to transcribe it here.

† After the lapse of so many centuries, there must be considerable hazard in any attempt to unfold the mysterious import of this ancient prediction, the terms of which, in this line, seem to be so contradictory. An ingenious friend of mine has, however, suggested, that the falling and soaring, here applied to the same individuals, may be perfectly consistent, as illustrated in the case of a convict at the Old Bailey, who first falls in his adventurous career, and afterwards soars to public distinction on the pillory or the scaffold. But I leave to the learned in such matters the final solution of this abstruse question, if they should not be satisfied with my friend's conjecture.

‡ Old Merlin lived, according to the best

Since to the winds old Merlin's cell
Sent forth this terror-teeming spell;
And, ah, what various fates since then
Have visited the prophet's den!
Yet 'midst them all, 'tis said, his sprite,
Returning oft at dead of night,
Hath loved from nether realms to roam,
And hover'd round its earthly home.
Change after change the spot hath known,
But now 'tis claims it for its own.
The god, around whose brows appear
The juniper and bearded ear,
And from whose altars ever speed
The fumes of the Columbian weed;
The god, who frees the fetter'd brain
From Reason's arbitrary reign,
And governs, with all potent spell,
The haunts, where all the passions dwell;
The god of phrenzy—Bacchus he,
So high in old mythology,
Though many hold, that at his shrine
Reigns more of fiend than ought divine;
Yet, god or demon, here are known
The ogres of his midnight throne.
Nightly to this mysterious dome
Would many a wandering votary come,
Whom Fate, in some tempestuous hour,
Had blasted with her rudest pow'r:
Each child of misery or of shame
Hither, to soothe his suffering, came;
And each pale victim of despair
Would fondly seek a solace there.
Vain hope! 'tis the soul-beating fane
To deaden anguish turn'd their pain;
The vows they paid but made them more
Hope's darkling outlaws than before;
Nor one, who sought his pangs to tame,
Outcast of Fortune or of Fame,
Was known to this dark shrine to stray,
That went not more unblest away.
'Twas to these walls yon vagrant train,
That travers'd the benighted plain,
New bent their course, and lo! they see
The dome of their idolatry;
High o'er its dismal portal plays
A twinkling half-expiring blaze,
As doubting to reveal its light,
Or glimmer round a gloomier night.
But quickly, as the throng draw nigh,
The well-known signal they descry,
And, with impetuous career,
Like sound of whirlwind rushing near,
Glad to escape the dangerous plain,
They burst within the welcome fan,
And, to its inmost haunts convey'd,
Hail with long shouts the fav'ning shade.
And now, what tongue shall dare express
The councils of that deep recess,
Where, eager all for dark debate,
The pilgrims crowd in solemn state.
Not Elysian rites of yore,
Though thick the mystic veil they wore,
Not modern masonry may claim,
Nor ought of late or ancient fame,
Renown so mystic or so bold,
As what the muse shall now unfold.
Here then, in secret conclave met,
Their souls on dark designs are set;
Not Pandemonium a crew might boast
A deadlier plot—a wiler host; authorities, in the sixteenth century. Respecting his connection with the locus in quo (as a lawyer would say) of this epic effusion, history is silent; the poet must, therefore, have collected his information, as he professes to have done, from the traditionary lore of the spot, which, in all such cases, is sufficient authority.

Not Pandemonium's prince might claim
A prouder state, a loftier name
Than he, who, 'mong this midnight lane,
Was seen to hold the dangerous van;
Than he who, thronged about his peers,
Govern'd at will their hopes and fears,—
To phrensy round, or in despair
Sunk; as he pleased, each vassal there:
GRANWOTER, he,—a darker sprite
Ne'er sway'd o'er councils of the night;
No chief a stauncher soul than thou
Ne'er offered here his midnight vow.

This chief (or rumour much beguiles),
Once bask'd in fortune's fairest smiles,
With patrimonial affluence bless'd,
By many sought, by some caress'd,
No wants he knew, nor yet had known,
Had Prudence mark'd him for her own;
But scarce to manhood's age he came,
Ere, prone to every passion's flame,
He sank at once, a prey to all,
While Pleasure lured him to his fall,
While Vice's demons smiled to see
The work of their idolatry.
But chief the fiend of frantic eye,
Whose symbols are the card and die.
'Twas then, as from his 'wilderness'
Youth's visions took their panic flight,
And, as he scan'd the world's wide scope,
Nought met his eye but wrecks of hope,
'Twas then he vow'd his coming fate
On vengeance and despair should wait.
His mind, to this fell purpose wrought,
With kindred minds communion sought,
Deeming it better far to rule
O'er them than live another's tool.
Nor long the search, for busy Fame
Soon nois'd his history and his name;
And, like that dark impostor's band,
That curs'd, of old, Arabia's land,
Around him dock'd a furious crew,
Whom wayward fates together drew,

• Not being as deeply versed as I could wish, in the profound science of etymology, I have been much at a loss to unravel the latest signification of this epic cognomen, which, no doubt, like the Agamemnons and Diomedes of other days, must be pregnant with sublime meaning, if we could but discover it. What, however, I have failed to do myself, some philological friends of mine have had the temerity to attempt. One of them suggests, that the name may be a compound of the Latin grandis, and the Greek soter, and that it consequently implies a great deliverer; another deems it unnecessary to go back to the fountains of classical lore, inasmuch as the French words grand set, or the same terms in English, although not precisely synonymous, afford a much readier explanation; while a third, without touching upon the etymology of the name, considers GRANWOTER to be a lineal descendant of the renowned GRANOWSKIE, whose fame is immortalized in the pages of Rubelsaie. For my own part, I can only, with all due humility, admit that

'Non nostrum tantis componere lites.'

Of the fate of this hero, after he had distinguished himself as here set forth by the poet, I have no certain account. The most plausible rumor that has yet reached me, states, that, after having again signalized himself on another field, he retired from the world, with all the modesty of Cincinnatus, secluding himself within the walls of a remote castle, where—he continues to spend his days with the dignity of a patriot and the privacy of a philosopher.

• 'The world forgetting, by the world forgot,'

Whose only solace rested there,
Where Hope reigns wedded to Despair,
In Revolution's whirling storm,
Ruin their aim, their cry—'Reform.'
Of these GRANWOTER led the van,
Proud anarchy of the lawless clan.
'Prepare ye now, for grave debate,'
(The chieftain cries,—his word is fate),
'But first implore, with rites divine,
The god of this mysterious shrine;
For sought your councils e'er acquir'd
Of vigour till by him inspir'd.'
He spoke, and with applauding sounds
The subterranean vault rebounds;
Nor cease th' assembly's clamorous cheers,
Till to each ravish'd eye appears
One who might well, so portly he,
Pass for the 'present deity';

But, though so like in mien and air,
'Tis but his priest—the muse can swear.
In either hand he bears a load,
Sacred to the presiding god;
In either hand a vessel brims
With juniper's obolious streams;
Safe, on the board the juice he lodges,
Now known on earth as 'best proof Hodges';
But once the drink of gods above,
The nectar of carousing Jove;
And next an earth-born Ganymede
Brings store of the Virginian weed,
With tube and gill, and what beside
Is to these mystic rites allied,
With what beside may serve to swell
The orgies of this secret cell.

The board is spread, the rites commence,
And all around their charm dispense;
A hundred tongues in union blend,
And from a hundred throats ascend
Commencing vapours, dense and strong,
That veil in clouds th' enraptur'd throng,
While steams from many a votive gill,
The matchless nectar of the still;
Till through the 'vaulted subterrene'
The circling fumes alone are seen,
And, as he hails the dark abode,
Each vot'ry owns the coming god,
Feels all his wonted fires descend,
And through his frame their reign extend.
'He comes, he comes, the God appears,'
Each exults thus the omen chieftain;
'He comes, behold the well-known cloud,
That bears him in its billow'd shroud;
Behold yon taper's sinking blaze,
How blue it burns, how wild it plays!
Sure sign he scents our exhalations,
And quaffs benignly our libations;
Then come, propitious god, and aid
The councils of thy favour'd shade.'
While thus, with frantic voice and mien,
Each vot'ry hails the welcome scene,

• I leave it to the learned in Ptolemy to explain the particular properties of this beverage, and also to determine, whether it be or not, as our author hath affirmed, the identical liquor quaffed by the 'father of gods and men,' while enjoying his computations with his brother godships on the summit of 'Cloud-capt Olympus.' For my own part, I can only aver, with great sincerity, that such a beverage as 'best proof Hodges,' is not once mentioned by Homer throughout the twenty-four books of his Iliad, which I have most painfully consulted on the occasion; but one of my fort-mentioned friends, a most erudite and conscientious gentleman, hath assured me, that very honourable mention of it occurs in an ancient and elaborate work entitled, 'Annals of St. Giles' and Totbills Fields.

Dim and more dim the lights appear,
Till scarce a taper glimmers near;
Then leanness quits her 'vantage ground,'
And rebel passions rage around,—
Then Order and Decorum fly,
And own Confusion's enmity;
Pipes, kiffs, and vessels clattering fall,
And one wild chaos buries all.

And now the chief, with ravish'd glance,
Beholds the mischief-working trance,
If aught of light remain to see
The dark and dismal revelry;
Yet well he feels the moody power
That rules in the delirious hour,—
And well he knows how to command
The growing phrenzy of his band.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—On Saturday, a new melodrama was produced at this theatre, entitled Gibaldi Duval. It is a new version of Mrs. Opie's tale of the Russian Boy, which was very successfully dramatized by Mr. Thomas Dibdin, about eighteen months ago. The story is founded on an event which occurred at Brussels, about twenty years since; but as its present dramatizer, (who we understand to be Mr. P. Walker, the author of Wallace), has entirely changed the story, and added characters and incidents neither to be met with in the original nor in the fiction of the novelist, we shall give a brief sketch of the plot of the melodrama:—

Gerald Duval, (Mr. Cooper), who, for a supposed insult, has vowed revenge on Ethelind, Countess of Altenburg, (Miss Smithson), is the leader of a band of robbers. In pursuance of this scheme, he makes Count Altenburg a prisoner, and hastening to the abode of his wife Ethelind, seizes her, and, though he has an opportunity of immediately satiating his revenge, yet he prefers bearing her away to his cavern, whence her husband has just escaped, and, collecting a guard of soldiers, returns, attacks the haunt of the bandits, and shoots Gerald dead at the moment he is going to stab Ethelind, who is thus restored to her husband.

What could have induced Mr. Walker to select, for a new melodrama, a subject which had been already in such good hands, we know not; but the result must convince him that, it was at least injudicious, for though the thing is well enough for a melodrama, yet it falls short, very far short indeed, of the Russian Boy of the Surrey Theatre, which, with the excellent acting of Mr. T. P. Cooke, in the hero, and Miss Taylor, in the Countess, was powerfully interesting. Gibaldi Duval was, however, received with applause, and has been performed nightly ever since it was first produced.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A more intimate acquaintance with the new Belvidera of this theatre, makes no alteration in the opinion we expressed last week. Her feeble voice must be a serious obstacle to her appearing in one of the larger houses, and there is a little awkwardness in her manner, which, however, experience will soon correct. She possesses many qualifications for the higher walks of the drama; and we confess we think it would have been more judicious to have tried her first in Juliet, which, we have no doubt, she could play admirably.

The Marriage of Figaro has been produced at this theatre, with great success. It is a charming comic opera, and the parts were generally very well sustained, particularly by Jones, who is always excellent as the Count. De Camp was a good Figaro, and Taylenre a tolerable Antonio. Miss Carrew, Miss Corri, and Mrs. Chatterley, played their respective parts delightfully. We are very happy to find that the new theatre is likely to become as great a favourite as the old one, for it is nightly crowded. If, however, it is intended that the whole of the audience should get a glimpse of the stage, it will be necessary that a great alteration should be made in the side boxes. This, we doubt not, will be attended to before another season.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—Novelities have been so frequent at this house during the present season, that it almost becomes a novelty to us not to have to announce one this week. So many successful pieces have, however, been added to the stock-list, that a rich and varied treat is furnished nightly.

Literature and Science.

Mr. Simonde de Sismondi, the well-known author of the History of the Italian Republics, is engaged in a work of the first importance, the want of which has been long and universally acknowledged—A Complete History of the French Nation. The patience and agility displayed by the author in his multifarious researches, his perspicuous style and excellent arrangement, and, above all, the spirit of liberty which never ceases to animate him, afford abundant proof that, if he lives to complete his design, he will raise a literary monument worthy of his own reputation, and of the great nation whose feeds he is about to commemorate.

Literature advances rapidly in the Russian tongue; eight thousand volumes appeared in the last twenty years, whereas, in 1800, only three thousand were printed. It seems there are no less than three hundred and fifty living authors in Russia, though their works and even their names (except two or three) are wholly unknown in England and France.

The Russian frigate, Voslock, Capt. Bellinghausen, and a corvette, are returning from a voyage of discoveries in the Pacific, to Petersburg. These ships proceeded nearly in the track of Capt. Cook, advancing as far as 70° N. The principal thing discovered is, that Cook's Sandwich Land consists of an island or islands.

Cachemere Goats.—The Cachemere Goats imported into France by M. Ternaux, have been settled at Perpignan, and are now beginning to propagate. After yearning in March, the down, some rudiments of which had appeared in April, began to get intertwined, and this may be looked upon as an approach to maturity. 'This I had plucked up,' says M. Tessier (in his communication to the Royal Academy of Sciences), 'with horn combs, and it was thus almost pure and free from clots.' Each animal furnished, on an average, three ounces and a half; some, including a large he goat, gave six ounces. There is very little loss, and every thing announces that this race will easily get seasoned to the climate. The she-goats are better for milking than the natives; the large hairs vary much in length, and it has been remarked that the short haired individuals sometimes yield the most down, and it is finest on those of a grey colour. By allotting them a more elevated situation in the Pyrenees they are expected to give more down, and further improvements are contemplated, in the selections for propagation, by a judicious crossing with such of the indigenous races as bear an analogous down.

Rock in the Moon.—Dr. Olbers informs Dr. Gauss, that he observed on the 5th of February an appearance in the dark part of the moon, which has been called a lunar volcano. It appeared as usual in Aristarchus. It was small, but much brighter than the other parts of the moon, unilluminated by the sun, quite like a star, and even appeared like a star of the sixth magnitude, seen situated to the north-east of the moon. Dr. Olbers is inclined to believe that this brightness is produced by the reflection of the light of the earth from an even and smooth surface of a great extent of rock in the moon.

Apple Bread.—M. Duduit de Maisieres has invented, and practised with great success, a method of making bread with common apples very far superior to potatoe bread. After having boiled one-third of peeled apples, he bruised them while quite warm into two-thirds of flour, including the proper quantity of yeast, and kneaded the whole without water, the juice of the fruit being quite sufficient. When this mixture had acquired the consistency of paste, he put it into a vessel, in which he allowed it to rise for about twelve hours. By this process he obtained a very excellent bread.

New Balloon.—An experiment was made a few days ago, in the Garden of Tivoli, with a balloon, which was fitted and raised without any combustible matter, gas, or apparatus. It was exposed empty to the rays of the sun, and their action determined the atmospheric air into the balloon, which was completely filled. It acquired, at the same time, an essential impetus, and, when abandoned, rose of itself. The construction of the balloon is contrived, that it may receive the greatest advantage from the action of the sun; the upper part is transparent, the middle black, and the lower part gilt outside and black within.—Journal des Debats, Sept. 9.

LUCRETIVS.

Superstition.—From a French Paper. Three persons, named Ricou, Fayet, and Du Vacher, in the commune du Tremblay, near Segre, were brought up last assizes at Maine et Loire, the two first accused of having wounded and committed other violence on a man named Moreau, by which he was incapable of working for twenty days; and the third of having counselled the other in doing so. In March last, Ricou and his family suffered much from vermin, and could not get rid of them; and the milk of his cows produced no butter. Ricou believed himself under the influence of sorcery, and consulted two learned men of the profession, one of whom advised him to throw salt into the fire, and the other to throw bran in the stable where his cows were kept. Neither had any effect. Ricou then consulted Du Vacher, who, with being of the profession, enjoyed the reputation of a wise man through the neighbourhood. Du Vacher said he must consult a book left at his house by a soldier. He informed Ricou his family was threatened with new misfortunes, and his wife and children would die in a few days; the only remedy was to force the sorcerer to undo the work of fate; and to do this Ricou must put the sorcerer in the fire, and hold him there until the thing was accomplished. The individual pointed out by Du Vacher, as the sorcerer and author of Ricou's misfortunes, was Moreau, an honest journeyman in the neighbourhood. Ricou did not easily consent, but at length yielded to the fear of losing his wife and children, and procured the assistance of Fayet to put Moreau on the fire; the latter easily consented, being himself a victim to sorcery, as he believed, in consequence of drinking a glass of cider at Moreau's. Ricou sent his wife and children out of the way; and on the evening of the 25th of March, enticed Moreau to his house; a large fire was prepared; Ricou and Fayet seized Moreau, and commanded him to undo the fate he had cast upon them, or they would throw him into the fire. Moreau, in vain, protested he was no sorcerer; he was seized and laid across the fire. The fire had burnt his clothes, and injured his leg and his left thigh, when his cries frightened his persecutors. Fayet ran away with all speed. Ricou took up a gun and threatened to shoot Moreau, unless he suffered himself to be broiled alive; at length frightened at the cries of the sufferer, he permitted him to escape. On the trial, Ricou affirmed seriously, 'that a few days after this operation, the milk of his cows produced good butter, and he also got rid of the vermin; in short, his fate had altered.' Fayet said, 'as far as regarded himself, he was always the victim of sorcery, and had the colic every day from two to four o'clock.' Ricou and Fayet were sentenced, to two years' imprisonment; and Du Vacher was acquitted on the 12th of August.

A similar case will come before the next assizes at Sarthe. In this case the sorcerer is killed by the person suffering under his supposed influence: the murderer accuses his victim of having given the small-pox to his infant, and caused the death of his sheep.

Madame Catalini.—A few years ago, when this celebrated syren was in London, a new-born child was deposited at her door; when being told of it by her porter, she, ordered the new guest to be brought into her apartment. Round its neck was a note in these words, — 'I recommend my child to God and Madam Catalini.' She adopted the child:

The poet Schiller received from the Emperor of Germany a diploma of nobility, but he never availed himself of it. On searching one day in a chest for some papers, he stumbled on this diploma, and showing it to an intimate friend who happened to be present, he observed, 'You did not know, I suppose, that I have been several years a noble,' and then threw it carelessly aside. Schiller knew that an emperor might gain honour by conferring a title on him, but that he could gain no honour by a title.

A Simile.

Friendship is like the cobler's tie,
That joins two soles in unity;
But love is like the cobler's awl,
That pierces through the sole and all!

Longevity.—In the beautiful little village of Broxbourne, in Hertfordshire, there died, in the course of seven months, preceding 27th May last, thirteen persons, whose united ages amounted to 1077 years. The youngest was 70 years, and the oldest 89. The first was on the 19th October, 1820, and the last on the 24th May, 1821, and they stand in the register as follows:—

We are sorry that we cannot award our patronage and correspondence to Mr. Stuart, as he requests; for the very commencement of his letter frightens us. — In the name of God, Amen, may be well enough when it is followed by, 'This is the last will and testament, &c.' but it is really too serious a beginning for ordinary correspondence.

Review of New Books.

The History of Madeira. With a Series of Twenty-seven Coloured Engravings, illustrative of the Customs, Manners, and Occupations of the Inhabitants of that Island. London, 1821.

AMONG the few places which possess attractive features for the pen and the pencil, and yet have been hitherto neglected by both, is the Island of Madeira; a place interesting from its situation in the track of British commerce, and more particularly so from its excellent climate, which is found by experience to be highly beneficial to British invalids, in cases where their native air fails to produce relief.

The work before us contains a good historical and topographical sketch of the island, and the manners of the people are displayed, (correctly we doubt not,) in a series of excellent engravings, from designs by a resident in the island. 'These designs,' says the author in his preface, 'being made with a view to display character as well as dress and figure, appropriate thoughts naturally arising from the description, have been ventured, to increase the interest of the picture; and it is hoped that the effect will not be lessened by their being clothed in verse. In this respect, the desire to please will, perhaps, awaken indulgence, if it cannot excite praise.' We confess we like our author's prose better than his poetry; but the embellishments, (which are the principal features of the work,) are of sufficient merit to compensate for any defects of style in the poetical part of the work.

The island of Madeira is a valuable possession of the kingdom of Portugal, in the Atlantic Ocean, and has belonged to that power ever since its first discovery. The island displays the figure of an irregular quadrangle, and is formed of lofty mountains, hills, and fruitful valleys. Its more elevated parts generally rise in a gradual ascent, the highest point of land being a mile and a-half above the level of the sea. The island presents, in some places, the most enchanting scenery, abounding with all the softer pictures of natural beauty; while in others, huge rocks, lofty precipices, deep valleys, and rushing torrents, combine the most awful and charming examples of the sublime and beautiful, with their accessory features in the landscape of nature; uniting the delights of Arcadia with Alpine magnificence.

Although Madeira is, by some writers, said to have been known to the ancient geographers, and its discovery is, by others, attributed to John Gonsalvo and Tristram, navigators employed or at least encouraged by Henry, Infant of Portugal, yet the most concurrent testimony attributes it to an English gentleman, of the name of Robert Machin, who, in the reign of Edward the Third, was shipwrecked on the island. The story of Machin, though wearing much of the air of romance, is believed in the outline to be founded in truth.

Machin was much enamoured of a young lady, whose name was D'Arfet or D'Orset; but her parents forced her contrary to her wishes, to marry a nobleman of high rank, Machin being thrown into prison until the odious marriage was accomplished. When released, he determined to carry off the bride, and succeeded; he then embarked with her in a small vessel at Bristol, and set sail for France; but tempestuous weather drove them into the main ocean, and the first land they made was the then undiscovered Island of Madeira. Here they landed; but, before they had removed any of the ship's contents on shore for their immediate accommodation, the vessel was driven out to sea, and it was supposed lost. This preyed so much on the mind of the lady, that she shortly expired in the arms of her distracted lover:—

'He could not sustain the shock of this overwhelming loss, and lived but a few days to lament her. This sad interval he employed in erecting a memorial to perpetuate his fidelity, affection, and misfortunes:

'He laid her in the earth,
Himself scarce living; and, upon her tomb,

Beneath the heauteous tree where they reclined, Plac'd the last tribute of his earthly love.

'In the last cruel moments of his expiring life, Machin implored his friends to consign his remains to the same grave which contained those of his beloved Anna, who had sacrificed so much for him. This request was religiously fulfilled at the foot of an altar, erected under a tree of wide-spreading beauty, against whose stupendous stem was placed a large cross of cedar, which time seems to have venerated, as it still remains to excite the sympathizing feelings of those who visit the spot. Near this sacred emblem, was an inscription dictated by the dying lover, containing his sad history, and which concluded with a pious request, that if any Christians should, at some future period, form a settlement in that island, they would there erect a church, and consecrate it to the Redeemer of Mankind;—a devout hope, which, in the providential course of human events, has been since fulfilled.'

The distressed followers of Machin embarked in a boat or canoe, which they had either made or preserved, and put to sea. They were driven to the coast of Barbary, and there made captives. While at Morocco, they communicated their adventure to a fellow-slave, a Spaniard, of the name of Juande Morales, who was soon after ransomed. On his return to Spain, he was taken prisoner off the coast of Algarve, and carried into Lisbon by Gonsalvez Zarco, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, to whom he related the curious and extraordinary narrative of his English companions at Morocco. Zarco communicated the intelligence to his sovereign, who immediately ordered a ship to be fitted out, the command of which he gave to him, with a view to the discovery of the island. Zarco sailed for Algarve on the 1st of June, 1419, and made the eastern-most point of the island on the 14th of the same month. Zarco disembarked on the 2nd of July, and paid a pious visit to the sepulchre of the two lovers. Mass was celebrated, and the service for the dead, according to the Romish ritual, was performed over the tomb of Machin and his lady; and the ceremony was concluded by laying the first stone of a small church, which was afterwards completed of wood, and dedicated, according to Machin's last wish—to the Redeemer of the World.

The navigators saw no human inhabitants on the island, nor any ferocious animals or poisonous reptiles; but numerous flocks of birds of the most beautiful plumage. It abounded with wood, and the ground was covered with odoriferous herbs. When it was determined to convert it into a Portuguese colony, the immense woods were set on fire, and the conflagration is said to have lasted during several years. Zarco was appointed governor of the island, and three young Portuguese noblemen married his daughters, and had ample grants of land, and from them are descended the principal families of Madeira.

We have already mentioned the climate of Madeira, which is indebted for its boasted salubrity to the uniformity of its temperature; the soil is most fertile, and is capable of producing the fruits and vegetables of almost every quarter of the globe. Not only the tropical fruits, but even those of the north arrive here at the utmost perfection:—

'This island lays claim to its having been the first situation in the western world, where the arundo saccharifera, or the sugar-cane, was cultivated. It most probably was introduced from the east soon after the island was discovered; but at what particular period, there are no existing means of ascertaining. From hence it was transplanted to the Brazils, and it is said to be owing to a most destructive blight that it ceased, in a great measure, to be cultivated here, when the vine succeeded, and has continued to form the wealth of the island; but the small quantity of the sugar that is still produced is uncommonly fine, and is said to emit an odour similar to that of the violet. Another account mentions, that when the island was first colonized, Prince Henry of Portugal caused the sugar-cane to be transplanted thither from Sicily; and that at one time there were forty sugar-mills on the island, that article then forming the staple commodity. Now there is only one mill remaining; but in this description the excellence of the sugar and its odoriferous quality is confirmed.'

Madeira has long been celebrated for its grapes, of which it produces almost every variety, in great perfection:—

'The vine was introduced into Madeira from the island of Cyprus, but at what period rests upon very dubious conjecture. It is not easy to reconcile the character of Chaptal for accuracy in his philosophical inquiries, when he mentions that, in the year 1420, vines were already planted in this island. At all events, there must be a confusion in the dates, as the island itself, according to the Portuguese historians, had been discovered only in the preceding year; and, if so, there could scarcely be a sufficient quantity of land cleared away to produce the common necessities of life, much less to plant vineyards; and if a conflagration of the woods which overspread the country, and lasted several years, as is generally related, was necessary to prepare the island for cultivation, a much later period must be referred to for introducing this fortunate plant into Madeira.'

From the variety of grapes grown in this island, it might be concluded, that each could be made to produce wine of its own specific character:—

'But, in general, the different grapes are all mixed together in making that wine which exclusively bears the name of the island, except the Malmsey and Sercial grapes; the former affording a wine superior to any sweet wine, and the latter another superior to any dry wine. The Tinto grape also gives a wine which has the flavour of Burgundy, but is commonly mixed with the other wines. There is one extraordinary kind, which is merely used as a desert fruit, about the size of a muscle-plum, and the clusters are so large as sometimes to weigh twenty pounds.

'The vines run on trellises of cane-work, about three feet from the ground, and the vintage begins early in the month of September; when the singular precaution is necessary to tie up all the dogs to prevent their getting at the grapes, of which those animals are voraciously fond. The rats, lizards, and wasps are also great enemies to the ripened clusters.

'The process of making the wine is very simple. The grapes, when cut, are immediately consigned to the press, which is a large wooden trough, not unlike the cider-press in England, over which is a large clumsy lever, connected with other machinery. When the trough is nearly filled, the due number of bare-legged peasants appointed for the purpose, enter the machine, and by the active tread of their feet, press out the juice, which runs into a vessel beneath. The husks or stalks are then collected and pressed with the lever, which pressure is occasionally extended to the fourth time. The best wine is said to be produced on the south side of the island, and when first made is as deep-coloured as port. It ferments for about six weeks after it is made.

'There is some difference in the accounts given of the quantity of wine made in Madeira; but the most authentic average appears to be, from twenty-five to thirty thousand pipes, the greater part of which is exported, and the rest is consumed in the island. It does not, however, attain its due state of perfection till it has acquired a certain age in Madeira, or been transported to a warmer climate, and deposited there for a longer or shorter period. Hence has arisen the practice of sending such wines as are intended for British consumption, a voyage to the West Indies, or round the East Indies, China, and the Brazils; which experience has determined to be essential to their excellence.'

The land owners of Madeira do not manage their farms, but appoint certain portions to be cultivated, for which they give the tenant one half of the produce. Of the people of Madeira we are told,—

'The native inhabitants, more particularly the labouring classes, are of a more dark and swarthy complexion than those of the colder climates of Europe; for which, it is probable, they may be indebted to a Mulatto or Moorish origin, in common with the natives of the parent branch of the peninsula, from which they are derived. It is only a few of the first families who bear any the least resemblance in complexion, to the fair inhabitants of northern Europe; and this difference may be traced to a superior extraction. These islanders are generally of a middle stature, but athletic, well-limbed, active, and of great muscular strength, which renders them capable of sustaining the greatest fatigue; so much so, that they are often reduced to an emaciation of body, and debility of constitution, which brings on premature old age; though long life appears to be, otherwise, among the privileges which nature seems disposed to confer on them. The peasantry are sober, economical, and not merely inoffensive in their manners, but of dispositions the most courteous towards strangers, as among themselves. When they meet one of the latter, [former] they take off their cap, and "hope the Lord will prosper him;" and when they meet each other, they stand cap in hand, with common politeness, though under a perpendicular sun, and the reflected heat of a rock, till they have satisfied each other as to the welfare of their wives, children, relatives, acquaintance, cattle, domestic animals, &c.; and it is a point of economy not immediately to be settled, which of the friendly social party shall first return the cap to its appropriate situation.

'The higher classes, on the contrary, are inclined to corpulence, as they are inactive and indolent, which may be one cause of it; and this disposition is attended with a temper somewhat morose, and a tendency to melancholy. Though violent in respect to their libations to Bacchus, the presiding divinity of the island, they frequently indulge their appetite to excess in the luxury of the table. From this circumstance, with the sedentary life to which they habituate themselves, they become subject to chronic diseases, which are followed by the termination of premature old age.

'The youth, or at least the blooming gaiety of female life, is also greatly shortened, by early marriages and a numerous offspring. The mothers have often from six to twelve children, whom they generally suckle; a duty which they often protract beyond the period that nature requires, even for two or three years.

Funchal, the capital of Madeira, contains about twenty thousand inhabitants, which is considered as the fifth part of the population of the island. It is situated at the foot of a lofty range of mountains, forming a magnificent amphitheatre:—

'In a corner of the Franciscan convent, is a small chamber, which, though, from its dismal furniture, it may not invite a visit from the gay or the cheerful, may induce the curious to examine such an arrangement of mortality. Its ceilings and walls are completely covered with human skulls and thigh bones, placed in such a manner as to form a kind of triangle, with a skull fixed in the points. A figure of St. Francis is represented as balancing a saint and a sinner, to ascertain which is the heaviest. From the ceiling is suspended a small lamp, calculated to give sufficient light to display a scene which might as well be consigned to utter darkness. The number of these bones is calculated at upwards of three thousand. For what rational purpose they are thus curiously preserved, it is idle to inquire; and what object of superstition, none but the superstitious will pretend to determine.'

Intending to divide our notice of this interesting and elegant volume, we shall, for the present, only detach one or two passages:—

Superstition.—About three miles from the town, up the country, is a very handsome church, called Nosa Senhora do Monte, in which are some scripture paintings, and a fine organ, with other decorations suited to the character of the place. The image of the patron saint is preserved with the most devout care, in a glass case, on the great altar. She is about two feet in height, dressed in a flaxen wig, and decorated with a profusion of gold chains and precious stones, which, at different periods, have been the pious offerings of wealthy devotees.

'After the destructive flood in the year 1803, this image was brought into the town, with the greatest possible pomp and solemnity, being attended by the principal clergy, the military, in their best array, and the civil authorities, as there was no doubt of her presence proving a certain, and, indeed, providential protection against any further deluge; and, after being received with the celebration of all due honours, and remaining some months in the cathedral, she was returned to her own altar, with all the solemnity with which she had been consecrated to the city; as the church dedicated to her was built on the spot where, according to the monkish legends, she was originally found, soon after the first discovery of the island.

'Pilgrimages are daily made to her shrine; and the sailor, who is accustomed to danger, and laughs at fear, is seen to ask for added security against the perils of the sea, which he devoutly believes that she can afford him. It is the custom for sailors, after they have landed safely on the island, to go about the streets begging alms, in order to pay the clergy for saying masses in their behalf, at her altar. An entire crew, headed by their captain, are to be seen trudging barefoot up the steep road that leads to the church of Nosa Senhora do Monte, carrying their top-sails with them in procession, accompanied by an appraiser, who, in the presence of some priest belonging to the church, affixes a value on the sails; the value, being thus determined, is paid into the hands of the holy man, to defray the expense of celebrating masses, in favour of the vessel to which the sails belong, at the shrine of the saint.'

Funerals.—It is the custom here to bury the dead within twenty-four hours after their demise. They bear the body on an open bier to the place of interment, with the face and arms exposed to full view, attended by a concourse of priests and friars, chanting a funeral dirge; then follow the friends of the deceased; and the procession is closed by a motley tribe of beggars, bearing torches. When the body is consigned to the grave, a quantity of lime and vinegar is thrown in to consume it, in order to make room for others, as the church itself is the exclusive place of interment. If relatives were to attend funerals, it would be considered as a mark of indifference; and widows, in the higher stations of life, never cross the threshold for twelve months after the death of their husbands. It is only since the year 1770, that the Portuguese have withdrawn their uncharitable regulations relative to the burial of Protestants. Previous to that period, their dead bodies were thrown into the sea.'

Expedience; a Satire. By Julius. Book I. 8vo. pp. 95. London, 1821.

If our readers are not absolutely con-jurers, we suspect there is not one of them will guess the subject of this satire by its title, for surely never were title and subject more at variance. Who, except 'Julius,' would ever dream of calling a coarse attack on the Queen, now that the grave has closed upon her—'Expedience'? Is it expedient to insult the memory of the dead, and to abuse every nobleman who dared to defend an injured woman while groaning under an oppressive prosecution? Surely not, and we envy not the feelings of the man who is capable of such malignity, nor his sense, when he can call it expedience; and, as for the nobles thus abused, they may truly say with Sir William Davenant, it is a—

'Libel of such weak fancy and composure, That we do all esteem it a greater wrong To have our names extant in such paltry Rhyme, than in the slanderous sense.'

Objecting, as we do, to the title and subject of this satire, we seek for some atoning, if not redeeming, quality in its merits; but we seek in vain, and we unhesitatingly proclaim that it has not one single feature to recommend it. Perhaps we shall be told we are severe; let then our readers judge for themselves, in the following passage, which relates to a meeting of the county of York, where Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord Grantham, and the Black Dwarf, are the dramatis personæ. The Dwarf is exclaiming,—

"Who calls me coward—tho' of regal note, He, a false villain! lieth in his throat! I'd brave—!" A shriek convulsive spoke the rest.

With brandish'd horsewhip Gr^{nth}'m stood—

—confess'd, Prone at his feet the Dwarf persists to screech, Thump after thump resounds upon his breech; Ten thousand murders peonally he squeals— Bellowing in tears, to F^{tz}'s friend, appeals. The courtiers holla— F^{tz}'s! defend him, F^{tz}!

Faith! have you lost your valour or your wits!"

Would't a fac-simile of F^{tz}'s face, Its then surpassing glories of grimace; What time at mirror thy devours are made, A lump of alum 'twixt thy teeth be laid.

'Then Gr^{nth}'m—"Roptile; mark this whip as eke

This whip hath marked thee; now truly speak, What brought thee here?"—"My lord! my lord! my lord!

What, what! your lordship,—there he is my lord."

Like a stuck pig, Lord Gr^{nth}'m star'd, and fair,

Thinking he lied—had whipp'd the Dwarf again.

When lo! a power unseen arrests his clench,— In gath, oh! tell it not—the pow'r of stench. To cork his nostrils firm was Gr^{nth}'m right, Nor lag'd the court to hold their noses tight. "Within there! ho!" unanimous they shout, Pastsils to perfume—tongs to take him out! Loiter the servants, loath to have the job, And consequently exclaim—a snob! Stretching at arms length, fix the forpses fast, Pinch him; then, mock-bepitying, gaze aghast. He, like a Savoy monkey, against its chain, When tugg'd by stranger, tugg'd and screech'd again.

Pinch follows gibe, and gibe succeeds to pinch, The court, loud-laughing—"O Man, what makes you finch?"

We can assure our readers that this is a fair specimen of 'Expedience, a Satire, by Julius,' of the merits of which we leave them to judge.

The Retrospective Review. No. VII.

THE last number of this popular and ably conducted review, justifies the hopes that we're first entertained of it, and fully maintains the high character which it has gained among its contemporary periodicals. To the lovers of early English literature, the Retrospective Review, by pointing out the stores and selecting some of its gems, must afford a rich treat; and even those who may not be anxious to hold converse with the dead through the medium of their works, will scarcely fail of gratification, in the interesting extracts which it gives from books of approved merit, interspersed with acute critical remarks and ingenious reflections.

The seventh number, published on the 1st of August, contains ten articles, namely, 'The Life of Cellini,'—The Poetical Literature of Spain,—Dryden's Prose Works,—Lawrence's Arncliffe and Lucena,—Ascham's Toxophilus,—Davenport's King John and Matilda,—Andrew Fletcher's Political Works,—Loveless's Lucasta,—Wynne's History of the Gwerllir Family; and, lastly, The Early English Drama.

The first article is a good but brief analysis of the life of that ingenious artist and entertaining auto-biographer, Benvenuto Cellini, 'a man of great genius and uncommon versatility of talents: caressed alike by kings, popes, and dignitaries of the church of Rome; esteemed by men of learning; lauded by the most eminent artists of his time, and beloved by his acquaintance.'

From the account of the poetical literature of Spain, which is a well-written article, we shall quote an extract. It is a sonnet from a MS. volume of verse, written on occasion of the death of the Queen of Charles II. and shows the ingenious trifling of some of the Spanish poets. It is as follows:

O D eidad que sin llegar A aconectu D
O O Cloto cogerte en tu veid O R
N o el Nacer Reyna tu tempra N a flor

Not having indulged in attempts of this kind, we were not a little surprised at the facility with which, in twenty minutes, the following imitation of the above sonnet was produced. If, in our not very manageable language—at least in versification—such attempts are so little laborious, in an idiom so full of vowel terminations as the Spanish, the effort would be much less tedious than we had imagined.

We pass on to the review of the poems of the unfortunate Colonel Lovelace, who was 'an instance of one of the most melancholy reverses of fortune to be found in the annals of a set of men, the early poets of England, distinguished for the calamitous variety of their adventures;' a gentleman who was remarkable for the beauty of his person and the elegant endowments of his mind; one of the most gay and sprightly courtiers of Charles I. but who, for his attachment to his sovereign, was so involved and so persecuted, that, says Anthony Wood, 'he became very poor in body and purse, was the object of charity, went in ragged clothes, (whereas when he was in his glory he wore cloth of gold and silver), and mostly lodged in obscure and dirty places, more befitting the worst of beggars and poorest of servants.' The 'polished Lovelace' died at a wretched lodging in Gunpowder Alley, near Shoe Lane, and was buried at the west end of St. Bride's Church, among 'surfeit-slain fools, the common dung of the soil.' Lovelace was a charming poet, and, we think, deserves a higher praise than our critic awards him; we, however, agree with him fully as to the short poem which we shall quote, when he says,—

'The song called the Scrutiny is a most delightful piece of male coquetry. It is written in the happiest vein of the times. A declaration of infidelity so impudent yet so ingenious, so cruel yet so easy and good humoured, so saucy and vain yet with such apparent good grounds for confidence, that even the deserted lady would instantly resign herself to the conviction that no chains, however binding, no charms, however powerful, could detain so inconstant a gallant:—

'Why should you swear I am forsworn?
Since time I vow'd to be;
Ladly, it is already morn,
And 'twas last night I swore to thee
That fond impossibility.

'Have I not lov'd thee much and long,
A tedious twelve hours' space!
I must all other beauties wrong,
And rob thee of a new embrace,
Could I still dote upon thy face.

'Not but all joy in thy brown hair,
By others may be found;
But I must search the black and fair,
Like skilful mineralists, that sound
For treasure in unprov'd-up ground.

'Then, if when I have lov'd my sound,
Thou prov'st the pleasantest;
With spoils of moaner beauties crown'd,
I haften will return to thee,
Ev'n sated with variety.'

'Wynne's History of the Gwerllir Family,' is chiefly interesting from the clear and comprehensive view which it exhibits of the manners of the Welsh at a time when they were little better than barbarians. The following extracts give a singular picture of the Cambro-Britons about the middle of the fifteenth century:—

'The beginning of the quarrel and unkindness between Jevan ab Robert and Howel ab Rice ab Howel Vaughan, grew in this sort. Jevan ab Robert, after his sister's death, upon some mislike, left the company of Howel ab Rice, and accompanied John ab Meredith, his nephew, and his children, who were at continual feud with Howel ab Rice. The fashion was, in those days, that the gentlemen and their retainers met commonly every day, to shoote matches and maeltries; there was no gentleman of worth in the country but had a wine cellar of his own, which wine was sold to his profit; thither came his friends to meete him, and there spent the day in shooting, wrestling, throwing the sledge, and other acts of activitie, and drinking very moderately wihall, not according to haudding and gluttonous manner of our days.

Howel ab Rice ab Howel did draw a draught upon Jevan ab Robert ab Meredith, and sent a brother of his to lodge over night at his house of Kewegedarch, to understand which way Jevan ab Robert ab Meredith meant to goe the next day, who was determined to shoote a match with John ab Meredith's children at Llaniwhangel y Pennant, not farre from John ab Meredith's house. This being understood, the spie (Howel ab Rice's brother) slips away in the night to his brother, and lets him know where he should lay for him. Now had Howel ab Rice provided a butcher for the purpose, that should have murdered him; for he had directed by Howel to keepe himselfe free, and not to undertake any of the company until he saw them in a medley, and every man fighting. Then was his charge to come behind the tallest man in the company, (for otherwise he knew him not, being a stranger,) and to knock him down; for Howel ab Rice said,—"Thou shalt soon discern him from the rest by his stature, and he will make way before him." There is a foster-brother of his, one Robin ab Inko, a little fellow, that useth to watch him behind; take heed of him; for, be the encounter never so hotte, his eye is ever on his foster-brother." Jevan ab Robert, according as he was appointed, went that morning with his ordinary company towards Llanfihangel to meete John ab Meredith. You are to understand, that in those dayes, and in that wilde worlde, every man stood upon his guard, and went not abroad but in sort and soe armed, as if he went to the field to encounter with his enemies. Howel ab Rice ab Howel Vaughan's sister, being Jevan ab Robert's wife, went a mile, or thereabout, with her husband and the company, talking with them, and soe parted with them; and in her way homewards, she met her brother a horseback, with a great company of people armed, and riding after her husband as fast as they could. On this, she cried out upon her brother, and desired him, for the love of God, not to harme her husband, that meant him noe harme; and withall steps to his horse, meaning to have caught him by the bridle, which he seeing, turned his horse about. She then caught the horse by the tail, hanging upon him soe long, and crying upon her brother, that, in the end, he drew out his short-sword, and strucke at her arme, which she perceiving, was faine to lett slippe her hold, and running before him to a narrow passage, whereby he must pass through a brooke, where there was a foot-bridge, near the ford. She then steps to the foot-bridge, and takes away the cantlaw or hand-stay of the bridge, and with the same lets fire at her brother, and, if he had not avoyded the blow, she had strucke him downe from his horse.

—Furor arma ministrat.—

Howel ab Rice and his company, within a while, overtook Jevan ab Robert and his followers, who turned head upon him, though greatlie overmatched. The bickering grew very hotte, and many were knocked downe on either side. In the end, when that should be performed which he came for, the murthering butcher having not stracke one stroke all day, not watching opportunity, and finding the company more scattered than at first from Jevan ab Robert, thrust himselfe among Jevan ab Robert's people behind, and making a blow at him, was prevented by Robin ab Inko, his foster-brother, and knocked downe; God bringing upon his head the destruction that he meant for another; which Howel ab Rice perceiving, cried to his people, "Let us away and begone, for I had given charge that Robin ab Inko should have been better looked unto." And soe that bickering brake, with the hurt of many, and the death of that one man.

It fortuned anon after, that the parson of Llanvrothen* took a child of Jevan ab Robert's to foster, whose sore grieved Howel Vaughan's wife, her husband having then more land in that parish than Jevan ab Robert had; in revenge whereof she plotted the death of the said parson in this manner. She sent a woman to aske lodgings of the parson, who used not to deny any. The woman being in bed, after midnight, began to strike and to rave; whereupon the parson, thinking that she had been distracted, awakening out of his sleepe, and wondering at so suddaine a crie in the night, made towards her and his household also; then she said that he would have ravished her, and soe got out of doores, threatening revenge to the parson. This woman had for her brethren, three notable rogues of the damnd crewe, fit for any mischief, being followers of Howel ab Rice. In a morning, these brethren watched the parson, as he went to looke to his cattle, in a place in that parish called Gogo yr Llechwin, being now a tenement of mine, and there murthered him; and two of them fled to Chirkland in Denbighshire, to some of the Trevors, who were friends or kinne to Howel ab Rice or his wife. It was the manner in those dayes, that the murtherer onely, and he that gave the death's wound, should flye, and he was called in Wales a lawrudd, which is a red hand, because he had blouded his hand; the accessories and abettors to the murtherers were never hearken'd after.

The notice of the 'Early English Drama' is the last of a series of articles on the subject which have appeared in the 'Retrospective Review,' and is confined to an examination of the works of Marlow, whose genius and talents are very fairly estimated.

CULINARY CURIOSITIES.*

The following specimen of the unaccountably whimsical harlequinade of foreign kitchens, is from 'La Chapelle' Nouveau Cuisinier, Paris, 1748.

'A turkey,' in the shape of 'a football,' or 'a hedge-hog.'—'A shoulder of mutton,' in the shape of a 'bee-hive.'—'A tree of pigeons,' in the form of a 'spider,' or sun-fashion, or 'in the form of a frog,' or 'in the form of the moon.'—Or, 'to make a pig taste like a wild boar.'—'Take a living pig, and let him swallow the following drink, viz. boil together in vinegar and water, some rosemary, thyme,

* Llanvrothen is a small village near the sea-side, in Merionethshire.

sweet basil, bay-leaves, and sage; when you have let him swallow this, immediately whip him to death, and roast him forthwith. How 'to still a cocke for a weake bodie that is consumed; 'take a red cocke that is not too olde, and beate him to death.'—See the Booke of Cookrye, very necessary for all such as defight therein.—Gathered by A. W. 1591, 12mo. p. 12. How to Roast a pound of BUTTER, curiously and well; and to force (the culinary technical for to stuff) a boiled leg of lamb with red herrings and garlick; with many other receipts of as high a relish, and of as easy digestion as the Devil's version, i. e. a roasted tiger stuffed with tenpenney nails, or the 'Boone Bouche,' the rarest rownskinowmowsky, offered to Baron Munchausen 'a fricassee of pistols, with gunpowder and alcohol sauce,'—see the Adventures of Baron Munchausen, 12mo. 1729, p. 200.—and the horrible but authentic account of Ardesoif, in Moubray's Treatise on Poultry, 8vo. 1816, p. 18.

But the most extraordinary of all the culinary receipts that have been under my eye, is the following diabolically cruel directions of Mizal's, 'How to roast and eat a goose alive.'—Take a goose, or a duck, or some such freely creature, (but a goose is best of all for this purpose,) pull off all her feathers, only the head and neck must be spared: then make a fire round about her, not too close to her, that the smoke do not choke her, and that the fire may not burn her too soon; nor too far off, that she may not escape free: within the circle of the fire let there be set small cups and pots full of water, wherein salt and honey are mingled; and let there be set also chargers full of sodden apples, cut into small pieces in the dish. The goose must be all larded, and basted over with butter, to make her the more fit to be eaten, and may roast the better: put then fire about her, but do not make too much haste, when as you see her begin to roast; for, by walking about, and flying here and there, being cooped in by the fire that stops her way out, the unwearied goose is kept in; she will fall to drink the water to quench her thirst, and cool her heart, and all her body, and the apple sauce will make her dung, and cleanse and empty her. And when she roasteth and consumes inwardly, always wet her head and heart with a wet sponge; and when you see her giddy with running, and begin to stumble, her heart wants moisture, and she is roasted enough. Take her up, set her before your guests, and she will cry as you cut off any part from her, and will be almost eaten up before she be dead: it is mighty pleasant to behold!—See Wecker's Secrets of Nature, in folio, London, 1660, pp. 148, 309. We suppose Mr. Mizal stole this receipt from the kitchen of his infernal majesty; probably it might have been one of the dishes the devil ordered when he invited Nero and Caligula to a feast.—A. C. Jun.

This is also related in Baptista Porta's Natural Magicæ, fol. 1058, p. 321. This very curious (but not scarce) book contains, among other strange tricks and fancies of 'the Olden Time,' directions 'how to roast and boil a fowl at the same time, so that one half shall be roasted—and the other boiled';—and 'if you have a lacke of cooks—how to persuade a goose—to roast himselfe!'"

Many articles were in vogue in the 14th century which are now obsolete—we add the following specimens of the Culinary Affairs of Days of Yore.

Sauce for a Goose, A. D. 1351.

'Take a faire panne, and set hit under the goose whill she rostes;—and kepe clene the gres that droppes thereof, and put thereto a godele (good deal) of wyn, and a litel vyuegur, and verjus, and onyons mynced, or garlek; then take the gottes (gut) of the goose and slitte hom, and scrape hom clene in watur and salt, and so wash hom, and back hom small, then do all this togedur in a piffent (pipkin) and do thereto raisins of corance, and powder of pepur and of ginger, and of canell, and hole clowes and mace, and let hit boyle and serve hit forth.'

'That unwieldy marine animal, the rompus, was dressed in a variety of modes, salted, roasted, stewed, &c. Our ancestors were not singular in their partiality to it; I find, from an ingenious friend of mine, that it is even now, A. D. 1790, sold in the markets of most towns in Portugal—the flesh of it is intolerably hard and rancid.'—Warner's Antiq. Cul. 4to, p. 15.

This swan * was also a dish of state, and in high fashion when the elegance of the feast was estimated by the magnitude of the articles of which it was composed; the number consumed at Earl of Northumberland's table, A. D. 1512, amounted to twenty.—Northumberland's Household Book, p. 108.

The CRANE was a darling dainty in William the Conqueror's time, and so partial was that monarch to it, that when his prime favourite, William Fitz Osburne, the steward of the household, served him with a crane scarcely half roasted, the king was so highly exasperated, that he lifted up his fist, and would have stricken him, had not Eads (appointed Dapifer immediately after) warded off the blow.'—Warner's Antiq. Cul. p. 12.

SEALS, CURLEWS, HERONS, BITTERNS, and the PEACOCK—these noble bird, 'the food of lovers and the meat of lords'—was also at this time in high fashion—when the baronial entertainments were characterized by a grandeur and pompous ceremonial, approaching nearly to the magnificence of royalty; there was scarcely any royal or noble feast without peacocks, which were stuffed with spices and sweet-

* It is a curious illustration of the de gustibus non est disputandum, that the ancients considered the swan as a high delicacy, and abstained from the flesh of the goose as impure and indigestible.—Moubray on Poultry, p. 36.

herbs, roasted and served up whole, and covered after dressing with the skin and feathers—the beak and comb gilt, and the tail spread—and some instead of the feathers, covered it with leaf-gold:—it was a common dish on grand occasions—and continued to adorn the English table till the beginning of the 17th century.

In Massinger's play of 'the City Madam,' Holford exclaiming against city luxury, says, 'three fat wethers bruised, to make sauce for a slugpeacock.'

The bird is one of those luxuries which were often sought, because they were seldom found: its scarcity and external appearance is its only recommendation—the meat of it is tough and tasteless.

Another favourite dish at the tables of our forefathers was a pye of stupendous magnitude, out of which, on its being opened, a flock of living birds flew forth to the no small surprise and amusement of the guests.

'Four-and-twenty blackbirds bak'd in a pye; When the pye was open'd the birds began to sing—

Oh! what a dainty dish—'tis fit for any king.'

This was a common joke at an old English feast. These animated pies were often introduced 'to set on,' as Hamlet says, 'a quantity of barren spectators to laugh,'—there is an instance of a dwarf undergoing such an incrustation.—About the year 1630, King Charles and his Queen were entertained by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, at Burleigh on the Hill, on which occasion, JEFFREY HUDSON, the Dwarf, was served up in a cold pye.—See Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, vol. ii, p. 14.

The BARON or BEEF was another favourite and substantial support of old English hospitality.

Among the most polished nations of the 15th and 16th centuries, the powdered (salted) horse seems to have been a dish in some esteem: Grimaldus herself could not escape the undistinguishing fury of the cook. Don Anthony, of Guevera, the Chronicler to Charles V., gives the following account of a feast at which he was present. 'I will tell you no lie, I saw such kinds of meats eaten, as are wont to be sene, but not eaten—as a horse roasted—a cat in gely—LYZARDS in hot broth, FROGGS fried, &c.'

While we are thus considering the curious dishes of olden times, we will cursorily mention the singular diet of two or three nations of antiquity, noted by Herodotus, L. 4. The Androphagi (the cannibals of the ancient world) greedily devoured the carcases of their fellow creatures; while the inoffensive Cabri (a Scythian tribe) found both food and drink in the agreeable nut of the ponic tree. The Lotophagi lived entirely on the fruit of the lotus tree. The savage Troglodyte esteemed a living serpent the most delicate of all morsels; while the capricious palate of the Zyguntini preferred the ape to every thing.—Vide Warner's Antiq. Cul. p. 135.

The Romans, in the luxurious period of their empire, took five meals a-day; a breakfast (jentaculum), a dinner, which was a light meal without any formal preparation (prandium); a kind of tea, as we could call it, between dinner and supper (merenda); a supper (cæna), which was their great meal, and commonly consisted of two courses; the first of meats—the second, what we call a desert:—and a posset, or something delicious after supper (comissatio).—Adams's Rom. Antiq. p. 434 and 447.

The Romans usually began their entertainments with eggs, and ended with fruits; hence AN OVO USQUE AD MALA, from the beginning to the end of supper, Horat. Sat. i. 3. 6.; Cic. Fam. ix. 20.

The dishes (edulia) held in the highest estimation by the Romans are enumerated, Gell. vii. 16.; Macrobi. Sat. ii. 9.; Martial v. 79. ix. 48. xi. 53., &c. a peacock (Pavo, v. us), Horat. Sat. ii. 2. 2.; Juvenal i. 143., first used by Horatius, the orator, at a supper, which he gave when admitted into the college of priests (collegium sacerdotum), Plin. x. 20. 1. 23., a pheasant (PHASIANUS, ex Phasi Calchidis Juvoni), Martial. vii. 58. xii. 72. Senec. ad Helv. 9., Petron. 79. Mart. v. 378., a bird called Attinga velina, from Ionia or Phrygia, Horat. Epod. ii. 54., Martial. xlii. 61., a guinea-fowl (avis Africa, Horat. libid., Gallina Numidia vel Africana, Juvenal, i. 142., Martial. xii. 73.) a Melian crane; an Ambracian kid; nightingales, lusciniæ; thrushes (ardæ); ducks, geese, &c. That the English reader may be enabled to form some idea of the heterogeneous messes with which the Roman palate was delighted, I introduce the following receipt from Apicius:—

'THICK SAUCE FOR A BOILED CHICKEN.'—Put the following ingredients into 1 mortar;—onion, dried mint, and later root, (similar to asafetida); cover them with vinegar.—Add dates; pour in li-quamen, oil, and a small quantity of mustard seeds—reduce all to a proper thickness with Port wine warmed; and then pour this same over your chicken, which should previously be boiled in Ausececi water.

The Liquamen and Garnæ were synonymous terms for the same thing; the former adopted in the room of the latter about the age of Aurelianus. It was a liquid, and thus prepared:—The guts of large fish and a variety of small fish, were put into a vessel and well mixed, and then exposed to the sun till they became putrid. A liquor was produced in a short time, which being strained off, was the Liquamen.—Vide Literæ in Apicius, p. 16. notes.

Essence of Anchovy, as it is usually made for sale, when it has been opened about ten days, is not much unlike the Roman liquamen. Some suppose it was the same thing as the Russian caviar, which is prepared from the roe of the sturgeon.

The BLACK BROTH of Lacedæmon will long continue to excite the wonder of the philosopher and the disgust of the epicure. What the ingredients of this sabbath composition were, we cannot exactly ascertain. Jul. Pollux says, the Lacedæmonian Black Broth was blood, thickened in a certain way: Dr. Lister (in Apicius) supposes it to have been hog's blood; if so, this celebrated Spartan dish bore no very distant resemblance to the black puddings of our days. It could not be a very affuring mess, since a citizen of Sybaris having tasted it, declared it was no longer a matter of astonishment with him, why the Spartans were so fearless of death, since any one in his senses would much rather die, than exist on such execrable food.—Vide Athenæum, L. iv. c. 3. When Dionysius, the Tyrant, had tasted the Black Broth, he exclaimed against it as miserable stuff; the cook replied,—‘it was no wonder, for the sauce was wanting.’ ‘What sauce?’ says Dionysius. The answer was,—‘labour and exercise, hunger and thirst, these are the sauces we Lacedæmonians use,’ and they make the coarsest fare agreeable.—Cicero, 3 Tuscul.

Original Communications.

LITERARY COINCIDENCES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Conformably with the intention I intimated in my last communication, I now send you a few examples of ‘Literary Coincidences’ to be found in the expressions of eminent writers; and I leave it to your readers to determine how far some of them are to be set down as plagiarisms. But certainly this cannot be said of the whole.

My first instance shall be drawn from classical lore. Cicero, in one of his orations, has the following passage:—

‘Quid est, quod, in hoc tam exiguo vitæ circulo et tam brevi, tantis nos in laboribus exercemus?’

This sentiment, so beautifully amplified by Tully, we find thus more concisely expressed in one of the Odes of Horace:—

‘Quid brevi fortes jaculamur ævo
Multa?’

Yet nothing was more natural, than that the poet and orator should have expressed themselves alike upon this occasion. The thought is perfectly natural; and, besides, plagiarism was not in fashion in those days.

There is a passage in ‘King Lear’ which bears a strong resemblance to one in Lucretius; yet no one will accuse our great bard of having pilfered from the philosophical Roman. I shall transcribe the two passages, and leave the reader to form his own conclusion:

Shakespeare.

‘Thou must be patient, we came crying hither;

Thou know’st the first time that we smell the air,

We wail and cry—

When we were born, we cry that we are come

To this great stage of fools.’

Lucretius.

‘Vagiteque locum lugubri complet, at æquum est,

Cui tantum in vitâ restet transire maiorum.’

In Fenton’s tragedy of Marianne, are to be found these lines,—

‘Awhile she stood,

Transform’d from grief to marble, and appear’d
Her own pale monument,’ which seem to have been, for the most part, literally translated from the following passage of Cyprian:—

‘Stetit ipsa sepulchrum,

‘Ipsaque imago sibi, formam sine corpore servans.’

It is not improbable, after all, however, that Fenton may never have read Cyprian.

Yet, whatever may be said of the foregoing examples, the one I shall next cite must, I fear, be set down as a plagiarism; though no one will think the worse of it on that account. I allude to the beautiful line with which Gray’s Elegy commences,—

‘The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,’ which is obviously borrowed from Dante. The following is the passage in Mr. Cary’s translation:—

‘And pilgrim, newly on his road, with love
Thrills, if he hear the vesper bell from far,
That seems to mourn for the expiring day.’

And what makes it more probable that Gray committed a petty larceny on this occasion is, that the sweet expression of ‘trembling hope,’ in the same delightful poem, also occurs in Dante.

Before I quit Gray, let me also notice, that his thought,—

‘And leaves the world to darkness and to me,’ is to be found likewise in the ‘Beggar’s Petition,’ where we have—

‘And leaves the world to wretchedness and me one obviously a parody of the other.

Every reader of English poetry recollects the beautiful yet simple expression of Goldsmith, in his ‘Edwin and Angelina,’—

‘And tears began to flow.’

Goldsmith, however, was not the first to use it. It occurs in Dryden’s ‘Alexander’s Feast,’ and in the ‘Essay on Criticism’ of Pope; and, last of all, it is to be found in Chatterton’s poem, entitled ‘The Death of Sir Charles Bowdin.’ This and similar instances of plagiarism on the part of Chatterton, by the by, are among the strongest proofs of the spuriousness of ‘Rowley’s Poems,’ which, whatever be the present ephemeral taste in poetical matters, will be regarded by posterity, I think, as the noblest monument of the genius of modern times. It is hardly too much to say that, when Chatterton died, the Shakespeare of the eighteenth century was no more.

But to return; or, as the French have it, ‘à nos moutons,’—the following line in Pope’s ‘Eloisa to Abeldar,’—

‘I have not yet forgot myself to alone,’ is evidently borrowed from a similar expression of Milton,—

‘Forget thyself to marble.’

Milton has also,

which Pope adopts in the same poem. Other ‘coincidences’ between him and our great epic bard, are likewise to be traced, which justify the inference, that the ‘Twickenham bee’ had, just before the composition of ‘Eloisa to Abeldar, been ‘drinking deep’ of the honied stores of his illustrious predecessor.

It would be easy to swell this list of examples; but I shall confine myself to one other, and that other Blair, who, in his ‘Grave,’ has favoured us with abundant instances of these ‘literary coincidences,’ which, it is much to be feared, however, the reader will hardly regard as accidental. Among the number, the following will be recognized as having its prototype in Pope’s ‘Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady.’ I shall transcribe the two passages:—

Blair,

‘Sullen, like lamps in sepulchres, your shine
Enlightens but yourselves.’

Pope,

‘Dim lights of life, that burn a length of years,
Useless, unseen, as lamps in sepulchres.’

Several other ‘coincidences,’ with Shakespeare, Addison, and some of our most eminent poets, are to be found in the ‘Grave’; but, as my paper is out, as well, I fear, as your patience, I must refer the curious reader to the poem itself, where the instances are too obvious to be missed. LITERARY INQUIRIES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Perhaps it will be filling up your columns with what will be neither useful nor interesting to any person except myself, but I should feel much gratified if any of your correspondents would answer me two questions; first, whether the poem of Mr. Coleridge's friend, mentioned in his 'Sibylline Leaves,' was ever published, and if so, who was the publisher? A word respecting the measure and the merits would be very acceptable, as I have for some time been engaged in the composition of a poem on a similar subject, in ignorance of its having been before touched upon. Secondly, whether the 'Shah Neimah' of 'Ferdusi' has been ever translated into English, and if so, whether in prose or verse? the last question, if not the first, will appear to shew singular ignorance, but I have been inquiring until I am weary, without any satisfaction as to one or the other. I am, Sir,

Your most obedient,

AN ADMIRER

Of your impartial Criticisms.

THE FEMALE HEAD IN QUEEN STREET.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—For the satisfaction of your correspondent ANTIG., respecting the female head in front of some of the houses in Queen Street, Cheapside, I can inform him that it is the head of our maiden Queen Elizabeth, who, I presume, patronized or made some grant to the Mercers' Company, it being the mark affixed to their estates. Not having immediate access to a survey of London or memoirs of the company, you will excuse this brief answer.

With respect, yours, &c.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—One of the articles in a newspaper which always attracts the most notice, is that headed Accidents and Offences; why these words have so long been united has always surprised me, for I could never, since the days of my boyhood, discover any affinity between them; at that period, indeed, it was different; my schoolmaster used to punish all accidents as offences, and I exercised all my logic to prove my offences were only accidents. I have, to be sure, seen the same logic used by adults, and, by the common consent of newspaper editors, it seems to be established as a law, which, like that of the Medes and Persians, altereth not, that accidents and offences are to be considered always together, as being twenty different gradations of the same thing: so that it seems clearly proved, that it is an offence to happen with an accident, and an accident to be guilty of an offence. I am, &c.

AN ACCIDENTAL OFFENDER*.

ANECDOTES OF NONCONFORMISTS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

MR. JOHN HOOK says, 'that an hypocrite is in the worst condition of any man upon earth, for he is hated of the world because of his profession, and hated of God because he has no more than a profession.'

Mr. John Haddesley, A. M.—'was so excessively modest, as to be under some awe when his brethren were present at any of his performances, though they were much his inferiors.'

Mr. Cuff—was a person 'who took great liberty to jest in the pulpit.'

Mr. John Farroll, A. M.—His enemies said that they would not send him to prison again, because he lived better there than at home.'

Mr. N. Stevens, M. A.—One that was then well acquainted with him, relates the following instance of his pleasantry:—'He went with a friend to his house, and knocked at the door, when, none of the family being at hand, he called to them to come in, and asked them whether, of the two, they would have had opened the door for them, the blind or the lame? His wife being blind, and he so lame as not to be able to rise out of his chair without help.' He would often tell a story of what happened when he was young, in the west, where he was born: 'A clergyman coming into the church, went up to the chancel to bow to the altar. It so happened, that there was no altar there, but the communion-table stood against the east wall, and a boy sat upon it. The boy seeing the priest coming towards him, slipped down, and stood before the table.' At length the priest made a low bow, and the poor boy, thinking it was to him that the respect was paid, bowed as low to him again; and the bows were repeated three times on each side; the boy being surprised at the priest's wonderful civility. In this case,' said Mr. Stevens, 'the boy knew well enough who it was he bowed to: but whether or not it was so as to the priest, is questionable.'

Mr. Lee.—He was an intimate friend

* Should our correspondents ever have the misfortune to be classed in the list of offenders in a newspaper, we suspect he will then learn the difference between accidents and offences.—Ed.

of Colonel King's, who was the first in the House of Commons that moved for King Charles's restoration. He was so far from owing the preceding powers, that he never paid any tax for twelve years together.

Mr. H. Vaughan.—Once he very narrowly escaped great trouble. As he was reading in a bookseller's shop in London, with his back towards the door, a pursuivant came in and told the bookseller, that he and three more had spent four days in searching after one Vaughan, but said they could not find him, and he escaped. He was ultimately committed to the goal in Grantham, called the Old Shop, for not reading the Common Prayer.

Mr. Ed. Reyner, M. A.—The opportunity of friends prevailed with him to accept the bishop's present of a prebend, but when he came next morning seriously to reflect upon the necessary attendants and consequences of this his new preferment, he was much dissatisfied, for he found he could not keep it with a safe and quiet conscience. Hereupon he prevailed with the Lady Armine, to go to the bishop to mollify the offence, and obtain a quietus. The bishop pleasantly told the lady—'I have had many countesses, ladies, and others, that have been suitors to me to get preferments for their friends; but you are the first that ever came to take away a preferment, and that from one that I bestowed it so with my own hands.'

Mr. Geo. Boheme, Steward Clerk.—A worthy person writes, 'that pretty country church hath not had a settled minister in it for sixty years, in his knowledge; and adds, he supposes not of sixty more before that; because it was so destitute of any maintenance till the late Sir John Brownlow settled 10l. a year upon it, for which there is a sermon preached once a fortnight.'

Mr. John Richardson.—He was a loyal subject, and one of those who greatly desired the restoration of King Charles II. and concurred heartily in it, saying to a friend of his, when discoursing about it, 'First justice ad rectum.'—'Ruit Caelum,' said his friend to him again, when he first saw him after Bartholomew, 1662. He was a man of unparalleled temperance in the whole course of his life. Being to preach once at St. Paul's Cross, and, as was usual, a glass of sack being offered him before he went into the pulpit, he refused it, and pleasantly said, 'he did not chuse to preach by the spirit of sack.'—*J. THE MUSK-OX AND POLAR BEAR.

AMONG the many novelties which have recently been added to that grand national repository, the British Museum, the musk-ox and the Polar bear are not the least interesting. They are some of the fruits of the two last expeditions to discover a North-West Passage.

The Polar Bear, the Ursus Marinus of Linnaeus, now placed on the landing of the staircase in the British Museum, was killed during Captain Ross's voyage, in lat. $70^{\circ} 40' N.$, and long. $68^{\circ} 00' W.$ It is, in length, about eight or nine feet, and about three feet and a half high. It has a long head and neck, and round ears; the end of the nose is black, the teeth large; the hair long and white, tinged in some parts with yellow; and the limbs are of great size and strength, although it is by no means one of the largest of its species.

This animal is confined to the coldest part of the globe; it has been found as far north as navigators have penetrated, at least above lat. 80° . The frigid climates alone seem adapted to its nature. The north of Norway, and the country of Mesen, in the north of Russia, are destitute of them; but they are met with again in great abundance in Nova Zembla, and from the river Ob, along the Siberian coast, to the mouths of Jenesei and Lena, but are never seen far inland, unless they lose their way in mists; none are found in Kamtschatka or its islands. They have been seen as far south as Newfoundland; but they are not natives of that country, being only brought there accidentally on the islands of ice.

During summer, the white bears are either resident on islands of ice or passing from one to another; they swim admirably, and can continue that exercise a distance of six or seven leagues; they also divide with great agility. They bring two young at a time; and the affection between the parents and them is so strong, that they would die rather than desert one another. Of this affection, several instances are recorded, but we shall only select two. While the Carcase, one of the ships in Captain Phipps's voyage of discovery to the North Pole, was locked in the ice, early one morning, the man at the mast head gave notice that three bears were making their way very fast over the frozen ocean, and were directing their course towards the ship. They had, no doubt, been invited by the scent of some blubber of a sea horse, which the crew had killed a few days before, which had been set on fire, and was burning on the ice at the time of their approach. They proved to be a she-bear and her two cubs; but the cubs were nearly as large as the adult. They ran eagerly to the fire, and drew out from the flames part of the flesh of the sea-horse that remained unconsumed, and eat it voraciously. The crew of the ship threw great lumps of the flesh of the sea-horse which they had still left, upon the ice, which the old bear fetched away singly, laying every lump before her cubs as she brought it, and dividing it, gave each a share, reserving but a small portion to herself. As she was fetching away the last piece, they levelled their muskets at the cubs, and shot them both dead, and in her retreat they wounded the dam, but not mortally. It would have drawn tears of pity from any but the most unfeeling, to have marked the affectionate concern expressed by this poor animal in the dying moments of her expiring young. Though she was sorely wounded, and could but just crawl to the place where they lay, she carried the lump of flesh she had just fetched away, as she had done the others, tore it in pieces, and laid it down before them: when she saw that they refused to eat, she laid her paws first upon one, then upon the other, and endeavoured to raise them up, making, at the same time, the most pitiable moans. When she found she could not stir them, she went off, and when she had got at some distance, looked back and moaned; and that not availing to entice them away, she returned, and smelling round them, began to lick their faces. She went off a second time, as before, and having crawled a few paces, looked again behind her, and for some time stood moaning. But still her cubs not rising to follow her, she returned to them anew, and with signs of inexpressible fondness went round them, pawing them successively. Finding, at last, that they were cold and lifeless, she raised her head towards the ship, and growled a curse upon the destroyers, which they returned with a volley of musket-balls. She fell between her cubs, and died licking their wounds.

A Greenland bear, with two cubs under its protection, was pursued across a field of ice by a party of armed sailors. At first she seemed to urge the young ones to an increase of speed, by running before them, turning round, and manifesting by a peculiar action and voice, her anxiety for their progress; but finding her pursuers gaining upon them, she carried, or pushed, or pitched them alternately forward, until she effected their escape. In throwing them before her, the little creatures are said to have placed themselves across her path to receive the impulse, and when projected some yards in advance, they ran onwards until she overtook them, when they alternately adjusted themselves for another throw.

Their winter retreats are under the snow, in which they form dens, supported by pillars of snow; or else under some great eminence beneath the fixed ice of the frozen sea. They feed on fish, seals, and the carcases of whales; and on human bodies, which they will greedily disinter; they seem very fond of human blood, and are so fearless as to attack companies of armed men, or even to board small vessels. When on land they live on birds and their eggs; and, allured by the scent of the seals' flesh, often break into and plunder the houses of the Greenlanders. Their greatest enemy in the brute creation, is the morse*, with which they have terrible conflicts, but are generally worsted, the vast teeth of the morse giving it a superiority.

The flesh of the Polar bear is white, and is said to taste like mutton; the fat is melted for train oil, and that of the feet used in medicine; but the liver is very unwholesome, as three of Barentz's sailors experienced, who fell dangerously ill on eating some of it boiled.

One of this species was brought over to England a few years ago; it was very furious, almost always in motion, roared aloud, and seemed very uneasy, except when cooled by having pailfull of water poured over it.

Callixenus Rhodius, in his description of the pompous procession of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, at Alexandria, speaks of one great white bear, among other wild beasts, that graced the show; but, from the local situation of this animal, at present, it can scarcely be supposed to have been of the same species, though Pennant is inclined to believe that it was.

The Musk-ox, which is also placed on the staircase, was killed during the expedition of Captain Parry, and, as we gave a particular account of it in No. 103 of the Literary Chronicle, we shall now merely add a few general remarks.

* The Arctic walrus, or sea-horse.

The musk-ox is quite a local animal; it appears first above Churchill River, on the western side of Hudson's Bay, and is to be found very plentiful between lat. 66 and 73 north. The musk oxen go in herds of twenty or thirty, delight in barren and rocky mountains, and run nimbly. They are very active in climbing the rocks, seldom frequent the woody parts, and are shot by the Indians for the sake of the skins, which make the best and warmest blankets. They are found again among the Cris, or Cristinaux, and the Assiniboues, and among the Attimousiquis; are continued from these countries as low as the provinces of Nievra and Libola.

A part of this species has been found in the north of Asia, the head of one having been discovered in Siberia, on the Arctic mossy flats, near the mouth of the Oby. Dr. Pallas, who states this fact, does not speak of the kind as being fossil, but suspects that the whole carcass was brought on floating ice from America, and deposited where the skull was found. If this be certain, it proves that these animals spread quite across the continent of America, from Hudson's Bay to the Asiatic seas.

LIFE,

AS DISPLAYED IN THE SOJOURNINGS OF
LOFTUS GREY.

Collected, Methodized, and Conglomerated,
By W. B. L.

CHAP. III.

THE proficiency that I made in all my academic studies soon satisfied my father as to the benefits which were likely to result from the 'expediency' of a public school. My expertise in the lighter branches of education, such as bruising, robbing orchards, disturbing apple-stalls, and assisting the venders, tricks upon tell-tale cobblers, and some few dozens of etceteras beside, was really wonderful; and, although such early signs of precocity could of course afford nothing less than the highest possible gratification to all whom it concerned, it was, nevertheless, deemed that the administration of a few lessons or so, of a soberer kind of science, might probably be so far advantageous, as slightly to check that exuberance of genius, which,—much to the annoyance of saucy, dull and uncivilized folks, whose ideas never soared beyond the boundaries of quiet and decorum,—I was so everlastingly exhibiting. I was, therefore, in the fitting season, gently removed, with as much dispatch as might be, to the distant residence of a clergyman, whose Herculean might, in matters of wisdom, had been as fully amplified as possible; there to abide until my mental and bodily qualifications were something softened down to the A. B. C. occupations of ordinary life.

He was one of those extraordinary individuals, who, to the profound erudition of a minister of the church, (doing duty once a fortnight,) added every possible acquirement which the skull of man could compass or the brain conceive. He was, indeed, a sapient soul; a living encyclopedia of learning, to which you have but to refer, and the hidden mystery of things are exposed unto your astounded sense—a positive circle of the sciences. There was nothing in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth, but he was as familiar with it as a bosom-friend. He knew all about the 'anthropophagi, and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders,' and had some considerable smattering of the principles of divination. He knew as much of chemical philosophy as of legal proprieties; and of erology as of either. He had a good deal to say upon the Linnæan system; and many doubts had occurred to him as to the Newtonian philosophy. He would offer some sagacious reasoning touching the growth of potatoes, and could draw a plausible parallel between Raphaël and his master, Da Vinci (whose name, he would tell you, was to be pronounced Viachi, and not Vinci, as the vulgar have it). He would discourse excellently well upon the cartoons of either, but had a slight objection to the drapery in the Transfiguration; this he would explain. He had a singular talent for painting himself, and could dance, solve Euclid, poetize, or preach the gospel most felicitously. He was a perfect mineralogist, and played Kaufferbankerbum's sonata on the violoncello delightfully. It did men's hearts good only to read his prospectus. His pupils were select and limited; yet, through some fortunate and unaccountable mischance, there was always a vacancy for one. All they did, and were to do, was executed according to the most approved rules. They ate their dinners by the systematic rules of logic as laid down by Obediah M'Creeker, gentleman and logician; and went to bed secundum artem. They were allowed to speak just so many words within the hour, and arranged their habiliments with mathematical precision. In short, the spheres were not better arranged than were our manners and our modes; and, although, perhaps, I was not a bona fide Ciceronian, under the tuition of such a sejanus I could not fall far short.

And here were spent some of the happiest days in all my life; days that flew along in luxurious ease and undisturbed contentment; that came with honied sweeteners, and passed away with sorrow for their shortness; that left naught behind but the delightful remembrance of their pleasures; oh! how pleasant was that time; even now, when age has saddened the scenes of life, when changes and vicissitudes have intervened, and when sober feelings have supplanted that enthusiasm which gives such a brilliant colouring to all around,—still, even now, I can recur to that happy period of my life, and dwell with renewing fondness on the recollection of its bliss. For, oh! Mary, my long-loved Mary, here, here it was that first I saw thee. Beloved spirit! if thou hast seen from thy high abode all the troubles of my chequered life; if thou hast watched all the ills and evils I have borne; if thou hast marked all my sins and grievous misdoings;—oh! Mary, remember me in heaven!

The little village of Bishopscote was situated in a retired and beautiful valley in the west of England, bordering the Bristol channel. It was rather a cluster of detached irregular cottages, built after the fashion of the fens, and so as most conveniently to command the view of such parts of the surrounding scenery as were most congenial to the owner's taste. It was, indeed, a lovely spot—a spot that poets might have chosen for their sylvan scenes; where gay green fields spread themselves beneath the high sun, and lofty trees threw the shadows of their bright foliage for rustic shelter and repose; where silver brooks babbled out their music through dew-dappled meadows, and young birds piped out their wild melody in the woods. How often have I, reclining with book in hand upon some bank, or perched among the branches of some widely-spreading oak tree, gazed upon the varied charms of that sweet place! How often have I listened to the tripping song of some innocent villager, loitering along his happy paths, and hymning unnumbered praises to the great Giver of all! Half a dozen words would set all this into jingling rhyme; and yet it is the literal flow of the remembrance. I could not speak of those enchanting scenes after the manner of prosing confabulation, and I even think of it poetically, and almost in numbers! But it was not in the power of these unaided, nor of all the picturesque and blooming scenery in the world, that could have given me a chastened pleasure, or have tamed my ungovernable spirit into quiet:—it was for thee, my blessed Mary, for thee reserved, to curb the headstrong passions of youth, and to check the ebullition of my will.

One lovely summer's evening I had sauntered into the uplands with Osian in my hand, and lay extended in the shadow of a pleasant hedge, poring over 'a tale of the times of old—the days of other years;' my dog Nero (no relation to the gentleman who fiddled) was sporting with the gnats which buzzed about him, and barking at the white butterflies, as they led him on to a distant and fruitless pursuit:—I had thus lain for at least a full hour, when, as I listlessly moved from my recumbent posture, I unconsciously exclaimed, 'Why tarries my love on the hill—fair-haired daughter of storms, white-bosomed Braxela come!'—If thou speakest of a dog, and that dog be thine, I can tell thee—said a soft voice behind me. I started from my seat, and stood before one of the sweetest girls that ever was formed by the hand of Heaven. She was a Quaker maiden, and her neat costume well accorded with her angelic face. 'If the dog be thine,' she continued, 'come with me and I will take thee to him, for he needeth thine assistance; he lieth lame and in much pain yonder; I would have taken him to my home, but that he is large and defileth my strength.' I was upon the point of striking out into some cloudy compliment, and of swearing that I could go with her the world over, 'spite of all the dogs and cats in Christendom, but her modest mien and placid eye rebuked all folly. I followed her quick footsteps as she led the way to the spot where poor Nero lay in all the anguish which a dog usually feels that has trodden on a thorn. I sprang forward, and soon discovered the cause of his suffering. My fair conductress stood by, and watched my proceedings with much and evident anxiety, whilst I extracted the thorn from the dog's paw. 'Poor animal,' said she, 'poor animal, what he must have felt, and how gratefully dost thou lick the hand which relieves thee.' I took my handkerchief so wrap round it, but the thick fold-

ings of the silk made but an awkward bandage. 'Oh,' cried the kind maiden, with a look which well bespoke the humanity of her heart, 'I do intreat of thee to take mine; it is far fitter for thy purpose I do believe, and thou canst return it to me when next we meet.' And when may that be, my sweet young lady, said I; 'when may I renew the thanks which are so well due to your kindness.' 'Surely, I require no thanks for doing assistance to a poor and helpless brute,' replied she; 'surely if a thorn had pierced my foot, thou wouldst have done the same by me, albeit a stranger.'—'By heaven, I would have gone to the world's end to have assisted so much sweetness, although, by doing so, a thorn had pierced my heart.'—'There would be little need of going so far, I do think,' she retorted, 'for assistance or a thorn, when this wood aboundeth with both the one and the other; but how the heart may receive a thorn I understand not.' I know not how or in which way I explained the difficulty, so earnestly was I gazing on the young creature before me; her age could not have exceeded sixteen, but her loveliness seemed perfect and mature; her complexion was beautifully fair, and her blue ethereal eyes spoke to the heart in a palpable discourse; her fair light hair, simply parted over her high and polished forehead, gave a witching symmetry to the contour of her sweet face; her mouth—oh! what a delicious mouth! made but to speak unearthly purity and tell of holy and heavenly things. She was a human creature; but, oh! she was the extreme of loveliness; she seemed to exceed man's dream of beauty; she was a being who brought to the heart the real presence of its brightest visions. Almighty heaven! I think I see her now!

THE BOTANIC GARDENS OF EUROPE.

BOTANIC gardens are a source of riches, not only to the country in which they are established, but they are of universal benefit to society. The plants peculiar to one garden are soon transmitted to all the others, and interesting varieties produced either by chance or cultivation are thus easily propagated. Such establishments, if protected by the fostering hand of government, would ultimately naturalize in every civilized country those useful fruits and vegetables, against which the difference of climate does not oppose an invincible obstacle.

Although the ancients have written many volumes on the history of plants, and have ascribed most astonishing virtues to some of them, still they never thought of having botanic gardens. Pliny informs us that Anthony Castor, one of the learned physicians of Rome, was the first who made the attempt: but his collection consisted merely of medicinal plants, and it does not appear that their cultivation was continued after his death.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, some persons fond of botany, collected the most interesting plants in one spot. Curcius Cordus, at Erfurt, Nordecus, at Cassel, and Gaspard de Gabriel, at Padua, established their botanic gardens about the year 1525. The celebrated Conrad Gesner began soon after to cultivate the plants which he wanted to study and to describe; and collected in his garden, at Zurich, all those he could procure by means of his numerous exertions and extensive correspondence. A taste for botany spread all over Germany, Switzerland, and France. The same Gesner wrote, in the year 1560, that these countries possessed, at that period, more than fifty botanic gardens. But he says almost nothing of those of the Netherlands, where even under the Dukes of Burgundy, and at the time of the crusades, they had imported and cultivated many plants of the east; several of their botanic gardens were, however, abandoned or destroyed during the civil wars. Lobel, in his preface to the new edition of his History of Plants, published in 1576, enumerates the most considerable gardens of the low countries.

Those which enjoyed the greatest reputation in the other parts of Europe were:—

At Venice, the garden belonging to the Senator Jerome Corner, who had sent for plants from Egypt and the Levant. At Milan, that of Scipio Simonetta, of which Tugio has given a description and the catalogue. At Lucia, that of Vincent de Monte Cattino, which Belon mentions with praise. At Rome, the gardens of some convents, and chiefly the Récottes near the Capitol. At Naples, that of John Vincent Pinelli, where Bartholom Maranta perfected himself in botany, and composed his Methodus Cognoscendorum Simplicium, published at Venice, in 1559.

In Germany and Switzerland the gardens of several apothecaries and clergymen; at Augsburg in particular, that of the Fuggers.

In France, that of René du Bellay, Bishop of Mans, who had sent the celebrated Belon to the east to make researches relative to the study of natural history.

The works of Lobel, L'Ecluse, Dodons, and Gesner, mention the gardens that existed in 1560. Those of Camerarius, at Nuremberg, and of the Landgrave William, at Cassel, appear to have been posterior to this time.

These were the principal private botanical gardens, anterior to the establishment of public ones, which first commenced about the middle of the sixteenth century. The most ancient of the public gardens, devoted to the improvement of Botanical knowledge, is that of Pisa, founded in 1544, by Cosmo de Medicis, first Grand Duke of Florence. The garden of Padua, which enjoyed a great reputation in the sixteenth century, was founded in 1546. That of Boulogne, dates from the year 1568. The garden of Florence was first established in 1556, and restored with renovated splendour in 1718. The garden of the Vatican, at Rome, is of nearly the same antiquity as that of Bologna. Holland very early followed the example of Italy. The Botanic garden of Leyden was established in 1577, and its management confided to Theod. Aug. Cluyt.

In Germany, the Elector of Saxony established a public botanic garden at Leipzig, in the year 1580. That of the university of Giessen was founded in 1605. The magistrates of Nuremberg were, in 1625, the founders of the Botanic garden at Altorf, which, under the direction of Jungermann, soon became the most celebrated of all Germany. That of Rinteln, which was four years older, shared its celebrity; and the origin of the Botanic gardens at Ulm and Ratisbon ascends nearly to the same period. The university of Jena founded her's in 1629, and intrusted it to the management of Rolfin, who has left a curious work on vegetables, in which he has introduced the history of the public botanic gardens of his time.

In France, it was Henry IV., who, in 1597, founded the botanic garden at Montpellier, which gave a new splendour to the university of that town. The Medicinal School, of Paris, planted a botanic garden nearly about the same time, but, as it was very small, and limited to useful plants, the science derived little benefit from its establishment. But the garden which Louis XIII. established at Paris, in 1626, soon rose superior to all the other botanic gardens of Europe.

Among the public botanic gardens posterior to that of Paris, the principal are—that of Messina, founded in 1636; that of Copenhagen, established some time before the year 1640; that of Upsal, which owes its origin to the Swedish king, Charles Gustavus, in 1657: but after the conflagration of the town, in 1702, this garden continued in a deplorable state until the year 1740, when its walls were rebuilt. In 1742, the professorship of botany, at Upsal, was given to Linnaeus, and the botanic garden acquired, under the care of this great man, a deserved celebrity.

In Holland, the gardens of Amsterdam and Groeningen became the most famous, next to the botanic garden of Leyden. The first dates from the year 1684, and is remarkable for having cultivated the first coffee-plant that was brought to Europe. The botanic garden of Groeningen was established by Henry Munting, in 1641.

Prior to the foundation of public botanic gardens in England, there were several private ones belonging to botanists: as those of John Gess, of the two Tradescants, and the garden at Chelsea, which belonged to Sir Hans Sloane, and which he left to the London Corporation of Apothecaries.

The botanic garden of the University of Oxford, founded about the year 1640, was inconsiderable before the addition of that which two brothers of the name of Sherard presented at Blenheim, in 1684.

Madrid was without a botanic garden until the year 1753. That which was established at Coimbra, in 1774, has procured us many plants from the Brazils. The garden of the University of Bnt., independently of the public botanic gardens, and of the pleasure gardens of many princes and great lords in Italy and Germany, Europe and, at the end of the sixteenth century, a considerable number of gardens destined only to introduce, to naturalize, and to disseminate exotic plants.

L'Ecluse, who devoted his whole life to botany, cultivated, at Vienna, at Frankfurt, and at Leyden, a great number of plants, of which he wrote the history. Maximilian II. who sat on the Imperial throne of Germany, from the year 1564 to 1576, founded a magnificent garden at Vienna, of which he gave L'Ecluse the management.

In Spain and Portugal, some botanists, like Monardes and Simon de Jovar, cultivated the plants brought from the two Indies.

John Gerard had a botanic garden near London, the catalogue of which he published in 1596; and it appears from the Hortus Kewensis, that England has been indebted to him for many exotic plants.

At Florence, the Senator Nicholas Gaddi was one of the first who got plants from Egypt and the east. At Rome, Cardinal Farnese collected a considerable number of plants, of which Aldini published the history in 1626. But, of all private botanic gardens, known at this period, the most celebrated was that of Conrad von Gemmingen, Bishop of Eichstadt, founded near his palace towards the close of the sixteenth century. John Robin cultivated, about the same time, a private botanic garden at Paris, of which he published the catalogue in 1601.

Next to John Gerard's garden, that of John Tradescant is the most ancient in England: it was planted about the year 1630. King Charles I. and the gentlemen of his court, who often visited this garden, acquired a taste for the cultivation of exotic trees, and several plants introduced by Tradescant, were named after him as Aster Tradescanti Ephemeron Tradescanti.

Henry Compton, Bishop of London, in 1675, collected, at Fulham, a great number of exotic trees which had never before been seen in Europe.

Collinson's garden, at Mill Hill, near London, was remarkable for a large collection of American plants; Mr. Salisbury, who purchased it a few years since, has particularly restored it to botany.

J. F. Mauroceni had a private botanic garden at Padua, of which Anthony Tita published the catalogue in 1713. Prince Frederick of Wirtemberg had one at Montbelliard; Gaspard Rose, at Leipsic; the Prince of Baden Durlach established one at Carlsruhe, in 1715; and the Swedish Senator, Count de la Gardie, had one at Jacobbadal, near Stockholm.

Of the numerous private botanic gardens in Holland, the most celebrated for the richness of its collection, and for the description which Linnaeus published of it, in 1737, is that which Clifford had at Hartecamp, three miles from Harlem and nine from Leyden.

In the Austrian monarchy there are, at present, twenty-three botanical gardens.

The palace of Schoenbrunn, near Vienna, had scarcely been begun in 1763, when the Emperor, Francis I. destined part of his garden to the cultivation of exotic plants. This is become one of the most deservedly celebrated in Europe. Its hot-houses being the most extensive that ever were built, tropical trees display their branches at liberty; they produce both flowers and fruit, and birds of Africa and America fly about amidst the trees of the native country. The King's garden at Kew, possesses, however, more varieties, and is more particularly devoted to the progress of botany.

Demidow's garden, at Moscow, is the most considerable botanic garden that ever belonged to a private individual. The catalogue of his plants, which he published in 1786, contains four thousand three hundred and sixty-three notable species, five hundred and seventy-two varieties of fruit-trees, six hundred varieties of flowers, and two thousand species of plants, which had not yet flowered.

The only remarkable private botanic garden in France is that of Malmaison, formed by the Empress Josephine. Mr. Ventenat has described the new plants which have flowered in this garden. There is another at Gand, which, since the year 1799, is become a public one; it counts already more than three thousand species.

Of the Botanic gardens out of Europe, which are destined to receive the plants collected by botanical travellers in the adjacent countries, the principal are:—That of Teneriffe. That of the Society of Sciences at Calcutta, where Sir William Jones has cultivated the most celebrated plants of the Indies; that of Jamaica, under the care of Dr.

Clarke. That of Cayenne, founded by the Chevalier Turgot. Those which André Michaux has established at New York and at Charleston. That of Mexico, of which Professor Cervantes is the manager. That which Dr. Osack has planted at Elgin, in America, in 1804; and, lastly, that which was founded by subscription, at Charleston, in 1803, under the sanction of the American legislative body.

THE ECCENTRIC JOSEPH SANFORD, B.D.

WHAT is called 'a classical anecdote,' has lately appeared in most of the London and in several of the provincial papers. The name of the ingenious student who made the replies was Joseph Sanford. He was originally a member of Exeter College, whence he was elected Fellow of Balliol. His rooms at Balliol were in the middle staircase, on the east side of the quadrangle; he used to read at the end of a gallery, without fire, in the coldest weather. On every Friday, in all weathers, he never missed walking to some house, four or five miles from Oxford, on the banks of the Cherwell, where he used to dine on fish*. On his application to the bishop for ordination, he was introduced to the chaplain, to whom he was a stranger, and who, as usual, told him he must examine him; and the first question proposed was 'Quid fides?' to which Sanford replied, in a loud voice, and increasing it at each answer, 'Quod non videt'. The second question was 'Quid spes?' to which Sanford answered, 'Futura res'. The third was, 'Quid caritas?' to which he roared out, 'In mundo raritas'. Upon which the chaplain, finding that he had an extraordinary character to deal with, left him, and went to inform the bishop what had passed below, with a person he knew not what to make of, who had given in his name, Joseph Sanford, of Balliol; this made the bishop laugh, and exclaim, 'You examine him? Why he is able to examine you and our whole bench! Pray desire him to walk up;' when the bishop made an apology for the chaplain, and said he was sorry Mr. Sanford had not applied to him in the first instance. In an evening it was his constant practice to walk his mile up and down Mr. Fletcher's shop†, after he had taken tea at Horseman's coffee-house, where he met Mr. Cracherode, Dr. Smallwell, (afterwards Bishop of Oxford,) and other Christ Church men, who used to accompany him to the Turle. He was a profound scholar, and rendered Dr. Kennicott much assistance in his great work,—the Hebrew Bible. His extensive library he gave to Exeter College, by a nuncupative will, witnessed by Mr. Fletcher. Dr. Eveleigh, the late provost of Oriel, who married a daughter of his nephew, Dr. Sanford, formerly Fellow of All Souls, presented a portrait of him to Exeter College; he is represented with a folio under his arm, which is the first edition of the Hebrew Bible, a book of the greatest rarity, which he bought for a trifle of David Wilson, a bookseller in the Strand; and as soon as he had ascertained his treasure, he never laid the book down, but took it himself to his lodging, and the next morning set off for Oxford, although he had not finished the business which brought him to London, and kept the book in his hands the whole journey, until he had safely lodged it in his room at Balliol. He was so much pleased with this acquisition, that, on Mr. Fletcher's next visit to London, he sent a guinea by him to the bookseller, in addition to what he had first paid him. He died September 25th, 1774, aged 84 years, and was buried in the middle aisle of the parish church of St. Mary Magdalen, Oxford, in which church a monument, with an inscription, has been raised to his memory. He was equally well known for his learning, extensive library, and singularity in dress.—Oxford Herald.

* Mr. Bishop, of Godstow, who lately died at a very advanced age, informed the editor that he knew Mr. Sanford, who often took fish at his house, which is on the banks of the Isis.

FRENCH FLATTERY.

THE following Address to Louis XV. after the campaign of 1745, will show that French adulation did not take its rise in the present day:—

'The conquests of your Majesty are so rapid, that we think it absolutely necessary that future historians should be cautious in their relation, lest posterity should consider them as fables unworthy of belief. Yet they must be told an undoubted fact, that your Majesty was the father of our venerable elderman of that name.

† This circumstance was told to the editor of the Herald by Mr. Fletcher, whose character stood so highly in the university, that his assertion was of Mr. Sanford's having repeatedly told him it was his intention to give his books to the library of Exeter College, had the full effect of a will regularly signed and sealed.

jesty, when at the head of your army, wrote yourself an account of your exploits, having no other table but a drum. The most distant ages must learn that the English, those fierce and audacious enemies, jealous of your Majesty's fame, were compelled to yield to your prowess the palace of glory. Their allies were only so many witnesses of their shame, and hastened to join their standards only to become the spectators of your Majesty's triumph. We venture to tell your Majesty, that whatever may be the love you bear your subjects, there is still one way to add to our felicity, by curbing the high courage which you possess, and which would cost us too many tears, if it exposed to the certain danger of war, your Majesty's precious life, or that of the young hero, the object of our fondest hopes!

Original Poetry.

WHAT THO' ZULEIKA'S EYES BE DARK TO *****

WHAT tho' Zuleika's eyes be dark
As those of the gazelle,
What tho' they shed a brighter spark,
Or more of passion tell
Than thine;—I deem them not so true,
All lovely as they seem,
As those of heaven's clearest blue,
Of heaven's softest beam.
Tho' sweet they are to gaze upon,
They wander like the light
That fits when evening's gleam is gone
Before the traveller's sight.
When in his path deep marshes lie,
And distant is his home;
But there's a light within thine eye
That tells me 'twill not roam.

SAM SPRITAIL.

'VELVETEEN,' A FACETIOUS COVE.

WHEN the coach and four arrive
At the Peacock, Ballington;
'Velveteen' is all alive
Till coachmen mount, all right! and groan:
Horses reeking, bugles squeaking,
Boxes, passengers, and haste;
Friends are greeting, lovers meeting,
And the generous nobly treating
Those who liquors taste.

—Who's for Manchester?

'Velveteen!' is all the go;
In his mouth a sprig he keeps,
And his eyes are tutored so,
One opens while the other peeps;
Ever squinting, like wit hinting,
For a pleasant thought or two,— Time's engraver merrily noting,
Wrinkles on his forehead, printing Periods not a few.

—Here! a coach! a coach!

On his face the purple glows;
Ruddier than the luscious grape,
Hoping to his bottle nose
Like Job's, which potsherd vied to scrape:
Pigtail chewing, quids renewing,
Joking with a turkey's snoko,

Snarling, sneering, queering, brewing,
Business still full drive pursuing,
Peace and jobs to make.

'Going down to-day, Mem.'

Quick,—the mails are driving up
With a fine and glorious speed,
'Twixt the hour we tea and sup,
Take a glass or papers read:
—All is dunning, bellowing, stunning,
'Velveteen!' is on his way;
Wits are loitering, quizzing, punning—
Life, like wheels to coaches running,
Hurries through the day.

'York mail! York mail! run

AIR.—DELIA.

THO', like the bee from sweet to sweet,
I stray to every fragrant flow'r,
Each simple bud elate to greet,
Unmindful of the clinging hour;
Yet think not I am careless too,
As I meet on its airy rove;
No! Delia fair, believe me true,
I only wish to live and love: HAT.

AFFECTION.

(FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.)

SOST as the wind that whistles thro' the trees,
When evening spreads around her cooling breath,
Where no harsh sound or roar assails the ear,
But all is sweet and calm, serene and clear,
Such and so soft's the parent's purring sigh,
So sweet is his life. Before it dawns to day,
He to his daughter turns his stiff young gaze,
Big tears flow down the furrows of his face:
He chaps his daughter in his last embrace!
Then, on her weeping face he weeps his tears,
Her arms surround his neck, and his arms round
Life soon forsakes his form, and dies to wait
Man tastes of joy for ever freed from care.
She feels he breathes not;—no! dread of
breath,
She clasps a parent—fore'd from her by Death.
The weeping sufferer, stricken with her woes,
Upon the clay-cold come her tears heave;
Shrieks rend the air—'the soul's awning wing
Conquers her hopes and dries the starting tear;
She starts—a pale and trembling with the stands,

A victim to Affection's stern demand!
She stands as breathless—now her panting
eye

Owens no soft tear, but from it flashes fire,
Of and despair, of grief, of woe, and death,
And then the maiden answers her parent's sigh,
No tender sigh steal on the attentive ear,
She stands like hebenstatues firm'd for Fate;
With haggard looks and eyes of sad despair,
Her sunken eyes once more attempt to pour,
And the cold form a moment she surveys!
Sad task for tender virtue to perform—
To face despair—nor heed the passion's flame.
On the pale face she casts her quivering eye,
Swift thro' her soul affection's terror fly, Totters her limbs—her trembling hands give way,

She senseless falls and clasps her parent's day,
Lost in insensibility, her soul is free
From every woe—of and anxiety.
How short the joy, for soon returning death
Swift thro' her languid soul stealing death,
She wakes from joy to feel the weight of woe,
Which scarce can bear of human nature leave
That face to man which made his joy so true,
Which all his happiness and hope destroy.

Which 'twines around compassionate men's minds,
And in his frenzied heart secure asylum finds;
In her reviving breast its seeds are sown,—
Joy from her soul for ever far has flown;
The brightness of her eyes now swiftly fades,
And woe bestows instead its sickly shades;
Her beauty's bloom, her rosy tender cheek, Lose all their charms, and serve her woes to speak;
Her thoughts are placed upon that endless state
Which forms a part the last to this world's fate,
Lives but to feel affection's tender woe;
And far affection bids her soft tears flow;
Thinks on the pleasures which she once enjoyed,
And how those pleasures were by death destroyed,—
Forms all her thoughts for that glad hour to come,
Which hurries resignation to the tomb;
In heaven she hopes for bliss, and hopes to meet
That being who made her youthful hours so sweet;
Flies from a world where misery holds her court,
Where virtue's sold, and where distress is bought,—
The land of woe, where man from happiness flies—
Where, clogged with sin, too soon his spirit dies. J.P.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—After the Coronation, which was exhibited for the forty-second time on Thursday night, a new farce was produced, called Monsieur Tonson. It is founded on the very well-known tale of that name, by Mr. Taylor, though with considerable additions, a love story being grafted upon it. There is nothing very striking either in the plot, incidents, or dialogue of the piece; and it owes the success which it met with to the performers, particularly Mr. Cooper and Mr. Gattie. The farce, though tedious and very deficient in humour, was well received.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A new comedy in three acts, entitled Match Breaking, or a Prince's Present, was acted for the first time on Thursday night. It is from the pen of Mr. Keany, the author of The World, Raising the Wind, and several other successful dramatic pieces. Match Breaking is, however, not only of a very different character from any of the former productions of the author, but is also out of the common walk of the legitimate drama. The scene of the piece is laid in one of the petty states of Germany; and the following is a brief outline of the story:—

The German family of De Stronberg, who are rather disloyal in their conversation and sentiments, have betrothed their niece Emma, of Lowenstorp, (Mrs. Chatterley), to Edgar Rosenheim (De Camp), a captain in the Prince's Guard. Edgar, however, has great reason to be jealous of the prince himself (Mr. Terry), who had been his protector and friend, who comes into the family in the disguise of his relation, Hoffman, a professor of philosophy. At the moment of signing the contract, the supposed professor suggests the necessity of the prince's written consent to the marriage, but the baroness and the three brothers De Stronberg, in a lofty and satirical assertion of their independence, spurn the idea, and insist on proceeding. At the critical moment, a present arrives from the prince, conveyed by one of his pages, to Emma, with a complimentary inscription—this produces a sudden change. The family are astonished, the contract is suspended, and the Stronbergs are suddenly seized with the hope of marrying Emma to the prince himself. The younger brother, Solomon (Jones), an empty self-sufficient coxcomb, who is constantly buzzing about the court, with an affectation of despising it, is sent in search of information. The professor, Hoffman, has written against the prince, and to the supposed professor, Solomon is very free of his satire and invectives against government. The prince, who has, in fact, been struck with a passionate admiration of Emma, becomes, in the course of his visits, incognito, still more enamoured of the simplicity and purity of her heart, and the jealousy of Edgar is exasperated to the highest degree. Every appearance increases the hopes of the family. The prince sends notice of a public visit; at this moment an officer arrives in the family to arrest the supposed professor for his writings against the prince. The family are in the greatest alarm, and immediately determine on turning the professor out, that he may not be found in their house. The prince's arrival is announced, and at the moment they should welcome, they are bent on removing him in his assumed character. At this point he discovers himself, joins the lovers, expresses a good-humoured re-bort on the apostate miscontents, whom he freely forgives, and the curtain falls.

It will be seen there is much improbability in the story, for the circumstance of a prince assuming a mask, and throwing himself into situations where his feelings must unavoidably be wounded, merely to ascertain the propriety of a matrimonial union projected by an officer of his guards, is as extraordinary as it is novel; but there is also another objection to this piece,—the false picture it gives of the virtues of a court, and its contemptuous sneer at every thing like political opposition or manly independence. Three characters in the piece are, however, admirably drawn; that of the Prince, ably sustained by Terry, who preserves the dignity of his rank in situations and equivokes the most embarrassing; Solomon, too, a sort of vapouring political coxcomb, who is perpetually boasting of his own importance, his secret information, and his acute discrimination, in the hands of Jones, drew down great applause; and the interviews between him and the prince, while under the disguise of Professor Hoffman, were extremely well managed. The character of Emma is particularly amiable,—a lovely woman, in the bloom of youth and beauty, preserving her constancy amidst all the temptations which a sovereign can offer, and the persuasions of importunate friends, could not fail of giving a powerful support to any piece when sustained by Mrs. Chatterley. Much as we admire this lady, we never saw her to more advantage, and by her exertion she proved that she is as well qualified for scenes of pathetic tenderness as for those of spirit and vivacity. The character of Edgar was by no means happily sketched; and where the author was deficient, Mr. De Camp certainly did not prove an aid de Camp. All the other characters were too unimportant in the drama to intitle them to notice, if we except Miss Corri, who sang some simple airs very prettily. The piece was completely successful, and announced for repetition every evening, without a dissentient voice.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Egerton, the active manager of this theatre, closed it for the season on Tuesday night, when he delivered a modest and appropriate address.

Literature and Science.

Magnetism.—The Baron de Humboldt has discovered that there exists a singular analogy between the distribution of the magnetic powers and that of heat, and that they may equally be traced on the map of the two hemispheres, by curves, which indicate the degree of their intensity. These lines shew how, by the influence of great geological causes, the temperature varies in points situate under the same parallel, and how it is identical on points of different degrees of latitude. The laws of this derivation are deduced in a very luminous manner by M. de Humboldt; and we hope shortly to give a careful abstract of so important and curious a theory.

Tannin.—Several experiments have recently been made in France, on the various vegetables which yield tannin in greater quantity than oak bark.

The root of septfoil, (tormentilla sylvestris), found in sundry wet and poor lands and woods, and the male cornel tree, (cornus), a shrub that grows in all woods and hedges, where it is sown by birds, afford one third more tannin than oak-bark. The bark of the abus, which grows with astonishing rapidity in all wet places; the weeping willow; the service tree, (serbubus foliis primatis utriusque glabris), cultivated by seed, shoots, and grafting, is the hardiest of all known trees, and furnishes the greatest quantity of tannin.

Properties of Sound.—Mr. Haldat, of the Royal Society of Nancy, recently read a memoir on the laws of the propagation of sound; the influence of the wind particularly struck his attention, and he seems to have pursued his subject with as much attention as if it had never been treated before. He is evidently ignorant of all the experiments on sound made in England since the time of Derham, for the following are all the conclusions he arrives at:—1. The wind exerts a real influence on the propagation of sound; 2. That its propagation is impeded and diminished against the wind, and augmented when going with it or against the wind; 3. That the increase and decrease are equal; 4. That the limit of propagation is very little altered in crossing the currents of the wind; 5. That the voice of an adult, speaking in a moderate tone, may be heard sixty-five paces, but that this distance is diminished or increased, according as it is against or with the wind, in the ratio of its rapidity.

LUCRETIUS.

It is, perhaps, known to but few people, that there lives still on the frontiers of Transylvania, a Roman colony, which has preserved its language almost pure, and is proud of its descent. When any member of this colony enlists into the Austrian service, he answers to the usual question, 'whence he comes?' I am a Roman (Romansum.)

A barrister being 'at the point of death, made his will, and left all his fortune to a lunatic hospital: on being asked why he did so, 'he replied 'I wish my property to return to those who gave it me.'

Anecdote of his late Majesty.—When his late Majesty was residing at the palace of Kew, the Princess Charlotte, then a little girl, was staying with the King; and it was his delight to take her out with him in his morning and evening walks: On one occasion, as she was going out into the garden from the White Horse at Kew, his Majesty said to the pages who were standing in the hall, 'Make way for this poor child.' On this the young princess remarked, 'I am not a poor child, grandpapa—indeed I am not.'—'Yes my dear, answered the king, 'you are, and I will tell you why. You are kept by the whole nation, and that makes you poor indeed; and as to the crown, I assure you it sits not light on the heads of those that wear it!' A fine method this of conveying an instructive moral to her mind; and of teaching, much more forcibly than a long didactic discourse could have done, the grace and humility on the one hand, and the virtue and gratitude on the other, of a princess to the subject.

Review of New Books.

An Account of the Interior of Ceylon and of its Inhabitants. With Travels in that Island. By John Davy, M. D., F. R. S. 4to. pp. 530. London, 1821.

Few works of the present day can lay so strong a claim to originality as the one before us, for, with the exception of the 'Historical Relation of the Island of Ceylon,' by Robert Knox, an English seaman, who was wrecked on the coast in 1660, and suffered twenty years' captivity, there is not a single volume in existence on the subject. Knox's history has always been popular, on account of its simplicity of style and narrative, and the good sense and good feelings of the author; but his sphere of observation was necessarily limited, and the period of one hundred and forty years, which has elapsed since its publication, and the vast interest which the subject has acquired since Ceylon has become a British province, have rendered an account of it one of the most acceptable works that could be offered to the public.

The subject has fallen into excellent hands, and Ceylon has found, in Dr. Davy, an historian, who has made ample amends for the neglect which it has hitherto experienced. The work is compiled from original materials, collected in Ceylon during a four years' residence of the author, who was on the medical staff of the army. He has received the assistance of every one who was capable of aiding him in the information, and hence the work is enriched by many valuable contributions. It gives a full account of the history, geography, and geology of the island; its population, laws, language, and religion; the state of the arts and sciences, the domestic habits and manners of the inhabitants, &c. A work of this nature, written with the ability which Dr. Davy has displayed, cannot fail of exciting great interest, and therefore we propose making our readers somewhat extensively acquainted with its contents.

Vol. III.

The Island of Ceylon is in the tropic of Cancer, situated nearly between the parallel of 6° and 10° north latitude, and between 80° and 82° east longitude; that is at the western entrance of the Bay of Bengal, and off the coast of Coromandel. It is almost two thirds of the size of Ireland, containing altogether a surface of 27,770 square miles, and a population of about 800,000 souls, which is in the proportion of about thirty-eight only to a square mile. The old kingdom of Kandy, now called the Kandyan Provinces, occupies the whole middle of the island, and a great portion of the southern extremity; their superficial contents are estimated at 12,360 square miles. The character of the interior, as to surface, greatly varies, and may be divided into flat country, hilly, and mountainous; the latter district, in perpendicular elevation above the sea, varies from eight hundred to three thousand, and even to four and five thousand feet. There are no lakes, not even a single stagnant pool among the mountains. Uniformity of formation is the most remarkable feature in the geological character of Ceylon, the whole of which, with very few exceptions, consists of primitive rock, the prevailing species of which is granite or gneiss.

The mineralogy of Ceylon is singular and curious; it is remarkable for its richness in gems, and its poverty in the useful metals. It is remarkable, too, for the number of rare minerals that it affords, and for the small variety of the ordinary species; thus, in its mineralogical character, quite oriental, better fitted for show than utility—for pomp than profit. The principal gems found in Ceylon are the ruby, garnet, topaz, amethyst, sapphire, and rock crystal.

The soil of the island is generally poor, but it abounds in rivers and springs; the proportion of rain that falls in it is very great, exceeding what falls in England three or four times. In respect to heat or temperature, no tropical country is, perhaps, more favoured than Ceylon; its hottest weather being temperate in comparison with the summer heats of most parts of the continent of India; and, generally speaking, the climate is salubrious.

Although Dr. Davy does not give any account of the plants of Ceylon, and treats very briefly of its animals, (which do not differ from those on the adjoining continent of India,) yet he has paid particular attention to the snakes of the island, which are neither so numerous nor so dangerous as they have been represented. Our author collected twenty different species of snakes, of which sixteen were harmless. Of those that are poisonous, the pimpler is the most remarkable. It is characterised by its great size, and by a couple of horny probosces, in form and curvature not unlike the spurs of the common fowl; the base of the spur is attached to a small bone, with a minute head, which is received into the glenoid cavity of a thin long bone, that terminates in a tapering cartilaginous process. These horny spurs are useful in enabling the snake to climb trees and hold fast its prey:—

'This snake is the largest species in Ceylon; and, indeed, is the only one that grows to a great size. I have seen a specimen of it about seventeen feet long, and proportionately thick.' It is said by the natives to attain a much greater magnitude, and to be found occasionally twenty-five and thirty feet long, and of the thickness of a common-sized man. The colour of different specimens that I have seen has varied a little: it is generally a mixture of brown and yellow; the back and sides are strongly and rather handsomely marked with irregular patches of dark brown, with dark margins. The jaws are powerful, and capable of great dilatation; and they are armed with large strong sharp teeth, reclining backwards. As the muscular strength of this snake is immense, and its activity and courage considerable, it may be credited that it will occasionally attack man; there can be no doubt that it overpowers deer, and swallows them entire.

The natives have many ridiculous stories respecting this snake. They say, that when young, it is a polonga, and provided with poisonous fangs; and that when of a certain age and size it loses these fangs, acquires spurs, and becomes a pimpler.

berah. They suppose its spurs are poisonous, and that the animal uses them in striking and killing its prey. They imagine that parturition is always fatal to the female, owing to the abdomen bursting on the occasion; and that the males, aware of this circumstance, out of regard for the females of their species, avoid them, and choose for their mates female noyas.

The most common of the poisonous snakes of Ceylon, is the naya or hooded snake of the English, and coluber naja of Linnaeus. The natives rather venerate this snake than dread it, and will not even kill it when found in their houses:—

Frequent exhibitions are made of this snake in Ceylon, as well as on the continent of India, by men called snake-charmers. The exhibition is rather a curious one, and not a little amusing to those that can calmly contemplate it. The charmer irritates the snake by striking it, and by rapid threatening motions of his hand; and appeases it by his voice, by gentle circular movements of his hand, and by stroking it gently. He avoids, with great agility, the attacks of the animal when enraged, and plays with it and handles it only when pacified, when he will bring the mouth of the animal in contact with his forehead, and draw it over his face. The ignorant and vulgar believe that these men really possess a charm by which they thus play without dread and with impunity without danger. The more enlightened, laughing at this idea, consider the men impostors, and that in playing their tricks there is no danger to be avoided, it being removed by the extraction of the poison-fangs. The enlightened in this instance are mistaken, and the vulgar are nearer the truth in their opinion. I have examined the snakes I have seen exhibited, and have found the poison-fangs in and uninjured. These men do possess a charm, though not a supernatural one, viz. that of confidence and courage; acquainted with the habits and disposition of the snake, they know how averse it is to use the fatal weapon nature has given it for its defence in extreme danger, and that it never bites without much preparatory threatening. Any one possessing the confidence and agility of these men, may irritate them, and I have made the trial more than once. They will play their tricks with any hooded snake, whether just taken or long in confinement, but with no other kind of poisonous snake.

Dr. Dyer made several experiments on the poison of the snakes, whence he infers, that there are only two snakes at Ceylon, the hooded snake and the tie-polouga, whose bite is likely to prove fatal to man. There is another animal in Ceylon, less dreaded but much more troublesome, and the cause of the loss of more lives than the snakes. This is the Ceylon leech:—

'This animal varies much in its dimensions; the largest are seldom more than half an inch long, in a state of rest; the smallest are minute indeed. It is broadest behind, and tapers towards the forepart; above, it is roundish; below, flat. Its colour varies from brown to light brown; it is more generally the latter, and rarely dark brown. It is marked with three longitudinal light yellow lines, extending from one extremity to the other; one dorsal and central, two others lateral. The substance of the animal is nearly semi-transparent, and, in consequence, its internal structure may be seen pretty distinctly. A canal appears to extend centrally the whole length of the body, arising from a crucial mouth at the smaller extremity, and terminating in a small circular anus at the broader extremity, on each side of which are two light spots.

'This leech is a very active animal; it moves with considerable rapidity; and it is said occasionally to spring. Its powers of contraction and extension are very great; when fully extended, it is like a fine cord, and its point is so sharp, that it readily makes its way through very small openings. It is supposed to have an acute sense of smelling, for no sooner does a person stop where leeches abound, than they appear to crowd eagerly to the spot from all quarters.

'This animal is peculiar to those parts of Ceylon which are subject to frequent showers; and, consequently, it is unknown in those districts that have a long dry season. It is most abundant among the mountains,—not on the highest ranges, where the temperature appears to be too low for it, but on those not exceeding two or three thousand feet above the level of the sea. It delights in shady damp places, and is to be seen on moist leaves and stones more frequently than in water. In dry weather it retires into the close damp jungle, and only in rainy weather quits its cover, and infests the pathways and roads, and open parts of the country.

'Whether it is found in any other country than Ceylon is not quite certain; perhaps the leech of the mountainous parts of Sumatra, noticed in Mr. Marsden's history of that island, is similar to it; and it is not unlikely, that it occurs amongst the damp and wooded hills of the south of India. Those who have had no experience of these animals,—of their immense numbers in their favourite haunts,—of their activity, keen appetite, and love of blood, can have no idea of the kind and extent of annoyance they are to travellers in the interior, of which they may be truly said to be the plague. In rainy weather, it is almost shocking to see the legs of men on a long march, thickly beset with them gorged with blood, and the blood trickling down in streams. It might be supposed that there would be little difficulty in keeping them off; this is a very mistaken notion, for they crowd to the attack, and fasten on, quicker than they can be removed. I do not exaggerate when I say, that I have occasionally seen at least fifty on a person at a time. Their bites, too, are much more troublesome than could be imagined, being very apt to fester and become sores; and, in persons of a bad habit of body, to degenerate into extensive ulcers, that in too many instances have occasioned the loss of limbs, and even of life.'

We have already stated the population of Ceylon; it is divided into two great classes,—the aborigines of the country and foreigners naturalized; the former are the Singalese, and the latter chiefly Malabars and Moors. The Singalese are completely Indians in person, language, manners, customs, religion, and government. Their average height is five feet four or five inches, and they are well made; the colour of their skin varies, from light brown to black:—

'The Singalese women are generally well made and well looking, and often handsome. Their countrymen, who are great connoisseurs of the charms of the sex, and who have books on the subject, and rules to aid the judgment, would not allow a woman to be a perfect belle, unless of the following character, the particulars of which I shall give in detail, as they were enumerated to me by a Kandyan courtier, well versed and deeply read in such matters:—"Her hair should be voluminous, like the tail of the peacock; long, reaching to the knees, and terminating in graceful curls; her eyebrows should resemble the rainbow; her eyes, the blue sapphire and the petals of the blue manilla flower. Her nose should be like the bill of the hawk; her lips should be bright and red, like coral on the young leaf of the iron-tree. Her teeth should be small, regular, and closely set, and like jessamine buds. Her neck should be large and round, resembling the berrigadea. Her chest should be capacious; her breasts, firm and conical, like the yellow cocoa-nut, and her waist almost small enough to be clasped by the hand. Her hips should be wide; her limbs tapering; the soles of her feet without any hollow, and the surface of her body in general soft, delicate, smooth, and rounded, without the appearance of projecting bones and sinews."

The remarkable feature of Indian society, distinction of castes, prevails among the Singalese, as well as the Hindoos, though to a less extent and with less effect on the minds of the people. The principal caste is the Gowanne, a privileged people, who monopolize all the honours of church and state, and possess all the highest rank in the country:—

'The common dress of these people and which may be considered as the

tional dress, is extremely simple, and not unbecoming. The dress of the men consists of a handkerchief about the head like a turban, leaving the top of the head exposed; and of a long cloth of two breadths, called topetty, wrapped about the loins, and reaching as low as the ankles. The material of the women's dress is very similar; they leave the head uncovered, and wear a long cloth, of a single breadth, called hala, wrapped round their loins, and thrown over their left shoulder. On occasions of ceremony, when full dressed, the men cover the body with a short jacket, and those who have the privilege lay aside the handkerchief for a cap, and decorate themselves with gold chains and girdles.

To this caste belong that singular and savage people, the Weddahs, who inhabit the extensive forests on the south-eastern side of the island. They are divided into the village Weddahs and the forest Weddahs. The village Weddahs live in huts, made of the bark of trees; their food is the flesh of deer, elk, the wild hog, and the inguana, with a little Indian corn, the wild yam and the roots of some water lilies:—

“Few traces of even incipient civilization can be observed amongst them. Though living together, they seem to be ignorant of all social rites, and strangers to almost every circumstance that ennobles man and distinguishes him from the brute. To procure a wife, the Weddah does not commence a process of courtship; but goes immediately to the parent, asks their consent to have their single daughter, and if the first to ask is never refused. They appear to be without names. A Weddah interrogated on the subject, said, “I am called a man; when young I was called a little man; and when old, I shall be called the old man.” It could hardly be expected that such a people would have any burial rites; they do not even bury their dead; but as soon as the body has expired, throw it into the jungle. They appear to be ignorant of every art, excepting such as hardly deserve the name, and without which they could not exist, such as making a bow, an arrow, a cord from tough fibrous plants, scratching the ground and sowing a few seeds, and so forth. The bit of cloth they wear, and the iron heads of their arrows, they obtain by barter, receiving them in exchange for their dried venison, the skins of deer, or for honey and wax.

“They have hardly any knowledge of numbers, and cannot count above five; they have no knowledge of medicinal plants, and only the grossest and simplest, superstitious notions. They believe in the existence of evil demons, and make offerings to them when labouring under sickness or any great misfortune. They have no idea of a supreme and beneficent God, or of a state of future existence, or of a system of rewards and punishments.”

There is one caste, or rather out-cast, the Rhodées, who are considered as the vilest of the vile, and live in the most wretched state of degradation:—

“They are not allowed to live in houses of the common construction, but only in the innermost sheds, commonly opened on one side. In carrying a pingo*, they are permitted to load it at one end only; and they are not only shunned by, but are required to avoid others. When a Rhodia sees a Geowanse, he must salute him with hands uplifted and joined, and must move out of the way; or if the pali be narrow, not affording room for both to pass at a distance, he must go back. But it is not true, as has been asserted, that on such an occasion he must prostrate himself for the Geowanse to walk over his body; indeed, such a practice would be incompatible with the notion of impurity attached to their touch, and which is so firmly impressed on the minds of the Singalese, that they have been known to refuse to obey the orders of our government, to make prisoners certain Rhodées, suspected of a murder, saying, “they could not pollute themselves by seizing them, but they would willingly shoot them at a distance.” Wretched as is the condition of the Rhodées, they are said to be a robust race, and their women particularly handsome. On account of the beauty of the latter, and the art of fortune-telling which they possess, they are less shunned than the men. When rambling about the country, practising their idle art, to attract attention they balance a brass plate on a finger, and holding it on high, twirl it round with surprising dexterity. The analogy between these people and the gypsies, in many points, is obvious; but, in all probability, it is merely incidental.

The Singalese have no notion of any species of government, excepting the pure monarchical; and they say that a king is so essential, that without him there would be neither harmony nor order, but confusion and dissension, which would soon prove fatal to society. The throne was strictly hereditary, and the rights and functions of the king were of the highest and most extensive nature; yet he was not perfectly absolute and without check. On ascending the throne, he had to consider himself under certain restrictions; he was expected to follow the example of good princes, observe the customs of the country, and attend to the written rules handed down for the direction of kings. Of these rules, the following are the principal: they are translated from the Pali, in which they are expressed in verse:—

- ‘7. Be without malice.
- ‘8. Inflict not torture.
- ‘9. Be merciful.
- ‘10. Attend to good counsel.’

We thank Dr. Davy for giving us these excellent maxims for a king. We would have them translated into every living language, made the basis of every prince's education, and so familiar to every monarch in Christendom, that he should ‘wear them in his heart's core, ay, in his heart of heart.’ Dr. Davy adds,—

‘Should a king act directly contrary to these rules, contrary to the example of good princes, and in opposition to the customs of the country, he would be reckoned a tyrant, and the people would consider themselves justified in opposing him, and in rising up in mass and de-throning him; nor are there wanting instances in extreme cases of oppression, of their acting on this principle, and successfully redressing their wrongs.’

In no court, perhaps, was there ever a greater display of pomp, or greater respect shown to a monarch, than in the court of Kandy, before it was overturned by the British:—

‘The royal throne was of plated gold, ornamented with precious stones. When the king appeared on state occasions, he was either dressed in the most magnificent robes, loaded with a profusion of jewellery, or in complete armour of gold, ornamented with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds. To make the scene more impressive, and add to its solemnity, night was the favourite time for giving audience and transacting business.

‘The marks of respect required and shown to the Kandyan monarch were so unbounded, that one would suppose they were intended rather for a god than a man. The chiefs never approached the king without prostrating before him; and, in addressing him, Dewo (God) was an expression that they commonly used. His own proclamations were very characteristic:—"The most wealthy, the protector of religion, whose fame is infinite and universally spread, and of surpassing excellence, exceeding the moon, the unexpanded jessamine-buds, the heavenly river, the white chanks, and the stars;—whose feet are as fragrant to the noses of other kings as flowers to bees;—our most noble patron and god by custom,—like Sakreea, who subdued the Assooriabs, sitting on the precious throne of the magnificent, and prosperous city of Singadagalla, that possesses the beauty and wealth of all kingdoms, and is like the heavenly kingdom of Sakreea.—Ordered, &c."

Thus commenced a deed of gift of the late king, in which he assigned certain confiscated lands to one of his ministers, as a reward for his fidelity and good conduct; and, as we can scarcely finish better, here we leave off for the present.

St. George and St. Denys; a Dialogue. By Hugh Melros. 8vo. pp. 113. London, 1821.

THIS is one of those productions on which it is difficult to offer a decided opinion. Its merits are certainly too low for a high praise, too small for a great praise; but if it affords little to praise, it contains nothing to condemn. The author, with the feeling of Goldsmith, whom he considers as possessing 'more practical policy than a whole privy council of men merely versed in the routine of office,' laments, in terms somewhat laconic, the decline of the peasantry, and the rise of speculators and monopolists. The following extract, contrasting present and former times, is one of the best passages in the poem:—

'Our foolish fathers sowed and planted
Tree, which they never used nor wanted
In hope, with them when all was dark,
Their children's children here might breathe;
Carve future Sylvan on their bark,
Quaff future vintages beneath;
With billets from their giant boughs,
Might cheer their halls cereal too,
Or shape them into future ploughs,
To cut the valleys where they grew.
And hoply philosophic pride
Might muse where centuries broke their rage,
And rosy infans run and hide
Beneath their hollows, scooped by age.
But we, their sons, a wiser race,
Bequeath to those who take our place,
Nor tree, nor branch, nor trunk, nor root,
Nor seed, nor sapling, graft, nor shoot,
Enjoying still—we fill our dish
With blades before they swell to corn,

With spawn, before it grows to fish.

With eggs unbatch'd, with calves unborn;
Devour, with gusto, glee, and laughter,

The present, past, and coming fruits,—
Bequeathing, to the times hereafter,

Our empty casks and faded mits.

These games and gambols, past believing,
Our dull and sombre souls call "thieving."

But we, who play these jovial pranks,
(Praise to our fertile wit, and thanks!)

To hush complaint and stifle groans,
Refine them down to "raising loams."

In a note of considerable length, the author pursues the subject, and projects (for what is an author without a project!), a plan of relief for the distressed peasantry. He proposes that all the waste lands, when inclosed and brought into cultivation, should be divided among those who possess nothing, in parcels of from four to five acres for each family. The advantages arising from this plan, he says, would be that,—

'Besides the amelioration of character to the man, the land would pass from the rudest agriculture into a state of horticulture in its minutest detail. Instead of curious instruments and refinements, manual labour would force the soil to do its duty.

'Were a considerable proportion of the labourers proprietors, the price of labour could not be fixed by the party whose interest it is to undervalue it. The concurrence of the employed would be necessary to sanction the terms proposed by the employer.—Again, the occasional avocation of the peasant to cultivate his own estate would enhance the value of his services; he would gradually be accessible to a feeling of pride; and when once that feeling was awakened in him, his advance in decency and honesty would be rapid.

'I have heard some persons approve of a little plot of land to employ the labourer after his working hours, in what they are pleased to call his spare time. His working hours, I reply, are already too many for his strength; and his return from them should be greeted by a nutritive meat supper, the conversation of his family, and rest. A mere garden (fastidiously cultivated, as the peasants usually keep their gardens) is yet totally inadequate to giving them any importance, or securing to them those comforts, without which human nature sinks and is undone.'

There is a good deal of benevolence in the author's project, and it would certainly do much good, but it would not be a panacea to heal all the real and imaginary evils which he, with microscopic eye, sees overwhelming poor old England. Something, however, might certainly be done to ameliorate the condition of the peasantry, and we know nothing so likely to facilitate this object as giving them small farms or plots of ground for individual cultivation.

The History of Madeira.

THE portion of this beautifully embellished work which we have reserved for our present notice, has an immediate reference to the engravings, which are, both in point of design and colouring, of a very superior description; they give a very striking and familiar view of the 'costume, manners, and occupations of the inhabitants;' and, with the aid of the letter-press, render the natives of Madeira and their varied pursuits almost as familiar to us as our fellow countrymen. From the description the author gives of the several classes of the inhabitants and their peculiarities, we shall make a few extracts; and, first, of the 'county's pride,' the peasantry:—

'The cottages in Madeira, the habitations of the labouring peasantry, are built of stone, with roofs composed of thatch, which are annually thickened with the same material, in order to render them more impervious to the heavy rains of the winter season. They consist, generally, of one room, which is subservient to every domestic purpose. Here the victuals are cooked, and the household occupations pursued during the day; while, at night, it is divided by a curtain or straw mat, to answer the purpose of sleep. Their ordinary furniture seems to be confined to a very few articles. The principal of these is a large iron pot, in which their food is prepared, which does not offer any abundant variety, as it consists chiefly of a kind of porridge, composed of rice and Indian corn. Sometimes, indeed, though it is considered as a luxury, not being often seen on the cottage table, the rich people enjoy a meal of salt pork or salted fish.

'Religious duties occupy much, if not the greater part, of the leisure that labour can spare them. The picture of their tutelary saint is seen in a conspicuous part of their dwelling, and to gain whose protecting favour their prayers are seldom omitted, when the opportunity offers to repeat them. The rosary is also a constant associate of their intervals from labour, and the more public exercises, as demanded by the church, are constant objects of habitual devotion.'

There is a beautiful engraving, entitled 'Rural Toil.' It represents an old woman sitting under a banana-tree, winding thread from a reel, while a young woman near her, is engaged in spinning from the distaff, which is usually employed in warm countries, as it is not confined, like the spinning wheel, to a sedentary situation, but may be exercised either standing or walking.

One of the singularities in the tail of the Madeira peasant, consists in his carrying every thing on his head, without the least assistance from the shoulders. The unequal surface that prevails through the island, renders the use of the plough impracticable, as it equally forbids the use of animal labour; cultivation is, therefore, principally produced by manual labour. Spades are not in use, but the instrument employed in breaking up the ground is a kind of long pointed hoe. Indian corn is ground by a stone in the open air, principally by women. Of the costumes of the natives, we are told that,

'There is a manifest difference between the southern and western natives of the island of Madeira. It is not necessary to attempt a philosophical inquiry into the causes of this variety. It is sufficient for these pages merely to state its existence. Those of the western side lay claim to, as they indeed possess, a decided superiority over those of the southern part of the island. Their manners and habits are more simple and natural; their figures present a more regular proportion, and their skin a finer complexion. They are described, also, as remarkable for the brightness of their eyes, the growth of their hair, and the beauty of their teeth. They frequently go barefoot; but when their feet are clad, they wear boots made of goat-skins, which are light and durable, and being white, have a pretty appearance. The whole dress of both sexes has a picturesque character, both as to shape and variety of colour. For its materials, the wearers are solely indebted to their own domestic manufacture, in which the female hands are more particularly employed.'

Itinerant musicians are common in Madeira:—

'It may be naturally expected, in a country where the love of music and the practice of it is so universal, from rank and opulence to the lowest classes of every denomination, that there would be such a profession as that which the plate so characteristically displays. These itinerant musicians assist at the religious festivals and the private entertainments of the capital, while they entertain the more humble audience of the village. Indeed, as they travel from one end of the island to the other, they may be considered as occasionally enlivening and delighting the whole of it. To the song and the instrument they add the dance. They excel also in extemporaneous compositions. Their music is suited to the occasion; and their dancing is not devoid of grace, but slow in its movements. Their occupation is to afford pleasure to others; but, as they are in continual motion, and never stationary, their's is a life of no common labour. They are represented as sleeping little, and eating less; but, though they support their fatigue chiefly by drinking, they are never seen to indulge in it to excess.'

The inhabitants of Madeira are generally stout, but more particularly so the dignitaries of the Romish church, who appear to fatten abundantly on the good things of this island. One engraving represents a prior of the order of St. Francis, with that kind of bulk which monastic fasting and prayer does not always discourage. He is as jolly as Falstaff, and forms a striking contrast to the lean and lugubrious lay brother by the side of him. In another engraving there is a brother of the same order, (not a lay brother, but one fast enough to be a prior,) collecting donations for his convent. He appears surrounded with luxuries, and is receiving a loaf from a beautiful female who is kneeling. The friar looks very amorous, and is patting the cheek of the fair damsel. All the orders of St. Francis are mendicant; that is, they are not allowed to possess any property beyond the walls of their cloister:—

'The community, which is numerous, is entirely supported by charitable contributions. There are three branches of the principal institution at Funchal, which are settled in different parts of the island, to collect support from the country people, particularly at the time of the vintage. The charity thus obtained consists generally of a loaf of bread, or other article of sustenance, with some small piece of money, for which the mendicant friar returns his holy benediction. No place escapes their solicitation, which assumes a different form, according to the character of those to whom the eleemosynary applicant addresses himself. Places of refreshment are very numerous in different parts of the town as well as of the country, where stalls present bread, fruit, and wine for sale, as represented in the plate. These never escape the friar's application, and as seldom fail of adding to the contents of the conventual sack.'

The nunneries of the island of Madeira are confined to Funchal, and consist of four conventual establishments for females:—

'One of them is formed upon the same system as that of La Trappe, in Normandy, as it existed previous to the French revolution. Among other rigorous and unusual regulations, these cloistered ladies are not only forbidden the use of speech themselves, but even of hearing that of others. All conversation, therefore, is prohibited when the gates of this silent mansion are once closed upon them. It is presumed, that there never was another institution of this character for the female religious, under any regulation, or in any jurisdiction of the church of Rome.

'The independent nunneries here have but moderate revenues; and the poorer ones are maintained by the ingenious industry of their inhabitants in making artificial flowers, which they do with great taste and imitative power. They also excel in preserving fruits, and various branches of confectionery.'

The Portuguese ladies of Madeira very seldom walk out but to attend their devotions: when they visit one another, it is usually in a palanquin. Its only furniture is a cushion, with a silk or chintz curtain. But,— 'The palanquin, which is the common conveyance of the town, is too weighty to be carried with equal ease over the rugged unequal roads, that form the communication from one part of the country to the other. For this purpose a hammock is employed, made of strong net-work, fastened at each end to a considerable length of bamboo, which is capable of bearing such a weight as the design intends to express. In this way the country parties are formed; nor is sleep refused in the passage, to which the posture is peculiarly inviting; the gentlemen also frequently prefer it to riding. Porters follow the hammocks with the necessary baggage.

'The travelling bearers of these machines possess not only the strength adequate to the load, but display all the agility which the unequal surface of the roads requires, as well as a curious expertise in shifting the bamboo from one shoulder to the other, in order to relieve themselves, without any risk to the persons whom they carry, or causing the least apprehension for their security. Indeed, accidents of any kind are altogether unheard of in this mode of travelling.'

To what we have already said in praise of this work, we shall add nothing further than recommending it as a necessary and elegant appendage to every good library.

A Supplement to the Pharmacopœia; being a Treatise on Pharmacology in general: including not only the Drugs and Compounds which are used by Practitioners of Medicine, but also those which are sold by Chemists, Druggists, &c. for other purposes. Together with a Collection of the most useful Medical Formule; an Explanation of the Contractions used by Physicians, &c. &c. &c. A New and improved Edition, considerably enlarged. By Samuel Frederick Gray, Lecturer on the Materia Medica, &c. 8vo, pp. 480. London, 1821.

This work, though under the modest title of a 'Supplement' to the Pharmacopœia, is of more general and extensive utility than the Pharmacopœia itself. Its object, says Mr. Gray in his preface, 'is to give a concise account of the actual state of our knowledge of drugs in general, using that term in its most extensive signification, as including not only those natural substances and compounds which are employed by physicians or private practitioners in the practice of medicine, but those other substances and compounds which, from their analogy to these, are usually sold by the same retailers as sell medicines for the purpose of being used as dyes, paints, perfumes, cosmetics, liqueurs, &c.; and upon this account the work appears under the title of 'Supplement to the Pharmacopœia,' as that book contains only the medicines which are at present most generally used by the physicians of London and its environs. Still, however, the medicines form the greater bulk of the work.'

We shall not follow the author in his division of medicines into empirica, officials, and nostrums; but on this point shall merely observe, that the subjects of the volume are all systematically and scientifically arranged, and so accompanied with explanations as to render them easily understood by those who are out of the profession; and though no medical student should be without this supplement, yet Mr. Gray contemplated a more extensive field of usefulness than merely writing for the initiated.

In addition to the many thousand recipes which the work contains, including almost every species of compound, infusions, decoctions, emulsions, syrups, varnishes, tinctures, powders, pills, plasters, patent medicines, &c. &c. &c. there is a variety of other useful information, 'too tedious to mention.' The last branch of the work is by no means the least interesting: it contains an account of apparatus and materials for a medicine chest; a list of the contractions used by physicians and druggists; the college list of medicines, with the usual doses in which they are administered; and a list of native British plants, arranged according to the use to which they are applied.—From a volume which embraces a field so ample, we shall content ourselves with one extract, for the benefit of our botanical readers. It is directions for preparing dried plants for a herbarium siccum:—

'The plants being laid down in their natural position as far as possible, upon some sheets of blotting paper, are then to be covered with two or more sheets of the same, and a board being laid upon the whole, to prevent the leaves, &c. from curling up, weights are put upon the board, and the whole exposed to the air in a dry place. If the stalks or other parts of the plants are very thick, the lower part may be pared, so as to lay the whole as flat as possible. The paper should be changed every two or three days, and the weights increased until the plants are thoroughly dry. A number of plants may be submitted to the same press at once, placed one upon another, with two or three sheets of blotting paper between them.

'A still better way is to have a box the size of a sheet of paper, and about nine inches or a foot deep, then strew some sand about an inch thick at the bottom, over which place a sheet of blotting paper, and upon this, as many of the plants as will conveniently lie upon it, carefully expanding and smoothing them; then put a sheet of blotting paper over them, and the thickness of about half an inch of sand, upon which another sheet of paper, another layer of plants, paper, and sand may be placed, thus continuing till the stock of plants is exhausted, or the box filled, observing to have a layer of sand at the top; the box is then to be put into a dry airy place, or near a common fire, till the drying is complete; when the plants are dried, they may either be pasted down on sheets of paper, or otherwise fastened by thread, or slips of paper pasted through slits in the sheet.

'Instead of flattening the plants for the purpose of placing them in books, they are sometimes dried in their natural form, by suspending them in a tin-box of sufficient depth, then carefully filling the box with sand, and placing it in a warm dry place for a few days; after which the sand is to be taken out carefully, and the dry plants may be either made into nosegays and covered with a glass case, or stuck in pots, and scented with a few drops of a proper essential oil; even mushrooms may be dried under sand in a similar manner. The sand should be rather coarse, that the moisture may breathe out the more freely.'

Mr. Gray's preface, which is by no means the least interesting part of his work, contains a retrospective view of the medical profession, with some judicious reflections on the inutility of the late Apothecaries' Act. With a strong feeling in favour of the profession, he points out the fatuity of attempting to protect or even assist it by severe enactments, which do not prevent empiricism, and often oppress deserving individuals. On this subject we perfectly agree with him in the following remarks:—

'But in respect to the cant, for no other name can be given to it, of the danger of permitting home-bred and even unlearned empirics to practise medicine, it may be remarked, that as the higher classes of society require their usual medical adviser to possess their manners, so do the lowest; and although the poor may accept of the advice and medicines given them by practitioners who rank above them in society, yet they do it with a latent suspicion that they are made the subjects of experiments, and never cordially bestow their confidence but upon those of their own rank; nor is this peculiar to the poor in civil life, for Hamilton, in his Regimental Surgeon, mentions the reluctance with which soldiers report themselves sick, and accept the proffered aid of their medical officers, choosing rather to purchase medicines out of their scanty allowance, and follow empirical advice, until overpowered by disease, and no longer able to conceal it.

As to the power of suppressing home-bred or even unlearned empirics altogether, the trouble and expense of lawsuit, and the obloquy that attends those who attempt to deprive a man of the fruits of his industry and skill through the want of technical formalities, are so great, that it is only the strongest stimulus of personal enmity, or a feeling that their own interest is deeply involved in getting rid of a more popular neighbour, that would originate a prosecution; hence, while the grossest ignorance and real unskillfulness would escape, by being clothed in the garb of poverty, especially considering the facility with which the poor slip from the fangs of the law by changing their residence, as it would never be worth while in such a case to hunt them out, even if it were possible, it is only the active and intelligent practitioner, like Sutton the inoculator, that would be prosecuted, because by his neighbourhood all old could be prosecuted or injured, or from him else could they look for a reimbursement of any portion of the expenses that must be incurred; and here the protection would, as in Sutton's case, have to counter every discouragement that could be put upon the affair, and have to fight their way through all the mazes and intricacies that the law could interpose, with a court and jury decidedly hostile to their claim, and requiring the most positive enactments and evidence in their favour; and the want of success in any lawsuit, or even the expenses of three or four, if so many were required, although they were successful, would outweigh any possible injury that could arise from letting the matter rest as it was.

Moreover, as to the real justice of attempting the forcible suppression of empirics, however mortifying it must be to the pride of the philosopher or the intense labours of the scholar, truth will oblige the historian of the practice of medicine to confess, with a sigh over the vanity of human learning, that our choicest remedies, and our most approved modes of cure, are generally, if not universally, derived from empirics, and those whom unlearned; and that, however the methdicts have laboured to explain the modes of action, and the reasons for the effects produced, they have done little or nothing towards the improvement of the practice.

Again,—

'The real enemies of the fair practitioner, whether empiric or methodic, are those persons generally educated in what is called the regular method, who, disdaining the slow and gradual progress of industry and attention to business, endeavour to trample down their brethren, and thrust themselves forward to public notice in advertisements, under real or fictitious names and titles, and thus make a great noise in the world, although, from the heavy expense of advertising, it is doubtful whether they really get as much money as they might obtain by pursuing the usual course; and still more those persons who, impelled by a commercial rather than a philosophic spirit, become nostrum-mongers, and frequently, in defiance of their better knowledge, recommend, in pompous terms, some inert or dangerous medicine to the notice of the sick, and thus encourage them to practise upon themselves. The most hazardous of all experiments, to which the rash trials of the most ignorant village empiric, who derives the whole of his book-learning from a well-thumbed copy of some old black-letter herbal, are comparatively safe; since, in the latter case, there is some chance that his experience may enable him to perceive his error in time to retrieve it, and at the worst a salutary caution would be inculcated, and a repetition of the trial avoided.

The true method of combating this is not by soliciting harsh penal laws against practitioners who have not studied at certain schools, or who have not been devoted to medicine by their parents. For as the sick, disregarding the existing differences between the several ranks of the medical profession, will solicit the advice of those persons in whose knowledge they place confidence, the attempt only leads both practitioners and patients to invent modes of evasion, and widens the breach between the different branches of the profession. It would be better to throw the portals of the college and the medical schools wider open, and by rendering instruction cheap, invite the poorest descendant of Apollo and Esculapius to join the aids of science to his long-cherished secrets, and seat himself among his more fortunate brethren. Unless this be done, the only method is to let things take their own course, and rest content with simply securing their proper distinctions to those who have gone through the trouble of obtaining them, and, on the other hand, bestowing these distinctions only on those who merit them, leaving the sick and their friends perfectly at liberty to search for relief wherever they think it most likely to be found; thus creating an honourable competition and rivalry, instead of that continual bickering which at present pervades the different branches of the medical profession, as they may be well assured that the mass of mankind are not so blind as to be incapable of judging in a matter that so nearly concerns them as their health, or so inattentive to their own interest, as not to prefer those practitioners whose success in practice shall attest their skill.'

We shall say nothing further in praise of this work, to what we stated at the commencement of our review; the rapidity with which the first edition was sold, is a proof that our opinion respecting its merits is that of the public; it is, however, but justice to observe, that the second edition has been considerably improved.

CRITIQUE ON

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S REMARKS
ON NOVELISTS AND DRAMATISTS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

THERE is a phenomenon, which has long been observed to take place in our literary system, and the observation has been so repeatedly confirmed by experience, that we are fully justified in accounting it an effect of the pre-established order of things, rather than an occurrence of a casual nature. It is this: the failure of the novelist in the drama. Though I had frequently observed this in the course of my reading, yet I never considered it in the light of a general law of our nature, till I saw it proposed as such by an eminent author, in an extract taken from his edition of the Novelist's Library, which appeared in No. 121 of the Literary Chronicle. To account for this phenomenon, i. e. to show, why from the condition and nature of the human mind, a novelist should most probably fail in drama, is an undertaking which may afford both instruction and amusement, as it introduces speculative philosophy into an agreeable subject. I would, therefore, beg the assistance of any correspondent whose taste may lie in such investigations, if he thinks he can either point out or correct any error in what I shall propose to his examination, or throw any new light on it by way of illustration or addition. I would gladly, by proposing such questions to the consideration of young essayists, induce them to give a little of their attention to such speculations, so that they might learn to combine reflection with imagination, to be more solicitous about their thoughts than is the custom of the present race of polite authors, who are such thorough Dellacrusians in the choice of their language, that they have engaged the whole nation in the same pursuit, and diverted our minds from the search of knowledge; for we have come to pay such a slavish obedience to the equipage of a glittering phraseology, though containing no real authority within, that we are rather servants of a verbal despotism, than freemen of an intellectual commonwealth; and while we follow the pageantry of the former, desert the advancements of the latter. But to return to our subject.

It will first be necessary, as the account given of this phenomenon by the above author might seem to render this investigation superfluous, to state my objections to his solution. The editor of the Novelist's Library is an author and a critic so justly celebrated, that it is with some diffidence I venture, even in the cause of truth, to dissent from his opinions; but in such a cause, we are recommended even to confront the devil to his beard, and, therefore, (not meaning any particular similitude) why not face a mortal? My first objection, then, is that he has treated this subject poetically, and not philosophically, as it demanded.

I am always sorry when I see a philosophical question treated poetically, and that for two reasons; first, because there is little doubt, but that if the author chose to exert what he has of reasoning faculty (and some, I contend; he must have to be a real poet) in the investigation of the true answer, without incurring and obscuring it with the technical imagery and phrase of his profession, he would find it out at the last; and, secondly, because by the same means he not only deceives himself, but his readers also; who, receiving his dicta as if they flowed from an inspired tongue, though all the time they may be little better than so many lying oracles, are convinced by a specious reasoning, though without any satisfactory perception of its conclusiveness; and when they quit the subject, (if, indeed, they have any notion at all of what they were engaged in,) it is either totally erroneous, or vague and indeterminate at best.

The solution given of the above question, by the editor of the Novelist's Library, is an instance of this. His reasoning is so enveloped in poetical language, and his arguments so disjointed, and scattered in such graceful negligence over the face of his pages, so mingled and metaphorical, that I defy him to be satisfied of their conclusiveness himself, much less to conceive them satisfactory to others. I am no enemy to the application of poetical language to abstract subjects under proper regulations.—say, I think the combination of poetical language and strict argument, such as is seen in the works of my Lord Verulam, necessary to the perfect consummation of philosophy; but not in the way it is here attempted, where the investigation of the question is made a mere stalking-horse for the display of the splendid trappings of written rhetoric. I am not so dry a school-man either, that I can relish nothing but rigorous argumentation; let the subject run the poet's gauntlet through all the flowers and confusion of images he chooses, but if it be a philosophical one, let him treat it also in philosophical language, that our reason may be satisfied, as well as our fancy titillated; he is an impotent trifler else.

However, let us extract his arguments as well as we can from the confusion in which they lie, and examine both them and the theory founded upon them. The editor had, most probably, a vague notion of the true solution of the question, and has accordingly made use of two or three expressions, which seem to touch upon it, but all the arguments I can collect, which he lays any stress upon, are three; which, stripped of the imposing vestures in which he has clothed them, and exhibited in their naked strength, are, in substance, as follows:—The powers of description and narration are essential to a novelist; therefore, unfit him for the drama. The chief talent of a novelist lies in addressing the imagination, therefore he is unfit for the drama. The dramatist is copartner with the actor in the production of his work, the novelist stands alone, therefore the latter is unfit for the drama. These include, as far as I can see, the whole of the editor's arguments upon the subject, and I assure my reader, however he may have felt when he perused the original from whence they are taken, what with my own stupidity and their obscurity, I found not a little difficulty in making out even these; it was like a blind man in a labyrinth, who has not only the intricacies of the place to contend with in finding the proper clues, but his own incapacity. However, now we have them, let us see what they are.

The most unfortunate predicament in which an argument can stand is,

1st, when it is false; 2nd, when, though true, it is nothing to the purpose for which it was intended; and, 3rd, when it not only proves nothing to the purpose, but proves the very opposite to that which it was brought to prove. This is certainly the most lamentable predicament which the perverse influence of the stars could possibly invent to hamper an argumentator; a man who has fallen into a dilemma, may be likened to one in a company of sealers, but a man bringing an argument to defeat himself, commits nothing short of a logical suicide.

Now, in such a predicament do I conceive the above three arguments to stand, precisely. I think a little consideration will show us that they are every one of them false, either in their premises or their conclusion; that they are inconclusive, and nothing to the question in hand; and, moreover, that they are contra-conclusive, if I may use that word to express a mode of reasoning, which proves the very opposite to that which was intended by it. If I can do this, I shall look upon myself as having performed a real service to the cause of polite literature, for it will show us the necessity of introducing a little more accuracy into our reasonings upon this species of writing, when we see a man of such genius and abilities as the editor fall into these egregious mistakes through neglect of it.

1st. They are false. It by no means follows, that because the powers of description and narration are essential to a novelist, they unfit him for the drama. This would be to say, that to be a dramatist, you must want these faculties; which, few who have read Shakespeare, will be ready to admit; Dover cliff and Othello's defence are instances of description and narration, not to speak of numberless others in that immortal author, which are set in the very gap of such an admission. Few who have read Ivanhoe, with all their reverence for the author, will allow descriptive and narrative powers to be incompatible with dramatical; look at the Tournament, Rebecca's account of the Siege, and the dramatical dialogues of the Outlaws, scarcely inferior to those of divine Shakespeare, and who will dare to say, the eloquent editor is not himself the overthrow of his own assertion? no one will attempt thus to unfit the triple crown, whereby he is stamped the present sovereign of our literary dominions, which yet must be done if we allow this critical argument of his to be conclusive. We must, positively, either unlure him or convict him of a false argument; many voices would be required to effect the former; for the latter, I am satisfied with his own. The truth is, there is nothing in the descriptive faculty, taken generally, repulsive of the dramatical; and, unless this can be shewn, it is no argument because the novelist possesses one more faculty than is absolutely requisite to fit him for a dramatist, that he is therefore unfit; and in like manner of the narrative power. But it will be said, the editor does not assert that the power of description is incompatible with the dramatical; it is the perpetual tendency towards description which is essential to a novelist, that he asserts to be injurious to the dramatist.

The answer to this objection is contained in the proof of the falsity of his second argument, which, if it means any thing different from the first, means this: a novelist's chief talent lies in addressing the imagination, or, in other words, a perpetual use of description and narration are essential to a novelist, and, therefore, unfit him for the execution of a work where little of either is admissible. Now, in order to see whether this argument be true or false, let us first understand the precise meaning of the words contained in it; and first of description. Does he mean scenic description or description of acts? If the former, I take it upon myself to prove, that his assertion of this kind of description being essential to a novel, is, in matter of fact, not true. Of the six great novelists, Fielding, Richardson, Smollet, Le Sage, Cervantes, and Scott, the four first are not at all remarkable for their skill in scenic description, or their tendency to address the imagination by it; if the latter, I do not see how the ability to imagine acts and describe them for a novel, can be brought to prove the inability to imagine acts and develop them for the stage. So that thus far his argument appears to me to be false, either in its premise or its conclusion, according as he means scenic description or description of acts.

We must now distinguish narration from description. Narration is the telling what, description, the telling how, things were seen or done. Narration, in both these provinces, is certainly essential to a novel, and is mostly out of place in a drama; whether the conclusion drawn from these premises by the editor, viz. that the habit of narrating renders a novelist unfit for the drama, be true or not, remains to be considered. Now, so far from the habit of narrating having this effect, in my opinion, it has just the opposite tendency. For, the narrator must have a complete idea of, and acquaintance with, his personages, and the things seen and done by them, before he can tell of them; hence one would be apt to conclude that this perfect knowledge must assist him greatly, if he chose to introduce them on the stage, performing what he can describe so well. In order that a habit of doing one thing should render the doing another difficult, these two things must be of the same kind; thus, as the editor says, the artist who has dedicated himself to the use of water-colours in painting, renders the attainment of excellence in oils more difficult than it would otherwise have been; but, as poetry and shoe-making, for instance, have little in common, there is no reason but that a poet might make a very tolerable shoe-maker if it had first come in his way. But if together, with being of the same kind, the qualities requisite to effect the one, are all to be found in those necessary for the other, the habit of doing the latter, can cause no difficulty in the former, unless the supernumerary qualities forbid it, which the editor has failed in showing to be the case in the writing of a novel and a drama. In fact, it requires some ingenuity to show how, from the vivacity of a novelist's imagination, whereby he is able so clearly to portray his characters, that they shall be conceived by his readers without the help of any material representative, he becomes unfitted to exhibit them when he has this assistance.

The editor's third argument is drawn from the copartnership of the dramatist and the actor. The dramatist has 'to fit his sentiments, actions, &c. to real persons, not to ideal, as the novelist'; this is his third foundation for concluding a novelist to be unfit for the drama. First let us examine this foundation; and then see how the conclusion bottoms itself upon it. And here the learned editor seems to me to mislead himself by the words 'real and ideal.' To make his assertion, that a dramatist has to fit his sentiments, &c. to real persons; true, a real person must receive a character which is possible to be, or to exist in some real capacity, and cannot at all mean what the editor supposes it to mean, viz. Kemble or Siddons. So that it is here evident he mistakes real for living. In a very few instances, and with a very few characters, a dramatist may have written expressly for a particular actor, but I cannot persuade myself to believe that any one ever consulted the muster-roll of the green-room, and adapted his sentiments, &c. to all the performers, from the king to the foot-boy. This being understood, it follows that the dramatist is limited to put together such ideas as might be conceived really to exist in rerum natura; whilst the novelist is not specifically so restrained; but who could ever conclude from this, that a novelist cannot write a drama? it is a new kind of logic which proves that, because one object may be more difficult to be obtained than another, the former is, therefore, unattainable by him who has attained the latter. I would ask the editor also, what does this argument of the difficulty of suiting sentiments to real persons, even supposing that real means some particular living persons, put in the way of a novelist, more than of any other literary profession? How does it exclude a novelist from the drama, more than a parliament orator or a poetical parson? Here I am again met with the old answer of habit: but the habit of drawing ideal characters can have nothing to do with increasing the difficulty of drawing real ones, unless the former be all chimerical, and merely fantastical; if they be not wholly out of nature, this practice, instead of increasing, must diminish the difficulty. Were it shewn that the drawing of real characters and ideal, required opposite and repulsive qualifications, there indeed would the argument be conclusive, but till that be done, it is puerile and nugatory, and no more proves a novelist no dramatist, than it does a crocodile no hypocrite.

2nd. These arguments, even supposing them true, are nothing to the purpose. For they all, o to prove that a novelist cannot write an acting drama. Now, this has nothing at all to do with the question under consideration. The true question is the phenomenon of a novelist's failure in the composition of a reading dramatical. Fielding's, Smollet's, Le Sage's plays are all bad in the closet, and this is the phenomenon to be accounted for. It is no more a phenomenon that Fielding wrote a bad acting play, than that Milton did; but it is a phenomenon that a novelist, who possesses so many qualifications for the drama, should, at the same time, be the author of an excellent novel, and an utterly bad play, without a single trace that would lead us to suppose the existence of such qualifications in a writer we yet know to possess them. Milton possessed as many qualifications for the drama as ever Fielding did, and yet his Comus or Sampson is no phenomenon, though not tolerable in the performance; and why? simply because they are inspired, though more faintly, by the same breath that blew such tremendous blasts through the vaults of hell; that filled such a clangorous tribe in the battle of the Angels, whose echoes were nursed to that terrible night in the grottoes of Sabrina, and whose thunder began its roll even at the gates of Gaza. Had Fielding written a good reading play, had it been ever so full of description and narration, so as they partook of the same excellence we see in his Jones or his Andrews, their inaptitude for the stage would never have caused any surprise, nor have given this occasion to the editor, of sending his philosophy a-begging to his poetry. And that this is the true question, further appears from the editor's own expressions when proposing it, where he speaks of 'the dullness which pervades Fielding's plays, &c.' plainly alluding to the reading, and not to the acting of them. Moreover, a good acting play depends on a certain choice of effective points and attitudes, beside an adaptation to the humour of the audience, in which it is no more a phenomenon that a novelist should fail, than a preacher-monkey in the conversion of a Jew; the choice of such circumstances being as much out of the line of the former, as salvation is out of the power of the latter, at least of such of them as have tails, and no caucuses to hide them. It is more than probable that Sophocles himself would not please an English audience; Racine or Voltaire certainly would not; hence, then, there is nothing strange in Fielding's or Smollet's failure; as certainly neither of them had more of what we call abstract dramatical genius, than the three above-mentioned.

3rd. I am to prove these three arguments contra-conclusive, that is, that the conclusion rightly following from their premises, is the very opposite to that which the editor proposed to draw from them. And here I cannot help noticing my surprise, that the learned editor did not see that he was, all the time the pseudo-philosophizing fit was on him; labouring to prove the converse of the question only, and not the question itself; by heaping up all those difficulties on the side of a novel, instead of proving that a novelist would probably fail in the drama, he proves only that a dramatist would fail in a novel. For, the whole scope of his argument lies in showing that there are certain faculties, descriptive and imaginative, which are essential to a novelist, and a certain freedom and boundlessness in the draughts of his pencil much beyond the laborious and artificial touching requisite for a true copy of original life, the drama being, according to him, a mere mimicry of the acts of real persons. From all these, the only conclusion which can be fairly drawn is, that a person may write a very good play, and yet fail in a novel. Yet they do not even this completely, but contingently; for this founding conclusion can be drawn only when the dramatist happens to want these faculties, which I have shewn, is by no means a matter of necessity, or when, by a habit of contracting his powers to the delineation of real persons, he has cramped or clipped the wings of his fancy.

But this is not all; these arguments not only prove the converse, but the reverse, the very opposite of what they were brought to uphold. For they prove that a novelist must possess all the qualities of a dramatist at least, whatever he may have of his own, over and above. The novelist, to describe and narrate, must have a full and perfect knowledge of his characters, and unless they are mere chimeras, must have frequent practice in drawing after life; all which are so many proofs, of what the editor would as soon see them prove, as an Athanasian would see his reason, proving that three was not one, viz. the very contrary to what he believes.

CALAMUS.

TYTLER'S ELEMENTS OF GENERAL HISTORY. MARSHAL BRUNE.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Wishing a young friend, who has but little patience or application, to be acquainted with the outlines of general history, I procured for her Mr. Tytler's Elements of General History, on the merits of which the public has stamped the seal of approbation; its popularity is merited in many respects, and I dare say the first edition runs free from many errors to be found in the seventh. I do not know in what year the first appeared, but certain it is, that the fate of Europe has undergone considerable changes since, without the publishers giving themselves any trouble to make the necessary alterations to exhibit the present state of either political or social Europe, save in a chronological table, full of inaccuracies. I will point out the most important, because it is connected with an event, or rather a series of events, which will probably influence the future destinies of France. It is stated, anno 1815, 'Marshal Brune shot himself, at Avignon.' It is presenting falsehood in its most cruel shape, to accuse a man of suicide in a work destined for posterity, who was basely assassinated by an infuriated mob of royalists, his body hacked in pieces, dragged through the streets amidst the triumphant yells of those demons, and then thrown into the Rhone; these facts, Sir, are known to all Europe, save the editor of the seventh edition of Tytler's Elements of General History.

The marshal's widow has sued in vain for justice on the known assassins of her husband, but their protectors are too near the throne for them to fear punishment. What was the crime of Marshal Brune? he had defeated the Duke of York at the Helder; he had always served his country with glory, but, alas, he was weak enough and wicked enough to admire the Emperor Napoleon! hence his fate*.

ANCIENT AND MODERN PHARISEES

'This is the excellent foppery of the world!'
LEAR.

Through all the various periods of history, no persons have made themselves so injurious yet so successful in society, as the Pharisees; as if hypocrisy were as essential to existence as the vital air, and ceremonial rites equal to the true devotion of the heart. There were, in ancient days, seven sorts of Pharisees, and, at this enlightened time, they might be increased, without deviating from truth, to seventy! But as this calculation would be more tedious than instructive, let a few instances be sufficient for the present purpose and opinion, formed from individual contrast. The first sort of the ancient Pharisees was Phariseus Sichemeta: he turned Pharisee for gain, and was, therefore, like the Sichemites, more eligible to derive ceremonial advantages from a compliance with the Jewish law. This Pharisee has descended legitimately through every generation, and 'increased and multiplied' a thousand fold. He is to be found as the main pillar of the church, chapel, and meeting-house; and his principle being formed to gain, he always finds his interest increase in proportion to the apparent substance of his principle. He sacrifices every other object to promote his interest, seeing 'that in godliness there is great gain.'

The second was called Phariseus Truacatus, as if he had no feet, because he would scarcely lift them from the ground when he walked, to cause the greater opinion of his meditation. How frequently this character is recognized under a clerical hat, a broad-brim, a silk bonnet, and even the nodding plume. He is often present at the grave of a rich relative, and, like Richard, the Duke of Gloster, with the Bible in his hands, on the eve of a destructive enterprise. When the eye of observation is turned towards him, his external deportment is strikingly expressive of what ought to be his real meditation.

The third is Phariseus Impingens, because he would shut his eyes when he walked abroad, to avoid the sight of women, inasmuch, that he dashed his head against the walls, that the blood gushed out!! I know of none who represent this modestly unnatural stoicism so well as the immaculate scholars of Brazen-nose College. And yet there is a great deal of dashing of brainless puppies and unmeaning loggerheads, against the populous walls, but, principally, to avoid their wives and mothers-in-law.

The fourth, Phariseus quid debro facere, et facium illud; for he was used to say, 'What ought I to do? and I will do it.' The man in the gospel seems to have been identified here, who came to Christ, saying, 'Good master! what shall I do?' and at last replied, 'All these have I done from my youth up.' It may be observed, that too many ask with their lips what they ought to do, when on the sickly couch or overwhelmed in woe; but the performance of their good deeds seldom or never comes. And how many christian professors walk in the courts of religion year after year, even till their dying day, yet never exercise the virtues of christianity, nor disseminate one iota of that benevolence and reward, of which they have partaken large a share.

The fifth, Phariseus Mortarius—he was so called, because he wore a hat something like a deep mortar, such as is used to pound spice in, inasmuch that he could not look up, nor on either side, only downward on the ground, and straight forward. What sublime rejection of the world, and its beauties and deformities! What an admirable character for a godfather! He was, surely, the highest of the pharisaical coterie. Let us imagine a dozen such as this mortar-headed christian, occupying their wonted space in Broad Street or the Mall, in a sunny afternoon; see what crowds of the contrasted rotaries of pleasure would surround them. This antique novelty would certainly give life to a new race in the haunt-ton. Qy. But are not the various of the dandyan exquisites, of the mortar order?

The sixth, Phariseus ex amore, such a one as obeyed the law for the love of virtue. Of this class our country can most unequivocally boast; and our kings, queens, princes, dukes, prelates, and advocates, have been prime ornaments of their literal descent; not to select particularly those for whom we are bound in our sanctuaries to pray.

The seventh, Phariseus ex timore—because he obeyed the law for fear of punishment. He that conformed for fear, had respect chiefly to the negative commandments; but he that conformed for love, especially respected the affirmative. Most of the Pharisees of this country conform to what is called law, and are so apprehensive of punishment, that they contribute annually to the supporting of military idlers, merely to shoulder arms and fix bayonets now and then, to keep their own turbulent spirits in order; for John Bull's enthusiasm is so strong in the support of liberty, that he is ever talking of her name, and comparatively never enjoying her society. THE SHAH NEMEH OF FERDOSI. To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SER.—In answer to one of the inquiries made by a correspondent in your last number, I beg to state for his information, that the Persian-Hind, the Shah Nemeh of Ferdosi, has been translated into English verse. It was published in the year 1790, by Cadell, under the title of "Poems by Ferdosi, translated from the Persian, by Joseph Champion, Esq." It is now many years since I read the work, but, so far as my recollection assists me, its merits were not such as to render a new translation, if executed with spirit, unacceptable to the public.

COOKE'S FOLLY.

On the summit of St. Vincent's rocks, in the neighbourhood of Clifton, looking on the Avon, as it rolls its lazy course towards the Bristol Channel, stands an edifice, known by the name of 'Cooke's Folly.' It consists of a single round tower, and appears at a distance rather as the remnant of some extensive building than a complete and perfect edifice, as it now exists. It was built more than two centuries ago, by a man named Maurice Cooke—not indeed as a strong hold from the arms of a mortal enemy, but as a refuge from the evils of destiny. He was the proprietor of extensive estates in the neighbourhood; and while his lady was pregnant with her first child, as she was one evening walking in their domain, she encountered a strange-looking gipsy, who, pestering her for alms, received but a small sum. The man turned over the coin in his hand, and implored a larger gift. 'That,' said the lady, 'will buy you food for the present.'

'Lady,' said the man, 'it is not food for this wretched body I require; the herbs of the field and the waters of the ditch are good enough for that. I asked your alms for higher purposes. Do not distrust me if my bearing be prouder than my garments; do not doubt the strength of my sunken eye, when I tell you that I can read the skies as they relate the fates of men. Not more familiar is his horn-book to the scholar than are the heavens to my knowledge.'

'What, thou art an astrologer!' 'Aye, lady! my fathers were so before me, even in the times when our people had a home amidst the pyramids of the mighty—in the times when you are told the mightier prophets of the Israelites put the soothsayers of Egypt to confusion; idle tales! but if true, all reckless now. Judah's scattered sons are now destitute as ourselves; but they bend and bow to the laws and ways of other lands—we remain in the stern steadfastness of our own.'—'If, then, I give thee more money, how will it be applied?'—'That is not a courteous question, but I'll answer it. The most cunning craftsman cannot work without his tools, and some of mine are broken, which I seek to repair—another crown will be enough.' The lady put the required sum in his hand, and, at the same time, intimated her desire of having a specimen of his art. 'Oh! to what purpose should that be? Why, why seek to know the course of futurity?—Destiny runs on in a sweeping and resistless tide. Inquire not what rocks await your bark: the knowledge cannot avail you, for caution is useless against stern necessity.'—'Truly, you are not likely to get rich by your trade, if you thus deter customers.'—'It is not for wealth I labour. I am alone on earth, and have none to love. I will not mix with the world, lest I should learn to hate. This present is nothing to me. It is in communion with the spirits who have lived in the times that are past, and with the stars, those historians of the times to come, that I feel ought of joy. Fools sometimes demand the exertions of my powers, and sometimes I gratify their childish curiosity.'—'Notwithstanding I lie under the imputation of folly, I beg that you will predict unto me the fate of the child which I shall bear.'—'Well, you have obliged me, and I will comply. Note the precise moment at which it enters the world, and soon after you shall see me again.' Within a week the birth of an heir awoke the clamorous joy of the vassals, and summoned the strange gipsy to ascertain the necessary points. These learnt, he returned home; and the next day presented Sir Maurice with a scroll, containing the following words:—

'Twenty times shall Avon's tide
In chains of glistering ice be tied—
Twenty times the woods of Leigh
Shall wave their branches merrily,
In spring burst forth in mantle gay,
And dance in summer's scorching ray:
Twenty times shall Autumn's frown
Wither all their green to brown—
And still the child of yesterday
Shall laugh the happy hours away.
That period past, another sun
Shall not his annual journey run,
Before a secret silent foe
Shall strike that boy a deadly blow.
Such and sure his fate shall be:
Seek not to change his destiny.'

The knight read it; and in that age, when astrology was considered a science as unerring as holy prophecies, it would have been little less than infidelity to have doubted the truth of the prediction. Sir Maurice, however, was wise enough to withhold the paper from his lady, and in answer to her inquiries, continually asserted that the gipsy was an impostor, and that the object of his assuming the character of an astrologer was merely to increase her alms. The child grew in health and beauty; and as we are most usually the more strongly attached to pleasures in proportion to the brevity of their continuance, so did the melancholy fate of his son more firmly fix him in the heart of Sir Maurice. Often did the wondering lady observe the countenance of her husband with surprise, as watching the endearing sportiveness of the boy, his countenance, at first brightened by the smile of paternal love, gradually darkened to the deepest grief, till, unable to suppress his tears, he would cover the child with caresses, and rush from the room. To all inquiries Sir Maurice was silent, or returned evasive answers. We shall pass over the infancy of young Walter, and resume the narrative at the period in which he entered into his twentieth year. His mother was now dead, and had left two other children, both girls, who, however, shared little of their father's love, which was almost exclusively fixed on Walter, and appeared to increase in strength as the fatal time grew near.

It is not to be supposed that he took no precautions against the predicted event. Sometimes hopes suggested that a mistake might have been made in the horoscope, or that the astrologer might have overlooked some sign which made the circumstance conditional; and in union with the latter idea he determined to erect a strong building, where, during the year in which his doom was to be consummated, Walter might remain in solitude. He accordingly gave directions for raising a single tower, peculiarly formed, to prevent ingress, except by permission of its inhabitants.—The purpose of this strange building, however, he kept secret; and his neighbours, after numerous vain conjectures, gave it the name of 'Cooke's Folly.' Walter himself was kept entirely ignorant on the subject, and all his inquiries were answered with tears. At length, the tower was completed, and furnished with all things necessary for comfort and convenience; and on the eve of Walter's completing his twentieth year, Sir Maurice showed him the gipsy's scroll, and intreated him to make use of the retreat prepared for him till the year expired. Walter at first treated the matter lightly, laughed at the prophecy, and declared he would not lose a year's liberty if all the astrologers in the world were to croak their ridiculous prophecies against him. Seeing, however, his father so earnestly bent on the matter, his resolution began to give way, and at length he consented to the arrangement. At six, the following morning, therefore, Walter entered the tower, which he fastened within as strongly as iron bars would admit, and which was secured outside in a manner equally firm. He took possession of his voluntary prison with melancholy feelings, rather occasioned by the loss of present pleasure than the fear of future pain. He sighed as he looked upon the wide domain before him, and thought how sad would it be to hear the joyous horn summoning his companions to the chase, and find himself prevented from attending it—to hear the winter wind howling round his tower, and rushing between the rocks beneath him, and miss the cheerful song and merry jest, which were wont to make even the blast a pleasant sound. Certainly his time passed as pleasantly as circumstances permitted. He drew up in a basket, at his meal-hours, every luxury which the season produced. His father and sisters daily conversed with him from below, for a considerable time; and the morris dancers often raised his laughter by their grotesque movements. Weeks and months thus passed, and Walter still was well and cheerful. His own and his sister's hopes grew more lively, but Sir Maurice's anxiety increased. The day drew near which was to restore his son to his arms in confident security, or to fulfil the prediction which left him without an heir to his name and honours. On the preceding afternoon Walter continually endeavoured to cheer his parent, by speaking of what he would do on the morrow—desired his sisters to send round to all their friends, that he might stretch his limbs once more in the merry dance—and continued to talk of the future with such confidence, that even Sir Maurice caught a spark of hope from the fiery spirits of the youth. As the night drew on, and his sisters were about to leave him, promising to wake him at six by a song, in answer to their usual inquiry if he wanted any thing more that night, 'nothing,' said he, 'and yet the night feels chilly, and I have little fuel left—send me one more fagot.' This was sent him, and, as he drew it up, 'this,' said he, 'is the last time I shall have to dip for my wants, like old women for their water: thank God! for it's well-time work to the arm.' Sir Maurice still lingered under the window in conversation with his son, who, at length, complained of being cold and drowsy. 'Mark!' said he, as he closed the window, 'mark, father, Mars, the star of my fate, looks smilingly to-night,—all will be well.' Sir Maurice looked up—a dark cloud-spot suddenly crossed the planet, and he shuddered at the omen.

The anxious father could not leave the spot. Sleep he knew it was in vain to court, and he therefore determined to remain where he was. The reflections that occupied his mind continually varied:—at one time he painted to himself the proud career of his high-spirited boy, known and admired among the mighty of his time; a moment after he saw the prediction verified, and the child of his love lying in the tomb. Who can conceive his feelings as hour dragged after hour, while he walked to and fro, watching the blaze of the fire in the tower as it brightened and sunk again—now pacing the court with hasty steps, and now praying fervently for the preservation of his son!—The hour came. The cathedral-bell struck heavy on the father's heart, which was not to be lightened by the cheerful voices of his daughters, who came running full of hope to the foot of the tower. They looked up, but Walter was not there;—they called his name—he answered not.—'Nay,' said the youngest, 'this is only a jest; he thinks to frighten us, but I know he is safe.' A servant had brought a ladder, which he ascended, and looked in at the window. Sir Maurice stood immovable and silent—he looked up, and the man answered the anxious expression of his eyes. 'He is asleep,' said he. 'He is dead!' murmured the father.

The servant broke a pane of the window, and opening the casement, entered the room. The father, changing his gloomy steadfastness for frenzied anxiety, rushed up the ladder. The servant had thrown aside the curtains and the clothes, and displayed to the eyes of Sir Maurice his son lying dead—a serpent twisted round his arm—and his throat covered with blood. The reptile had crept from the fagot last sent him, and fulfilled the prophecy.

SONNET.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

DEAR SIR,—The following 'Sonnet,' (if worthy to be so called,) was brought forth in an attempt to produce fourteen lines uniform in their terminations; and, although some of the rhymes will not bear close examination, you may, perhaps, deem the attempt sufficiently curious for insertion in the Literary Chronicle.

Your obliged servant, Y. F.
Queen Street, 13th Sept. 1821.

My art, I guess thy malady is love,
For oft I find that gaze is fix'd above,
On twinkling stars, and clouds that idly rove.
In cheerful beauty thro' heaven's blue above!
And oft I find thee in the lonely grove,
Pensive and sad as maimed turtle-dove,
Clothing in melody sweet thoughts, that prove
Some untold passion must thy bosom move!
Oft, too, thou dost the gentle noan reprove,
Praying she will the veil from him remove,
Who blindly round thy heart the snare hath wove;

Yet still thy gaudiest lies unclaim'd.—By Jove!
'Tis I, perchance, should seize the golden glove!
Am I awake? I am; thy speaking eyes approve.

THE RECONCILIATION.

By J. D. NEWMAN.

Emma, brush away that tear,
On thy cheek it shall not linger,
Trace of it must not appear,
Crush the trembler with thy finger;
Let us not occasion woe,
Let us not ally with sorrow,
But that pleasure only know
We can from each other borrow.
Come, my Emma, smooth thy brow,
We perchance are both in error:
On my life it must be so,
When discord holds its court of terror;
Come, my love, and fondly rest,
Where affection true is beating,
On that faithful tender breast
Which can thro' at every meeting.
Let us then no more dispute,
Let thy lip no more be pointing,
On that faithful tender breast
Of lowlier discord—greater doubting!
But for ever let us bow
To the wishes of each other;
On us then will pleasure flow,
O'er us then will gladness hover.

TO —

No kiss! no dear embrace,
Till war's alarm is o'er;
Yet grieve not, soon in holy place
We'll kneel: the priest before Fair Ariadne shall thy sister be,
So playful, kind, and true,—
Her love shall seem as mine to thee,
Her soft eyes beaming through;
Her voice so soothing—innocent—
Shall seem my inmost vow
To thee, from battle-hove sent,
As link on neck I know.
Her song shall haunt thy dreams,
As some heaven-breathing air,
Till scarce the ravish'd spirit seems
A portioner of care.
When, o'er the sea victorious,
Along the road I see,
With wreaths and garlands glorious,
The maidens all in glee,
To deck with fume's applauding
The victor's throbbing brow;
Full many a bosom gladdening
With joy unknown till now.
Ah! then, while sad and far away,
Where war's red terror low's,
To grace our happy meeting day,
Keep fresh the sweetest flowers!

No kiss, no dear embrace,
Till war's alarm is o'er;
Yet grieve not, soon in holy place
We'll kneel: the priest before. Mac.

THE DEATH OF AGUIRRE*.

DAMNED by the partners of his crimes,
The dark adherents of more prosperous times,
Aguirre the blood-stain'd stands!—besitting fate!
'Tis just that he should be thus desolate,
Whose only aim, while triumph could be found,
Was to spread desolating death around!
Ravage his end, and massacre his means,
The tyrant-planner of terrific scenes;
Even now, although the arm of power is fled,
And the stern heart has long lain with the dead,
Even now, as old tradition wildly tells,
Here the form wanders the freed spirit dwells,
Shrieks in the cave, or thunders in the wood,
Or hovers darkly o'er some ancient food
Which erst it tinctor'd with the victim's blood!

Girt by strong foes, and left by guilty friends
Who served him but to forward selfish ends,
Aguirre the murderer stands; and one alone
Of all his band—some faithful Marañone,
Shares in the savage terrors of that hour,
When lawless might must crouch to loftier
power:

Bold in his crimes, but in his friendship true,
He dares to die with the sore lord he knew.
Too faithful villain! deep immersed in guilt,
Whose hands are purged with the blood
they've spilt;

Led by an instinct I may not controul,
Must I admire thy loftiness of soul,
Must this one virtue make me half forgot
Dark deeds New Andalusia curses yet?

'Llamas,' said the chief, 'why art thou here,
Where there is naught to gain, and all to fear—'

Thy craven-comrades crouch them to the king—

Bend thy proud crest—the deed will pardon bring—

—And leave thee singly to endure the scathe
Of changeful fortune and thy foe-man's wrath!
No! I was true in life, and will in death
Not shrink to yield with thine my latest breath!

Aguirre feels not, or does not seem to feel
Llamas's love and self devoted zeal,
But from him turns and goes straight way to seek

His daughter, who, with terror pale and weak,
Awaits the coming of a phrenzied sire,
Who dooms his child to death, but not in ire.
'Say thy prayers, child, for I must see thee
die!'

She looks, and, scarcely conscious, mutters
'why?—'

'Because thou may'st not live to be revild,
And scorn'd hereafter as a traitor's child!'

Vain was the pleading of her eyes,
Vain her bent knee and her imploring sighs:

Paternal tenderness was wholly gone—
There stood Aguirre the murderer alone!

The feelings of the father were forgot,
He thought of pride and of her future lot—

To meet the ready weapons of his foe
With breast as willing; never martyr

Went with calmer eye or spirit more unban,
To brave an undeserved but glorious punishment!

All hope was gone, and all resistance vain,
Yet did the chieftain's pride its sway maintain:
He would not yield himself, save to the hands
Of one allowed to issue holy commands;
And when the conquerors glorying in their
prize,

Exclaimed, 'behold, Aguirre our captive lies!'
His soul spoke through his eyes of untamed pride,

While haughtily and briefly he replied,
'Aguirre bows not to slaves so vile as ye,
Though chance for once gives you the mastery!—'

Then came his death-blow!—and the felon-arm

Then rear'd to work the warrior's latest harm:—
A few hours back, and it had wrought his skill!
However stern, with eager strength and will,
But now it seems to lack the steady power
That used to guide it in the battle hour;
And the first shot scarce wounds the destin'd
one,

Who calmly whispers, 'that was badly done!'
The second fire, more deadly, aim'd more true, Reaches his heart, 'but this,' he cries, 'will do!'

And, sinking on the earth, no more remain'd
Of Andalusia's scourge, Aguirre the murderstain'd!

Fine Arts.

His Majesty, immediately after his coronation, commissioned Sir T. Lawrence, President of the Royal Academy, to paint a new portrait of him in his coronation robes, and seated in St. Edward's chair, with the crown of England upon his head, and the sceptre in his hand, as he appeared enthroned in the Abbey. The picture, which is of great magnitude to admit the various concomitants, is already far advanced, and probably will be the most successful from the pencil of the president. It promises far to excel in magnificence and splendour the famous picture of the pope, by the same artist, belonging to his Majesty. When finished, it is the intention of his Majesty to present duplicates of it to various corporation halls in the united kingdom.

It is well known that pictures of any considerable interest are not to be bought, except by mere chance, and at enormous prices. A hundred years ago, the little Correggio, at Dresden, a picture not twelve inches square, was sold for 13,000 gold ducats; and when a certain powerful monarch told the Duke of Tuscany that he would give him 8000 crowns for the Madonna della Seggiola, at Florence, the duke replied, that for another such picture, he would give his majesty 80,000. The small picture of Acteon, belonging to the late Mr. West, and ascribed to Titian, sold for 2000*l.*, while Mr. West refused 10,000*l.* for his own last picture but one.

It is reported that the Royal Academicians have liberally determined to form a collection of the finest works of the old masters, which are to be placed in the painting-room of the Royal Academy, for the improvement of the students.

The Royal Irish Institution has offered a premium of five hundred guineas for the best picture of the landing of his Majesty in Ireland.

The celebrated painting of Moses touching the Rock, by Murillo, which is placed in one of the hospitals in Seville, is likely to be transferred to this country: the enormous sum of four thousand guineas having been offered for it by a noble amateur, which, it is thought, will be accepted.

M. Stefano Barezzi, of Milan, has discovered a process for transposing paintings in fresco from one wall to another without injuring them. He covers the picture with a prepared canvass, which detaches the whole of the painting from the wall. The canvass is then applied to another wall, to which the picture attaches without the least trait being lost. M. Barezzi is now engaged in removing a large picture of Marco d'Oggione, in the Church della Pace, at Rome, and it is hoped that by this process he will be able to rescue from the ravages of time the beautiful remains of the Cæna of Leonardo da Vinci.—Paris paper.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The new farce of Monsieur Tonson, which is from the pen of Mr. Moncrief, having undergone some judicious curtailments, continues to be played every evening with applause. The monotony, however, which reigns at this theatre, cannot last long, unless the manager prefers empty benches, with a trifling expenditure, to active exertions and good houses. It was, we believe, intended that the Coronation should not have been exhibited after Monday last, but it still continues; Mr. Elliston probably thinking it as attractive as any thing he has at present to offer in its stead. We trust that the parsimonious system on which the management of this theatre is conducted, will not be continued much longer; if it is, there can be no difficulty in foretelling the consequences—a degraded theatre and an empty treasury.

COVENT GARDEN.—The opening of the winter theatres used formerly to be considered as an interesting epoch in the annals of fashion; and even now, when the recess is so comparatively short, and the 'great lessee' has had no recess at all, the commencement of the season at this theatre was not a little gratifying to the public. The short period that has elapsed since the season closed, has been well employed;—the interior of the house has been repainted, and the gilding new burnished, which gives it a chaste and harmonious effect. The play selected for the opening was the tragedy of Hamlet; and the great attraction of the evening was the appearance of Mr. Young, as the royal Dane, after an absence of three years. In the present state of the stage, the loss of a gentleman of Mr. Young's talents from the metropolis, could not but be felt with regret; he has now, however, returned to fill that station which has remained void ever since he quitted it. The character of Hamlet is one peculiarly suited to the powers of Mr. Young, and he is the only person on the stage who plays it with effect. It was in this character that he first made his great impression on the public, many years since, at the Haymarket; and it was also in Hamlet that he took leave of the London stage three seasons ago. His re-appearance on Monday night, must have been highly gratifying to him. His entrance called forth the warmest transports of joy; the acclamations, loud and long, continued from all parts of the house, and the pit simultaneously rose, waving hats and handkerchiefs in congratulations of his return. Mr. Young, we are happy to say, looks extremely well, and though it was scarcely to be expected that he should have improved, yet we do not think his powers have suffered any diminution during his absence. He displayed all that energy, acuteness, and discrimination, which so peculiarly mark his portrait of Hamlet; in the soliloquies he displayed his declamatory talents to great advantage; and in many parts, particularly the closet scene, he was powerfully effective. Mr. Young is a very equal performer; he does not startle his audience by sudden bursts, but wins their applause by his chasteness of style and judicious conception of his author. There was nothing new in the other parts of the play; it was well cast, and afforded a rich treat to a very crowded and elegant audience.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Young appeared in another of his favourite characters—Rolla, in Pizarro. This play has been one of the most successful of its kind ever produced on the stage; there were, however, many circumstances which tended to give it popularity when first produced, the most important of which were the political situations in which the country was placed, and which the dramatist turned to very good advantage in the sentiments which he conveyed through the play. With the exception of John Kemble, the Peruvian hero never had a better representative than in Mr. Young, and he sustained it on Wednesday with as much effect as we ever witnessed. In his scenes with Cora and Elvira, he was particularly happy, and in the last act, the wondrous indignation which he felt at the perfidy of the Spanish commander, his noble efforts to save the child, and the manner in which he restored it to Cora, elicited the loudest acclamations. Mrs. Faucit as Elvira, and Miss Foote as Cora, gave much interest to their characters; and the Alonzo of Abbott, the Las Casas of Yates, and the Blind-man of Blanchard, were all highly respectable.

In the farce of the Irish Widow, (not played for the last twenty years), which followed, a young lady made her first appearance, on any stage, in the character of the Widow Brady. This young lady is a neat petite figure, with an agreeable and animated countenance. Her voice is rather too feeble for so large a house; and we suspect she would be more at home in a less bustling character. She was, however, well received, and the farce, with the aid of Farren in Kecksey; Emery in Whittle; and Connor in Sir Patrick, went off with much applause.

Among the new engagements at this theatre, we find the name of Mr. Drinkwater Meadows, who is a comic performer of considerable promise, and of great provincial celebrity.

HAYMARKET.—The success of Mr. Kenney's new comedy of Match-breaking (for it is decidedly successful) appears to us quite a phenomenon in the history of the drama. We stated our objections to it in our last, which have not been removed, in witnessing the comedy a second and a third time. With an improbable story, trite sentiments, party feelings, and a total absence of wit, this comedy, by a sort of harmony in its incidents, keeps the in-ferest of the audience on the alert to the end, although the denouement may be foretold in the first act. The character of Solomon, so admirably sustained by Jones, has now devolved on Oxberry. Any performer succeeding to the character after so able a representative as it at first boasted, must appear to disadvantage; but, although Oxberry was rather an unpolished courtier, yet he played with great spirit, and was much applauded.

The comedy was, on Wednesday night, preceded by Tom Thumb, in which J. Russell played the character of King Arthur, admirably; indeed, we have seldom seen this actor to more advantage. We cannot say much in praise of Tayleure's Lord Grizzle; there was too much buffoonery in it.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.—This house closed for the season on Thursday night. Although no manager ever presented more novelties in the time, every one of which were successful, yet we fear the season has been far from being a profitable one. The fever in which the town was kept in the early part of the season by the coronation, was unfavourable to the drama; and the production of the pageant at the two great theatres, one of which has been open all the time, presented a novelty too attractive for the chaste performances of the English Opera to cope with. We must, however, confess, that the neglect of this theatre is neither creditable to English taste nor to English feeling. The encroachments of the larger houses were alluded to in the farewell address, which was well delivered by Mr. Bartley. It is as follows:—

'LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—Our short season is this evening brought to a close. The aggressions of the large establishments have this year reached their climax, since Drury Lane Theatre has continued open during the whole of the limited period allotted to our performances, and thereby deprived us even of the slender harvest which, on former occasions, we had been allowed to reap. How far the wisdom of government may deem it fit to allow of these gradual encroachments on the summer theatres, or may condescend to take an interest in those public amusements, is beyond our power at present to ascertain; though, under all the circumstances, we may be allowed to indulge a reasonable hope of speedy and effectual relief.

The proprietor, Ladies and Gentlemen, begs leave to offer, through me, his grateful acknowledgments for the share of patronage he has received. It has been far greater than, under the oppressive difficulties he has had to contend with, he could reasonably have hoped for; and it will not, he trusts, be deemed an idle boast, when he reminds you of the great and flattering success which has attended every novelty, without exception, that has been brought forward for your entertainment. Our exertions, Ladies and Gentlemen, will be redoubled to ensure a continuance of your favour when we are permitted to meet again; and, in the mean time, in the name of the proprietor, and of all the performers, and in my own, I respectfully thank and bid you farewell.'

Literature and Science.

The alabaster sarcophagus, found in the newly discovered tomb, at Thebes, was deposited in the British Museum on Wednesday last, by order of Mr. Salt, his Majesty's Consul-General in Egypt.

New Expeditions to Africa.—His Majesty, who takes every opportunity of promoting the interests of science and of art, expressed his desire, a short time since, that an expedition should be formed to explore certain parts of Africa, which border upon Egypt. The idea was suggested in consequence of the successful researches of M. Belzoni in the latter country; but the object of the present expedition is of a different character from the pursuits of that gentleman, inasmuch as it is the discovery, not of the ponderous monuments of Egyptian labour, but of the remains of Greek and Roman edifices, which it is conjectured are scattered in different parts of Libya,—a country which those celebrated nations visited, and in which they established colonies at several different periods, but which it is supposed no Europeans have since explored.

The gentleman who has been chosen by government, with the approbation of his Majesty, to superintend this expedition, is Mr. Beechey, many years secretary to Mr. Salt, the English consul to Egypt, and the constant companion to M. Belzoni, in his late indefatigable researches. The lords of the Admiralty have also afforded every assistance in their power to advance the object of this expedition, by fitting out a small vessel with a complement of men, and entrusting the command to Lieutenant Hoppner, who was engaged under Captain Parry in the last northern expedition, and from whose drawings were executed the engravings that embellish the account of that voyage.

Libya, the country about to be explored by our adventurous countrymen, is that which in ancient times contained the two countries of Cyrenaica and Marmarica. The former was called Pentapolis; from the five great cities which it contained; one of which was Berenice, or Hesperis, now Bernic, the spot where the celebrated gardens of the Hesperides are generally supposed to have existed. Not far distant was Barca or Baca, and Ptolemais, now Tolometa. To the east of the extreme northern point of the coast, called Thycus Promontorium, now Cape Rasat, was Apollonia, now Marza Susa, or Sosush, formerly the port of Cyrene, that city being situated on a little island; it was founded by Battus, who led thither a Lacedæmonian colony from Thera, one of the Cyclades; and the kingdom was afterwards bequeathed to the Romans by the last of the Ptolemies, surnamed Apton, and was formed by that nation into a province with Crete. The expedition will explore the vestiges of it, which are supposed still to remain under the name of Curia; to the east of this stood the fifth city of ancient Cyrenaica, called Darnie, now Derna.

South of Marmarica, (before mentioned,) which our countrymen will visit, and in the midst of the sands of Libyan desert, was a small and beautiful spot, refreshed by streams and luxuriant with verdure, in which stood the temple, so celebrated in antiquity, of Jupiter Ammon, said to have been founded by Bacchus, in gratitude to his father Jupiter, who appeared to him, when perishing with thirst, in the form of a ram, and showed him a fountain. Here was the Fons Solis, whose waters were cold at noon and hot at night. Here also the celebrated ancient Oracle, so difficult of access through the Libyan Deserts, and which was consulted by Alexander the Great after a memorable and dangerous journey, the token of which, transmitted to posterity, is the ram's horn upon the head of that conqueror, on numerous medals.

The expedition will, in all probability, be engaged three or four years.

Another expedition is about to proceed to the interior of Africa, on that hitherto fatal enterprize, the discovery of the course and termination of the River Niger. It consists of Dr. Woodney, Lieut. Clapperton, of the royal navy, and Lieut. Denham, of the army. They will proceed from Tripoli to Mourzook, and thence endeavour to reach Tombuctoo or Bornou.

Discoveries in Egypt.—A young

Englishman of the name of Waddington, who has lately arrived in Rome, has penetrated upwards of six hundred leagues above the level of the second cataract, in following the army of the Pacha of Egypt. In the whole of the way he fell in with only a few small Egyptian monuments, in isolated situations, and of no very remote date; but on his arrival at Schayni, where the Pacha encamped, he discovered thirty-five pyramids, of from fifty to one hundred and twenty feet in height, but in a very ruinous state. He also saw seven or eight temples, of which one, (upwards of three hundred feet in length,) was covered with hieroglyphics. It is probably in the neighbourhood of these ruins that search should be made for Nabatha, and not the Meroe of the ancients. This traveller has copied some very curious Greek inscriptions. He assures us that he has seen nothing in his travels comparable to the monuments of Nubia, and that he considers that province as the cradle of the arts in Egypt.

Chant—of divers kinds. 1. Chant Ambrosio, established by St. Ambrose; 2. Chant Gregorian, introduced by Pope IX. the Great, who established schools of chanters, and corrected the church music. This, at first, was called the Roman song; afterwards the plain song; as the choir and people sing in unison.

Immediately after the execution of Louis XVI. a Venetian democrat, on hearing that Monsieur had assumed the title of Louis XVIII. waited on his majesty, and commenced his address of congratulation in the following couplet:—

*'Thou unhappy King of no land,
More wretched than the King of Poland.'*

The admirers of fine writing, and particularly of that new species of beauty called Alliteration, now so much used by orators, will be pleased with the following character of a young lady, from an old Newcastle Journal:

—Died in the flower of her age, Miss Mary Harrison, daughter of the late Mr. Thomas Harrison, of Wheldon Bridge House.—[If boundless experience be the basis of beatitude, and harmless humility the harbinger of a hallowed heart; these Christian coconuts composed her characteristic, and conciliated the esteem of her contemporary acquaintances, who mean to model their manners by the mould of their meritorious monitor.—There are but two instances, at least, in our present recollection, which approach near to the above: the one is, 'Henry Hallam, latter, hostler, and haberdasher, at Holborn Bridge, Hatton Garden'; the other, 'Benjamin Bell, brown bread and biscuit baker, near Battersea Bridge.'

Dr. Donne was allowed to be one of the most witty and eloquent divines of his day. Whether, as Chaucer says, of selfish priests—

*'He sette his benefice to hire,
And lette his shepe acombred in the mire,
And ran unto London, unto Seint Poules,
To taken him a chanterie for soules.'*

or not, I do not pretend to say. But the following anecdote is not a little singular:—The deanery of St. Paul's becoming vacant, King James sent for the doctor, and ordered him to attend him the next day at dinner. When his majesty was sat down, before he had ate any meat, he said, 'Doctor Donne, I have invited you to dinner; and though you sit not down with me, yet I will carve to you of a dish that I know you love well; for, knowing you live London, I do therefore make you Dean of St. Paul's; and, when I have dined, do you take your beloved dish home to your study; say grace there to yourself, and much good may it do you.'

*If so weak to suppose
I'll be 'twit'ch'd by the nose,
By your 'blackguards,' you're silly enough;
I'll not 'sniff' a grain,
To tempt me to vain,
Friend 'snuffy,' I am yours,
Up to Snuff!*

Maxims of George I.—Never to forsake a friend; to endeavour to do justice to every person; and not to fear any one.

A whimsical couplet from the writer of it to a Welsh squire, who had promised a hare:—

*'Tell me, thou son of great Cadwallader!
Hast sent the hare? or hast thou swallowed her.'*

As a whimsical couplet, this can be equalled only by the following, from the 'poem of a young tradesman':—

*'No more will I endure love's pleasing pain,
Or round my heart's leg tie his gallant chain.'*

Lord North, during a severe illness, said to his physician, 'Doctor, I am obliged to you for introducing me to some old acquaintance that I have not met with for many years!'—'Who are these, my lord?' said the doctor, 'My ribs,' replied his lordship, 'which I have not felt for many years until now.'

A Frenchman very gravely observed, that if Adam had had the good sense to have purchased the office of king's secretary, we should all have been nobles.

Taxing Costs.

Clients, in days of yore, as sage men say,
Were proud an honest lawyer's bill to pay;
(But now, alas, as knaves and rogues grow faster,

Each lawyer's bill must see the taxing master)
In those blest times, a farmer came to town
To pay his bill of costs in specie down;
But first he wished to have some explanation,
And thus, in country style, made this objection:—

*'I'm woom, you zek, to pay your small account, Coota want you zut a receipt for the amount;
But, zur, I zee that you have charged me her
For an attendance in the Borough, where
No lands or bus'ness o' mine e'er laid,
Or cash o' mine was e'er received or paid;
I, therefore, hope ye will not take't amiss,
If I, friend Latip, inquire as to this—
'How this small charge arose I'll quickly tell'
Replied the honest man: 'You know full well
At Christmas time you never fail to send
A turkey or a goose, my worthy friend;
This six and eight-pence, therefore, is her charge,*

(Tis customary, and should be enlarged.)
For trouble in attending to receive
What you, my friend, so liberally give.
Long time with anxious eye the coach I watch'd—
The turkey goes—a finer ne'er was tasted.' J.P.

In the times of Queen Elizabeth, when persons demanded passports with the design of travelling on the Continent, they were usually questioned respecting their object by Lord Burleigh or his secretaries. If business or health called them away; passports were for those reasons given them; but if it was a mere curiosity to see the world, as it is called, that moved them, a desire of becoming acquainted with the manners, customs, arts, and antiquities of our neighbours, they were strictly questioned respecting their knowledge of those things in their own country, and if found ignorant, they were told to travel first at home, there being as much to be known in England as elsewhere, and it being disgraceful to the nation that persons unacquainted with their native country should expose themselves in foreign nations.

Review of New Books.

The Village Minstrel, and other Poems.

By John Clare, and the Northamptonshire Peasant. 2 Vols. 12mo. pp. 427. London, 1821.

EVERY circumstance that transpires relating to the character and conduct of the Northamptonshire Peasant, tends to justify the assertion of a critic in the Quarterly Review, that he furnishes one of the most striking instances 'of patient and persevering talent, existing and enduring in the most forlorn and seemingly hopeless condition, that literature has at any time exhibited.' The two volumes before us, though produced under circumstances of less difficulty than his first production, have still been written at intervals snatched from the labours of husbandry, to which he is still doomed, to maintain his afflicted parents and his wife and child.—It may be asked, has the knowledge of his genius and his miseries obtained nothing for him? Yes; a few noble individuals have come to his aid, —the Marquis of Exeter allows him an annuity of fifteen guineas per annum, and Earl Spencer one of ten pounds, Earl Fitzwilliam has presented him with 100l.; and his publishers have added another 100l. to it. These sums, with some smaller contributions, altogether yield him forty-five pounds a-year; a sum which, though insufficient for the support of his family, must afford him considerable relief, and for which he seems truly grateful.

When, about eighteen months ago, we noticed Clare's first work, we gave some account of his life; his struggles to obtain a smattering of education by the few halfpence which he earned by extra-labour as a plough-boy; when two months' labour were required to pay for one month's schooling; and three years of toil did nothing more for him than to enable him to read the Bible. We stated the rapture with which he hailed the purchase of Thomson's Seasons, the very thoughts of which produced the first effort of his muse. In the introduction to the volumes before us, there are some further interesting particulars respecting this untutored child of the muses. It was in the summer of 1817 that Clare first thought of offering a small volume of poems to the public by subscription. He consulted a printer, who told him that the expense of three hundred copies of a prospectus would cost one pound, and he set himself resolutely to work to obtain that sum. But the story is best told in his own simple words:—

“At the latter end of the year I left Casterton and went to Pickworth, a hamlet, which seems by its large stretch of old foundations and ruins to have been a town of some magnitude in past times, though it is now nothing more than a half solitude of huts, and odd farm-houses, scattered about, some forlorns asunder: the marks of the ruins may be traced two miles further, from beginning to end. Here, by hard working, day and night, I at last got my one pound saved, for the printing of the proposals, which I never lost sight of; and having written many more poems, 'excited by a change of scenery, and being over head and ears in love,—above all, having the most urgent propensity to scribbling, and considering my latter materials much better than my former, which no doubt was the case,—I considered myself more qualified for the undertaking: so I wrote a letter from this place immediately to Henson, of Market Deeping, wishing him to begin the proposals and address the public himself, urging that he could do it far better than I could, but his answer was that I must do it. After this, I made some attempts, but not having a fit place for doing any thing of that kind, from lodging at a public-house, and being pestered with many inconveniences, I could not suit myself by doing it immediately, so from time to time it was put off. At last I determined, good or bad, to produce something, and as we had another limekiln at Ryhall, about three miles from Pickworth, [Clare was at this time employed in lime-burning,] I often went there to work myself, where I had leisure to study over such things on my journeys of going and returning. On these walks, morning and night, have dropped down, five or six times, to plan an Address, &c. In one of these musings, my prose thoughts lost themselves in rhyme. Taking a view, as I sat beneath the shelter of a woodland hedge, of my parents' distresses at home, of my labouring so hard and so vainly to get out of debt, and of my still added perplexities of ill-timed love,—striving to remedy all, and all to no purpose,—I burst out into an exclamation of distress, “What is life!” and instantly recollecting that such a subject would be a good one for a poem, I hastily scratched down the two first verses of it, as it stands, as the beginning of the plan which I intended to adopt, and continued my journey to work. But when I got to the kiln I could not work for thinking about what I had so long been trying at; so I sat me down on a lime-skuttle, and out with my pencil for an address of some sort, which, good or bad, I determined to send off that day; and for that purpose, when it was finished, I started to Stamford with it, about three miles off: still, along the road, I was in a hundred minds whether I should throw up all thoughts about the matter, or stay till a fitter opportunity, to have the advice of some friend or other; but, on turning it over in my mind again, a second thought informed me that I had no friend; I was turned adrift on the broad ocean of life, and must either sink or swim: so I weighed matters on both sides, and fancied, let what bad would come, it could but balance with the former: if my hopes of the poems failed, I should not be a pin worse than usual; I could but work then as I did already: nay, I considered that I should reap benefit from the disappointment; the downfall of my hopes would free my mind, and let me know that I had nothing to trust to but work. So with this favourable idea I pursued my intention, dropping down on a stone-heap before I entered the town, to give it a second reading, and correct what I thought amiss.”

In the prospectus, a copy of which is inserted in the introduction, Clare proposed publishing his poems at three shillings and sixpence, if three hundred subscribers could be obtained; he wrote a modest address to the public, and inserted his sonnet to the Settling Sun, printed in the former collection. All his Prospectuses were distributed, but, alas! he could only obtain the names of seven subscribers. One of these subscribers, however, was the means of recommending Clare to better patrons, and had the honour of first introducing his talents to the knowledge of the world.

When we saw two new volumes of poems, by Clare, announced, within so short a period since his first collection was published, we acknowledge we were afraid that his friends were drawing too freely on his genius, and forcing him before the public somewhat too hastily; we must, however, confess, that this is not the case, and numerous as are the pieces in these volumes, there are scarcely any that we would have wished to be withheld. The whole of these poems, with the exception of about a dozen pieces (some of which are his earliest productions), have been written since his former volume went to press. The principal poem, the 'Village Minstrel,' was begun in the autumn of 1819, and finished soon after the former volume made its appearance. Clare is himself the hero of his poem, and paints, with glowing vigour, the misery in which he then was, and his anxiety for his future fate. It is a fine picture of rural life, and the author luxuriates in his love of natural objects and his description of rustic sports and village scenes, notwithstanding the melancholy reflections and forebodings with which they are accompanied. A few stanzas will justify our remark. The author is describing his own feelings and character:—

'And dear to him the rural sports of May,
When each cot-threshold mounts its halting bough,
And ruddy milk-maids weave their garlands
gay,
Upon the green to crown the earliest cow;
When mirth and pleasure wade a joyful
brow,
And join the tumult with unbounded glee
The humble tenants of the pail and plough:
He lov'd "old sports," by them reviv'd, to see,
But never car'd to join in their rude revelry.
O'er brook-banks stretching, on the pasture-ward
He gaz'd, far distant from the jocund crew;
'Twas but their feats that claim'd a slight regard;
'Twas his, his pastimes lonely to pursue—
Wild blossoms creeping in the grass to view,
Scarce peeping up the tiny bent as high,
Beting'd with glossy yellow, red, or blue,
Unnam'd, unnoticed but by Lubin's eye,
That like low genius strung to bloom their day
and die.
'O, who can tell the sweets of May-day's morn;
To waken rapture in a felling mind,
When the gilt east unveils her dappled
down,
And the gay woodlark has its nest resign'd
As slow the sun creeps up the hill behind;
Morn redd'n'g round, and daylight's spotless hue,
As seemingly with rose and lily lin'd;

While all the prospect round beams fair to view,
Like a sweet opening flower with its unansullied
dew.
'Ah, often brushing through the dripping
grass,
Has he been seen to catch this early charm,
Lest'ning the "love song" of the healthy lass Passing with milk-pail on her well-tur'd
arm;
Or meeting objects from the rousing farm;
The jingling plough-teams driving down the steep,
Waggon and cart—and shepherd-dogs'
alarm.
Raising the bleatings of unfolding sheep,
As o'er the mountain top the red sun 'gins to peep.
'Nor could the day's decline escape his gaze;
He lov'd the closing as the rising day,
And oft would stand to catch the setting rays,
Whose last beams stole not unperceiv'd away;
When, hesitating like a stag at bay,
The bright unwearied sun seem'd loth to drop,
Till clads' night-hounds hurried him away,
And drove him headlong from the mountaintop,
And shut the lovely scene, and bade all nature stop.
* * * * *
'It might be curious here to hint the lad,
How in his earliest days he did appear;
Mean was the dress in which the boy was clad,
His friends so poor, and clothes excessive
dear,
They oft were foil'd to rig him once a year;
And housewife's care in many a patch was seen;
Much industry 'gainst want did persevere:
His friends tried all to keep him neat and clean,
Though care has often fail'd, and shatter'd be has been.
'Yet oft fair prospects cheer'd his parent's dreams,
Who had on Lubin founded many a joy;
But pinching want soon baffled all their schemes,
And dragg'd him from the school a hopeless
boy,
To shrink unbecked under hard employ;
When struggling efforts warm'd him up the white,
'To keep the little toil could not destroy;
And oft with books spare hours he would beguile,
And blunder off with joy round Crusoe's lonely tale.
The description of harvest home—its sports—the amusements of the village feast, are full of truth and nature, and intermingled with passages of great beauty and the most delicate sentiment; of which the following is a pleasing instance:—
'O rural love! as spotless as the dove's;
No wealth gives fuel to a borrow'd flame,
To tempt the shepherd where to chase his love,
And go a forger of that sacred name;
Both hearts in unison here beat the same;
Here nature makes the choice which love inspires:

Far from the wedded lord and laughing dame
This boon of heavenly happiness rears,
Not fella-like law-bound, but wedded in desires.'

There is much force in the author's lament for those restraints, which the hands of power are putting on the pleasures of the humble peasant; he contrasts, with much feeling and regret, the state of the village green ere—'— civil wars 'gainst nature's peace combin'd,
And desolation struck her deadly blow,'
With its appearance,—
'When ploughs destroy'd the green, when groves of willows fell.'
But he shall speak for himself:—
'There once were springs, when daisies il-ver studs
Like sheets of snow on every pasture sward;
There once were summers, when the eve-flower buds
Like golden sunbeams brightest lustre shed;
And trees grew once that shelter'd Lubin's
head;
There once were brooks sweet whispering
down the vale:
The brooks no more—kingcrop and day
fled;
Their fast fallen tree the naked moonbeams,
And scarce a bush is left to tell the mouldering
'Yon shaggy tufts, and many a rusty nail
Existing still in spite of spade and plough,
As seeming fond and loth to leave the spot,
Tell where was once the green—browsed
lows now,
Where Lubin often turns a saddler'd horse,
Marks the stopt brook, and mourns oppres-
sion's power;
And thinks how once he waded in such sloughs,
To crop the yellow "horse-blob" only
flower,
Or catch the "miller's-thumb" in meadow's sultry hour.
'There once were days, the woodman knows
it well,
When shades e'en echoed with the singing thrush;
There once were hours, the ploughman's tale
can tell,
When morning's beauty wore its earliest blush,
How woodlarks carol'd from each thorny
bush;
Lubin himself has mark'd them seat and sing:
The thorns are gone, the woodlark's song is hush,
Spring more remembers winter now than spring,
The shades are banish'd all—the birds have took to wing.
There once were lanes in nature's freedom
dropt,
There once were paths that every daily
wound,—
Inclosure came, and every path was stopp'd;
Each tyrant fix'd his sign where paths were found,
To hint a trespass now who cou'd find
the ground:
Justice is made to speak its own continuance
The high road now must be each wheel bound;—

Incluse, thou'rt a curse upon the land,
And tattlest was the wretch who thy existence
plann'd.

O England! boasted land of liberty,
With strangers still thou may'st thy title
own,

But thy poor slaves the alteration see,
With many a loss to them the truth is known:
Like emigrating bird thy freedom's flown;
While mongrel clowns, low as their rooting
plough,

Dreadn't thy laws to put in force their own;
And every village owns its tyrants now,
And parish slaves must live as parish kings allow.

This is the last extract which we shall make from the 'Village Minstrel', a poem which of itself would justify all the praise that has been bestowed on John Clare, who, in vivid descriptions of rural scenery, in originality of observation and strength of feeling, richness of style and delicacy of sentiment, may rank with the best of poets of the day, though a humble and untutored peasant.

Among the minor poems in these volumes, we have been much pleased with 'Autumn,' 'Cowan Green,' 'Song of Praise,' and some of the pastorals, a style in which Clare would have been successful, had he not abandoned it early in his poetic career. The songs and sonnets are many of them very pretty, and some of them possess considerable merit. We shall enrich our present article with a few of these pieces. The first is a sweet ballad:—

I love thee, sweet Mary, but love thee in fear;
Were I but the morning breeze, healthily
and airy,
As thou goest a walking I'd breathe in thine
ear,
And whisper and sigh how I love thee, my Mary!

I wish but to touch thee, but wish it in vain;
Wert thou but a streamlet, a winding so clearly,
And I little globules of soft dropping rain,
How fond would I press thy white bosom,
my Mary!

I would steal a kiss, but I dare not presume;
Wert thou but a rose in thy garden, sweet fairly,
And I a bold bee for to rifle its bloom,
A whole summer's day would I kiss thee,
my Mary!

I long to be with thee, but cannot tell how;
Wert thou but the elder that grows by thy dairy,

And I the blest woodbine, to twine on the hoop,
To embrace thee and cling to thee ever, my Mary!

THESE are the songs.

There was a time when love's young flowers
With many a joy upon his bosom grew;
Sweet hours of bliss—his shirt was roses;
Those hours are fled—and I'm a distress.
I would not wish, in reason's spite;
I would not wish with new joy to grieve;
I only wish for one delight,—
To see those hours of bliss again.

There was a day when love was young,
And nought but bliss did there belong;
When blackbirds nestling o'er us sung,
Ah me! what sweetest wail'd his song,
I wish not springs for ever fled;
I wish not birds' forgotten strain;
I only wish for feelings dead
To warm and wake, and feel again.

But ah! what once was joy is pain;
The time's gone by; the day and hour
Are whirling sped on trouble's blast.—
As winter nips the summer flower.
A shadow is but left the mind,
Of joys that once were real to view;
An echo only fills the wind
With mocking sounds, that once were true.

Though there is no species of poetry more common than the sonnet, yet there are few who succeed in it. Clare has indulged in it largely, and given us no less than sixty specimens of his talents in this species of composition, in which we think him very successful.
We quote three of them:—

A WISH.
'Be where I may, when death brings in his bill,

Demanding payment for life's long-ling'ring debt,
Or in my native village peasting still,
Or tracing scenes I've never known as yet,
O let one wish, go where I will, be mine,—
To turn me back and wander home to die,
'Mong nearest friends my latest breath resign,
And in a church-yard with my kindred lie,
'Neath the thick-shaded sycamore's decay,
Its broad leaves trembling to the breeze of day;
To see its shadow o'er my ashes wave,
How soothing will it be, while hovering near,
My unscen spirit haunts its dusky grave,
Pausing on scenes in life once lov'd so dear!

TO TIME.
'In Fancy's eye, what an extended span,
Time, hoary herald, has been stretch'd by thee:
Vain to conceive where thy dark burst began,
Thou birthless, boundless, vast immensity!
Vain all conceptions of weak-minded man
Thee to unravel from thy mystery!
In mortal wisdom, thou't already ran
A circl'd travel of eternity;
Still, but a moment of thy mighty plan Seems yet unwound, from what thy age shall
see,
Consuming tyrant of all mortal kind!

And what thou art, and what thou art to be,
Is known to none, but that Immortal Mind
Who reigns alone superior to thee.'

TO AUTUMN.
'Come, pensive Autumn, with thy clouds and storms,
And falling leaves, and pastures lost to flowers;
A hush'd charm hangs on thy faded forms,
More sweet than summer in her loveliest hours,
Who, in her blooming uniform of green,
Delights with samely and continued joy;
But give me, Autumn, where thy hand hath been,

For there is wildness that can never cloy,—
The russet hue of fields left bare, and all
The tints of leaves and blossoms are they fall.
In thy dull days of clouds a pleasure comes,
Wild music softness in thy hollow winds;
And in thy fading woods a beauty blooms,
That's more than dear to melancholy minds.'

With all our predilections for the first fruits of natural genius, we must admit that Clare has improved by cultivation; and though some of his earlier productions are striking from their neatness and simplicity, yet his more matured efforts, though not deficient in this respect, have a refinement of language and a correctness of style, which give them an increased value.
Should these new volumes extend the public patronage sufficiently to relieve him from that oppressive anxiety which still bears him down, we may fairly expect the poet to take a loftier and more extensive range of subject, and to add new claims to those he already possesses as a man of genius; though stronger claims to public sympathy and public support no one can present, than the poor Northamptonshire peasant; and with all the warmth of admiration for his talents, and sympathy for his miseries, we recommend him and his works to the public.

An Account of the Interior of Ceylon and of its Inhabitants. By John Davy, M. D., F. R. S.

ALTHOUGH the succession to the throne of Kandy was hereditary, yet it had much of the form of an elective monarchy; and the consent of the people was required before a successor could be declared. When it was publicly announced that the king was dead, which was not until his successor had been chosen,—

A tent was pitched before the hall of audience, in which, on a piece of iron, and a basin of mixed metal, a man stood by the side of a heap of paddy, and beat the mourning tom-tom—the public signal of the event, warning the chiefs to dress themselves in black, and authorizing the people to give vent to their grief, and cry, and lament aloud.

'Till the body of the deceased monarch was consumed, it was contrary to custom for the prince to take any refreshment. The corpse, inclosed in a coffin, was carried in a palanquin to the Awadana-madoowe, or royal burying-ground, attended by the chiefs, their wives, and daughters. As the funeral procession moved on, two women, standing on a platform, carried by four men, thrice over the coffin. The priests of the different temples of bloodho were assembled at the burying-ground, and having offered up the proper prayer for the happiness of the deceased monarch in his metempsychosis, were presented with cloths that were laid on the coffin, to be given them for discharging their pious office. The coffin was now placed in a kind of wooden cage, and was surrounded with wood; a person broke its lid with an axe, and a relation of the deceased set fire to the pile, which was fed with oil and pitch, and sandal wood, and various perfumes. When the whole was enveloped in flame, the chiefs retired, went to the great square, and informing the prince that the body was burnt, were ordered by him to go to their houses and purify themselves.

'The morning tom-tom was sounded, and the funeral fire was kept alive till the eleventh day, when the chiefs proceeded to the burying ground with offerings of betel, areka nut, and such articles of diet as might be pre-ented to the king with propriety. The fire was now extinguished, by pouring on it milk and cocoa-nut water; some of the calcined bones were put into a pot or urn of earthenware, and covered and sealed, whilst the rest of the bones and ashes were collected and deposited in a grave with the presents brought for the deceased king.

'The urn was placed on the head of a man masked, and covered all over with black, who, holding a sword in his hand, and mounted on an elephant or horse, and attended by the chiefs, proceeded to the Mahawellé ganga. At the ferry called Katagastotta, two small canoes, male of the Kakoonza, were prepared, lashed together, and covered with boughs, in the form of a bower. The masked bearer entering the canoe, was drawn towards the mid-channel of the river, by two men swimming: who, when they approached the deepest part of the stream, pushed the canoe forward and hastily retreated. Now the mask having reached the proper station, with the sword in one hand and the urn in the other, divided the urn with the sword, and in the act plunged into the stream, and diving, came up as far as possible below, and landing on the opposite side, disappeared. The canoes were allowed to float down the river; the horse or elephant was carried across, and left to graze at large, never to be used any more; and the women who threw the rice over the coffin, with the men who carried them, were also transported to the other side of the river, under the strict prohibition of re-crossing. The chiefs returned to the great square, informed the prince that the ceremony was ended, and were again ordered to purify themselves.'

'Another ceremony remained to be performed before the prince could be considered completely king—that was choosing a name and putting on the royal sword, for which a fortunate day and a fortunate name were fixed by the royal astrologers. Coronation is not one of the ceremonies of the Kandyan monarchy, though a very rich crown belonged to the kings of Kandy. The marriage ceremony of the king was long, complicated, and expensive, and, as will appear by the following part of it, somewhat disgusting. The day after the marriage rites were completed.—

'The king and queen amused themselves with throwing perfumed balls, and with squirting scented water at each other,—a diversion to which the wives of the chiefs were admitted, and of which they were allowed to partake, being quite at liberty to pelt and bespatter even royalty itself as much as they pleased. When the king was tired of the exercise, he retired to an apartment overlooking an adjoining room, in which vessels of scented water, and small copper cups were prepared for use, and in which the chiefs were assembled, only waiting for the appearance of the king, to deluge each other with sweets.'

A banquet followed in the evening, in which there were two or three hundred different kind of curries, the drink being milk, or a beverage resembling lemonade. Dancing and singing extended the feast until day-break. We pass over the account of their national festivals, which are somewhat tedious, and quote the ceremony of receiving ambassadors by the old court of Kandy:—

'The king held his court in the hall of audience, and transacted all business with his officers seated on the throne. Behind the throne there was a secret door, by which his majesty passed unobserved; and before it seven curtains, which were not drawn up till the king was seated and composed, and in perfect readiness to appear. On ordinary occasions, all the curtains were raised at once; and after the chiefs had prostrated three times, they were desired to be at their ease, which was resting on their knees, and on which, when the business was over, they left the hall backward, his majesty remaining till all had departed. On the presentation of ambassadors, extraordinary pomp and ceremony were observed. A great concourse of people was assembled; the royal elephants were drawn out; all the guards were on duty, and the approaches to the hall were illuminated. On entering the hall, the chiefs and ambassadors had to prostrate before the curtains, which were now managed with peculiar finesse: they were all suddenly drawn up, and as suddenly let down, affording, at first, only a momentary glimpse of his majesty: after a pause, they were slowly drawn up, one after another, a certain number of prostrations being required for each, till the throne was disclosed, and the king exposed to view: then the ambassador, actually crawling, was led to the foot of the throne by the ministers, walking in the most submissive attitude; and having delivered his letters, he had the troublesome task to perform of crawling backward.'

'The judicial and legislative, as well as the executive power, formerly centered in the king; but all officers, from the king downwards, exercised judicial powers, more or less; appeals laying from an inferior to a superior, till it reached the king himself, whose sentence was in all cases decisive. No one but the king had the power of passing sentence of death; for murder, it was carried into effect by hanging; but for high treason, the only capital crime besides, the sword was used instead of the halter, and the criminal was decapitated. Robbery was punished by fine, imprisonment, and branding:—

'The crime of adultery, by the Singalese, was punished in a very summary manner. The injured husband did not institute a suit at law to recover damages; if he caught the adulterer in his house, he might beat him soundly, or even cut off his hair and ears, or have him flogged in public, and his wife flogged in the royal store-house, the place of punishment for women; after which, by his own ipse dixit, he might divorce her, and in disgrace send her home to her family.'

The cruel punishment for insolvency among the Singalese, forms a strong contrast to the mildness of their laws, in regard to offences. The creditor proving his debt, and the debtor acknowledging his incapacity to pay it, he and his family become slaves to the creditor, who retains them and their offspring till payment of the debt is made.

The religion of the Singalese is that of the Buddhists; they do not believe in the existence of a supreme Being, the creator and preserver of the universe, but are materialists in the strictest sense of the term. Their opinions of heaven and hell bear some affinity to those of the Hindoos, of which we gave an account in our review of Mr. Ward's valuable work in our last year's volume.

The language of Ceylon, the Singalese, is distinct and peculiar, and is considered of so much consequence, that it is almost the only subject that is studied. Very many of the natives are grammatically acquainted with it; and reading and writing are almost in general amongst the male part of the population as in England:—

'The Singalese write very neatly and expeditiously, with a sharp-pointed iron style; and they colour the characters they have scratched by nibbling them with ink made of lampblack and a solution of gum. Their books are all manuscript, and actually formed of leaves of trees, and confined by boards. The leaf most used, as best adapted to the purpose, is the immense leaf of the talipot-plant, occasionally nearly thirty feet in diameter.

ence. It is well and slowly dried in the shade, rubbed with an oil, and cut into pieces of suitable dimensions, the length of which always greatly exceeds the width; near the two extremities each piece is perforated, that they may be connected by means of a coril, to which the boards are also attached, to form a book. The boards are generally neatly painted and decorated. Occasionally, but rarely, their books are made of thin copper-plates.

The subjects of their writing are various; chiefly theology, history, medicine, astrology, and poetry:—

‘Almost every Singalese is more or less a poet; or at least can compose what they call poetry. Love is not their great inspiring theme, but interest:—a young Kandyan does not indite a ditty to his mistress’s eyebrows; the bearded chief is the favourite of his muse, to whom he sings his petition in verse, whether it be to ask a favour or beg an indulgence. All their poetry is sung or recited; they have seven tunes by which they are modulated. Their most admired tune is called “The Horse-trot:” from the resemblance which it bears to the sound of the trotting of a horse. Of their music, which is extremely simple, they are very fond, and prefer it greatly to ours, which they say they do not understand.’

The Singalese tunes are seven in number; and they have also seven musical instruments, on which they are most commonly played; these, of which Dr. Davy has given drawings, are principally of the drum kind; there is one made of brass, somewhat like a symbol, which is beat with a stick, a second in the shape of a clarinet, and a third of the violin order.

The sciences can scarcely be said to exist among the Singalese. Of mathematics and geometry they are entirely ignorant, and even of arithmetic their knowledge is very limited. They have no figures of their own to represent numbers, and, according to their own method, they are obliged to use letters; they have lately adopted the Malabar or Tamul figures, with their tables of multiplication and subtraction. Their weights and measures are necessarily very defective. They are ignorant of astronomy, but greatly addicted to astrology; their knowledge of medicine is extremely superficial; of anatomy they are quite ignorant, and of chemistry their knowledge does not extend beyond distillation, which is principally used for extracting an ardent spirit from the fermented juice of the cocoa-nut tree. Their skill in pharmacy, surgery, and pathology, is in a very rude state.

In the arts, the Singalese have made more progress than in the sciences; particularly in some of the ornamental or fine arts. Of these, painting is the least advanced. They are unacquainted with perspective, or with the effect of light and shade in colouring. All their paintings are mixed with gum, and of oil painting they are entirely ignorant. Lacker painting is an art much in use among the Singalese, and of which they are very fond, and which they perform with a good deal of skill and taste. It is chiefly used to ornament bows and arrows, spears, sticks, ivory boxes, priest’s screens or fans, and wooden pillars. Their lacker is obtained from a shrub called kapitia (crocum lacciferum), very common in most parts of Ceylon. In statuary the Singalese have been more successful than in painting; religion affords the most common subject; and artists are instructed in their designs to three postures, the standing, sitting, and recumbent, and to the priestly costume, no one venturing the slightest innovation. The statues are always coloured. The art of casting is not behind that of sculpture, and there is now at Kandy a figure of Boodhoo, in copper, as large as life, which Dr. Davy says is so well done that it would be admired even in Europe.

In architecture the Singalese have not any peculiar or national style; but they execute work in gold and silver for jewelry with great taste and dexterity, and this with very few tools; the best artist only requiring the following:—

‘A low earthen pot full of chaff or saw-dust, on which he makes a little charcoal fire; a small bamboo blow-pipe, about six inches long, with which he excites the fire; a short earthen tube or nozzle, the extremity of which is placed at the bottom of the fire, and through which the artist directs the blast of the blow-pipe; two or three small crucibles, made of the fine clay of ant-hills; a pair of tongs; an anvil; two or three small hammers; a file; and, to conclude, the last, a few small bars of iron and brass, about two inches long, differently pointed, for different kinds of work. It is astonishing what an intense little fire, more than sufficiently strong to melt silver and gold, can be kindled in a few minutes in the way just described. Such a simple portable forge deserves to be better known; it is, perhaps, even deserving the attention of the scientific experimenter, and may be useful to him when he wishes to excite a small fire, larger than can be procured by the common blow-pipe, and he has not a forge to command.’

Gardening is hardly known as an art in Ceylon, but the inhabitants are not unskilful in agriculture.

Personal Narrative of Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent. By Alexander de Humboldt and Aimé Boupland.

We concluded our former notice of this valuable work with a description of the caoutchouc and the process of preparing it, and we now give an account of the Indian poison, which is fabricated at Esmeralda, a most solitary Christian mission of about eighty inhabitants, on the Upper Oranoko. This active poison is employed in war, in the chase, and, what is more singular, as a remedy for gastric obstructions. M. Humboldt says,—

‘The poison of the ticusas of the Amazon, the upas-ticus of Java, and the curare of Guyana, are the most deleterious substances that are known. Raleigh, toward the end of the sixteenth century, had heard the name of urari pronounced as being a vegetable substance, with which arrows were envenomed; yet no fixed notions of this poison had reached Europe. The missionaries, Gumilla and Gili, had not been able to penetrate into the country where the curare is manufactured. Gumilla asserts, “that this preparation was enveloped in great mystery; that its principal ingredient was furnished by a subterranean plant, by a tuberoso root, which never puts forth leaves, and which is called the root, by way of eminence, raiz de si misma; that the venomous exhalations which arise from the pots, cause the old women (the most useless) to perish, who are chosen to watch over this operation; finally, that these vegetable juices never appear sufficiently concentrated, till a few drops produce, at a distance, a repulsive action on the blood. An Indian wounds himself slightly; and a dart dipped in the liquid curare is held near the wound. If it make the blood return to the vessels without having been brought into contact with them, the poison is judged to be sufficiently concentrated.” I shall not stop to refute these popular tales collected by Father Gumilla.

‘When we arrived at Esmeralda, the greater part of the Indians were returning from an excursion which they had made to the east, beyond the Rio Paclamo, to gather jujivas, or the fruit of the bertiollita, and the liana which yields the curare. Their return was celebrated by a festival, which is called in the mission, la fiesta de las jujivas, and which resembles our harvest homes and vintage feasts. The women had prepared a quantity of fermented liquor, and during two days the Indians were in a state of intoxication. Among nations that attach great importance to the fruits of the palmtree, and of some others useful for the nourishment of man, the period when these fruits are gathered is marked by public rejoicings, and time is divided according to these festivals, which succeed one another in a course invariably the same. We were fortunate enough to find an old Indian less drunk than the rest, who was employed in preparing the curare poison from freshly gathered plants. He was the chemist of the place. We found at his dwelling, large earthen pots for boiling the vegetable juice, shallower vessels to favour the evaporation by a larger surface, and leaves of the plaintain-tree rolled up in the shape of our filters, and used to filtrate the liquids, more or less loaded with fibrous matter. The greatest order and neatness prevailed in this hut, which was transformed into a chemical laboratory. The Indian who was to instruct us, is known throughout the mission by the name of the master of poison, (amo del curare) he had that self-sufficient air and tone of pedantry, of which the pharmacopologists of Europe were formerly accused. "I know," said he, "that the whites have the secret of fabricating soap, and that black powder, which has the effect of making a noise, and killing animals when they are wanted. The curare, which we prepare from father to son, is superior to any thing you can make down yonder (beyond sea). It is the juice of an herb which kills silently (without any one knowing whence the stroke comes)."

"This chemical operation, to which the master of the curare attached so much importance, appears to us extremely simple. The liana, (beyuca), which is used at Esmeralda for the preparation of the poison, bears the same name as in the forests of Jaraita. It is the beyuca de macacure, which is gathered in abundance east of the mission, on the left bank of the Oronoko, beyond the Rio Amaguaca, in the mountainous and granitic lands of Guayana and Yumariquin.

"The juice of the liana, when it has been recently gathered, is not regarded as poisonous; perhaps it acts in a sensible manner only when it is strongly concentrated. It is the bark and a part of the albumen which contains this terrible poison. Branches of the macacure, four or five lines in diameter, are scraped with a knife: and the bark that comes off is bruised, and reduced into very thin filaments, on the stone employed for grinding cassava. The venomous juice being yellow, the whole fibrous mass takes this colour. It is thrown into a funnel nine inches high, with an opening four inches wide. This funnel was, of all the instruments of the Indian laboratory, that of which the master of poison seemed to be most proud. He asked us repeatedly if por allá (down yonder, that is in Europe), we had ever seen any thing to be compared to his empedado. It was a leaf of the plaintain tree rolled up in the form of a cone, and placed in another stronger cone, made of the leaves of the palm-tree. The whole of this apparatus was supported by slight frame-work, made of the petioles and ribs of palm leaves. A cold infusion is first prepared by pouring water on the fibrous matter, which is the ground bark of the macacure. A yellowish water filters during several hours, drop by drop, through the leafy funnel. This filtered water is the venomous liquor, but it acquires strength only when it is concentrated by evaporation, like molasses, in a large earthen pot. The Indian, from time to time, invited us to taste the liquid; its taste, more or less bitter, decides when the concentration by fire has been carried sufficiently far. There is no danger in this operation, the curare being deleterious only when it comes into immediate contact with the blood. The vapours, therefore, that are disengaged from the pans, are not hurtful, notwithstanding what has been asserted on this point by the missionaries of the Oronoko. Fontana, in his false experiments on the poison of the ticunas of the river of Amazons, long ago proved, that the vapours rising from this poison, when thrown on burning charcoal, may be inhaled without apprehension; and that it is false as M. de La Condamine has announced, that Indian women, when condemned to death, have been killed by the vapours of the poison of the ticunas."

When the darts are touched with this juice, which is mixed with a glutinous substance, in order to make it stick, they are mortal; large birds, when wounded with one of these arrows in the thigh, perish in two or three minutes; but it is often ten or twelve before a pig or a peccary expires. Our author is not acquainted with any antidote for this poison. Among uncivilized nations, various things are resorted to for a covering, but it is the Indians of the Oronoko alone who are so amply provided for by nature, as to furnish them with shirts ready made. Mr. H. says,—

"We saw on the slope of the Cerra Duida, shirt-trees, fifty feet high. The Indians cut off cylindrical pieces, two feet in diameter, from which they peel the red and fibrous bark, without making any longitudinal incision. This bark affords them a sort of garment, which resembles sacks of a very coarse texture, and without a seam. The upper opening serves for the head, and two lateral holes are cut to admit the arms. The natives wear these shirts of marima in the rainy season; they have the form of the ponchos and ruanas of cotton, which are so common in New Grenada, at Quito, and in Peru. As in these climates the riches and beneficence of nature are regarded as the primary causes of the indolence of the inhabitants, the missionaries do not fail to say in showing the shirts of marima, "in the forests of the Oronoko garments are found ready made on the trees."

In addition to the ready-made shirts, the spathes of certain palm-trees furnish pointed caps, which resemble coarse net-work. M. Humboldt refutes the ancient traditions respecting the dwarf and fair Indians said to be near the sources of the Oronoko. Proceeding down this great river, he came to the cavern of Atarupe, which he thus describes.—

"We soon reckoned in this tomb of a whole extinct tribe near six hundred skeletons well preserved, and so regularly placed, that it would have been difficult to make an error in their number. Every skeleton reposes in a sort of basket, made of the petioles of the palm-tree. These baskets, which the natives call mapires, have the form of a square bag. Their size is proportioned to the age of the dead; there are some for infants cut off at the moment of their birth. We saw them from ten inches to three feet four inches long, the skeletons in them being bent together. They are all ranged near each other, and are so entire, that not a rib or a phalanx is wanting. The bones have been prepared in three different manners, either whitened in the air and the sun; dyed red with onoto, a colouring matter extracted from the bixa orellana; or, like real mummies, varnished with odiferous resins, and enveloped in leaves of the heliconia or of the plaintain tree. The Indians related to us, that the fresh corpse is placed in damp ground, in order that the flesh may be consumed by degrees; some months after, it is taken out, and the flesh remaining on the bones is scraped off with sharp stones. Several hordes in Guyana still observe this custom. Earthen vases half-baked are found near the mapires, or baskets. They appear to contain the bones of the same family. The largest of these vases or funeral urns, are three feet high, and five feet and a-half long. Their colour is greenish grey; and their oval form is sufficiently pleasing to the eye. The handles are made in the shape of crocodiles or serpents; the edge is bordered with meanders, labyrinths, and real grotesques, in straight lines variously combined. Such paintings are found in every zone, among nations the most remote from each other, either with respect to the spot which they occupy on the globe, or to the degree of civilization which they have attained. The inhabitants of the little mission of Mapyures, still execute them on their commonest pottery; they decorate the bucklers of the Otahitians, the fishing implements of the Eskimoes, the walls of the Mexican Palace of Mitla, and the vases of ancient Greece. Every where a rhythmic repetition of the same forms flatters the eye, as the cadenced repetition of sounds soothes the ear. Analogies founded on the internal nature of our feelings, on the natural dispositions of our intellect, are not calculated to throw light on the filiation and the ancient connections of nations.

'We could not acquire any precise idea of the period to which the origin of the mapires and the painted vases, contained in the ossuary cavern of Atarupe, can be traced. The greater part seemed not to be more than a century old; but it may be supposed, that, sheltered from all humidity, under the influence of a uniform temperature, the preservation of these articles would be no less perfect if it dated from a period far more remote. A tradition circulates among the Guahiboes, that the warlike Atures, pursued by the Caribbees, escaped to the rocks that rise in the middle of the great cataracts; and there that nation, heretofore so numerous, became gradually extinct, as well as its language. The last family of the Atures still existed in 1767, in the time of the missionary Gili. At the period of our voyage, an old parrot was shown at Maypures, of which the inhabitants related, and the fact is worthy of observation, that, "they did not understand what it said, because it spoke the language of the Atures."

M. Humboldt and his companion opened several of these mapires or baskets, in order to examine attentively the form of the skulls, all of which displayed the characteristics of the American race, except two or three which approached to the Caucasian. Our travellers having some of the skulls and skeletons, loaded a mule with them, but, says M. H.—

'Unfortunately for us, the penetration of the Indians, and the extreme quickness of their senses, rendered all our precautions useless. Wherever we stopped, in the missions of the Caribbees, amid the Llanos, between Angostura and Nueva Barcelona, the natives assembled round our mules to admire the monkeys which we had purchased at Oroonoko. These good people had scarcely touched our baggage, when they announced the approaching death of the beast of burden, "that carried the dead." In vain we told them that they were deceived in their conjectures, and that the baskets contained the bones of crocodiles and manatees; they persisted in repeating, that they smelt the resin that surrounded the skeletons, and "that they were their old relations." We were obliged to make the monks interpose their authority, in order to conquer the aversion of the natives, and procure for us a change of mules.

'One of the skulls, which we took from the cavern of Atarupe, has appeared in the fine work published by my old master, Blumenbach, on the varieties of the human species. The skeletons of the Indians were lost on the coast of Africa, together with a considerable part of our collections, in a shipwreck, in which perished our friend and fellow-traveller, Fray Juan Gonzales, a young monk of the order of St. Francis.

'We withdrew in silence from the cavern of Atarupe. It was one of those calm and serene nights, which are so common in the torrid zone. The stars shone with a mild and planetary light. Their scintillation was scarcely sensible at the horizon, which seemed illumined by the great nebulae of the southern hemisphere. An innumerable multitude of insects spread a reddish light on the ground, loaded with plants, and resplendent with these living and moving fires, as if the stars of the firmament had sunk down on the Savannah. On quitting the cavern, we stopped several times to admire the beauty of this singular scene. The odoriferous vanilla, and festoons of bignonia, decorated the entrance; and above, on the summit of the hill, the arrowy branches of the palm-trees waved murmuring in the air.'

M. Humboldt has some very curious observations on the earth-eaters, which are not only to be found on the Oroonoko, but among the negroes on the coast of Guinea, the savage inhabitants of New Caledonia, in the Pacific Ocean, and the Javanese. We shall, however, only quote the facts as they relate to the Otomacs of the Oroonoko:—

'The inhabitants of Urtana belong to those nations of the savannah, (Indios andantes), who, more difficult to civilize than the nations of the forest, (Indios del monte), have a decided aversion to cultivate the land, and live almost exclusively on hunting and fishing. They are men of a very robust constitution; but ugly, savage, vindictive, and passionately fond of fermented liquors. They are omnivorous animals in the highest degree; and, therefore, the other Indians, who consider them as barbarians, have a common saying, "nothing is so disgusting that an Otomac will not eat it." While the waters of the Oroonoko and its tributary streams are low, the Otomacs subsist on fish and turtles. The former they kill with surprising dexterity, by shooting them with an arrow, when they appear at the surface of the water. When the rivers swell, which in South America, as well as in Egypt and Nubia, is erroneously attributed to the melting of the snows, and which occurs periodically in every part of the torrid zone, fishing almost entirely ceases. It is then as difficult to procure fish in the rivers which are become deeper, as when you are sailing on the open sea. It often falls the poor missionaries, on fast-days as well as flesh-days, though all the young Indians are under the obligation of "fishing for the convent." At the period of these inundations, which last two or three months, the Otomacs swallow a prodigious quantity of earth. We found heaps of balls in their huts, piled up in pyramids three or four feet high. These balls were five or six inches in diameter. The earth which the Otomacs eat is a very fine and untenuous clay, of a yellowish grey colour; and, being slightly baked in the fire, the hardened crust has a tint inclining to red, owing to the oxide of iron which is mingled with it. We brought away some of this earth, which we took from the winter provision of the Indians; and it is absolutely false that it is stercoritic, and contains magnesia. Mr. Vauquelin did not discover any traces of this earth in it; but he found that it contained more silica than alumina, and three or four per cent. of lime.

'The Otomacs do not eat every kind of clay indifferently; they choose the alluvial beds, or strata that contain the most unctuous earth, and the smoothest to the feel. I inquired of the missionary, whether the moistened clay were made to undergo, as Father Gumilla asserts, that peculiar decomposition, which is indicated by a disengagement of carbonic acid and sulphuretted hydrogen, and which is designated in every language by the term of putrefaction; but he assured us, that the natives neither cause the clay to rot, nor do they mingle it with flour of maize, oil of turtle's eggs, or fat of the crocodile. We ourselves examined, both at the Oroonoko and after our return to Paris, the balls of earth which we brought away with us, and found no trace of the mixture of any organic substance, whether oily or farinaceous. The savage regards every thing as nourishing that appeases hunger; when, therefore, you inquire of an Otomac on what he subsists during the two months when the river is the highest, he shows you his balls of clayey earth. This he calls his principal food; for at this period he can seldom procure a lizard, a root of fern, or a dead fish swimming at the surface of the water. If the Indian eat earth from want during two months, (and from three quarters to five quarters of a pound in twenty-four hours), he does not the less regale himself with it during the rest of the year. Every day in the season of drought, when fishing is most abundant, he scrapes his balls of peya, and mingles a little clay with his other aliment. What is most surprising is, that the Otomacs do not become lean by swallowing such quantities of earth; they are, on the contrary, extremely robust, and far from having the belly tense and puffed up. The missionary, Fray Ramon Bueno, asserts, that he never remarked any alteration in the health of the natives at the period of the great risings of the Oroonoko.

'The following are the facts, in all their simplicity, which we are able to verify. The Otomacs, during some months, eat daily three quarters of a pound of clay, slightly hardened by fire, without their health being sensibly affected by it. They moisten the earth afresh when they are going to swallow it. It has not been possible to verify, hitherto, with precision, how much nutritious vegetable or animal matter the Indians take in a week at the same time; but it is certain that they attribute the sensation of satiety which they feel, to the clay, and not to the wretched aliments which they take with it occasionally. No physiological phenomenon being entirely insulated, it may be interesting to examine several analogous phenomena which I have been able to collect.

I observed every where within the torrid zone, in a great number of individuals, children, women, and sometimes even full-grown men, an inordinate and almost irresistible desire of swallowing earth; not an alkaline or calcareous earth, to neutralize, (as it is vulgarly said,) acid juices, but a fat clay, unctuous and exhaling a strong smell. It is often found necessary to tie the children's hands, or to confine them, to prevent their eating earth, when the rain ceases to fall. At the village of Blanco, on the bank of the river Magdalena, I saw the Indian women who make pottery, continually swallowing great pieces of clay.

From various experiments that have been made by M. Humboldt, as well as other physiologists, it is found that there are some species of earths which may be taken in considerable quantities without injury to the health; and that although the Otonacs in America, and the inhabitants of New Caledonia, eat earth from want and to appease hunger, there are tribes in other countries that eat it from choice.

M. Humboldt is an author so deservedly popular, and his works are so highly interesting, that to recommend it is only necessary to quote them. This we have already done, and we now take our leave.

THE WILD ASS*.

The sun was just rising over the summits of the eastern mountains, when my greyhound, Cooley, suddenly darted off in pursuit of an animal, which my Persians said, from the glimpse they had of it, was an antelope. I instantly put spurs to my horse, and, followed by Sedak Beg and Mehmander, followed the chase. After an unrestrained gallop of full three miles, we came up with the dog, who was then within a short stretch of the creature he pursued; and, to my surprise, and at first vexation, I saw it to be an ass. But, on a moment's reflection, judging from its fleetness it must be a wild one, a species little known in Europe, but which the Persians prize above all other animals as an object of chase, I determined to approach as near to it as the very swift Arab I was on would carry me. But the single instant of checking my horse to consider, had given our game such a head of us, that, notwithstanding all our speed, we could not recover our ground on him. I, however, happened to be considerably before my companions, when, at a certain distance, the animal in its turn made a pause, and allowed me to approach within pistol-shot of him. He then darted off again with the quickness of thought; capering, kicking, and sporting in his flight, as if he were not blown in the least, and the chase was his pastime.

He appeared to me about ten or twelve hands high; the skin smooth, like a deer's, and of a reddish colour; the belly and hinder parts partaking of silvery grey; his neck was finer than that of a common ass, being longer, and bending like a stag's, and his legs beautifully slender; the head and ears seemed large in proportion to the gracefulness of these forms, and by them I first recognized that the object of my chase was of the ass tribe. The mane was short and black, as was also a tuft which terminated his tail. No line whatever ran along his back or crossed his shoulders, as are seen on the tame species with us. When my followers of the country came up, they regretted I had not shot the creature when he was so within my aim, telling me his flesh is one of the greatest delicacies in Persia; but it would not have been to eat him that I should have been glad to have had him in my possession. The prodigious swiftness and peculiar manner with which he fled across the plain, coincided exactly with the description that Xenophon gives of the same animal in Arabia, (vide Anabasis, b. 1.) But, above all, it reminded me of the striking portrait drawn by the author of the book of Job. I shall venture to repeat it, since the words will give life and action to the sketch that is to accompany these pages.

Who hath loosed the bonds of the wild ass? whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings! He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. The range of the mountain is his pasture.

I was informed by the Mehmander, who had been in the desert when making a pilgrimage to the shrine of Ali, that the wild ass of Irak Arabi differs in nothing from the one I had just seen.

He had observed them often, for a short time, in the possession of the Arabs, who told him the creature was perfectly untameable. A few days after this discussion, we saw another of these animals, and, pursuing it determinately, had the good fortune, after a hard chase, to kill it and bring it to our quarters. From it I completed my sketch. The Honourable Mount Stuart Elphinstone, in his most admirable account of the kingdom of Cabul, mentions this highly picturesque creature, under the name of Goorkhur; describing it as an inhabitant of the desert between India and Afghanistan, or Caubul. It is called gaur by the Persians, and is usually seen in herds, though often single, straying away, as the one I first saw, in the wantonness of liberty. By the national passion for hunting so wild an object, Persia lost one of its most estimable monarchs, Bahram, surnamed Gour, from his fondness for the sport, and general success in the pursuit of an animal almost as fleet as the wind. The scene of this chase was a fine open vale, near to Shiraz, but which had the inconvenience of being intersected by a variety of springs, forming themselves into exceedingly deep ponds, covered at the bottom, by nature, to an extent under ground not to be traced. While the King was in the heat of pursuit, his horse came suddenly to the brink of one of these pieces of water, and, tumbling headlong, both horse and rider disappeared. The pond was immediately explored to the utmost of their ability in those days, but the body of the King could not be found. Hence it is supposed that it must have been driven by the stream into one of the subterraneous channels, and there found a watery grave. This event happened fourteen hundred years ago, and it yet forms an interesting tale in the memories of the natives about, to relate to the traveller passing that way.

CRITIQUE ON

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S REMARKS ON NOVELISTS AND DRAMATISTS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

(Concluded from p. 616.)

I HAVE now laid before the reader the whole of this critic's reasoning, and, I think, sufficiently proved its fallacy and inconclusiveness. I am, indeed, astonished that the learned editor himself did not feel he was treading on false ground, for if he had ever paid due attention to his own words, he would have perceived them constantly betraying uncertainty and contradiction. One of his sentences runs thus: 'It must, therefore, frequently happen that the author best qualified for a province in which all depends on the communication of his own ideas and feelings to the reader, without any intervening medium, may fall short.' Now, does not the evident incongruity of the words must and may, show that the writer had no clear notions of what he was endeavouring to prove? if the premises from whence he drew this tremulous conclusion, had any thing of energy and fixedness in them, instead of allowing it to vacillate between certainty and possibility, he would have boldly said, shall or will, and not may; but they had no such force, and, therefore, he found himself obliged to put us off with this lame account of the matter, that a novelist may not be a good dramatist, which nobody disputed. Again, he says, speaking of an acting drama written in the manner of a novel, 'there is an immediate failure, though it may be the failure of a man of genius.' Would not one have thought this was sufficient to have shown him, he was labouring to prove what was nothing to the purpose? for Fielding's plays are not what can be called honourable failures, which he speaks of above; they are utterly bad, and this is the phenomenon to be accounted for. But, in order to show that his whole manner of reasoning tends to prove the very opposite of what he wished, though he was not conscious of it, let the reader look at the following sentences. After having enumerated several qualifications which the novelist and dramatist must possess in common, and which appear to comprehend the sum of those necessary in both their arts, he says, 'he (i. e. the novelist) must not only tell what the characters actually said, in which his task is the same as that of the dramatic author.' Hence a good acting play may be made by selecting a plot and characters from a novel, by contracting the events within the space necessary for representation, and by discarding from the dialogue whatever is redundant.' Now, here we have his own words, that the novelist has all the requisites for a dramatist, that one department of the former is to do what includes the whole art of the latter, viz. 'to tell what the characters actually said,' and that a well-educated tailor might cut out a play from a novel, yet we find him concluding from all this, that a novelist is no dramatist! Is it not a natural question, why the novelist himself might not lop off the redundancies and select the characters, as well as the tailor, and so give us a good play? unless, perhaps, the editor may set about proving, in the face of our milliners, that a writer of novels cannot handle a pair of scissors.

* From Sir Robert Ker Porter's Travels in Persia.

But the solution of this latter phenomenon, that an able critic and author should fall into such contradictions and absurdities, which is to the full as wonderful as the former, is that he treated his subject as he would his mistress, as a trifle to play elegant tricks upon, to mumble sweet phrases over, and to keep him in poetical wind. It is impossible, but that if he had taken the pains to look through the tinsel and drapery of his language, at the inward substance of his arguments, he would have seen their weakness and instability. This, however, would be too much to expect in this age of wordy literature, where the ghost of an argument is scarcely to be detected amidst the clouds and confusion of magnificent sequipedals, headlong metaphors, and images swoln out of all natural figure.

Let me not be accused of an envious wish to detract from the gratefulness of good language, because I may be deficient in it myself; sound has its sense to please, as well as argument its faculty. Neither do I object to the introduction of poetical language into subjects, whose objects are professedly philosophical;—but this I object to: the utter disregard of every thing but fine words; or if we do admit something bordering upon reason into our compositions, making it mere wire or cat-gut to hold the fringe together. What I require is merely this: that before he adjusts his ornaments, the argumentator would make a clean draught of the line of his argument, that he may know where he is going, and then he may paint it in what colour he pleases, so as he leaves it visible to his followers; but it is a contemptible office, a kind of dressing of the dead, to spend our time in heaping a profusion of flowers and beautiful weeds on a senseless counterfeited real energy.

I have devoted the chief part of this essay to the demonstration of the falsity of a particular theory; but whether the editor's account of the phenomenon be true or not, is a secondary consideration. I come not for the invidious purpose of detecting the errors of a man so much my superior in mental qualifications, but to show the dangerous tendency of the present rage for voluble eloquence: this makes a man of sense and abilities, involve and bewilder himself in most palpable contradictions; this makes a coxcomb, whose sagacity ends where reason begins, viz. at the extremity of animal instinct, provided he can fill his own mouth and our ears with grammatical breath and sorrows, pass for a man of genius and wisdom amongst us, when his proper office should be, making wooden cuckoos or whistle trumpets, for children and idiots.

With this warning before our eyes, let us now turn to the investigation of the question itself. It is much easier to overturn a theory, than to establish one permanently, and, therefore, though I am pretty certain the above solution of the proposed phenomenon is not the true one, I am by no means as sure, that I am about offering, may not meet similar treatment from some abler inquisitor, which, however, I by no means deprecate, but on the contrary request, as I had much rather be convicted of an error than remain in it. I shall also have the satisfaction of knowing, that if I do fail, it is not for want of using all diligence to prevent it; that I attempted the question with a serious design to solve it, and for no latent purpose, such as carrying off the wits of my readers on the current of my voluminous fluency, or stupifying them with a breathless succession of fleeting imagery. I attempt it for itself, else I would not attempt it at all. If my object was only to expose my poetical faculties, I would keep to poetical subjects.

The primary error in the theory we have just overturned, seems to me to lie in the attributing the cause of the phenomenon to habit. This was the first principle the editor set out with, though by a poetical licence (which I suppose means, a neglect of every thing like reason and propriety) he leaves the connexion between it and the arguments he has brought to prove it, as difficult to be made out as the phenomenon itself. Indeed, he says no more about it, but having first made it the head of his hypothesis, and given us a few disjointed members to clap up a body, he has left it to us to make it a tail. But as the head and tail of an hypothesis are the same thing, namely, the hypothesis itself, and as the members are the arguments which support it, I suppose if we can knock the hypothesis on the head, we may send the tail, &c. a-begging. Now, what is the fact? Fielding wrote his novels after his plays; so that the habit of writing in the style of a novel, could have no effect on his plays, which were written already. Is it not singular the biographical critic should never have considered this, though he mentions it a few lines afterwards? but, poetry, all along of poetry! it is impossible to see a plain matter of fact through the mist which a poetical fancy casts before the mind. But, though this alone puts the hypothesis to flight without farther trouble, the reader may like to see a speculative proof of the same thing. To this end, I will beg leave to introduce a rule invented by Sir Isaac Newton, to my reader's notice, which, although used heretofore only in purely scientific subjects, may yet be applied here with great propriety and effect. It is this: no cause of any phenomenon is to be admitted, but what is true, and sufficient to account for the phenomenon. Now, though in the present case, the truth, i.e. the existence, of habit as an efficient cause to work many wonders, cannot be denied, yet it is wholly insufficient; which is plain from what I have brought forward above, concerning the habit of imagining and describing.

We must look to a more remote cause for this phenomenon, than habit. And to me it appears to be this. There are some men of a vast and magnificent turn of mind, who cannot bring themselves to dwell upon any thing minute or particular. On the other hand, there are those of an accurate and curious disposition, who delight in examining closely the several differences and particles of things, and have no capacity of taking in general views. Now, according to my notion, a dramatist is of the former class, a novelist of the latter; and this not only accounts thus simply for the proposed question, but also for another, viz. why a dramatist would most probably fail in a novel; which is a conjecture of mine I leave to be determined by experience. For, a dramatist is obliged, by the necessity of contracting his work to the measure of a few pages, to develop his characters in the great, to let us into their dispositions and designs immediately; consequently, he must choose their prominent and decisive characteristics, and by a general and comprehensive view of his subject, give us a determinate outline at once. On the contrary, a novelist has what waste of paper he chooses to travel over, and, therefore, we expect a minute account of every thing; consequently, he works by piecemeal, he makes out his characters by little and little, and by exhibiting all the individual traits of his personages, gives us at last a finished and accurate picture of them. If this be the case, the man of the first class, which contains those of a vast and comprehensive mind, will succeed in the drama, and fail in a novel on account of his deficiency in minute knowledge; on the other hand, the man of the second class, which contains those of an accurate and curious disposition, will succeed in a novel, and fail in the drama on account of his deficiency in seizing general points, and developing instantaneously. Hence we see that the faculties of description and imagination, which otherwise would make the novelist a dramatist, are rendered useless by this deficiency.

The only difficulty I can see in this theory is the following: how does it agree with the fact that Cervantes and Scott, two of our greatest novelists, are yet authors of most comprehensive and stupendous imaginations, especially the latter? I answer; we must distinguish between a novelist and romancer; besides it is the querist's assertion, not mine, that all men of genius are of one or other class above-mentioned. There may be men who have both a comprehensive and an accurate genius, though, perhaps, not of the first degree in either, and such would write a drama as well as a novel. A novel then seems to be distinguished from a romance in this, that the former is a narration of what men might probably say and do in life, the latter of what would not probably happen, and hence the author of a romance should have a noble imagination and somewhat dramatical, as the language of a romance is above the common-place strain of a novel. But it will be said, which is Cervantes, a novelist or a romancer? which is Scott? This is the very point I want to come to. I answer, both. As far as they relate things probable they are novelists. As far as they relate things not probable they are romancers. And mark how well this agrees with my theory: this mixture of novel and romance shows a genius in the author at once accurate and comprehensive; therefore he belongs to both the above classes; therefore he should write a good play as well as a good novel; and what is the fact? Cervantes was a dramatist considerably above mediocrity, and I have as little doubt that the author of the Scotch novels is the writer of those excellent dramatical mottoes he has prefixed to his chapters, as that Scott is the author of the novels themselves.

However this may be, let the author of these novels, whoever he is, attempt a drama, either tragedy or comedy, and if he fails, I am content to give up my theory, and, what is more, to embrace that I have just overturned!

CROSS READINGS.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Your readers will recollect the amusing articles under the titles of 'Cross Readings, Ship News, and Mistakes of the Press,' and they will doubtless be delighted to discover a new source of amusement of this kind; it will cost them no trouble, which is always a great drawback on pleasure: they have only to take Levisac's Grammar and read the exercises exactly as they are printed: as a specimen, I will give you one taken at random.

'Was not Virgil born at Mantua?' it is from that poisoned source that have arisen all the cruel wars that have desolated the universe: the fable says, that as soon as Hercules had cut off the heads of the hydra, others sprang up, while their united flocks fed on the tender and flowery grass.' THE NEW CHURCH OF ST. PANCRAS.

SIR,—According to Vitruvius, three things ought to be considered in every fabric, without which no edifice will deserve to be commended; and these are, utility or convenience, duration, and beauty.

If population increase, and a desire to be instructed in the established rules of divine worship prevail, then the edifice which is now erecting in the New Road, will add much to the convenience of its local and social circle. Hence, the first thing will be accomplished, in part, though convenience is not always studied upon a general principle, the rich being more usually furnished with crimson curtains, large prayer-books, and hassocks, while the poor are only adorned with the 'hearing ear,' the standing posture, and the avenue draught, which confirms a rheumatism or inoculates a disease. This is a hint for the architect and his associates, because the grant for the building of churches is given with a view of the poor being accommodated on a Sunday.

Duration being the second thing worthy of consideration, I make a remark or two. In Andrea Palladio's time, architecture was noble, because of its durability; exalted, from its spacious elements; and grand, on account of the vast stores of science and wealth bestowed on it. Greece, Rome, and Egypt were spots which exhibited their orders, arches, flights of steps, staircases, pillars, and monuments, to the most elevated and sublime conceptions, suitable for sepulture, festive honours, victorious celebrations, baths, holy ablations, and the most sacred consecrations of their mystic or more simple devotions. In this country, Wren's name is immortal, for his works are erected as specimens of immortality, the essence of duration. But it is not fashionable for modern architects to study a guide of so recent a period as Wren; and, therefore, churches, like Manchester calicos or Birmingham wares, are built only to suit the taste or caprice of interested and time—not eternity—serving individuals or parochial junks. Places of worship ought to resemble the simplicity of the heart, and be dedicated wholly and solely to the Eternal Architect; but, it is evident from the exterior of this new church, what might be anticipated of its interior,—a mere superficial edifice, whose beauty will pass away with the generation of its structure, and the next century show its waste and cankered decay. Had this been the mode of building after the fire of London, when so many churches were built, into what vast expenses would the parishes of London now be thrown; but, fortunately for the epoch of 1821, it was otherwise.

I do not object to ornament and decoration where it arises from a pure cause, and is used to add to excellence; sculpture and painting, emanating from skillful pencils and discriminating chisels, are the very graces of religion; but I do object, most strongly, against churches, either exteriorly or interiorly, having the air, in part, of theatrical illusion. But, to my third point;—it is very difficult yet to speak of the beauty of this new church. Viewed afar, it appears that it will maintain its command at a respectful distance from its sister saints and brethren of all denominations, from the Small-Pox Hospital to St. Paul's. As yet, it looks a very slight superstructure, and evinces an ornamental fancy, which, as I have previously hinted, will accord with the lighter fancies of the new-road and square-whippers. An idea struck me, and forcibly too, of an unfortunate association. I mean the shell-work over the altar-end of the church; it looks as a caricature likeness of our esteemed monarch, or the host which a Catholic priest holds up to his congregation at mass. I speak it with reverence and regret, because I fear it will give room for worse construction and allusion than what I unwillingly make, and before the church be finished might be removed for a more unequivocal device.

Peals of bells being excluded from our new churches or chapels of ease, ringers will, in course of years, like old grandvires, become extinct. This I am sorry for, good ringing being a healthful exercise, and of later periods full of harmony and deep science in numbers. It is very pleasant too, on royal occasions, public anniversaries, light-hearted weddings, and liberal exhibitions of joy, to hear their playfulness dissolve in air. ANAC.

P. S. The house, however elegant, previously to the erecting of the above church, which stands by its side, must be removed, whatever convenience and expense will be sacrificed.

STATISTICS OF PARIS.

THE Compté Chabrol Prefect of the department of the Seine, has recently published a work from official documents, containing some interesting particulars on the state of Paris. The following extracts will afford a curious comparison with the state of London:—

On the 1st of January, 1819, there were registered in Paris, 1171 cabriolets de place (on the stand), of which 765 were for the streets and 406 for the environs.

106 Messageries and voitures for fixed destinations, not included in those for the vicinity of Paris.

489 Coaches of remise,

318 Cabriolets, ditto.

4804 Private cabriolets.

9080 Carts.

495 Voitures à loyer, drawn by one horse.

843 Ditto, ditto, drawn by hand.

Of private voitures, drawn by two or more horses, not subject to take a number, the administration can give no precise account.

1600 Horses are generally kept in Paris, exclusive of those brought thither by strangers.

An eighth part of the paving of Paris is renewed annually, during seven months of the best season.

The streets, bridges, and public squares are lighted by 4553 lanterns, which consume annually 606,397 lbs. of oil.

In the public establishments, 483 lanterns consume 31,734 lbs. of oil.

The ordinary watering and clearing of the streets is done by the inhabitants; that of the bridges, quays, gates, and squares, employs from the 1st March to the 31st October 116 men; and during the other four months 250 men.

The clearing away of dust, &c. during eight months, requires 140 men and 210 horses; in the winter months, 220 men are required, and 330 horses.

The corn market can contain 400,000 sacks.

In ordinary years, there are consumed in Paris,—

718,000 Hectolires of wine, including about 450,000 bottles (13,966,842 wine gallons).

24,350 Ditto of cider (539,154 wine gallons).

77,000 Ditto of beer (3,034,263 wine gallons).

13,600 Ditto of vinegar (259,298 wine gallons).

71,750 Bullocks.

8,500 Cows.

76,500 Calves.

339,650 Sheep.

70,500 Hogs.

981,000 Pigeons.

174,000 Ducks.

1,239,000 Chickens.

251,000 Capons or poulets.

549,000 Turkey.

328,000 Geese.

131,000 Partridges.

177,000 Rabbits.

28,000 Hares.

Butter and eggs cost annually

10,348,800 francs.

Oysters cost 599,600 francs.

Sea-fish, 3,417,600 francs.

Fresh water fish, 333,400 francs.

The receipts of the twelve theatres, including the Cirque Olympique, may be valued, one year with another, at 5,590,000 francs, of which they give 500,000 for the use of the poor.

10,000 persons daily frequent the Spectacles, of whom 7000 pay, and 3000 have free admissions.

The receipt of the minor spectacles, balls, gardens, concerts, coffee-houses, à seoirs amusantes, curiosities, &c. may be estimated at 1,000,000 francs, of which 100,000 go to the poor.

So that public amusements produce above 6,000,000 francs, which is above 16,000 per day, not including the expense of refreshments and of gaming, which pay separately.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

THE population of Great Britain, at the census in 1811, was 11,800,000, exclusive of the army and navy, then about 500,000. From the returns, so far as published, under the present census, it appears, the increase is about 15 per cent. This will make the population of Great Britain at present to be 14,000,000 of souls. Ireland contains about 6,500,000 people, making the population of the British dominions in Europe 20,500,000. The population of our North American possessions cannot be less than 1,500,000; the population of the West Indian colonies, 900,000; Africa about 130,000; in the Mediterranean, 150,000; colonies and dependencies in Asia, 2,040,000; and in our extensive territories in the East Indies, perhaps 70,000,000 of souls. The whole population of the British empire will, at that rate, contain 95,320,000 of souls.—The Russian, the next highest in the scale of civilized nations, contains 80,000,000; France, 30,000,000; and Austria an equal number. The Roman empire, in all its glory, contained 120,000,000, one half of whom were slaves. When we compare its situation with that of the British empire, in power, wealth, resources, and industry; the arts, sciences, commerce, and agriculture, the preponderance of the latter in the scale of nations and of empires, is great and most remarkable. The tonnage employed in the merchant service is about 2,640,000 tons, for Great Britain; the exports, 51,000,000 (including 11,000,000 foreign and colonial); and imports, 36,000,000. The navy, during the last war, consisted of 1000 ships of war; the seamen at present in the merchant service are about 174,000: the net revenue of the state, 57,000,000l. sterling. The capital of the empire contains 1,200,000 persons, the same number which Rome contained in the days of her greatest strength. The value of fixed or landed property in Great Britain, as calculated by Mr. Pitt, in 1797, was 1,600,000,000l. and it may now be fairly taken at 2,000,000,000l. The cotton manufactures of the country are immense, and reach, in the exports, to 80,000,000l. or one half of the whole. In short, taking every thing into consideration, the British empire, in power and strength, may be stated as the greatest that ever existed on earth, as it far surpasses them all in knowledge, moral character, and worth. On her dominions the sun never sets; before his evening rays leave the spires of Quebec, his morning beams have shone three hours on Port Jackson, and while sinking from the waters of Lake Superior, his eye opens upon the mouth of the Ganges.

REFINEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.

[The people of the United States boast a high degree of civilization, and a very fine taste for the drama; so much so that they affected to despise the splendid talents of Kean, and the journalists loaded him with abuse more befitting the purloins of St. Giles's or Billingsgate, than the editors of periodical journals. In order that our readers may judge of the weight of their pretensions, we quote, from a recent number of the National Intelligencer, published in the capital of the United States; the following article. Smoking and drinking spirits in a theatre have not, we believe, been known in this country for above a century and a half; and yet they are now prevalent in that transatlantic Athens—the city of Washington:—Eo.

WASHINGTON THEATRE.

It is with much pleasure the writer of this understands that the new theatre is on the eve of being opened by a detachment of Messrs. Warren and Wood's company, from Philadelphia. A well-conducted theatre is at all times not only an evidence of public taste, but an auxiliary in behalf of the public morals, because it allures the young and the gay from amusement often fatal to character, fortune, and health. In order to answer the end intended, it is absolutely essential that a rigid internal police be established for the purpose of preserving order and decorum in the audience. Anxious that this should be attained, I beg leave to recommend that the managers, or whoever have the superintendence of the performances, establish and enforce something like the following regulations.—Without something of the kind, all theatres are bear-gardens, instead of places of polite recreation:—

1st. No person to be allowed to smoke within the walls of the theatre during the play nights. This will add to the security of the building by taking away one cause of fire.

2nd. No person allowed to sell intoxicating liquors within the walls of the theatre, a tavern being near, where they can drink and smoke without offending decency or annoying ladies.

3rd. No person, on any pretence, allowed to stand up on the box-benches, or cover them with dirt, and impede the sight of others.

Ladies who come without a proper attendant, to be confined to the upper row; and on no occasion, to be suffered to intrude into the lower boxes.

5th. If any gentleman choose to talk loud, quarrel, or fight, they are to retire to some spot where they cannot disturb the audience.—The watch-house or penitentiary is a very convenient place.

6th. All tipsy gentlemen to be positively refused admittance, unless they will promise to go quietly to sleep in a corner of a box.

7th. No actor shall presume to give additional point or force to an equivocal passage or 'double entendre,' by either leering, winking, or the like, upon pain of being bisected off the stage.

With these or similar rules, a theatre may be made a school of refinement, elegance, and morality. Without them it is but a rendezvous for vulgar profligates, men without shame, and women without virtue. Should my worthy old friend Wood think proper to attend to these hints, he will see me and my family frequently at the theatre. But he will certainly not see us if my wife and daughters are to sit down where fashionable bucks have just had their feet, and, for aught I know, by the side of a prostitute, and be smoked with tobacco, while their ears are assailed by the ribaldry of half-bred gentlemen, who have no other way of attracting notice except by making themselves offensive.

A FATHER OF A FAMILY.

Original Poetry.

A PRAISE OF POESY.

'Oh Poesy, for thee I hold my pen,
That am not yet a glorious denizen
Of thy wide heaven.'—KEATS.

What hand shall imply wings in thine flight

From this low earth to an immortal height,
Till I have travelled up within the reach
And bearing of heaven's ministers—all their speech

Sounds audible, and near as mine own voice!
And who breathe words of blame at my fond choice?

Be thou my guide—thou, heaven's faithful Post,
And fit my spirit for discovery
Of unknown worlds of thought! Teach me to shape

Thy course aright, that I may touch your eye
Shall be unmet by any bark but mine,
And I will land thee long with many a lyre divine.

Yet there are some (oh shamelessness!) who slight

There, Poets, and care not in thy sight
To be found gracious; who full highly weigh Thy glorious gift to few as one that may All easily be won; but soulless shapes are they;

Earth grovellers and grubs—creatures without knees,

Who cannot worship wisdom, yet will stoop
Lower than lilies when in death they bane;
So they may grasp the gold that is their bane;
And these shall be as they had never been;
Whatever now their undeserved degrees
In worldly honours, precedence, and fame,—
Forgotten in the memory of Time their name,
And vain and wretched doings. Beneath thy fane,

Divinest Poetry, I would be found
A worshipper. Let not thy mysteries astound
My feeble sense; but lend me a clear light,
To lead my spirit, if it err, aright!
So will I honour thee with every rite
Which graceful poets use in praise, and prove
Not undeserving of thy dearer love.

Ye who have never heard her voice, nor tasted
The wine of Helicon; ye who have wasted
Long nights in fruitless orisons to her,
And, for she listened not your feeble prayer
For inspiration, hate her from despair
That she will ne'er instruct your souls to breathe

A lyric hymn for great Apollo's bearing,
Or teach your hands one coronal to wreath,
Worthy the honour of Apollo's wearing,
Despite his rage—for she of holy Heaven
Was born and taught; it may not be forgiven!

Her brow is crowned with glory, and its ringlets

Also golden yellow, and brighter than the wing-lets

Of rainbow-tinted dove, and beautiful
As those thin-streaming threads the gossamer
Lays loose unto the many-winded air,
To thrall the fays who come at dusk, to cull
The violet's dew, to bathe Titania fair.

Wild creatures tame at her meek innocent look,

And plays round her feet as summer brook
—And round the lilies which, like Dian's maids, Lave their white limbs in the cool-watered slade.

The fery lion will crouch down in meekness, While her hand smooths his rough mane to the sleepiness*

Of her own golden hair and silken lashes;
And yet her eye sometimes its anger flashes,
When fools deny her wisdom, and despise
Her revelations and deep mysteries.

Who that beholds her may refrain adoring,
When upward-looking as an eagle soaring,
She holds divine communion with the skies,
And walks the uncertain waters as they rush

At her headlong course, who suddenly bust
At her smooth song, mellifluous as the lay
Piped by the early-singing birds, when Day
Comes grandly in his car; or that at noon
Of night thick-veiled to the moon,

Walking in loveliness, and silently
Sorrowing, to see Endymion lie,
Cold to love, with slumber-sealed eye.
And she is fair as that pale nightly rover;
Tender as Venus of her wounded lover;

Harmless as Love when Psyche hid his arrows;
Gentle as Lærbia fondling tame sparrows;

* Poetry and Music are here considered as one and the same.

Sweet-voiced as whispered words of passionate wooers;

Quiet as murmuring of those happy coveys,
The amorous doves; soothing as the bee's
Faint drowsy hum, when nestling on a flower,
And surfeiting on sweetness. The loitering breeze,

That whispers with the leaves in lady's bower,
Is noisy in its stillness to't. 'Twill be Awful more ravelling than airs of Italy;

Then subtle and lofty as discharge
Of the thunder-clouds, when at some mountain-targe

Their crushing bolt is levelled; then terrible,
Being moved, as the deep groan of painful
bell,

The roar of raging seas, or boisterous breath
Of the storm-wind, which speaks the wrath of death.

Ah, how may I by my rough lines express
Her grace, her meekness, and sweet winning-
ness;

And how repeat the music of her sighs,
Which scarce would wait the light down when it lies,

Windfalls, upon a motionless flower's head;
How tell one thing that she hath done or said;
How paint her eloquent look; and the bright meaning

Of her sweet smile, that cheers one like the greening
Of the spring meadows, seen through melting snows;

How tell the kindness, the sweet dispose,
The sympathy withal, of her fine heart,
That weeps for sorrow of another's woe,
And smarts for pity of another's smart;

How tell in sandy deserts if she roam,
Trees bloom in bowers, drest in May's sweet bloom;

And sudden as shot stars, flowers from verdant beds
Spring up alert with youth, and bow their heads,

Like worshipping Persians at their god's new rise,
Doing her homage in most reverent wise;

And waters at her wish, as Eden's sheen,
About her feet gush coolingly, and run
Like beamy light new bursting from the sun;

And nothing else but beauty soon is seen,
Where freshness, fragrance, and green life had never been.

The lowly and the mean her still small whispering
Voice have heard in loneliness, much wondering

Whence such sweet sounds might come. The nobiest men

Of the o'erpass'd time, like meek awe'd children,
Have sat attentive to her high discourse,
That drew their souls from earth to where her song had source.

And hope-dلف spirits have unwearingly kept
Long lonely vigils, while the unthoughted slept, Waiting and watching her approach. Their feet
Have tracked her to her secret retreat,
And trod where none but poets dare to tread.

The crown that circled sacredly each head
By her bestowed, by her was gather'd
From heaven's immortal bowers these angels wreathed

And fragrant made, for on them they had breathed.

Oh! great reward of their ambitious toil,
That labour might not weary—danger foil,
These men are deathless now—eternal heirs
Of an eternal heritage; and their's

An ever-during crown of gems and gold,
And orient glory. Oh! might proud kings be told

Of these rich crowns, that nor unrest nor pain
Cost them that wear, nor seas of blood to gain,
Nor kingdoms wreck and ravage to maintain,
Sure they would meek and lowly grow, and spurn

Their bubble sceptre of a day, and yearn
To pass the portal of a poet's grave,
So they might win a wise renewer, and have
Their deaths lamented, and a hallow'd name

Synonymous with virtue—old as fame;
Then, durable as the stars, their body names
Would live in heaven, when the bolt smothering flames

Of its volcanic bosom have calcined
This poor, and proud, and perishable world,
With all its quenchless waters, gathered and curled,

And dried like shrivelled scrolls, and to the wind

In ashes from the Almighty hand loose hurl'd.

Then mock not poetry. Oh! to be dumb,
Tongueless, and mouth-shut as the silent tomb,
Were better than such babbling! The stern and rude

Inhabiter of rudest climes is learned
In this most learned lore. 'Tis understood
Of wisdom, and hath had his praise—not earned

Easily, nor oft. Believe it is the soul's
Untutor'd language, which pedantry controls
No more than doth the wind the giant sea,
Who most opposed is strongest, and speaks
most angrily.

Oh, ever-eloquent poetry! wreather
Of fair and deathless flowers—continual breather

Of songs which never die—no new inspire
To tell, in smiling verse, of when thy lyre
Was heard in heaven, how the stern godhead smiled

At its new voice, and by it was beguiled
Of his just wrath against that sinful twin
From Paradise out-driven, never again To wander their birth-bower. How, swift as thought,

The priceliest angels, soon as their ears caught
Thy fainting feelings, fluttered fast around,
And drank its vast varieties of sound
In silence solemn wrapt, and listening,

And on thy voice as on th' Almighty's hung.
How Gabriel awhile did stand astounded,
His earnest eyes with a mixed rapture glitten-
ing,—

(Excessive rapture, sister to sad Pain),
Till, with a gentle glance of self-disdain,
Far down into the depths of space he flung
That startling trumpet, which had frequent rung Alarm through farthest heaven, when angels
warred

Madly and wickedly with their liege Lord;
But were soon quailed, and conquered to be spared

And Justice's sword suddenly sheathed as barred;
How him, rebellious then, since God exiled,
Melted in rage, and, like a toward child, Stood proud-subdued and weeping, was forgiven;

And with heaven's shouts the clouds shook under heaven,
And the huge hearth, with its surrounding sea,
Roll'd in its trembling orbit giddily.

'Twas then, proud Poetry, that tears like rain
(The first by angels wept, and not for pain,
But joy,) watered the everlasting throe.
That day is yet a jubilee. 'Tis known

The souls of God's and nature's poets? then Were flamed—the pride of heaven, and there,
and men!

These high and holy themes may not be sung
By lump faint-voiced as mine, and loosely strung
O, pardon my mad spirit, which would dare
To soar thy giddy heights, and beat the air
That swims serene round heaven with wings profane!

And pardon my rash tongue, too weak and vain
To win thy judging ear! I did but rave
Like to a petted child, for things I may not have.

My soul is fever'd with its restless rage,
And thirsts for glory, which will ne'er assume Till a soft-gushing rill, fresh from the clear Sweet fount of Helicon, flow coolingly between Me and my green resolve, and medicine
My warring mind to peace, now nothing spent
With its determined toil; nor shall it rest
With indolent ease on her calm couch, content
To live with her, and do as should her guest,
Till Fame's own crown is won and safe possessed.

Ere this great gain be mine, much I must toil,
And waste the sap of youth with midnight oil,
Working unseen, uncheered, as miners toil,
Yet come at last in presence of the sun,
And show the labours they untask'd have done,
By the all-buying wealth which they have won.
So I must labour in the mines' mines,
And delve for wit—the diamond that shines
Brilliantly ever; and thought—the golden ore
That maketh the soul rich. Oh! never more Shall my soul faint in its brave task; but I, Like warrior doomed, who knoweth his must die

In th' imminent breach, yet enters gallantly,
Will wage this hopeful, doubtful, studious strife,
That works out fame eternal, but wears out life.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Geraldi Duval, the Coronation, and Monsieur Tonson, still reign at this theatre, and still bring good houses. On two or three evenings lately, the pit has been so crowded, that upwards of two hundred persons got upon the platform leading across it to the stage, and were only prevailed upon to quit it by being accommodated with room in the upper boxes. The Coronation has now been exhibited fifty successive evenings, a circumstance almost unprecedented in this age of spectacle. Wearied as we are of the monotony which prevails at this theatre, we are happy to find that some novelties are forthcoming, among which are a new comedy; and report adds, a grand spectacle, in which forty horses will be introduced on the stage, representing the principal events of his Majesty's visit to Ireland. This is a somewhat questionable subject; and, when we consider that a piece founded upon it was condemned the first night at Astley's, (where it is very unusual to damn any piece,) we hope Mr. Elliston will pause before he incurs so heavy an expense as it must necessarily create. We do not hear any thing of Mr. Kem's engagement at this theatre, for the season; indeed, at present, there is nothing for him to do. Mr. Walluck, we understand, has gone to America. Munden, it is said, has renewed his engagement with Mr. Elliston. We are glad of it, for these are not the times in which we can spare him from the stage.

• Milton and Shakespeare.

COVENT GARDEN.—Farquhar's excellent comedy of the Beaux Stratagem, was performed at this theatre on Friday night, when Mr. Drinkwater Meadows made his first appearance on the London boards, in the character of Scrub. Mr. Meadows is the son of a comic performer, who was for many years a great favourite in the northern counties; he is young, well made, and has an expressive countenance. With these qualifications, and others of a higher cast, a good knowledge of the stage, and a correct conception of his character, he played the part of Scrub with great success. Unlike too many of our modern comedians, (and tragedians too,) he does not seek to create effect by artificial means, but trusts to a faithful portrait of his author; grimace forms no part of his acting, which is chaste without tameness, and humorous without extravagance. His rustic imitations of Archer were admirable, and close even to minuteness; but the scene with the thieves was the best; and the manner in which he rushed in on the alarm being that 'the honest gentlemen were robbing the house,' was quite in character; and, between his efforts to huddle on his clothes, and his blustering timidity to escort the persons out, he elicited shouts of laughter and applause. The début of Mr. Meadows was completely successful, and if he continues to study English comedy, and not English comedians, he will rise to the very summit of his profession; even now he is a very valuable accession to this already powerful company. Jones, in Archer, is so gay, lively, and genteel a footman, that we do not wonder that, even in the disguise of a servant, he is a great favourite with the ladies. Emery, as the Hounslow Captain, Gilbert, gave a most accurate and forcible delineation of the character; his face, figure, dress, and demeanour, all combined to give fidelity to the portrait. Mr. Abbott, in Aimwell, made a polite and gallant beau; and Connor's Foulard is one of his best characters. His unruffled firmness, when, in a brogue that would betray him to all the world, he declared himself to be a French priest, was highly ludicrous. Yates, with all his artificial stuffing, made but a very indifferent Boniface; the rich humour and joviality of this prince of publicans is not to be conveyed or expressed by a mere unkindness of person, though Mr. Yates seemed to think that therein lay the powerful merit. Blanchard, (though no man has less sensibility in his character,) played the character of Sullen to the life. Mr. Davison presented an excellent picture of his discontented lady. Mr. Davenport did all that Lady Bonifield had to do, as well as it could be done; and Miss Foote was charming in Cherry. We wish we could speak favourably of Miss Beaumont, in Donada; but really, a pretty person and a pretty voice are all the pretty things we can say about her. The comedy, thus strongly cast and ably supported in all its principal characters, with its own intrinsic merits, could not fail of ensuring much applause, which it certainly obtained.

On Wednesday night, the opening of Rob Roy Macgregor attracted a very crowded and elegant audience. During the absence of Mr. Macready from town, the part of Rob Roy was sustained by Mr. Yates, who seems to be a sort of dramatic at-all, or actor of all work. This gentleman is not without some talents, but they are not to be found in such characters as 'the Macgregor,' and we are sorry he does not consult his theatrical reputation more than to attempt them. Miss Halliday appeared, for the first time, as Diana Vernon, and added new claims to that approbation which she had previously obtained. Liston, as the Bailie Nicol Jarvie, in appearing for the first time this season, was most heartily welcomed. The rich humour which Liston throws into this character, makes it one of the most attractive in the opera, and it is a treat of which we never get weary. There was no novelty in the cast of the remaining characters, which are all familiar to the public.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The manager of this theatre 'holds on the tenor of his way,' in giving us other popular new pieces or good old comedies. The genuine—the elegant drama reigns at this theatre, and reigns successfully amid all the spectacular attractions of larger houses. Whether the taste for the drama may or may not be on the decline, we will not pretend to determine, but we were always of the opinion (and the success of this house confirms it) that the legitimate drama, if performed in theatres of proper dimensions, would insure patronage enough to render it ultimately more advantageous to the proprietors of theatres than the splendid pageants which they exhibit at so much expense.

We might say something of the difference between encouraging a taste for the genuine drama, and vitiating it, but that would have little influence where money-making is the sole object of theatrical speculation.

On Tuesday night, the comedy of The Jealous Wife was performed, for the first time at the New Haymarket Theatre. The character of Mrs. Oakley, a finished picture of female weakness and want of temper, was sustained with great force and effect by Mrs. Johnson. She developed the alarming progress of jealousy, from the little leaven of suspicion to the tortures of conviction, with fearful reality. Her over-bearing rage, impatience of control, and fretfulness of disposition, were given with all the force and truth of nature. Mr. Conway, though not so good an Oakley as we have seen, played the character very respectably. Terry, as his brother, the Major, taught him how to 'rule a wife' with great confidence, and gave full force to a bachelor's invectives against the lovely sex. De Camp's Lord Trunket was by no means good. Williams bustled through Russet pretty well, and was quite as hasty and passionate as the character required. Oxberry's Sir Harry Beagle was tolerable, but Lucy's Charles execrable. Miss Boyce very agreeably disappointed us in Lady Freelove, which she played with much discrimination; and, in the scene in which she feeds the jealousy of Mrs. Oakley, she displayed considerable ingenuity. The comedy was received with much applause by a crowded audience.

ADRIANUS THEATRE.—This lively little theatre, which has been renovated and decorated with much taste and brilliancy of effect, opened for the season, on Monday night, with a new comic burlesque, called Capers at Canterbury. It is a lively bustling piece, in which there was much good acting by Wrench (who is engaged at this theatre), Wilkinson, and some others of the favourites of last season, among whom we noticed Mr. Callaghan, who, as Brian O'Boggie, is a very amusing Irishman. Half an Hour's Courtship, in which Mr. Watkins Burroughs is the hero of the piece, and the favourite pantomime of the Fairy of the North Star (which has been revived), finished the evening's amusement, much to the satisfaction of a very crowded house.

Literature and Science.

Bonaparte's Memoirs.—Counts Bertrand and Montholon have stated, through the public journals, that the 'Manuscript venu de St. Helene,' 'Des Pensées,' 'Maximes,' 'Sentences,' 'Memoires Secret,' 'Napoleon peint par lui même,' 'Chagrins Domestiques,' 'Vers,' &c. &c. published or announced as the productions of the Emperor Napoleon, are not by him, and that his MSS. have not been communicated to any person. They also state, that the memoirs announced under their names are not by them.

Night Clocks.—The west dial of the Tron Church, at Glasgow, has been illuminated at night with complete success. The apparatus consists of a No. 1 Argand burner, placed a few feet out from the top of the dial, and inclosed in a newly hemispherical lantern, the front of which is glazed. The back forms a parabolical reflector; the dial receives not only the direct, but also a continual stream of reflected rays; and is thus so brilliantly illuminated, that the hours and hands can be seen with nearly the same distinctness at a distance as during the day-time. By a simple contrivance, the clock disengages, about sun-rise, a small detent, somewhat similar to the larum in wooden clocks, which shuts the gas-cock, and so instantly extinguishes the light.

A subscription has been opened for a whole length marble statue of the late Sir Joseph Banks, to be executed by Chantry, and to be placed in the hall of the British Museum. More than 2000*l.* was subscribed in a few days towards this object, which is a just tribute to the zeal of the late president of the Royal Society.

The Latitude.—The Annales Maritimes report the discovery of a new method to determine the latitude, by a single non-meridian height, deduced from two other heights, taken in a very short space of time.

Mr. Ryan, the author of the 'Worthies of Ireland,' has in the press, Eight Ballads on the Fictions of the Ancient

Irish, and several miscellaneous poems, and is also preparing for publication, a catalogue of works, in various languages, relative to the history, antiquities, and language of the Irish; with remarks, critical and biographical.

Height of Mountains.—Mr. J. G. Jackson, who has published descriptive works of Southern and Western Barbary, and who has more than once crossed the chain of Mount Atlas, has published an observation which calls for an accurate investigation. From observations made by Mr. Colebrook, in India, on the heights of Mount Himala, his calculation is that, from some of the crests of that enormous range being visible at the distance of two hundred and eleven English miles, their elevation should be twenty-eight thousand feet above the sea. Mr. Jackson has applied this rule to measure the height of certain elevated points of Atlas, on the eastern side of Morocco, which are visible at sea twenty miles from the coast, westerly, and in the direction of Mogadore. Hence it will follow that the elevation of these heights would be more than twenty-nine thousand English feet above the level of the Atlantic, and, of course, the highest on the globe, as to any known measurement.

New Russian Voyage of Discovery.—Early last year, the foreign journals announced an expedition fitting out by the Russian government, to explore the coasts of Siberia and Asia, and to get further information of three newly discovered islands in the Glacial Ocean*. These islands lie opposite the mouth of the river Jana, and have received the collective name of New Siberia. A letter from Dr. Erdmann, professor in the University of Dorpt, communicates some details relative to this enterprise.

It has long been known to the neighbouring inhabitants and the hunters of Terra Firma, who had made excursions in that quarter, that there existed an unknown country which had been noticed in several maps; but its extent remained unknown, till an inhabitant

* Accounts from Captain Billingshausen, commander in the Russian Voyage of Discovery in the Atlantic seas, (as received at Petersburg from Botany Bay, his letter dated May 1850, report that he had discovered the islands covered with snow and ice, on one of which was a volcano, lat. 50° south. He announces that there is no southern continent, or should there be one, it must be inaccessible from being covered with perpetual snow, ice, &c.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.

The Third Report of the Committee of the Society for the Improvement of Prison Discipline, and for the Reformation of Juvenile Offenders. With an Appendix. 8vo. pp. 212. London, 1821.

Among the numerous societies which this country may justly boast, formed "to inquire the wretched out, and court the offices of soft humanity," there is not one calculated to render such great and important services to society, as that which has been formed for the improvement of prison discipline. For all the philanthropic Howard long ago laid open the secrets of the prison-house, and exhibited many affecting scenes of human misery, yet his researches were chiefly directed to the removal of such diseases as were incidental to prisons, and the alleviation of bodily suffering. The moral evils of imprisonment, its unavoidable tendency to corrupt, as well as the means by which it might be rendered instrumental to reclaim, were subjects which had not become the topic of direct investigation, and in which public feeling had been very little interested. It was reserved for the present day, and for the present society, whose Report is now before us, to investigate the actual tendency of punishments, the true ends to which they ought alone to be directed, and to render prisons places for moral discipline as well as salutary restraint. In this work of beneficence, to the eternal honour of the sex, a female was the first to lead the way.

When Mrs. Fry first visited the prison at Newgate, she found nearly three hundred women sent there for every gradation of crime; some untried, and others under sentence of death, all crowded together; their ferocious manners and expressions towards each other were horrible, and such a den of iniquity was witnessed as might have appalled the stoutest heart, and cooled the zeal of the most ardent enthusiast. One year's unceasing labour of Mrs.

Fry, however, quite changed the scene. Riot, licentiousness, and filth, were exchanged for order, sobriety, and comparative neatness, in the chamber, the apparel, and the persons of the prisoners. There was no longer to be seen an assemblage of abandoned and shameless creatures, half-naked and half-drunk. The prison no longer resounded with obscenity, imprecations, and licentious songs. To use the strong but just expression of one who knew the prison well, "this hell upon earth exhibited the appearance of an industrious manufactory or a well regulated family." The magistrates visiting the prison, soon became sensible of the valuable services Mrs. Fry rendered to the wretched victims of crime and misery, and the Grand Jury of London, in February, 1818, declared, that "if the principles which govern her regulations were adopted towards the males as well as females, it would be the means of converting a prison into a school of reform; and, instead of sending criminals back into the world, (as is now too generally the case,) hardened in vice and depravity, they would be restored to it repentant, and probably become useful members of society."

We have deemed it necessary to state these facts, to show what has been done; for the improvement of prison discipline is not a chimerical project or a fanciful theory, but is really practicable. But to return to the Report. The committee have, in the course of their labours, ascertained the highly important fact, that a well-regulated system of prison discipline represses crime; and that the dread of it is such, that few prisoners, after their discharge from a good gaol, return to it, while the number of re-committals to a bad prison is generally considerable. It has been discovered, that since Mrs. Fry began to visit the prison, the number of re-committals have diminished forty per cent. One of the most important features in prison discipline is the employment of the prisoners, which, we are happy to find, has now been introduced into several gaols, where there was nothing but idleness. Constant labour, the classification of prisoners, the establishment of schools, and a well-regulated system of religious instruction, whenever introduced into a gaol, have never failed in effectuating the most salutary reform. This has been proved not only in the London prisons, but in those in the country, in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. In the last-mentioned country, the Dublin Association, for the improvement of prisons, have been very active, and with great success. The condition of almost every gaol has been ascertained:—

"This investigation has given publicity to many scenes of suffering. Of one gaol, the committee write, "We found some of the prisoners lying on straw. In one cell, seven and a-half feet by seven feet, three men slept every night. In every part the dirt was most disgusting. The want of classification is horrible in its effects. The worst felons are mixed with those guilty, and even accused only of petty misdemeanours. Great numbers must have passed through this gaol within the last few years; each man forced into temporary contact with vice, in its most abandoned form, and then sent home to spread the pollution through his family and neighbourhood."

"Of another prison, they say, "It is scarcely possible to conceive a combination of causes less calculated to correct, and more liable to corrupt both body and mind, than that which this gaol exhibits. Committal to it inflicts an immediate and a heavy punishment, which, through disease, may amount to actual privation of life."

"Adverting to another gaol, it is remarked, "Beyond locking up the prisoners in their sleeping cells, no means of separation are afforded for either males or females, debtors or felons, old or young, tried or untried; and the melancholy effects are daily visible in corrupting the innocent, and hardening the criminal. Instances are by no means rare, of persons committed for venial misdemeanours, when turned out, becoming confirmed offenders."

Now "let us look on this picture and on that:—

"At Sligo, it is stated, that "the labours of the visiting committee have greatly prospered; the conduct of the prisoners has been wonderfully improved, and the greatest decorum now prevails in every part of the building.

During the last year, the number of commitments was less than one-half that of former years, and not one of those who received instruction has been re-committed for any offence. Several depraved females, it is known, have returned to the paths of virtue and industry, in consequence of the humane exertions of ladies visiting this prison.

At Kilmainham, not one of the prisoners who were the subjects of the committee's labours, have been re-committed to it since their discharge; though in every other class of prisoners, where their time is devoted to idleness and guilt, frequent and melancholy instances have occurred of their return into confinement, under fresh and aggravated charges.

There is another object in which this society in England has laboured with equal zeal, if not with equal success—the reformation of juvenile offenders. From the investigations of the committee, they have ascertained, with some degree of certainty, that there are upwards of eight thousand boys in the metropolis, who subsist in a material degree by depredations on the public. A great proportion of these boys are passing constantly through the prisons, thus ripening into the most atrocious offenders; and on their release they are industriously engaged in spreading the knowledge and practice of crime. Some of these have not distress to plead on their behalf, and have friends earnestly desirous to assist them; the greatest portion, however, are nursed in depravity and tutored in crime. At an early age they are turned into the streets, and dare not return to their homes without a certain sum, the fruits of mendicancy or theft. The committee, in visiting the several prisons of the metropolis, found many cases of boys who were quite friendless, and who, on their discharge from confinement, literally knew not where to lay their heads. In order to assist such, a temporary refuge has been instituted, which has had the good effect of reclaiming and providing for many youthful victims of crime. The committee attribute much of juvenile delinquency to the number of fairs in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and recommend their abolition by the legislature.

The example that has been so gloriously set in this country for the improvement of prison discipline, has been followed in many foreign countries, particularly France, Russia, and Sweden. In Russia, a prison discipline society was formed by the indefatigable exertions of a valuable member of the committee in England, Mr. Walter Venning. This gentleman sacrificed health, interest, comfort, and society, to encounter vice, misery, disease, and even death. Like Howard, he was devoted to the task of assuaging the miseries and promoting the improvement of his fellow creatures, and, like him, fell a victim to his exertions:—

Assiduously engaged in visiting one of the prisons in St. Petersburg, Mr. Venning contracted a fever, which terminated his existence on the 10th January last.

Soon after the formation of the Society, Mr. Venning joined the committee, and very essentially contributed, by his exertions, to the success of their labours. He was indefatigable in visiting the goals of the metropolis, and ever earnest in his endeavours to restore the criminal, but especially the youthful offender, to the paths of religion and virtue. During his late residence in Russia, a period of nearly four years, his time has been unceasingly devoted to the amelioration of the goals in that country. He presented to the Emperor Alexander a memorial, forcibly pointing out the great national advantages that result from the improvement of prison discipline, and the wisdom and practicability of rendering punishment the instrument of reformation. The justice of these views was acknowledged, and to carry them into effect, an association was formed at St. Petersburg, under the imperial sanction. This association has been productive of extensive good, by introducing improvements in the construction of places of confinement, and regulations calculated to preserve the health, and promote the moral and religious interests of the criminal. It is needless to add, that in these philanthropic labours Mr. Venning eminently shared; and long, very long, will the wretched and the guilty confined in the prisons of the Russian empire, have reason to revere his name and bless his memory.

The Appendix to the Report contains numerous extracts from the correspondence of the committee, which give an interesting account of the principal goals in the united kingdom. In most of those where labour is introduced, the prisoners are not only reformed, but the expenses of the establishments are essentially relieved. At the general Penitentiary, at Millbank, the earnings of the prisoners are upwards of 4000l. annually, and the expenses of the establishment 25,000l. The dietary of this establishment is as follows:—

For breakfast, one pint of hot gruel or porridge.

For dinner on Sundays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, six ounces of clod, stickings, or other coarse pieces of beef, (without bone, and after boiling,) with half a pint of the broth made therefrom, and one pound of boiled potatoes. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, one quart of broth for the males, and one pint for the females, thickened with Scotch barley, rice, potatoes, or peas, with the addition of cabbages, turnips, and other cheap vegetables.

For supper, one pint of hot gruel or porridge; also every day one-half pound of bread, made of such meal as the committee may direct, for every male prisoner under the age of eighteen years, and one pound for every other prisoner. But the boys under eighteen years may have the full allowance of bread, if the chaplains and governor shall certify that their conduct has been meritorious during the week preceding.

The expense of food alone per week, is stated in evidence before the Lords' Committee on Goals, to be 4s. 9d. each male prisoner, and 6d. less for the females. The expense of food at Deane's House of Correction, is 2s. 3d. to 2s. 6d. per week; that at Preston, (both prisons being in full work,) is stated, for the year ending 2d May last, to be 2s. 1d. If the cost of the Millbank dietary were reduced 1s. viz. to 3s. 9d. per head, for five hundred and fifty prisoners, more than 1400l. per annum might be saved. It is much to be desired, for the credit of the Penitentiary system, that this institution should be regulated with as strict regard to economy as is consistent with the objects of the establishment.

From the account of a visit to the prisons in France, made in December, 1820, we make one extract, from which it would appear, that juvenile delinquency is by no means uncommon in France; but we shudder at the idea of consigning a child of seven years old to any prison, and that too for a period of a dozen years. Our extract relates to the prisons in the department of the Upper Rhine:—

Colmar Prison.—This is a wretched place, constructed out of an ancient convent. It contained seventy-seven prisoners, seven of whom were galleyers. The prison was calculated to hold one hundred and fifty, but five hundred have occasionally been put into it. There was no employment and no instruction. The men prisoners, except the galleyers, were all together. Two boys, one about ten years old, who had stolen a child's chair, appeared to be hardened thieves. The galleyers were locked up when they were not walking in the court, which they are allowed for four hours a-day. The women also had this permission. The prison was well ventilated. No clothing is allowed. The sick are sent to a neighbouring hospital. An addition is now making to the buildings of this prison.

'Ensisheim Maison Centrale de Detention.—This is a depot for prisoners convicted and sentenced to more than a year's confinement, and many are sentenced for life. This depot is for eight departments, Haut Rhin, Bas Rhin, Moselle, Meurthe, Vosges, Haut Soane, Doubs, and Jura. There are now in it six hundred and fifty prisoners, but it is capable of containing a larger number. It is divided into classes for men and women, correctional and criminal; there are also courts for the sick; making in all six courts. The young have also a sort of separation, but it is little more than nominal. There was one boy who had been sentenced for stealing at seven and-a-half years of age, and who is to remain till he is twenty years old. The boys have some instruction given them. The number of women was about two hundred and seventy. The prisoners were all at work picking cotton, by which they get from five to six francs per week; of this, one-sixth goes to the entrepreneur, one-sixth to the governor, one-third to the prisoners weekly, and one-third on his discharge. The entrepreneur is a sort of merchant, who supplies all, and pays for the work at a rate fixed, every quarter, by the society of arts and manufactures at Mulhausen. The prisoners have two hours per day allowed for exercise and meals; the rest of the day they are obliged to work. Their allowance of food is 1½ lbs of bread, ½ wheat, and ½ barley, each day; besides potatoes or peas, and rice, with meat, the first Sunday in the month. This house was built for a Maison de Mendicité; it is not calculated for a prison, as it admits of no inspection. Instruction is very incomplete, and there seemed a considerable want of discipline.'

In the Report on the State of Prisons in Switzerland, we find that the untried prisoners are by far the most hardly dealt with:—

'Not only are they in general very long in being brought to trial, but their places of confinement are most cruel. One or two cases will serve to illustrate this. A man was found shut up in a tower situated in the middle of a river. He was its only human inhabitant. His gaoler came three times a-day in a boat to examine his chain and bring him food, and his judges from time to time, as they proceeded in his examination. He was chained to his bed, from which he could not move far, and had no chair or table, nor fire, instruction, or comfort, but a few old books. He could indeed see the sky, but that only. He had been in this situation for twelve months, and even then it was not determined whether he was guilty or not. In the same tower was a room about sixteen feet square, without light altogether, or air, except what passed through a narrow funnel. In this place they told me that a man had been on one occasion confined eleven months. In another prison, a large apartment in the tower of an ancient convent, a man was found who had been taken up on suspicion, and had been confined forty-eight days. The window was unglazed, but not large enough to admit light. The room was very cold. The straw on which the prisoner lay was almost black with use, and his clothes had not been changed since his confinement. He was, he said, covered with vermin. These are, it is to be hoped, singular cases, yet it is the general treatment of untried prisoners in this country.'

The prisons in Italy are generally ill constructed and badly regulated; but this country can boast of a female who, following the example of our distinguished countrywoman, 'seeks the wretched out.' After describing the state of the prison at Turin, where, out of twenty-four women, eight were sick, we are told, that,—

'Although these poor women were in so wretched a state, their situation was better in other respects, for they were all decently clothed, and employed in different works. I afterwards learned that they were indebted for this to the kindness and generosity of a lady, equally distinguished by her rank and piety, who had been exiled to this work by the accounts she had heard of Newgate, and who, not finding other help, herself did the whole work of a committee, relieving their necessities, giving them work, reading to them and instructing them in their duties, and preventing, in some measure, the evil which must have resulted both in this world and another, from their confinement in this miserable place.

'Prison at Villa Franca.

'This prison is for the reception of the Galley-slaves, as they are called. It is situated near the port, where a considerable number of the slaves are conducted to work, during the day. Others, convicted of lesser offences, are allowed to walk out, chained two together, accompanied by a guard. These wear the prison dress, upon which the word "Galereen" is marked on their back. Parties of them were almost daily to be seen in the streets of Nice, offering for sale various useful articles and trinkets of their own manufacture in prison; they appeared to behave with great submission; and, as long as they conduct themselves quietly, they are not interfered with by their guard, who closely follows them, and stops with them, whenever they like to offer their goods. Others, who are committed for life, were not suffered to partake of this indulgence.'

In a letter from Mr. Venning, (whose death we have already noticed,) giving an account of the prisons of Russia, we have the following interesting details:—

'In consulting the annals of Russia, which you will perceive has been done by the interesting details contained in the pamphlets of the proceedings of our committee, you will find that works of love and mercy always did, and do still, constitute a distinct characteristic of this nation.

'As these pamphlets are in the Russian language, the following extract from one of them, perhaps, may not be uninteresting:—

"Makrius, who, in former times, was metropolitan of all Russia, at the marriage of the Czar Ivan Vassilovitch with the Czarina Anastasia, in his speech to him, said, among other things, 'act towards the needy with mercy; protect the widows, the orphans, and the injured; and visit those who are confined in prison.' In those times, Boyarin Sheremetoff was also well known by his works of mercy. He gave away his fortune. When asked by the emperor, 'where have you spent your property?' he answered, 'I spent it with the poor of this world.' The Czar Mechila Federovitch regularly furnished all the needy exiles to Siberia with money from his own private funds, to assist them on their long journey. The Czar Alexey Mechalovitch (father of Peter the Great) visited the prisons once every year in plain attire, pardoned trivial offenders, and sent all the prisoners bread from his own table. His two wives followed the example of the philanthropic emperor. The first, Czarina Maria Ilenekna, appropriated great sums to the liberation of prisoners; and Czarina Natalia Kirilovna satisfied all the wants of the prisons and the hospitals by her presents, visited them during the night, and with her own hands distributed clothes to the indigent."

'And it is added, and I believe with justice too, that in general with difficulty will the man be found in this empire who would not by some means, however inconsiderable, testify his commiseration for the unfortunate in prison.

'I have again the painful task of announcing to you that the Ladies' Committee have sustained a very severe loss in the decease of their president, her Excellency Mrs. Kazadavleff. I shall not soon forget her kindness to the prisoners, or the friendship with which she honoured me. One of the last instances of her kindness which I witnessed was towards a poor female prisoner, a native of Little Russia, who, after having received part of her punishment, was to be exiled to Siberia for life, but she was too weak to go far; the guard had not conducted her out of the city, before she fell down in the street through extreme weakness, and they were obliged to bring her back to the prison, where we found her in a most miserable condition: her deplorable state immediately attracted the attention of Mrs. Kazadavleff, who made herself acquainted with all her wants, and instantly supplied some of them: but her kindness did not stop here: she succeeded in her application that she might not be sent off till she was perfectly recovered. A comfortable bed was provided for her in the hospital of the town prison, to which she was removed, and where, by attention and care, her life was for some time prolonged; and, although she did not recover, she had the consolation of knowing that she had in her last illness a true, a disinterested and sympathizing friend, in this lady. Her Excellency Mrs. Tolstoy, daughter of Field Marshal Koutsoff, has been appointed president of the Ladies' Committee. A temporary building has been granted to the Ladies' Committee, until the new prison be erected for the female prisoners, almost adjoining the town prison. The plans are nearly ready. Separate dormitories are to be made for debtors as well as for criminals. There are some doubts entertained how the sleeping cells are to be sufficiently heated by warm air, and I will thank you to give me information on this subject, as the plans now drawing, are principally under my direction.

The Prince Galitzin, in his address at the Annual Meeting of the General Committee of the St. Petersburg Prison Society, in January, 1820, pays an elegant tribute to the memory of Mr. Venning, whom he calls a second Howard. He says,—

"Since the year 1817, Mr. Venning had resided in Russia, and though little, or rather altogether unknown at first, it may be said that he himself then performed the work of a whole society. With the highest permission granted to him, he examined the state of the prisons, houses of correction, and poor houses in St. Petersburg, Iver, and Moscow. Many reforms and improvements were made according to his suggestions, and a particular attention was thereby excited towards this department.

"His indefatigable exertions to promote the establishment of a Tutel Society for the prisoners here, were at last crowned with the desired success. On the 19th of July, 1819, his Imperial Majesty was pleased to give his sanction to such a society; and the act declaring its formation testifies, that Mr. Venning was the first person who suggested the idea among us, of such a beneficent institution. His joy and delight at this event, so much desired for by him, seemed to make a deep impression on his mind, and from that period, a kind of sacred bond seemed to unite him to Russia. Last year, he was a co-operator in the establishment of a Prison Committee at Cronstadt, and though his active love for suffering humanity excited him subsequently to resolve on visiting England and other places, where he expected to exert himself in a new sphere of usefulness, yet he always proposed in his mind to return to Russia. At last, he took his departure for Denmark, with a view to form a Prison Society there; but it is well known, that by the ship being wrecked in a storm, his voyage was prevented, and it was only by a special act of a gracious Providence that he was saved from the most imminent danger, and brought back again to St. Petersburg. After this, notwithstanding the shock which his health had received, he ceased not, during the autumn, to look out for a fit opportunity to depart, but adverse winds obliged him to remain here.

"Thus, the Almighty disposer of events ordained that he should lay down the frail tabernacle of his body here, in order to be clothed with an "eternal one not made with hands;" that he should here finish his earthly career, in order to commence another in our Father's kingdom which is on high.

"Out of love and sincere esteem for the memory of our deceased colleague, I have a proposal to make, to which you will doubtless all accede, that you allow me to communicate the decease of Mr. Venning to his Imperial Majesty, and to ask the gracious permission of his majesty to erect on the spot, where the mortal remains of this friend of mankind rest, a humble, yet becoming monument, in testimony of the meek Christian qualities and labours of the deceased; and of the esteem of the members of the St. Petersburg Committee of the Tutel Society for prisoners, for his memory, towards the establishment of which society he was the most active instrument. Not splendour, nor vain show, nor empty eulogy, ought to constitute the symbols and ornaments of this monument, but a simplicity which shall speak to the heart, and excite to pious reflection. While Russia has to shew near one frontier the ashes of his countryman, who marked the first traces of amelioration in the condition of prisoners, and of the sick and the suffering, let her also show another monument of a second Howard."

To the friends of humanity, the Third Report of the Society for the Improvement of Prison Discipline must be highly gratifying, as it not only shews that a great deal of good has been done, but points out an ample field for future exertions.

LIVES OF EMINENT SCOTSMEN.

Parts II. and III.

WHEN we noticed the first part of this elegant little work, we spoke very decisively as to what we deemed its merits—the originality of the memoirs, the elegance with which many of them were written, and the spirit of impartiality and free inquiry which distinguished the whole: these, it will be allowed, are strong recommendations to any work, particularly to a biographical one; but strong as they are, the two subsequent parts do not render it necessary that we should qualify them. One thing we certainly must regret, the want of regularity in the publication. The first part, we believe, appeared on the first of May, to be succeeded by one monthly. Six parts are now due, but three only have appeared; a fourth is, however, promised for the first of next month. Whether this delay is of a temporary or a permanent nature, we know not, but however injurious we think the want of punctuality may be to a periodical (and we think it highly so), yet even this is much better than that the work should suffer by haste; and it is, perhaps, due to the editor and publisher of the "Lives of Eminent Scotsmen," to attribute the delay to their anxiety to do the work ample justice.

The second and third parts, now before us, contain twenty-two memoirs, including the lives of James the Fifth and Sixth, Henry the Minstrel, Sir David Lindsay, the Earl of Stirling, Alexander Barclay, Dr. Armstrong, Thomson, Macpherson, &c. The life of one of the most amiable of the Stewarts, James the Fifth, is well written; and justice is done to the memory of this "King of the Poor," in the following estimate of his character:—

"The mere narrative of such a life as James's, makes any summary of his character unnecessary: there are no incongruities to reconcile, no great faults to be put in proper balance; it is throughout vigorous, splendid, and consistent. It still remains, however, to fill up the sketch, which a feeble hand has attempted to present, of the leading events of his history, with some traits, which, though not less interesting, rest, as it were, in shadow. It has been seen how indefatigable James was in the administration of justice, but it has yet to be told, that he was the first of the Scottish monarchs who took care to make known to the people what their rights were. In 1540, he ordered the whole Acts of Parliament of his reign to be printed in the vulgar tongue; a measure quite as hostile to the abridgement of the feudal barons, as the more recent translation of the Scriptures into the same tongue was to the exclusive pretensions of the Romish clergy. It cannot be said that James gave encouragement to the latter; but he set an example which essentially prepared the way for it. Although not possessed of any of that religious fervour which began to distinguish the age in which he lived, and apparently little sensible of the importance of religious liberty to the spread of knowledge, James was ardently desirous for the information of his subjects in all other respects. Of the elegant and useful art, and of all branches of what was called profane learning, he was a liberal patron and active promoter. "He furnished the country," says Pitcott, "a writer not the most charitable to his memory," "with all kinds of craftsmen, silk as Frenchmen, Spainiards, and Dutchmen, quill ever was the finest of their profession that could be had; quill brought the country to great police." Lindsay, Buchanan, Bellenden, Maitland, Montgomerie, Henryson, and many others of inferior fame, were among the men of letters who contributed to shed a lustre on his reign, and who, in an age when there was no reading public, could live on the patronage of the court alone. Bellenden he employed to translate, into the Scottish tongue, the History of Scotland, by Hector Boethius, an author to whom Dr. Johnson has done the justice of saying, that he "may be justly revered as one of the revivers of elegant learning;" and, subsequently, he gave the same author a commission to execute a translation of Livy, the first of Roman historians*. In a poetical prologue which Bellenden has prefixed to the latter version, he pays a just tribute of praise to James for his encouragement of our native literature, and farther speaks of him, as being himself distinguished for his literary productions.

If the editor of this work did not, in almost every line of his work, prove that he was a true Scot, we should have suspected him to be of the sister kingdom, on account of a bull, which occurs in a note to this memoir. He tells us that James kept his court at his castle of Caithly, since called Cowdail, a name given to it in consequence of the last lord having, every day at his table, a bullock dressed entire.

It is generally known that Alexander Barclay, the translator of the 'Ship of Fools,' has been claimed by both England and Scotland; the question appears to be set at rest by the editor of this work, who adduces pretty decisive evidence that he was a Scotsman.

In the life of Thomson, which is one of the next in these volumes, the editor corrects an error into which Johnson has fallen in his 'Lives of the Poets,' when he states that Thomson's 'first want was a pair of shoes,' and that, 'for the support of all his necessities, his whole fund was his "Winter."' It appears, from a letter written by Thomson at the time, and which the editor has discovered and printed, that Thomson, though not rich, was unembarrassed, and far from wanting a pair of shoes. The literary part of this letter (which is addressed to Dr. Cranstoun) establishes a fact of some interest to the curious in poetical history, the source from which he derived the idea of his admirable poem of 'Winter.' The editor ridicules the idea of Murdoch and others, that the distinguishing qualities of Thomson's mind and heart are best discovered from his works; that those who inferred from his poems that he was a 'great lover, a great swimmer, and rigorously abstinent,' might, from the same source, have proved that he was an early riser, since he reprobated the bed of sloth most eloquently. The last memoir in the second part is that of John Oswald, who, under the name of Silvester Otway, contributed several poetical effusions to the London newspapers in 1788 or 1789. Oswald had been an officer in the army, and is better known as a politician than a poet. At the commencement of the French revolution, he warmly espoused its principles, and went to Paris, where he became a very active member of the Jacobin Club:—

'The influence which Mr. Oswald had acquired in the Jacobin Club, gave him a corresponding influence with the government of the day, over which that club, as every body knows, exercised for some time a most pernicious control. The first of Anglo-Jacobins was not to be required by any inferior appointment; they at once nominated him to the command of a regiment of infantry. The corps is said, however, not to have been of the best description, being composed of the refuse of Paris and the departments.

'Mr. Oswald had, previously to this appointment, been joined by his two sons; but true to the principle of equality, which he professed, he only made them drummers in the regiment of which he was colonel.

'The bad character of the men whom Colonel Oswald commanded, obliged him to have recourse to a system of severity in disciplining them, which, while it made them good soldiers, there is every reason to believe made him in every one a personal enemy. In the outset of his command he committed a sort of national blunder, which added nothing to his popularity. Knowing what feats his own countrymen had performed at the point of the bayonet; convinced from experience and observation that there was in a charge of cold steel something more appalling than in a hundred volleys of musketry—he conceived the notion that a regiment trained to depend entirely on the charge would be one of powerful efficiency, and certain to acquire great distinction. He proposed, therefore, to lay aside the musket in his regiment, and to substitute a pike of superior construction. The directory approved his suggestion, and the experiment was made. The men, however, could not be persuaded to view the innovation in the same light as their English colouel. They were Frenchmen, and decided upon it with French feeling. For light warfare—the brisk fire—quick retreat—and as quick return—the French soldiery have no superiors; but in that cool intrepidity which can make and sustain a charge, they have never been able to compete with the soldiers of many other countries—the Scots, the Muscovites, the Swedes, and even the Hollanders. Colonel Oswald saw, when too late to repair a bad impression, that he had mistaken the national character; he was obliged to throw away his pikes, because his men absolutely refused to be trained to the use of them.

'When the war in La Vendee broke out, Colonel Oswald's corps was one of those selected to proceed against the rebels, a distinction which it no doubt owed to having a foreign commander, who might be supposed to have fewer scruples than a native in acting against natives. In the first encounter, however, which they had with the Vendeeans, Oswald's men are generally understood to have taken advantage of the confusion of the fight to rid themselves of this advantage; they are said to have not only dispatched the father, but his two sons, youths of a most interesting character, and another English gentleman, whom Oswald had selected as worthy to share his fortunes. It is, at all events, certain that the four Englishmen fell in the fight; and whether in consequence of their own forward bravery or of the treachery of their French comrades, will probably ever remain a mystery.

'Mr. Oswald was about the common stature, but of a very commanding appearance. I have heard that, when in Paris, he affected the Roman costume; wore his collar open, and his hair à la Brutus.'

In the memoir of James the Sixth, the author takes a full and comprehensive view of the life, conduct, and policy of that weak but tyrannical monarch. The events of his reign are too well known to admit much in the way of novelty, but some of the most prominent are reprehended with just severity. The writer, after noticing the persecuting spirit of this king, in sending men to the stake for what he deemed heresy, justly observes, that—

'The history of James's life in England was stained by but too many similar acts of arbitrary cruelty. The whole of his internal government consisted, indeed, of little else than acts of aggression on the rights and liberties of his people, frequently aggravated by peculiar features of wantonness and rigour. The murder of Sir Walter Raleigh, the glory of his age and nation, to please the court of Spain; the pardon of his Majesty's favourite, the Duke of Somerset, and his lady, for poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury, after having invoked, on his knees, the vengeance of heaven on himself and his posterity, if he did not yield them up to justice; the imprisonment of the Earl of Northumberland for fourteen years, in addition to an exaction of thirty thousand pounds, on a mere suspicion, unsupported by the least proof, of his being privy to the gunpowder-plot; the committal to the Tower of several members of the House of Commons, and the banishment of others for presuming to assert that the people of England possessed any right which did not flow entirely from the grace and favour of their sovereigns: gave a few of those acts which gave a character of oppression and profligacy to the domestic administration of James, seldom before exceeded in the history of England.

‘Nor did James confine himself to conduct, the evil of which might perish with him. In the sufficiency of his self-conceit, he must needs become a legislator, and confer on England a law, which was to do the work of ignorance and inhumanity long after he should be no more. It is painful to be obliged to speak thus severely of a prince of our native line; but, can less be said of that law which first made witchcraft a crime in England, and has been the cause of consigning hundreds and thousands to an ignominious death, for an impossible offence? James had before leaving Scotland, written and published a “Treatise on Demonologie,” in which he had endeavoured, with great show of learning, to “resolve the doubting hearts of many,” as to the “fearful abounding of those detestable slaves of the devil, witches or enchanters,” and established, to his own satisfaction, that “witches ought to be put to death according to the law of God, the civil and imperial law, and the municipal law of all christian nations.” He now resolved to let his English subjects have the benefit of this sensible discovery; and found the Parliament foolish enough to concur with him in passing that law, on which so many capital convictions have taken place for witchcraft, and which remained, for upwards of a century, a disgrace to the statute-book, and to the national character.

A tyrant at home, James was a truckler abroad; and though England enjoyed an unwanted length of peace during his reign, it was a blessing gained by a sacrifice of character and advantages, for which it ill compensated. He had scarcely seized the sceptre, when he gave peace to Spain without being asked for it; and thus lost, as Cornwallis, the ambassador whom he sent to Madrid, says in a letter to Cecil, “such an opportunity of winning honour and wealth,” as England never before possessed. He afterwards allowed the Spaniards, whom he had thus foolishly favoured, to ill-treat, defraud, and even massacre British subjects with impunity. He beheld his son-in-law, the Elector Palatine, and in him the protestant cause, about to be overwhelmed by a coalition of enemies; and to save both, sent over—an aid of one regiment of foot! He saw the Palatinate lost through his pusillanimity, and then weakly imagined that he could reason princes, flushed with victory, out of their conquest. He allowed his unfortunate daughter, her husband, and her children, to drag out a long exile in a foreign land, without affording them any of those helps which duty and humanity required at his hands. He suffered the British flag, which had never before known dishonour, to be grossly insulted, and our merchant-ships to be pillaged by the Dutch; contenting himself with sending a remonstrance, which the Dutch, viewing it as it deserved, passed over unheeded. Nay, as if there had been no fitter way for an independent prince to resent injuries, than to heap favours on his enemies; notwithstanding all the Dutch had done, he consented to deliver up to them the cautionary towns which they had deposited in the hands of Queen Elizabeth, on their paying five millions less than the sum for which they stood pledged; and thus relieved them besides from that state of dependence on Britain, which had been hitherto regarded as the right arm of our continental policy. The massacre at Amboyna was now all that was wanted to place beyond doubt, whether it was possible to rouse a spark of the man or sovereign in him. He submitted to this unexampled injury, even without requiring satisfaction, and contented himself with whiningly telling the Dutch ambassador, “that he had never heard nor read a more cruel and impious act than that of Amboyna. But,” continued he, “I do forgive them, and I hope God will; but my son’s son* shall revenge this blood, and punish this horrid massacre.”

‘Need we be surprised that such a course of conduct should have made James an object of ridicule among foreign nations, and of contempt with his own? All over the continent, caricatures of him were to be seen, exhibiting him in the most ludicrous situations. In one place, he was represented with a scabbard without a sword; in another, with a sword stuck so fast in the scabbard, that nobody could draw it; and in a third, carrying a cradle after his poor daughter, the Electress Palatine, who, with dishevelled hair and tattered garments, was trudging along with a child on her back. The French had their epigram, too, on the occasion, the point of which is, with some loss of elegance, preserved in the following old version:—

‘While Elizabeth was England’s king,
That dreadful name through Spain did ring;
How alter’d is the case—aid me I
These judging days of gude Queen Jamie.’

‘James proved a false prophet. It was left to Cromwell to obtain satisfaction for this, as well as other wrongs, which Britain had endured during the reigns of his legitimate predecessors.

There are several memoirs in this part on which we would dwell, but our limits preclude it. In the life of Macpherson, the author expresses himself decidedly that ‘he was all but the sole author of the poems which he ascribed to Ossian.’ It is one of the features of this work to rescue from oblivion the names of several men of genius who had been ‘born to blush unseen.’ Among those must be ranked the unfortunate Charles Salmon, a journeyman printer of Edinburgh. He was zealous in the cause of the Pretender, and was the author of some Jacobite songs, and ‘An Elegy written in the Abbey Church, Edinburgh,’ Salmon was a dissipated young man:—

‘At the suggestion of some of the more prudent of his gay companions, Salmon issued proposals for publishing a collection of his poetical effusions, under the modest title of “Poems by a Printer.” From the misfortunes which afterwards befel him, this collection never saw the light; but there is reason to believe that he had accumulated a sufficient number of poems to have formed a very respectable volume. Several of them had appeared in Ruddiman’s Magazine and in the Dumfriess Weekly Magazine, established by Mr. Jackson, on a similar plan, and may, perhaps, still be traced. The friend to whom the writer of this memoir is indebted for such information as it contains of Salmon, remembers to have heard him recite two imitations, or rather parodies, of the Deserted Village and Splendid Shilling, as parts of his intended publication. The subject of the former was “Auld Reikie,” and of the latter, “The Threadbare Coat.” There were also a variety of occasional pieces, addressed to the friends with whom he associated, including some names which would have vouched for the regard in which, though poor and humble, Charlie Salmon was held by individuals of the first respectability.

‘Whatever prospects of poetical renown Salmon may have formed, one night of fatal dissipation came and destroyed them all. In a fit of intoxication, he fell into the company of a recruiting sergeant, and the same friend who had last seen him with a white cockade in a paper cap, working a press to the song of “The Crown is Charlie’s right, is it no? is it no?” saw him next morning enlisted under the black cockade, or, as Salmon was wont with other Jacobites to call it, the curse of God. Poor Salmon! When asked by one of his friends how he could have been so misled, he answered, with a smile at his own simplicity, “I listed for a lieutenant.”

‘The regiment in which he had enlisted was the Seaforth Highlanders, and without waiting to excite what he dreaded more than the bitterest reproach, the

‘Sir Walter Raleigh speaks of it as a known fact, that “the Spaniards murdered twenty-six Englishmen, tying them back to back, and then cutting their throats, when they had truded with them a whole month, and came to them on the land without so much as one sword.”’ commiseration of pretended friends, he hastened to join it. In the memorable mutiny which some time afterwards broke out in this regiment at Edinburgh, when they seized possession of Arthur's Seat, and set the power of government at defiance, Salmon is said to have been called upon, in consequence of his knowledge of English, and superior address, to take the management for his comrades of the negotiation which ensued for their return to duty. The regiment was ultimately embarked for India, and Salmon was heard of no more.

Of the merits of a writer of whose works we know so little, it would be rash to form any conclusive judgment. The pieces which have happened to survive the general fate of his productions, may, perhaps, be those which were least entitled to have any influence on the decision. He appears to have been rather a writer who promised much, than who had realized much.

These two parts are, like their predecessor, each embellished with a group of fine portraits, elegantly engraved.

An Account of the Interior of Ceylon and of its Inhabitants. By John Davy, M. D., F. R. S.

THE Singalese have, from time immemorial, indulged in that preference so natural and common to an agricultural people, of living either in very small villages, consisting of a few houses, or detached habitations, separated from each other only by the extent of land occupied by each individual. Their dwellings are generally in low and sheltered situations. The economy of a Singalese family is very simple; they have about them, and in their neighbourhood, almost every thing they require, and the occupations of the different members of the family are well defined. The more laborious operations of agriculture, as ploughing, embanking, &c. fall to the lot of the men; and the lighter, as weeding and assisting in reaping, to the women. The care of the house and the management of the household affairs belong almost exclusively to the latter, and constitute their peculiar duties. The Singalese rise at dawn of day, and retire to rest about nine or ten o'clock at night. They sleep on mats, either on the floor or on couches, with a fire generally in the room. Their principal meal is at noon, and consists of rice and curry, which is generally composed of red pepper, salt, lime-juice, and the dried skin of the gorka. Their meals are short and unsocial; the master of the house, the father of the family, is first served; at his solitary repast, he is waited on by his wife, who helps him and supplies him with what he wants. The turn of the mistress of the house is next, and of the younger children who cannot help themselves without a mother's care; the rest of the family eat last, and their portion is what remains. Among poor people, these distinctions are little attended to, and the family all eat together. Though not a convivial, the Singalese are a social people, great gossip, and when not seriously occupied, visiting and conversation are their principal amusements. On such occasions, the men and women form their respective circles, and are never seen mixed in society. Old bachelors and old maids are rarely to be seen among the Singalese; almost every man marries, and marries young, and the preliminaries of the union are settled by the parents:—

'When a young man has reached the age of eighteen or twenty, he is considered marriageable, and it is the duty of his father to provide him with a proper wife. The father having selected a family of his own caste and rank, pays the master of it a visit, and if the information he receives respecting the lady's dower be satisfactory, he formally proposes his son. Soon after the father of the lady returns the visit, to learn the circumstances of the young man, the establishment he is to have, and his prospects in life. If both parties are so far satisfied, the father of the young man makes another visit to his friend, to see the lady, and inquire respecting her qualifications, age, and disposition. He is contented if she is younger than his son, in good health, free from ulcers and corporal blemishes, possessed of a pretty good disposition, and acquainted with the ordinary duties of a housewife. On his return home, he desires his son to go clandestinely and see her; if the young man enter the house, it is under a feigned name; and if he see his intended he must not address her. The day of the marriage being fixed, and the hour determined by an astrologer, the bridegroom and his family, their relations and friends, proceed to the house of the bride, accompanied by people carrying provisions, and by four men in particular, bearing a large pingo, laden not only with all sorts of provisions, but likewise with a piece of white cloth, and with jewels and ornaments, varying in number and richness, according to the means of the individual. The party set out in time to arrive towards evening; they find a mandoo (a temporary building) prepared for their reception, a feast in readiness, and the friends of the lady assembled to meet them. In the middle of the mandoo, which is covered with mats, the men of both parties seat themselves round a large pile of rice, placed on fresh plantain leaves, and garnished with berries of different kinds; the ladies do the same, collected within the house. Both parties help themselves with their hands, and eat from the common pile. This mode of eating, peculiar to the marriage feast, is esteemed proof of good fellowship, and should any one hesitate to partake, he would be considered an enemy, and be driven away. After the repast, the bridegroom enters the house, meets the bride attended by her friends; they exchange balls, made of rice and cocoa-nut milk; and he presents her with the piece of white cloth and with the jewels and ornaments he has brought. All this having been transacted in silence, he retires, and he returns to the mandoo. The night is passed by the company in telling stories and in conversation; the next morning, the bride, led by the bridegroom, and accompanied by all their friends, is conducted to his father's house, where the ceremony is concluded with another feast, similar to the preceding. The woman's dower generally consists of household goods and cattle, but rarely of land.'

Though polygamy and concubinage are contrary to the religion of the Singalese, yet they indulge in both, particularly the former, and it is remarkable that in the Kandyan territory, as in Tibet, a plurality of husbands is much more common than of wives. One woman has frequently two husbands, and Dr. Davy says he has heard of one case, where a woman had as many as seven.

We pass over the history of Ceylon, as one of the least interesting chapters of the volume, and proceed to Dr. Davy's travels in the island, from which we shall make a few extracts, and first of Adam's Peak, which is an immense mountain, of a conical form, rising rapidly and majestically to a point:—

'Near the summit, the ascent is so precipitous, that were it not for iron chains fixed to the rocks, small indeed would be the number of those who would complete their pilgrimage; even with the help of these chains, accidents occasionally occur, and lives are lost; only a fortnight before (we were told) two natives perished here; looking down, they became giddy and frightened, fell, and were dashed to pieces.

'We arrived at the top of the mountain a little after three o'clock. The magnificent views of the surrounding scenery amply repaid us for a laborious march, and all the little difficulties we had to contend with.

'From the surrounding scenery our curiosity soon led us to examine the summit of the mountain, and the object which induces thousands annually to undertake this weary pilgrimage. The summit is very small; according to the measurement made by Lieut. Malcolm (the first European who ascended the peak), its area is seventy-four feet by twenty-four. It is surrounded by a stone wall five feet high, built in some places on the brink of the precipice. The apex of the mountain is a rock, which stands in the middle of the inclosure, about six or eight feet above the level ground. On its top is the object of worship of the natives, the Sreepada,—the sacred impression, as they imagine, of the foot of Boodhoo, which he stamped on his first visit to the island. It is a superficial hollow, five feet three inches and three-quarters long, and between two feet seven inches and two feet five inches wide. It is ornamented with a margin of brass, studded with a few gems, of little value: it is covered with a roof, which is fastened to the rock by four iron chains, and supported by four pillars; and it is surrounded by a low wall. The roof was lined with coloured cloth, and its margin being decked with flowers and streamers, it made a very gay appearance. The cavity certainly bears a coarse resemblance to the figure of the human foot: were it really an impression, it is not a very flattering one, or the encomiums which are lavished on the beauty of the feet of Boodhoo are very improperly bestowed. It is hardly worth inquiring how it was formed, and whether it is entirely or only partly artificial. From its appearance and other circumstances, I believe it to be partly natural and partly artificial. There are little raised partitions to represent the interstices between the toes; these are certainly artificial; for a minute portion, which I secretly detached, was a mixture of sand and lime, similar to common cement, and altogether different from the rock itself. Lower down, on the same rock, there is a little niche of masonry, dedicated to Samen, who is also worshipped on the Peak, being considered the guardian god of the mountain. Within the inclosure is a small house of one room, the residence of the officiating priest; and this and two small huts outside the parapet, is all the shelter that the mountain affords. There is nothing else on the summit deserving of notice, that I am aware of, excepting a grove of Rhododendrons (rhododendron arboreum), which, studded with large red flowers, made a very handsome appearance. It is situated on the east and north-east side of the mountain, immediately outside the parapet, and is considered sacred. This shrub, or rather tree, the natives say was planted by Samen, immediately after the departure of Boodhoo, and that it is peculiar to the peak, and found in no other part of the island. The latter assertion I have since ascertained to be quite erroneous; the tree is common on all the higher mountains of the interior, and it occasionally makes its appearance at elevations little exceeding two thousand feet above the level of the sea.

'We passed the night on the mountains; and it was the first night, since I had entered the tropics, that I had occasion to complain of cold. There was no moon; the sky was cloudy, stars of the first and second magnitude only, making their appearance: once or twice that we looked out, we saw what might be called 'darkness visible,' and the giant forms of the mountains, sublime in obscurity. The next morning, just before sun-rise, we were awake by the shouts of a party of pilgrims, just arrived. Having no toilet to make, we were in the open air in an instant. It was indeed a glorious morning, and we had reason to thank the pilgrims for waking us. The rising sun painted the sky with gold and purple, and threw over the whole scene such a rich purple light, that I never before saw equalled.'

The party of pilgrims just arrived, consisted of several men and women, all native Singalese, neatly dressed in clean clothes, and they immediately proceeded to their devotions:—

A priest, in his yellow robes, stood on the rock, close to the impression of the foot, with his face to the people, who had ranged themselves in a row below; some on their knees, with their hands uplifted, and joined palm to palm, and other bending forward, with their hands in the same attitude of devotion. The priest, in a loud and clear voice, sentence by sentence, recited the articles of their religious faith and duties; and, in response, they repeated the same after him. When he had finished, they raised a loud shout; and he retiring, they went through the same ceremony by themselves, with one of the party for their leader.

An interesting scene followed this, wives affectionately and respectfully saluted their husbands, and children their parents, and friends one another. An old grey-headed woman first made her salams to a really venerable old man; she was moved to tears, and almost kissed his feet; he affectionately raised her up. Several middle-aged men then saluted the patriarchal pair; these men were saluted in return by still younger men, who had first paid their respects to the old people; and, lastly, those nearly of the same standing slightly saluted each other, and exchanged betel-leaves. The intention of these salutations, I was informed, was of a moral kind,—to confirm the ties of kindred, to strengthen family love and friendship, and remove animosities.

Each pilgrim makes some offering to the impression of the foot and to Samem. I observed several of them: one presented a few small pieces of copper coin, another some betel-leaves, another some areka nuts, another some rice, and another a piece of cloth. The offerings were placed on the impression, and almost immediately removed, by a servant who stood by for the purpose; they are the perquisites of the chief priest of the Malwate Wihare. Before the pilgrim descends, they are blessed by the priest, and exhorted to return to their homes, and lead in future virtuous lives.

At Gannithenē, Dr. Davy visited an elephant snare, which is merely a square space of small dimensions, surrounded by strong palisades, having a tree in the middle, and a narrow entrance. The manner in which elephants are taken is very simple:—

'The wild animals are first driven to Kandy, and then, if approved of, to this place. When an elephant enters the inclosure, he is fastened to the tree by means of a noose, and his feet are properly secured by strong ropes. From the inclosure he is led to an adjoining spot; a shed is built over him; his feet are tied firmly to trees, and he is not allowed to lie down. We found six elephants in progress of taming,—their limbs more or less shackled, according to the subjugation effected. They were all extremely lean, and miserable objects to look at. More than half of those caught die during their confinement; they seem to pine for the lost blessing of liberty; they refuse to eat, and generally die of starvation.'

The city of Kandy abounds in temples, which, with the palace, are the principal objects worthy of notice:—

'The palace did occupy a considerable portion of ground. Its front, about two hundred yards long, made rather an imposing appearance; it looked towards the different temples, and rose above a handsome moat, the walls of which were pierced with triangular cavities, for purposes of illumination. At one extremity it was terminated by an hexagonal building of two stories, called Paterpōon, in which the King, on great occasions, appeared to the people assembled in the square below. At the other extremity it was bounded by the women's apartments, on the front of which the sun, moon, and stars, (not of gallantry, but as insignia of royalty,) were carved in stone, and in which, at the public festivals, the King and his ladies stationed themselves to witness the processions. The intermediate space was occupied chiefly by the great entrance to the palace, and by the temple (the Dalada Malegaira), a little in the rear. The entrance was by a draw-bridge over the moat, through a massive archway, on one hand up a flight of huge steps, and through another archway to the hall of audience; and on the other hand, up another flight of steps, to the temple and the hexagonal building.'

At Memoora there is a nitre cum, which our author thus describes:—

'The first view of the place was exceedingly striking. A large cave appeared in a perpendicular face of rock, about three hundred feet high, crowned with forests, at the base of which was a stage or platform of rubbish, that seemed in danger of sliding into a deep wooded valley, closed in by mountains of considerable elevation and remarkable boldness. The cave was two hundred feet deep, and at its mouth, which was nearly semicircular, about eighty feet high, and one hundred wide. Its floor was rocky and steep, rapidly ascending inward, and its extremity was narrow and dark. To facilitate the ascent, ladders were planted in the most difficult places. The workmen whom I found at their labours, sixteen in number, were the rudest set of artificers I ever witnessed; their bodies, almost naked, were soiled with dirt, and their bushy beards and hair were matted and powdered with brown dust. When I arrived, they were occupied, not in the cave, but on the platform before it, attending to the operations that were then going on in the open air,—of filtration, evaporation, and crystallization. The apparatus employed was curious for its simplicity and rudeness. A small stream of water was led from a distance to the place, by a pipe of bamboos; the filters were of matting, in the shape of square boxes, supported by sticks; and the evaporating vessels, and, indeed, all the vessels used, were the common chatties of the country, of which a great many were assembled, of various sizes. The cave may be considered partly natural and partly artificial. I was informed that, during the last fifty years, for six months in the dry season, it has been annually worked, and that each man employed was required to furnish a load of nitre, which is about sixty poahés, to the royal stores.

In an earlier part of this volume, Dr. Davy states, that this nitre cave is 'a very compounded rock, consisting of calc spar, felspar, quartz, mica, and tale, in a horned state, exposed to the air, and slowly decomposing, strongly impregnated with saltpetre.' One hundred parts of this compound rock were found to consist of—

- 2.4 nitrate of potash.
- 0.7 nitrate of magnesia.
- 0.2 sulphate of magnesia.
- 9.4 water.
- 26.5 carbonate of lime.
- 60.7 earthy matter, insoluble in dilute nitric acid.

The remaining part of Dr. Davy's tour contains an account of all the principal objects in the country through which he travelled, but there is nothing particularly striking, and we shall only quote a singular instance of heroism which occurred at Passera, during the rebellion of 1818. Lance-corporal M'Laughlin, of the 72d, with four rank and file of that regiment, six Malays, and six Singalese, were on their march for Passera to Badulla:—

• This small party was beset about midday by a horde of rebels in a thick jungle, who fired on the detachment from their concealment, killing two soldiers of the light infantry on the spot, and immediately showing themselves in numbers around this little band of brave soldiers, whom they no doubt considered a certain prey; but, regardless of their menaces, and faithful to their fallen comrades, ten of these gallant men encompassed the dead bodies of their brother soldiers, while corporal M'Laughlin, with the remaining five, fought their way to Badulla, at two miles distance, through some hundred Kandians, to report the situation of the detachment they left surrounded by so immense and disproportionate a force, in conflict with which they continued for two hours, when being relieved by a party detached by Major M'Donald, under the command of Lieutenant Burns, of the 83d regiment, from Badulla, they had the triumph of seeing the insurgents fly before them, and of bringing in the dead bodies of their comrades to be honourably interred.

Some observations on the effects of the climate, 'on the diseases of Ceylon,' and an Appendix of Proclamations and other State Papers, close this valuable volume. The engravings are numerous and well-executed.

The Beauties of Mozart, Handel, Pleyel, Haydn, Beethoven, and other celebrated Composers; adapted to the Words of Popular Psalms and Hymns, for One or Two Voices; with an Accompaniment and appropriate Symphonies for the Piano-forte, Organ, or Harp. By an Eminent Professor. Music 4to. 1821.

We have heard it whispered, that the editor of this volume of harmony is Dr. Busby; whether this be true or false, we cannot state; it might be him, or Latrobe, or any one else out of a hundred professors that could be named in the musical world. But whispers are nothing to us, because we look at the execution of the work, not to the name attached to it, nor the concealment of the eminent professor! with whom we entirely agree, that it is a pity 'the Devil should have all the best music.' Some have objected to the adaptation of 'right pleasant melody' to 'psalms and hymns and spiritual songs,' under an idea that, however the voice may be engaged, the mind will return to 'Pray Goody please to moderate,' or the lip still covet 'The rich ambrosia of thy Breath,' or 'Drink to me only with thine Eyes.' Be it remembered, there are thousands of lovely women and anti-corinthian youths, with sweet voices, who are tolerably skilled on the three divine instruments to which those beauties are adapted, who are not familiar with theatrical favourites, particularly where parental restrictions are rigidly enforced, and which are as dutifully obeyed. So, then, fine music and pathos are to be confined alone to those whom some of our contemporaries are pleased to call—the licentious part of mankind.

The later ages have been too long degraded by drooping sing-song tunes. Congregations are in a great degree led by a humdrum organist or desk-professor, whose 'pious orgies,' of course, are rehearsed at home, for the elasticising of the spirits of a select tea party. It is a subject much to be lamented, that social meetings are not more cultivated in the more retired and serious walks of society; and it is worthy of prominent remark, that where they are so, the little differences of religious and political opinions, (for they are too often found to exist under the same influence,) are softened into unity, peace, and concord. We believe it to have been a reason with composers of eminence generally, that the poetry, which is not considered strictly evangelical and orthodox, has been more suitable, from possessing more taste, grace, and expression, than poems approved by staid divines, upon a par of mediocrity with the renowned Sternhold and his successors. Time, that brings the eternal round of excellence and beauty to pass, we are persuaded, will lead the above collection of beautiful compositions into the hearts of the rising generations without the least prejudice to their morals or happiness, and we hope that nurses will lullaby them to Watts, Cowper, and Barbauld, while engaged in fostering their infant charge into mental habitude and virtue. With reminding the editor of the too frequent accompaniments to a first edition, a few printer's discords and engraver's naturals, we recommend the work to our readers.

THESSALIAN MARTYRS.

(From Pouqueville's Travels in Greece.)
EUTHYMUS Blachavas, renowned and quoted as the last of the brave Thessalians, was awakened at the noise of arms which the northern nations caused to be heard at Lovcha, in Thirace, in 1809. He had invited to a last effort all the generous sons of Thessaly, who were prepared to sacrifice themselves for liberty. Olympus, Ossa, and

Othryx, were shaken; the Mahometans, thrown into consternation, had entrenched themselves in Lerissa. A great event was preparing, when it came to be known that those had retreated whom the Greeks had regarded as their deliverers. The satrap of Epirus at this news let loose his hordes on the Thessalians, and the cutting off of heads and burning of villages brought back the people to obedience. Blachavas, deceived in his hopes, in vain wished to resist; he retreated like a terrible lion from mountain to mountain; and when he no longer found security on the continent, the Isle of Trikeri offered him an asylum, whence he could escape into the Archipelago. But he heard the cries of the Christians; he reproached himself for having compromised their existence; and in order to redeem a whole people, he accepted a capitulation, by which he placed himself with a promise of life in the hands of the eldest son of the satrap of Janina. 'I am going to die,' said he to his friends; 'I know the faith of the Turks; reserve your arms for happier days—fly.' With equal courage he appeared before his enemy, who would perhaps have respected the pledge given him, if he had not been the lieutenant of a man who employed oaths only as the means of deceit. At Janina, tied to a stake in the court of the Seraglio, I again saw Blachavas, whom I had met at Milias, in Pindus, at the head of his troops. The rays of a burning sun played on his bronzed brow, which defied death, and a profuse perspiration fell from his shaggy beard. He knew his fate; and more composed than the tyrant who was about to shed his blood, he raised towards me his eyes full of serenity, as if to make me a witness of the triumphs of his last hour. He saw the approach of that hour so terrible to the wretched with the composure of the just. He bore, without trembling or reproach, the strokes of the executioner, and his limbs, dragged through the streets of Janina, showed to the astonished Greeks the remains of the last of the captains of Thessaly. Alas, why should so glorious an end be stained with the crime of rebellion, which had dragged so many innocent persons to the tomb! The inexplicable designs of Providence are only explained by prodigies which confound the calculations of our feeble reason. The punishment and revolt of Blachavas prepared the triumph of a feeble mortal who had no other arms than prayers and patience—one of the disciples of our Saviour destined to support the timid during the tempest, whose blood, confoanded with that of the warrior, restored by his martyrdom the honour of the Christians.

Demetrius, of the order of St. Basilus, elevated by that evangelic charity which characterized the Apostles in their persecutions, traversed in these stormy days the neighbouring cantons, in order to calm their minds and lead them back to the yoke of obedience. Denounced as a seditious person, and taken with Blachavas, he appeared before the satrap of Janina loaded with irons. It was wished that he should name accomplices, in order to involve in the conspiracy the orthodox prelates, who occupied the ecclesiastical thrones of Thessaly; but strong in faith he testified the truth of the living God, and his answers inflamed the rage of the Vizir, which blazed out in a dialogue worthy of being recorded to Christendom as a monument belonging to the martyrology of the church.

Vizir.—You have announced 'the reign of Jesus Christ, and consequently the destruction of our altars and the fall of our prince.'

Demetrius.—God reigns from eternity to eternity. I revere those masters whom He has given us.

Vizir.—What do you carry on your breast?

Demetrius.—The venerable image of the Holy Mary.

Vizir.—I wish to see it.

Demetrius.—It must not be profaned. Order one of my hands to be released, and I will show it to you.

Vizir.—It is thus that you mislead the minds of men. We are profaners! I recognise in this speech the agent of the bishops whom the Russians are bringing to enslave us. Name your accomplices.

Demetrius.—My accomplices are my conscience and my duty, which oblige me to console my Christian brethren and to teach them submission to your laws.

Vizir.—To your own you mean, you Christian dog.

Demetrius.—I glory in that name.

Vizir.—You carry an image of the Virgin, with which, it is said, prejudices are connected.

Demetrius.—Prodigies, say! The mother of our Saviour is our intercessor with her immortal Son. She works miracles for us every day, and every day I invoke her.

Vizir.—Let us then see if she will protect you.—Executioners, apply the torture.

At these words, pronounced with the energy of rage, the pages of the satrap concealed themselves while the executioners seized their victim, and threw him down at the feet of the tyrant, who spat in his face. The holy image was taken from him. Pointed reeds were driven into the nails of his fingers and toes. His arms were likewise pierced by them, and at the height of his agony nothing escaped his lips but these words, 'Lord have mercy on thy servant—Queen of Heaven pray for us.' The torture of the reeds being ended, there was applied round his head a chain of osselets, which was forcibly tightened while the executioner called out to him to name his accomplices, but the chain broke without extorting from him a murmur. The executioners, tired out, begged that the torture might be suspended till the following day, and the patient was precipitated into a damp dungeon. The satrap did not again attend the torture, which recommenced according to his orders, by suspending the victim with his head down over a fire of pitchy wood, with which they slowly burnt the skin of his crucifix. They were afraid that his life might escape, and withdrew him from the chafing-pan to cover him with a table, on which the executioners mounted, and danced for the purpose of breaking his bones. Victorious in the last trial, Demetrius, having now passed through the torture of the reeds, the fire, and of the estrapado, was built into a wall, leaving his head out of the masonry. He was there supplied with nutriment, in order to prolong his agony. He died on the tenth day, invoking the name of the Almighty. His supernatural courage astonished Epirus, and his name was quoted as a saint. It was said, that even miracles were performed by it; and what cannot be doubted is, that his blood appeased the rage of the satrap, and that he was the last expiatory victim of Thessaly.

A FRENCH ADVERTISEMENT.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.
Sir,—In the forty-sixth number of the Affiches Universelles, a daily French paper, and the forty-first article, under the title Paris, in the following advertisement of a book-keeper and teacher of the French language, which I extract without alteration, viz.—

“M. Meinier, teneur de livres, rue du Four St. Germain, No. 98, très connu, enseigne la partie double simple/écrite en un mois de leçons. Il se charge de la vérification, de la rédaction de tous comptes et des arbitrages; et il peut en outre donner quatre heures par jour pour les livres d'une maison de commerce.—BOOK-KEEPER and TEACHER of the French tongue, repair to dwelling-house.”

What am I, Sir, to understand by the last sentence, which is in English? Does it imply that I am to repair to his dwelling-house, or that he will repair to mine? This shows how ridiculous it is for persons to affect an understanding of another language, when they have but imperfectly learned their own. However, the twofold profession of keeper and teacher, I advise most strenuously to all young men who go raw from the country to London; and with what importance it would appear in our daily papers, under an advertisement like this: ‘A young man from Lancashire wishes for a situation at the ‘Bull and Mouth,’ the ‘Belle Savage,’ or ‘Red Lion,’ as book-keeper and teacher of the English tongue. Ladies boarding-schools regularly attended, — repair to dwelling-house. But what may be considered propriety in France, is obviously the reverse in England. I am, Sir, your’s, &c.

When a child is born, to what age may a person bet, on equal terms, that it will attain? Or, if the child has already attained to a certain age, how many years is it probable that it will still live? These are two questions, the solution of which is not only curious but important.

We shall here give two tables on this subject, one by M. Dupré de St. Maur, and the other by M. Parcieux. The table of M. Parcieux is formed from lists of annuities:—

TIME TO LIVE.

Total,.... 1,000,000

The number of inhabitants of a country is to that of the families, as 1000 to 22½.

By taking a mean also, it is found that in twenty-five families, there is one where there are six or more children.

The proportion of males and females in a country, are as 18 to 19.

It is found, that there are three marriages annually among 337 inhabitants, so that 112 inhabitants produce one marriage.

The proportion of married men or widowers to married women or widows, is nearly as 125 to 140; and the whole number of this class of society is, to the whole of the inhabitants, as 265 to 631.

Among 631 inhabitants, there are 118 married couples, seven or eight widowers, and 21 or 22 widows.

1870 married couples give, annually, 357 children.

The number of servants is to the whole number of inhabitants, as 136 to 1535 nearly.

OXFORD ANECDOTES.

JACOB BOBART—Was a German horticulturist, and came to England about the middle of the seventeenth century. He was appointed first superintendent of the physic garden in Oxford, founded in 1632, by Henry Earl of Danby. The catalogue of plants in the physic garden, published in 1648, was drawn up by J. Bobart, and is a favourable proof of his zeal and diligence. This catalogue was republished in 1648, considerably improved, and enlarged to more than double its bulk; Bobart being assisted in the work, as he acknowledges, by Dr. Philip Stevens and Wm. Brown, M. A. A plant, in honour of Bobart, is called Bobartin, a genus formed by Linnaeus, and said to grow in the East Indies. Under the care of Bobart and that of his son, the garden continued to flourish many years. Old Jacob died in the garden house, February 4th, 1679, aged eighty, and was buried in the church-yard of St. Peter in the East, where there is a monument to his memory, against the wall of the church. On rejoicing days, he used to have his venerable beard tagged with silver. He left two sons, Jacob and Tilleman, who were both employed in the physic garden. Jacob, who was a man of learning, published the second volume of ‘Morison’s Oxford History of Plants,’ 1699. An anecdote is told of him, which implies somewhat of a humorous disposition. He found a large dead rat in the garden, and transformed it by art into the shape of a dragon, as represented in old and curious books of natural history, particularly in Aldrovandus. This was shown to various learned men, all of whom believed it to be a genuine and invaluable specimen of the dragon. Many fine copies of verses were written by the literati in honour of Bobart and his matchless discovery, and persons flocked from all parts to see it. Bobart owned the cheat some years after, but it was for a long time preserved as a master-piece of art. There is an ingenious paper, by this writer, in the Philosophical Transactions for the year 1683, on the effects of the great frost, which happened the preceding winter, on trees and other plants. Many oak, elm, ash, walnut, and other trees were found, he says, with large rents or clefts in different parts of their trunks, in the large branches, and in such parts of their roots as were not sunk deep into the earth. Parts, he adds, that were so knotted, that they could not have been split but with great difficulty with beetles and wedges, were rent asunder by the force of the ice contained within them, making, at the time of bursting, a noise like the explosion of gunpowder. It is supposed that the trees which suffered were diseased, that some of the vessels were distended or burst, and that the effect was produced by the freezing of the sap or other juices contained in these cavities. J. Bobart gave the rent of a piece of land in Osney Meadow, commonly called Pike Acre, to be disposed of by the minister and churchwardens of the parish of St. Peter in the East, in Oxford, in the following manner:—Twenty shillings yearly to the minister of the parish, for a sermon to be preached by him on Christmas-day, in the afternoon, and the rest to such of the poor inhabitants as do not receive alms. He died December 28th, 1719, in the 79th year of his age, and was buried in the above-mentioned church, where there is an inscription to his memory. A descendant of the Bobarts, Mr. Tillemann Bobart, formerly of University College, still resides in Oxford. He is one of the esquire or gold-stick bedels of the university, and appears to inherit a love of gardening and botanical pursuits from his ancestors.

Mother Louse.—In former times resided on Headington Hill, a celebrated old matron, mentioned by Anthony Wood in 1673, called Mother Louse. She was the mistress of a little ale-house, situated at the further end of a row of tenements, near the lane leading to Marston, and now, not unaptly, called Harpsichord Row, or Harpsichord Garden. Granger, in describing a print of this noted female, informs us, that she was probably the last woman who wore a ruff in England. She gave a name to her habitation which it retained for many years, and was called Louse Hall. Cabbage Hall, exactly opposite Chainey Lane, the road to the intended Lunatic Asylum, was kept formerly by a tailor. A public-house higher up the hill, (now a private habitation,) was known by the name of Caterpillar Hall, which, says an ingenious writer, was no doubt a complimentary appellation, intimating to posterity, that, on account of its better commons, it had drawn away a great number of students from its inferior society; or, in other words, that the Caterpillar had eaten up the Cabbage.—Oxford Herald.

AEROSTATIC ASCENT OF MR. GREEN, AT BRIGHTON.

MR. GREEN, whose ascensions in a balloon, at the Coronation and on a subsequent day from Pentonville, we formerly noticed, made his fifth aerial excursion on the 2nd of October, from Brighton, and which had nearly proved fatal to him, as he was driven to sea, and was for some time at the mercy of the watery element. The following is his own account of this perilous adventure:—

I took my leave amidst the plaudits and anxious good wishes of the surrounding company, and ascended slowly, but majestically, towards the celestial regions. I rose about eight hundred feet, when the gas, which before had been expanded by the heat of the sun, became condensed by the change of temperature; the balloon consequently descended; this I could have easily prevented by discharging ballast, but I felt confident I was affording to the spectators a gratification unprecedented in the history of aerostatics; I therefore chose to take advantage of the circumstance. I eventually threw out two bags of ballast, and re-ascended, the balloon taking a direction south-east by south: it appeared to me as floating for a considerable time over the land's edge. The appearance of earthly objects gradually diminishing, I still ascended, so as to afford to the spectators a diminished view of my aerostatic machine. The balloon here took a more southerly direction, and finding myself going rapidly to sea, at an altitude of about two miles, I espied two vessels, the only assistance in sight at that elevation. I immediately opened the valve, and the balloon began to descend with great velocity, and, in the end, was plunged by the force of the wind into a tremendous heavy sea; it then drifted rapidly, assuming the appearance of an immense umbrella before me: the car striking the water on its side, its ornaments and coverings were presently destroyed, and it instantly filled with water. I had previously put on my life-preserver, but it unfortunately became entangled with the cords. I was here in a perilous situation, the life-preserver useless, and the car repeatedly turning over, so that I was alternately under water. In this distress I continued for many minutes, when, almost exhausted, the propriety occurred to me of separating the cords which entangled the preserver, and which, after much difficulty, I accomplished with a knife. After this, I had the consolation of being raised considerably above the water, which enabled me to hail a boat humanely sent to my assistance by Capt. Clear, of the Unity packet, whose humane and active exertions I shall ever feel proud to acknowledge. I was at this time so much exhausted, that it would have been utterly impossible for me to have continued my hold five minutes longer. I remained in the water, according to the opinion of Captain Clear, about twenty minutes; but it appeared to me much longer. The balloon dragged me about two miles through a heavy surf. After having been, with great difficulty, got on board, my distress was so great as to render it absolutely necessary to strip me. I continued for some hours insensible, and must refer the public to Captain Clear for particulars during that period. After my recovery, I anxiously inquired of the captain if my property was safe on board; when he informed me that the balloon was literally torn to ribbands, and my philosophical instruments and my apparatus, were all lost or destroyed. Upon examination, I found the balloon impossible to be repaired. I landed in safety on Wednesday morning, at one o'clock, at Newhaven, and reached the gas establishment, at Brighton, at ten o'clock.

Captain Clear states that he was on his passage from Dieppe to Brighton, when, about forty minutes after two p. m. he discovered a balloon descending very rapidly; that, in five minutes afterwards, it dropped into the water at about two miles to windward, when he lowered his boat, the sea running high, and the balloon dragging the car through a heavy surf; that he feared the man in the latter must perish before the boat could reach him, but that he had the satisfaction of seeing him pulled into the boat at about three o'clock. That he then so managed his vessel that the balloon came alongside, but he could not hold it; it therefore left the vessel, the boat still fast to it, and Mr. Green in the boat. That, as there was no other means of subduing the balloon, he ran his vessel's bowsprit through it, at the risk of losing it, if not the mast, it being twenty feet from the top of the balloon to the surface of the water. That, soon after, Mr. Green was got upon deck, when he made him swallow some brandy, then stripped and wrapped him in blankets, and had him put to bed. That he then proceeded to save the balloon, which remained on the bowsprit until the gas had escaped; it then dropped into the sea, and sunk under the vessel's bottom. That by the aid of tackle it was hoisted on board, in the progress of which, from the effect of wind and tide, the silk gave way and tore in all directions; it could only be preserved in a tangled and tattered state.

MACPHERSON'S LAMENT.

A NOTED highwayman, of the name of Macpherson, was executed at Banff, in the year 1701, eight days after his trial, and his execution took place at a much earlier hour than was appointed by his sentence; the magistrates of Banff being apprehensive of a rescue. It was even reported, that either by fraud or violence, an express, with his pardon, was detained between Turreff and Banff. An unhappy girl, whose love for him, and grief for his fate, ended in distraction, came to Glenorchy and Upper Lorne in the following summer. She could give no distinct account of herself; but the incoherent hints drawn from her led to a conclusion that her parents were reputable; but that, infatuated by a passion for Macpherson, she had passed some time with him among his gipsy associates, had been admitted to him in prison, and learnt the Lament, which he hoped would engage the populace to assist his friends in delivering him from the civil power, when disencumbered from his fetters, preparatory to execution; but, as she said, 'they wadna trust the music o' his voice, but choked him before his time.' She had left her ain souk to gang to Badenoch, the laund o' her dear and her dool, and she insisted Glenorchy was Badenoch, because the people spoke Gaelic, and there were 'bonny lads and red cheeked lasses.' Some one asked if she was a gipsy? She seemed quite indignant, and replied 'na, na, she was born in haly marriage, and baptizet in haly kirk.'

The fragments of the Lament were literally stolen from this mourner. A gentleman attempted to write from her singing; but she wept bitterly at the idea of 'giving away,' as she termed it, 'the last remains of her dear.' The gentleman engaged some friends to prevail with 'Jamie's lassie,' the only name she gave herself, to sing his Lament; and he kept behind her employing his pencil to trace the lines.

I've spent my life in rioting,
Debauch'd my health and strength,

I squander'd fast, as pillage came,
And fell to shame at length.

To hang upon a tree, a tree,
Accurs'd disgraceful death,
Like a vile dog hung up to be,
And stifled in the breath.

My father was a gentleman,
Of fame and honour high,
Oh mother, would you ne'er had borne
The son so doom'd to die!

The laird of Grant, with pow'r aboon,
The royal majesty,
Pass'd his great word for Peter Brown,
And let Macpherson die.

But Braco Duff, with rage enough,
First laid a snare for me,
And if that death did not prevent,
Avenge'd I well could be.

But vengeance I did never wreak,
When power was in my hand,
And you, dear friends, no vengeance seek,
It is my last command.

Forgive the man whose rage betray'd
Macpherson's worthless life;
When I am gone, be it not said,
My legacy was strife.

And ye that blame with cruel scorn
The wand'ring gipsy's ways,
Oh, think if houseless houseless born,
Ye could spend better days!

If all the wealth on land or sea
Before my eyes were spread,
I'd give them all this hour to be
On the soldier's dying bed.

Though cut and hack'd in every limb,
And chok'd with heaps of slain,
Glory and fame should be my theme,
To soften every pain.

My father was a gentleman,
Of fame and lineage high;
Oh, place me in the field like him—
Like him to fight and die!

ELLEN MARIA.

THE ZEPHYR.

SAY, zephyr, whither dost thou hie;
Why with such haste skim thro' the air?
Say, dost thou bear some lover's sigh
To some admired lady fair?

Or flyest thou to sip the dew
That sparkles on the lily white,
Or on the pretty violet blue?
Oh! little vagrant, stay thy flight.

Wilt thou on thy soft pinions bear
A message? wilt thou, zephyr, fly
And whisper in my Marianne's ear,
The echo of her Henry's sigh?

Say, wilt thou—? Yes; but do not speak,
For as I'm used so swift to fly,
My form is so divinely weak,
It will not bear more than a sigh.

'That will I take—tho' I should now,
(Had you not thus detained me here),
Been smoothing the soft raven brow
Of some divinely beautiful fair.'

Take then this sigh, and haste away,
Fly quickly, cherub! to my dear,
And as thou hast not ought to say,
Oh! cast it plaintive on her ear.

Then watch her sweet! and you shall hear
A sigh from her responsive flow,
And, little flutter, strive to bear
To me my Marianne's note of woe.

But stay, can't thou not bear a tear?
Oh, stay! I return—thou can't not then—
Then hasten, hasten to my fair,
And swift return to me again. J. C. P.

TO THE EVENING STAR.

PALE orb, whose unobtrusive light
Smiles sadly on a world below,
Thee, while I view, this stormy night,
Looks, like my fate, replete with woe!
And thou, whose silv'ry lustre streams
Alternate thro' a maze of glooms,
Art as some lamp, whose friendly beams
Guide the lost wanderer to his home.

Yes, while I pensive mark thy rays,
And anguish lende my weary breast,
I muse on future happier days
Of endless undivided rest;
Led by thy light, to tranquil spheres I roam,
And taste the transports of ETERNAL HOME!

EDWARD BALL.

LINES

To the Memory of Körner, the German Poet and Warrior.

FAREWELL to thee: thou spirit brave,
Whom youth nor valour's end could save;
O'en is thy form, and dim that eye,
Which in the fight flash'd gallantly;
Oh! though that ardent soul out of this Emaptured wood'd the muse divine,
Thy country call'd for help and aid
When Gallia did her fields invade;
And who but would have join'd a band
To seek and save his native land?

Oh! thou did'st raise thee at the cry
Of those who fought for liberty;
Thy spirit rush'd like mountain flood,
Boldly it swept o'er fields of blood,
Where yet thine eye could weep to see
The wreck of frail mortality,
And sigh to think how soon the tomb
Might be thine own relentless doom,
Yet pray that heaven would bless the cause
Of those who fought for home and laws.
Alas! the cold earth form'd a bed,
Ere long, whereon to rest thy head;
And still and silent is the lyre
Thou touch'd'st with poetic fire.
Yet, honour'd long shall be thy name,
Enroll'd in the bright lists of fame;
Thy sweetest strains oft times among
Thy gallant countrymen be sung,
And long thy deeds a hushed shade,
Tho' Körner's number'd with the dead.

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

Occasioned by the Death of A. E., in the West Indies.

When late I twined a wreath for thee,
And hoped, in other years,
To view it blooming beautifully,
Dewed but with Pleasure's tears,
I deem'd not of thy early doom,
Nor thought my humble might bloom,
Only above thy lonely tomb!

And so while I was framing themes
Of future happiness—
Dwelling on unsubstantial dreams
Of joys that yet might, bless,
Thou wert not I longer dwelling here,
And Friendship's sigh, and Sorrow's tear,
Could rail thee nought how'er sincere.

'Twas time in distant land to die—
'Twas thine to pass from earth
Where none of those dear friends were nigh,
Who watch'd thee from thy birth;
No brother firm—no sister fair—
No mother, and no sire were there
To listen to thy parting prayer.

And who I would have felt with thee,
Nay, yielded life for thine,
Could in thy pangs no sharer be,
Could make no sorrow mine;
And worthless pleasures, common cares
Awoke my smiles or claim'd my tears,
While thy soul flew to other spheres!

A wanderer—but not esteem'd
The less because afar,
Nor wert less sadly when redeem'd
From every earthly jar;—
How deeply have we thought upon
Each kindly deed we might have done
For thee—belov'd, departed one!

Yet much was sought, and much begun,
Thy health to re-instate,
And all that friendship left undone,
Was but the fruit of fate!

'Twere now a bootless tale to tell
Of love that never changed or fell
From plighted faith—dear Shade, farewell!

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The office of critic on the performances at this theatre, has been for some time a sinecure, for our readers would not thank us for dwelling at any length on the ferocity of the Ruffian Boy, the splendour of the Coronation, or the dreadful annoyance which Tom King and his Monsieur Tonson give to poor Morbleu. We have, therefore, only to say, by way of dramatic record, that Gerald Duval, the Coronation, and Monsieur Tonson, are the only pieces now performed at this theatre, and that they still maintain their attraction, to an extent that could never have been anticipated. When any novelty is produced, we shall be the first to make it known to our readers; at present we must content ourselves with a playbill announcement: 'The three unprecedentedly popular pieces every evening until further notice.'

COVENT GARDEN.—The loss of rational gratification which the public sustained during the absence of Mr. Young from the London boards, becomes very apparent when we see him resume those characters which he left vacant on the stage. Among those must be classed, as one of the first, the Stranger, which he sustained on Friday night, in a manner which called to our delighted memory the best days and the best exertions of John Kemble; not that Mr. Young is an imitator of that great actor, for his energies and talents are all his own; and they are only like each other in the forcible delineation of character, and in the power they possess of awakening the tenderest chords of the human heart. They rouse their audience to indignation or melt them into pity, insensibly, and, as it were, by some magic spell. Mr. Young's performance of the Stranger, has always been considered as one of his most finished characters; and we think his delineation of it on Friday, superior to any of his former exertions. His whole soul seemed embodied in the character; and he depicted, in the most correct and forcible style, the misanthropy and humanity, the stern severity, and the pure feeling of the abandoned husband. To adopt the language of a diurnal critic,—How admirably he combated the occasional reflux of kindly feelings, which, in the earlier scenes of the drama, made their way towards his heart. He looked a man whom the sorrows of others could never again touch, who, wishing to forget the world, lived already in a waste of his own creation, more cold and desolate than the wildest deserts of nature. His heart seemed shrunk within him—once deceived, he would never again trust to it for happiness; yet, when the story of Tobias met his ear, feeling began to awaken, and the hurried manner in which he deposited the charity in the old man's hand, showed that he was still a man—though almost disdaining the character. The quietude of his forlorn and hopeless fortunes, were preserved with a dignified consistency, until the interview takes place between him and Steinfort. He told the story of his love with a tenderness that drew tears from several of the spectators; but when he came to speak of the villain who took Adelaide from him, he elicited such a burst of feeling as, in our theatres, is seldom observable. Again; when he sees that object so dear to him, tainted as she was with crime, exciting at once the love of the husband and the insulted pride of the man, he balanced his feelings with such matchless skill, yielding to his affection, and recoiling from it, by turns, that it was impossible not to sympathize in the alternate emotions that unsettled all his former resolves. It was a relief when the children came at last to re-unite those links of conjugal attachment which perfidly had broken. It was altogether such a piece of acting, as left behind it an impression never to be forgotten.

The part of Mrs. Haller was sustained by Mrs. Brudenell, the lady, who a few weeks ago, made her debut at the Haymarket Theatre, in the character of Belvidera. We have already stated the physical defects this lady laboured under, in a feeble voice, and as that was felt at the Haymarket Theatre, it could not but be more striking in a house of three-fold dimensions. The character of Mrs. Haller, dignified as it has been by a Siddons and an O'Neil, is not one of great difficulty; a deep and silent sorrow, unraffed by any conflicting passions, pervades every scene in which she appears. Mrs. Brudenell acted with great feeling, delicacy, and tenderness; her conception of the character was correct, and her delineation of it rather chaste than forcible. The success of the performance was, however, unequalled and decisive, and the lady in many scenes was honoured with much applause. Mrs. Faucit played the Countess of Winterset with becoming dignity; Farley's Francis, and Emery's Solomon, justified the character they have long had, of being excellent performances. There yet remains one character to notice, but which is considered so insignificant in the piece, as usually to be passed over slightly. We mean that of Peter, so long held by poor Simmons. Its new representative was Mr. Meadows, who, stripping the part of all the buffoonery with which it has generally been loaded, really rendered 'Master Peter' a very important personage in the drama, and ensured him such an abundance of applause as he was, perhaps, never honoured with before.

On Wednesday, the opera of the Antiquary was performed for the first time this season. The part of Isabella Wardour, in the absence of Miss Stephens, fell into the hands of Miss Halland, who gave the songs with very pleasing effect. Mrs. Faucit, as Elspeth, gave a faithful portrait of this worn-out grandam. Listen!

Oldbuck and Blanchard's Caxon lose none of their interest, and the Antiquary was received with as much applause as ever.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The opera of Rob Roy, which has long been popular, was performed for the first time at this theatre on Wednesday night. It has been got up in a very liberal manner, and with great attention to scenic display. In the cast of the characters, the talents of the company were exhibited to the best advantage, though there are many plays to which those talents are better suited than Rob Roy. Mr. Terry, as the hero of the piece, gave a forcible representation of this distinguished freebooter, though somewhat deficient in that romantic spirit and enthusiasm which belongs to the character. He, however, displayed much energy and feeling in the most important scenes. Mr. Leoni Lee, as Francis Osbaldistone, executed the songs with much sweetness and effect, particularly 'Auld lang syne' and 'My love is like the red red rose,' which were rapturously encored. Miss Carew dissolved every word of Diana Vernon into sweet melody. She was in excellent voice, and played the character in a very pleasing manner. Mrs. Johnson acted Helen Macgregor: there was nothing of the heroine of the mountain and the glen about her; and we should rather have taken her to have been the wife of a Duke of Argyll or any nobleman 'who in courts had ever been,' than the partner of the outlaw Macgregor, treading upon her native heath. Tayleure, in the Baillie Nicol Jarvie, was very successful; his performance was rich in humour, and possessed much originality; in some scenes, however, he strongly reminded us of Mr. Mackay, whose delineation of the character has been justly the subject of much praise both in London, and more particularly beyond the Tweed. Owen had a good representative in Williams, and the 'Douglass creature' an indifferent one in Russell. De Camp was a blustering Major Galbraith, and Lacy a dandified Captain Thornton. With these drawbacks, the performance still possessed sufficient merit to ensure it great applause and repetition on the following evening.

Literature and Science.

Oriental Literature.—Oriental literature and education have just suffered a severe and unexpected loss in the person of M. E. Boethier, born in Egypt, professor of the vulgar Arabic at the school of Oriental Living Languages, and in the flower of his age. We lose in him a most valuable means of communication between Egypt and France. The relation in which he stood between the two countries, would have been very speedily much more efficacious, by the erection of a college of Egyptians at Paris. M. E. Boethier would have been the friend of this establishment. But though he has not been left to fulfil this great service to his paternal country, and to that of his adoption, yet he has left us an honourable memorial; and the great dictionary which he composed,—a work of fifteen years' perseverance and profound study, will preserve his name from oblivion or the indifference of mankind. In causing the manuscript of this work to be printed, the government in some measure mitigates the unfortunate loss.—Monitor.

Application of the Congreve Rocket in the Whale Fisheries.—The ship Fame has returned to Hull, and Captain Scoresby has confirmed all that was stated respecting the important advantages to be derived from the use of the rocket in the whale fishery.

The Fame has brought home nine fish, in the capture of the whole of which the rocket has been successfully employed. After being struck with the rocket, the largest whale became an easy prey to its pursuers. In one case, instant death was produced by a single rocket, and in all cases the speed was much diminished, and its power of sinking limited to three or four fathoms.

One of the largest finners, of one hundred feet in length, a species of fish seldom attacked by the ordinary means, and of the capture of which there is scarcely an instance on record, in the northern seas, was immediately tamed by a discharge of rockets, so that the boats overtook and surrounded it with ease.

Six out of the nine fish died in less than fifteen minutes: and five out of the ponder took out no line at all. One only survived nearly two hours, and another took out no more than one line, by getting into a pack of ice, where the boats could not follow.

The peculiar value and importance of the rocket in the fisheries is, that by means of it, all the destructive effects of a six or even a twelve pounder piece of artillery, both as to penetration, explosion, force, and internal fire, calculated to accelerate the death of the animal, may be given with an apparatus not heavier than a musket, and without any shock or re-action on the boat; whereas, it is obvious that no boat applicable to the fishery of the whale, can ever be made capable of sustaining the shock necessary to produce the same, or any thing like the effects of the six or twelve-pound shell, by the ordinary means of artillery.

In fact, nothing larger than the harpoon-gun could be applied; and the missile which could be discharged from such an implement, could neither have penetration nor explosive force sufficient to do any serious injury to the fish.

With respect to the rocket, however, it is a fact, that some of the smallest, fired in the late experiment in the Fame, penetrated completely through the body of the fish, so that the effect of the explosion was visible on the opposite side—the fierce fire of the rocket fixed in the animal's inside rapidly destroying life; and the effects and report of the explosion being distinctly perceivable within him, as in one instance, as above stated, producing immediate death. Indeed, it is certain that this might, in almost every case, be ensured by increasing the power of the rocket, without increasing the inconvenience or incumbrance of the apparatus required to discharge it, and equally without re-action on the boat, as when the smallest rockets are used. In addition to this, it may be stated, that there is no doubt of the rocket ultimately displacing with the operation of the hand-harpoon, by conveying the line and destroying the animal at the same time, and that without requiring the approach of the boat to the fish within the limits of perfect security. It is also equally certain, that the large finners, never or rarely attempted in the north, will be rendered an easy prey by the judicious application of the rocket.

Egyptian Mummy.—Mr. Coates, a native of Newcastle, has presented the Literary and Philosophical society of that town, with an Egyptian mummy in the very highest state of preservation. Mr. C. procured this relic of antiquity as he recently passed through Egypt on his return from India.

The celebrated Carnot, who is living in a retired manner at Magdeburg, is said to be engaged in writing a work which must necessarily excite great interest. It is to be entitled, 'Historical Memoirs of the French Revolution, and the Events of the last thirty Years.'

Astronomic Phenomenon.—According to observations made by M. Luthmer, at Hanover, a remarkable phenomenon will take place in the course of the next autumn and winter. This will consist in the conjunction of the two great planets, Jupiter and Saturn, which will appear on the 16th and 18th of October, at midnight, in the meridian, and will be visible during the whole of the night.

Curious Spring of Water.—There is, at present, at a place called Caw, in the county of Londonderry, a sycamore tree, which contains a well of excellent fresh spring water. At the height of five feet, the trunk is about eighteen inches in diameter; at seven feet, it seems to have separated into two branches of equal thickness, one of which has shot up to a very considerable height, twenty or twenty-five feet, perhaps; from that part of the trunk from which a corresponding branch is supposed once to have grown, issues a stream of excellent water, perfectly cool and clear, which never fails, even in the hottest weather or longest drought; the tree seems perfectly healthy, and in luxuriant leaf.—Irish Paper.

The celebrated Zodiac of Dendera or Tentyra, which, when first discovered by the French, during their expedition in Egypt, occasioned much discussion respecting the antiquity of the earth, has been lately brought to Marseilles, and is to be conveyed to Paris. The Courier Français states, that the English Consul in Egypt opposed its removal, on the ground that it was within the district in which he had purchased the right of digging for curiosities, and wished to claim it for his government. The dispute was referred to the Pacha, who determined in favour of the French explorers, M. Saulnier and another. An account of their journey is to be printed.

LUCRETIVS.

Pun.—An auctioneer having waited a long time for a servant, who neglected to fetch away a table which he had sold to a gentleman, remarked, that 'he was the most un-com-for-table fellow he had ever known.'

Humility.—At Lord Camden's seat, the Hermitage, near Seven Oaks, in Kent, the following important information was exhibited a few weeks since:—This is to give notice, that Lord Camden does not mean to shoot himself or any of his tenants till the 14th of September.

Among other public records of the divine right of kings, the following is taken verbatim from the London Gazette of April 16, 1668, in the reign of Charles the Second of pious memory:—'Advertisement.—We are ordered to give notice, that by reason of the approaching heat of summer, his majesty intends to continue touching for the evil, till Friday after the 1st of May inclusively, and no longer.'

Bull.—The late Marquis of Londonderry, in his will, made twelve months before he died, has the following genuine bull:—Speaking of his son, Lord Castlereagh, he says, he feels confident that 'no exertion or affectionate endeavour will be omitted by him that can any way contribute, in addition to her jointure, to the accommodation and comfort of my disconsolate and unhappy widow.'

The editor of a provincial journal has the following paragraph in his paper of Saturday last:—'Stafford Assizes terminated last week; the trials were not of an important nature; twenty prisoners were capitally convicted.'

A distinguished gentleman of Pennsylvania, whose nose and chin are both very long, and who has lost his teeth, whereby the nose and chin are brought pretty near together, was told, 'I am afraid your nose and chin will have a fight before long; they approach each other very menacingly.'—'I am afraid of it myself,' replied the gentleman, 'for a good many words have passed between them already.'

Spanish Bull.—A Madrid paper says, that the stones which have been raised throughout Andalusia, in commemoration of the constitution of the Cortes, are all made of wood.

Sir William Curtis.—It could be little suspected that the present royal favourite, Sir Wm. Curtis, had originally been the political elbow of John Horne Tooke,—such, however, it appears, was the case: 'Sir William's father had been a zealous friend of popular politics in the city and county, and, at the period of the great contest for Middlesex, when Wilkes was opposed by Luttrell, old Mr. Curtis regretted that his business and his time of life prevented him from being so active in behalf of his favourite candidate as he wished to be: "My son, however," says he, "is just now of age; he is young and strong; take him, Mr. Horne, under your own direction, and make him useful in your canvass!" 'The young man,' continued Horne Tooke, 'retained his acquaintance with me for some years afterwards; but subsequently, as would be readily supposed, we seldom met. It happened, however, after a very long interval, while I was a member of the House of Commons, that we did meet at the door of the House, going out together into the lobby, and, what was more extraordinary, going out on a division, upon the same side. Being side by side, said Tooke, 'I offered him my hand, as an old political pupil, and told him, that I was heartily glad to find that he had returned to his master and to his original principles at last.—"Return!" replied Sir William, archly, "I never left my principles; it is you, Mr. Tooke, who have changed."—"How am I to understand you, Sir William?"—"Why, Mr. Tooke, when I engaged in politics with you, we had the majority with us; by the majority I have always stuck; and I will keep among the majority to the last."

Acrostics and Rebuses have had their day in periodicals, and we feel no wish to revive them. We are at a loss to understand whether it is serious or not, when he talks of circulation. Review of New Books.

Views of Society and Manners in America; in a Series of Letters from that Country to a Friend in England, during the Years 1818 and 1820. By an Englishwoman. 8vo. pp. 523. London, 1821.

NOTWITHSTANDING the assertion in the title-page, and the attempted confirmation of the cheat in the dedication, we feel no hesitation in expressing our decided conviction, that this work is neither by an Englishwoman, nor by any woman at all. It bears the most conclusive evidence of its being the production of an American—a genuine American, republican in principle, conceited and arrogant in opinion, and illiberal in sentiment. We might adduce a hundred instances to prove the transatlantic origin of the author, but one or two shall suffice. Would an Englishwoman detail the defeat of the British fleet on Lake Erie, in a more exaggerated manner than the most republican journal of the United States ever did? and even admitting this, would she exclaim, 'I dwell on this splendid engagement with pleasure?' The cheat here betrays itself, and reminds us of a life of General Benningsen, by a Russian; in one of the first pages of which he speaks of Shakespeare as his countryman. But to our author; we are told that an European said to an American farmer, 'where are your ruins and your poetry.'—'There are our ruins,' replied the republican, pointing to a revolutionary soldier, who was turning up the globe; 'and there,' extending his hand over the plain that stretched before them, smiling with luxuriant farms and little villas, peeping out from beds of trees, 'there is our poetry.' We wonder the European did not adopt Mr. Burehell's expressive phrase, and answer this republican nonsense by 'fudge.' The next paragraph, too, is very English, at least as English as true. 'It is men of substance, possessed in clear property of from five hundred to five thousand pounds, who now attempt the passage of the Atlantic. I fear that the policy of England is cutting away the sinews of the state.' Now it is notorious, that for one emigrant to America with 5000l. or even 500l. there are several hundreds with barely the means of paying their passage there. Again:—

'The American enters the western wilderness skilled to vanquish all difficulties, and understanding to train his children in the love of their country, founded upon a knowledge of its history and an appreciation of its institutions; he is fitted to form the advanced guard of civilization; the foreigner, in general, will be better placed in the main body, where he may himself receive instructions, and imbibe feelings suited to his newly assumed character as a citizen of a republic.'

One instance more of the English feeling which pervades these 'Views':

'During the war, when a body of American militia had repulsed a party of invaders, and were pursuing them to their ships, the commanding officer suddenly called them from the pursuit. A citizen, surprised and irritated at the order, seeing the possibility of cutting off the retreat of the enemy, reproachfully observed, that ere they could gain their boats, two thirds might be dead or prisoners. "True," calmly replied the other, having first enforced the order for retreat, [an order of this sort seldom required enforcing in the republican army,] 'we might, possibly, with the loss of a dozen men, have deprived the enemy of some hundreds, but what would have been the dozen?—sons, husbands, fathers, and useful citizens. And what would have been the hundreds?—men fighting for hire. Which loss in the balance had weighed the heaviest?'

How kind and considerate in this American colonel, who was so sprung of English blood, that he would not purchase the sacrifice of some hundreds of enemies, with the loss of a dozen citizens. To make the story more complete, we would advise this Englishwoman, should he ever relate the story afterwards, to add that Jackson, the American Hannibal, (as he has been facetiously called,) was the name of the commanding officer, in order to show that he sometimes possesses other feelings than those which marked his unpunished murder of the English merchants, Arbuthnot and Arncliffe.

The instances we have quoted, we think, amount to the proof positive that the writer is an American; the collateral proofs are still more numerous, and betray themselves on every occasion, where either England or the United States are mentioned. The ladies of America, we are told, possess the most solid attainments, and the modern and even the dead languages,—their manners are marked by sweetness, artlessness, and liveliness,—their dress is elegant and costly, but made with strict regard to decency. The citizens of Philadelphia and New York, are what we certainly never heard them accused of before—courteous to strangers; and have a great regard to morals and fair dealing. Having cautioned our readers, that the imputing the authorship of this work to an Englishwoman is, as Lord Grizzle says, 'all a trick,' and that its statements must be received with great suspicion, we proceed to make a few extracts. Our author visited Utica, a town scarcely twenty years old, and which now aspires to be the capital of the state of Albany. An innkeeper at Utica, at whose door fifteen stages now stop daily, eighteen years ago carried the solitary and weekly mail in his pocket to Albany:—

Leaving Utica, the country assumes a rough appearance, stumps and girdled trees encumbering the inclosures; log-houses scattered here and there; the cultivation rarely extending more than half a mile, nor usually so much on either hand; when the forest, whose face is usually rendered hideous to the eye of the traveller by a skirting line of girdled trees, half standing, half falling, stretches its vast unbroken shade over plain, and hill, and dale—disappearing only with the horizon. Frequently, however, gaining a rising ground, (and the face of the country is always more or less undulating,) you can distinguish gaps, sometimes long and broad, in the deep verdure, which tell that the axe and the plough are waging war with the wilderness. On the fifth day from that of her departure from Albany, brought our traveller and her companions to Auburn. The villages at the head of the different lakes, Skencatalas, Cayuga, Seneca, Onondaga, and Canadaga, are all thriving, cheerful, and generally beautiful; but Canadaga bears away the palm. The land has been disposed of in lots of forty acres each, one being the breadth, running in lines diverging on either hand from the main road. The houses are in all delicately painted: their windows with green Venetian blinds, peeping gaily through fine young trees, or standing forward more exposed on their little lawns, green and fresh as those of England. Smiling gardens, orchards laden with fruit,—quinces, apples, plums, peaches, &c., and fields, rich in golden grain, stretch behind each of these lovely villas; the church, with its white steeple, rising in the midst, overlooking this land of enchantment. The increase of population, the encroachment of cultivation on the wilderness, the birth of settlements, and their growth into towns, surpasses belief, till one has been an eye-witness of the miracle, or conversed on the spot with those who have been so. All here wears so much the gloss of novelty, all around you breathes so much of the life and energy of youth, that a wanderer from the antique habitations of time-worn Europe, might look around, and deem that man here held a new charter of existence; that Time had folded his wings, and the sister thrown away the shears.

The mode in which the contents of the post-bag are usually distributed through the less populous districts, is amusing:—

'I remember,' says the writer, 'when taking a cross cut in a queer sort of a caravan, bound for some settlement on the southern shore of Lake Erie, observing, with no small surprise, the operations of our charioteer; a paper flung to the right hand, and anon a paper flung to the left, where no sight or sound bespoke the presence of human beings. I asked if the bears were curious of news; upon which I was informed, that there was a settler in the neighbourhood, who ought to have been on the look-out, or some of his children for him. "But when I don't find them ready, I throw the paper under a tree, and I warrant you they'll look sharp enough to find it; they're always curious of news in these wild parts;" and curious enough they seemed, for not a cabin did we pass that a newspaper was not flung from the hand of this enlightener of the wilderness. Occasionally making a halt at some solitary dwelling, the post-bag and its guardian descended together, when, if the assistance of the farmer, who here acted as post-master, could be obtained, the whole contents of the mail were discharged upon the ground, and all hands and eyes being put in requisition, such letters as might be addressed to the surrounding district, were scrambled out from the heap; which, being then again scrambled together, was once more shaken into the leathern receptacle, and thrown into the waggon; but it sometimes happened that the settler was from home. On one occasion, I remember, neither man, woman, nor child was to be found: the stage-driver whistled and hallooed, walked into the dwelling, and through the field of maize, and shouted into the wood; but all to no purpose. Having resumed his station, and set his horses in motion, I inquired how the letters were to find their destination, seeing that we were carrying them along with us, heaven knew where? "Oh! they'll keep in the country any how; it is likely, indeed, they may go down the Ohio, and make a short tour of the states; this has happened sometimes; but it is a chance but they get to Washington at last, and then they'll commence a straight course anew, and be safe here again this day twelvemonth, may be, or two years at farthest."

Between Rochester and Lewistown, there are now several villages, though five years ago there was but a single log-house. Our author says,—

"A citizen, who got into the stage during the morning for a dozen miles, and who united the professions of doctor and farmer, and painter also, if I understood right, told me that he had five-and-thirty patients within the stretch of one mile. This may convey to you some idea at once, of the rapid settling of the country, and the physical evils that the first occupiers of the soil have to encounter. We did not enter a house in which there were less than two of the family either in bed, or looking as if they ought to be there. The autumn is always the trying season, and the prolonged and extreme heats of the summer months have this year doubled its usual fatality. These evils, dreadful while they last, are, however, but temporary; as the axe and the drain advance into the forest, the mal'aria recedes. It would recede more rapidly, as well as more certainly, if the new settlers would contrive to do without, or at least with fewer mills. The collection of the waters from the creeks and the swamps, soon brought, by the action of a powerful sun, to a state of putrefaction, increases tenfold the deadly air already spread by nature."

A few miscellaneous extracts, and we shall conclude:—

Taverns.—"On arriving at a tavern in this country, you excite no kind of sensation, come how you will. The master of the house bids you good day, and you walk in; breakfast, dinner, and supper are prepared at stated times, to which you must generally contrive to accommodate. There are seldom more hands than enough to dispatch the necessary work; you are not, therefore, beset by half-a-dozen menials, imagining your wants before you know them yourself; make them known, however, and if they be rational, they are generally answered with tolerable readiness, and I have invariably found with perfect civility. One thing I must notice,—that you are never any where charged for attendance. The servant is not your's, but the innkeeper's; no demands are made upon you, except by the latter; this saves much trouble, and, indeed, is absolutely necessary in a home where the servant's labour is commonly too valuable to be laid at the mercy of every whimsical traveller; but this arrangement originates in another cause,—the republican habits and feelings of the community. I honour the pride which makes a man unwilling to sell his personal service to a fellow creature; to come and go at the beck of another; is it not natural that there should be some unwillingness to do this? It is the last trade to which an American man or woman has recourse; still some must be driven to it, particularly of the latter sex, but she always assumes with you the manner of an equal."

A pretty recommendation, truly, for a servant; one thing, however, we must say, that this account of the influence of the republican principles on servants, is by no means exaggerated, but, we believe, rather too faint a picture. Of Birkbeck's colony, in the Illinois, we are told, on the authority of two American gentlemen who visited the settlement, that,—

"Its situation possesses all those positive advantages stated by Mr. Birkbeck; that the worst difficulties have been surmounted, and that these have always been fewer than what are frequently encountered in a new country. The village of Albion, the centre of the settlement, contains at present thirty habitations, in which are a bricklayer, a carpenter, a wheelwright, a cooper, and a blacksmith; a well-supplied shop, a little library, an inn, a chapel, and a post-office, where the mail regularly arrives twice a week. Being situated on a ridge, between the greater and little Wabash, it is, from its elevated position, and from its being some miles removed from the rivers, peculiarly dry and healthy. The prairie in which it stands, is described as exquisitely beautiful; lawns of unchanging verdure, spreading over hills and dales, scattered with islands of luxuriant trees, dropped by the hand of nature with a taste that art could not rival; all this spread beneath a sky of glowing and unspotted sapphires. "The most beautiful parks of England," my friend observes, "would afford a most imperfect comparison." The soil is abundantly fruitful, and, of course, has an advantage over the heavy-timbered lands, which can scarcely be cleared for less than from twelve to fifteen dollars per acre; while the Illinois farmer may, in general, clear his for less than five, and then enter upon a much more convenient mode of tillage. The objection that is too frequently found to the beautiful prairies of the Illinois, is the deficiency of springs and streams for mill-sets. This is attended with inconvenience to the settler, though his health will find in it advantage. The nearest navigable river to Albion, is the Wabash, eight miles distant; the nearest running stream, that is not liable to fail at mid-summer, the Bonapaw, four miles distant. The stock-water in ponds, for cattle, my correspondent judged, was liable to run dry in a few weeks; and the settlement apprehended some temporary inconvenience from the circumstance. The finest water is every where to be raised from twenty to twenty-five, or thirty feet from the surface; these wells never fail, but are of course troublesome to work in a new settlement.

Our last extract, for in remark we have done already, contains an account of a visit, paid by our traveller, to Joseph Bonaparte, whose residence is near Bordertown, on the Jersey shore of the Delaware river:—

It is a pretty villa, commanding a fine prospect of the river; the soil around it is unproductive, but a step removed from the "pine-barren"; the pines, however, worthless as they may be, clothe the banks pleasantly enough, and, altogether, the place is cheerful and pretty. Entering upon the lawn, we found the choice shrubs of the American forest, magnolias, kalmias, &c. planted tastefully under the higher trees which skirted, and here and there shadowed, the green carpet upon which the white mansion stood. Advancing, we were now faced at all corners by gods and goddesses, in naked, I cannot say majesty, for they were, for the most part, clumsy enough. The late General Moreau, a few years since, according to the strange revolutions of war-stricken Europe, a peaceful resident in this very neighbourhood, and who re-crossed the Atlantic to seek his death in the same battle which sent here as an exile the brother of the French emperor;—this general, in the same Parisian taste, left behind him a host of Pagan deities of a similar description, with a whole tribe of dogs and lions to boot, some of which I have seen scattered up and down through the surrounding farms. Two of these dumb Cerberuses are sitting at this moment over the side of a neighbouring gentleman's door, and the family use them as hobby horses.

Count Surville (he wears this title, perhaps, to save the awkwardness of Mr. Bonaparte), soon came to us from his workmen, in an old coat, from which he had barely shaken off the mortar, and (a sign of the true gentleman) made no apologies. His air, figure, and address, have the character of the English country gentleman—open, unaffected, and independent, but perhaps combining more mildness and suavity. Were it not that his figure is too thick-set, I should perhaps say, that he had still more the character of an American, in whom, I think, the last enumerated qualities of mildness and suavity are oftener found than in our countrymen. His face is fine, and bears so close a resemblance to that of his more distinguished brother, that it was difficult at the first glance to decide which of the busts in the apartment were of him, and which of Napoleon. The expression of the one, however, is much more benignant; it is, indeed, exceedingly pleasing, and prepares you for the amiable sentiments which appear in his discourse. The plainness and urbanity of his manners for the first few moments suspended pleasure in surprise; and even afterwards, when, smiling at myself, I thought, "and what did I expect to see?" I could not still help ever and anon acknowledging that I had not looked to see exactly the man I saw. I felt most strangely the contrast between the thoughts that were fast travelling through my brain, of battles and chances, ambition and intrigues, crowns and sceptres—the whole great drama of his brother's life passing before me—I felt most strangely the contrast between these thoughts and the man I was conversing with. He discoursed easily on various topics, but always with much quietness and modesty. He did and said little in the French manner, though he always spoke the language, understanding English, he said, but imperfectly, and not speaking it at all. He expressed a curiosity to become acquainted with our living poets; but complained that he found them difficult, and inquired if there was not often a greater obscurity of style than in that of our older authors. I found he meant those of Queen Anne's reign. In speaking of the members of his family, he carefully avoided titles; it was "Mon frere Napoleon, ma seur Hortense," &c. He walked us round his improvements indoors and out. When I observed upon the amusement he seemed to find in beautifying his little villa, he replied, that he was happier in it than he had ever found himself in more bustling scenes. He gathered a wild flower, and, in presenting it to me, carelessly drew a comparison between its minute beauties and the pleasures of private life; contrasting those of ambition and power with the more gaudy flowers of the parterre, which look better at a distance than upon a nearer approach. He said this so naturally, with a manner so simple, and accent so mild, that it was impossible to see in it an attempt at display of any kind. Understanding that I was a foreigner, he hoped that I was as much pleased with the country as he was; observed that it was a country for the many, and not for the few, which gave freedom to all and power to none, in which happiness might better be found than any other, and in which he was well pleased that his lot was now cast.

The character of this exile seems to be much marked for humanity and benevolence. He is peculiarly attentive to sufferers of his own nation—I mean France; is careful to provide work for the poorer emigrants; and to others, affording lodging, and often money to a considerable amount. His kindness has, of course, been imposed upon, in some cases so flagrantly that he is now learning circumspection, though he does not suffer his humanity to be chilled. This I learned from his American neighbours. I left Count Surville, satisfied that nature had formed him for the character he now wears, and that fortune had rather spitefully in making him the brother of the ambitious Bonaparte.

The Celt's Paradise, in Four Dams.

By John Baunin. 12mo. pp. 122. London, 1821.

The 'Celt's Paradise' is founded on an acknowledged anachronism, that of making St. Patrick, whose abode in Ireland was towards the end of the fourth century, a cotemporary with Ossian, who lived a century before him. The poem embraces many of the legendary traditions respecting the bard, which are not unhappily introduced; but its poetic merit is scarcely sufficient to atone for its general inconsistency, although it presents some claims to originality. We quote one extract; it relates to a vision of Ossian, which he describes to the saint, and is a favourable specimen of the author's talents, really possessing considerable beauty:—

'Yes!—swift as the wild wind that gives it its motion,

We travelled the waste of the desolate ocean—
And how proudly I rode on the back of the billow,

With her lip for my kiss and her breast for my pillow!

'We came to a land where the light of the world

Hath brightest his standard of summer unfurled,

We touch it—we pass it—we traverse its scope
Like the glancing of thought or the gleamings of hope!

'I have no memory of the things,
I saw or met in that fearful flight—

They only make strange visions,
To my sleeping thoughts in a dream of night—
Yet half I remember as we past—

A desert of sand outstripping its blast,
Of savage shapes and forms of fear—

That came to look on us too near—
And the hungry glances of their eyes—
Half yielded to a stern surprise,

To see such apd travellers there,
Or hear us hurrying thro' the air—

'And on—The blue hills backward fly—
Trees, rocks, and the world all glance by—

And once we gave a farewell look—
To the old sun I had forsok,

He seemed as if rushing down the sky,
To drink the depths of the ocean dry,

And snuff his long and lonely reign,
And never light up the world again.

'Only, oh! And we came to the last cold shore
That aged sun is shining o'er—

It was a scene of feature wild—
Its rocks in random ruin piled—
And towers of ice and hills of snow,
Mocking the wither'd waste below.
Yet there, all beautiful and bright,
The sun was shedding his chastened light—
It seemed as if faithless trees and flowers,
That vary with the varying hours,
And eyes and cheeks that change at will,
And worldly hearts more fickle still,
Had tired him with their dull deceit,
And he no more would lend them heat
Of light or life—but hither came,
To shune on things that, cold and tame,
And shapes, and strange as they might be,
Smiled always in white constancy.
And there away from house and tower
He spent his silent noon-tide hour,
All sportively: his soft heart fell
On many a glancing icicle,
And kindled up each crystal height,
With rainbow hue and chequered light.
And I thought he wished no other eye
To gladden at a scene so high,
But all in solitude smiled to see
The play of his own pleasure.

'On, on!—That spangling scene is past,
And we have left the world at last!
I cannot tell you if we went Upward or down—thru firmament,
Or wind or water—air or light!—
It was even as a vision of night,
When youthful hearts that pant for heaven,
Dream of some rich and racy even,
Upon whose perfumed breeze they rise,
Like the mist of the hill in summer skies.—
I saw not, touch'd not, aught but her,
Who was my bosom's comforter,
In that rash flight—enough for me,
To feel her clasp me tenderly,
And with her kisses call from death
The flutterings of my failing breath—
O then! in what a keen delight,
We shot upon our airy flight—
Like the lone comet calm and fair,
Cleaving the silent realms of the air!—
I said I knew not aught was there—
Nor saw a shape, nor heard a sound
In all the voiceless space around!—
Yet have I thought—a half-dream thought,
That far and doubtfully I caught,
While in our rush of silence hurried
A parting glance of my native world—

'The stars were up—and weak and small,
They twinkled round a darkened ball;
I strove to fix them on my sight,
And, as I looked, their points of light
Lengthened to lines, that quick and slight Traversed each other, and entwined
Like a maiden's tresses in the wind—
And still I look and still they glance,
And mingle in their misty dances.
And faint and fainter, and now they fly—
And now they fail, and now they die—
And they and the spot they woke to light
Have melted from my swimming sight!—
One earthly sigh I gave to part,
From the world that warmed my youthful heart—

'And on, and on!—But how or where?
I felt no motion in the air,
And I think no breeze was busy there;
But I was swathed as in a mist,
That the morning sun-beam has not kissed;
And I was hurried as in a wind,
That all but leaves a thought behind—

'On, on!—and have we not touch'd at last,
Some gentle substance as we pass'd!—

I thought our flight less fearful now,
And I looked upon my spirit's brow
To read its smile—O well I knew
My own heart's thought reflected true!—
And smoother still we glide along,
Smooth as the gushing flow of song;
The velvet sod we press at last,
The gathered mist aside is cast,
And arm in arm, and hand in hand,
We wander thro' her own bright land!"

The notes which are appended to the volume, shew Mr. Banim, who is the author of the tragedy of Damon and Pythias, to be well read in the authentic and legendary history of Ireland.

Biographia Hibernica. A Biographical Dictionary of the Worthies of Ireland, from the earliest period to the present time. Written and Compiled by Richard Ryan. 2 Vols. 8vo. pp. 1135. London, 1821.

LAST week, we noticed the 'Lives of Eminent Scotsmen,' a work which presents strong claims to support; and it now falls to our lot to say a few words respecting the 'Worthies of Ireland,' a publication which every son of Erin must dwell on with delight. We might, perhaps, object to the terms 'eminent' and 'worthies,' as implying something rather too superlative for general biography, but they must be taken in a qualified sense. The editors of both these works have strong national feelings, but not too strong for impartial biographers and historians. The 'Scotsman' exults in the number of men his country has produced 'eminent in arts or arms, in letters or in science;' and while Mr. Ryan laments over the misfortunes of his country with patriotic feeling, he appeals to biography 'as the vindicator of an unhappy people, and brings in the dead to plead their cause,' glorying that the darkest periods of Ireland's history have been rich in men of talent, whose memory should not be forgotten.

To speak of the utility of such a work is quite unnecessary; and where the object is so laudable, we should not be over fastidious as to its execution. To us, however, it appears that Mr. Ryan is an honest biographer,—a faithful chronicler; that he has not sought to adorn his heroes with virtues they never possessed, but has been anxious to give honour where honour is due, and to exhibit each character fairly and impartially. It is this which makes biography valuable; and we would rather have a dozen pages of facts relating to an individual, than a whole volume of dissertations. The first volume of the 'Worthies,' which extends no farther than the letter

C. is rich in important lives, and contains memoirs of Burke, Boyle, Barry, Brook, Brien, Boirunne—the glory and grace of his age; 'Berkeley, 'to whom every virtue under heaven,' the Butlers, Curran, Carolan the bard, Centlivre, &c. &c. It is not, however, from the lives of individuals so well known that we shall make our extracts, but principally from the neglected biography in which these volumes have rescued many names. We may, however, observe, that in the more extended memoirs, and where originality cannot be expected, Mr. Ryan has presented the most important facts in an agreeable form. The first extract we make on account of its embracing a jeu d'esprit, and some lines by Moore:

'Joseph Atkinson was a man who fully merited the epithet "worthy;" and truly sorry are we to inform our readers, that, with almost every particular of his life, we are wholly unacquainted.

'He was a native of Ireland, and was treasurer of the Ordnance, under the administration of the Earl of Moira. He was the intimate of Moore, Curran, and the rest of the galaxy of Irish genius; and was himself a poet of more than ordinary ability, as the following jeu d'esprit, addressed to his friend Moore, on the birth of his third daughter, will evince:—
"I'm sorry, dear Moore, there's a damp to your joy,
Nor think my old strain of mythology stupid,
When I say, that your wife had a right to a boy,
For Venus is nothing without a young Cupid.

"But since Fate, the boon that you wish'd for, refuses,
By granting three girls to your happy embrace,
Sbe but meant, while you wandered abroad with the Muses,
Your wife should be circled at home by the Graces!"

'He died in Dublin, at the age of seventy-five, in October, 1818, and was sincerely regretted by all who knew him; being admired by the young for his conviviality, and respected by the aged for his benevolence and numerous good qualities.

'The following beautiful lines, from the pen of his intimate, Moore, are intended to be engraved on his sepulchre:—

"If ever lot was prosperously cast,
If ever life was like the lengthen'd flow
Of some sweet music, sweetness to the last,
'Twas his, who, mourn'd by many, sleeps alone.

"The sunny temper, bright where all is strife,
The simple heart that mocks at worldly wile,
Light wit, that plays along the calm of life,
And stirs its languid surface into smiles;

"Pure Charity that comes not in a show,
Sudden and loud, oppressing what it feeds;

But, like the dew, with gradual silent power,
Felt in the bloom it leaves along the meads;

"The happy grateful spirit that improves,
And brightens every gift by Fortune given;
That, wander where it will, with those it loves,
Makes every place a home, and home a heaven!

"All these were his—Oh! thou who read'st
this stave,
When for thyself, thy children, to the sky,
Thou humbly prayest, ask this boon also—
That ye like him may live, like him may die."

'Anthony Barnwell, a young officer of great promise, was the youngest son of John, eleventh Lord Trimlestown. The religion of his family precluding all possibility of his rising to eminence in his native land, he retired in his seventeenth year into Germany, where he entered the imperial service, in which he continued until his decease, in September, 1739. The following account of him is given in a letter from a general in the imperial service, to Viscount Mountgarrett:—"Amongst all those brave men who have lost their lives at the battle of Crotzka, none is so much lamented by all as Mr. Anthony Barnwell, the Lord Trimlestown's youngest son; he came into Germany in General Hamilton's regiment of cuirassiers, when his good sense, humility, good nature, and truly honest worthy principles, gained him the love and esteem of all who had the least acquaintance with him; we have had scarce any action of any note with the Turks that he was not in, and always acquitted himself with uncommon resolution. The day before the sad battle he was made a lieutenant; the next fatal day, the regiment in which he had his commission, was one of the first that charged the enemy; at the very first onset, his captain and cornet were killed, when he took up the standard, tore off the flag, tied it round his waist, and commanded the troop; he led out twice to the charge, and was at once repulsed; the third time, he turned himself to his men, and said, 'Come on, my brave fellows: we shall certainly now do the work: follow me.' He then set spurs to his horse, and pursued into the thickest of the enemy, where he was surrounded, defending himself for a considerable time with amazing courage; at last he fell quite covered with wounds, and dying, left such an example of true courage and bravery, as cannot fail of being admired by all who shall hear of it."

The life of Captain John Barrett, a brave but unfortunate seaman, terminates with a melancholy narrative. He perished on board the Minotaur, a seventy-four gun ship:—

"In the spring of the year 1810, the Minotaur sailed again for the Baltic, and was principally employed in escorting the different convoys from Hango to Decrhead. At the close of the season she again took charge of the homeward-bound convoy (the Plantagenet, seventy-four, Captain Ellis, escorting the rear,) a charge destined to be her final act of service, and in which she was most lamentably to fall by shipwreck. The evening before she struck, the Plantagenet telegraphed to her, and hauled to the westward; but the master and pilots of the Minotaur, too confident of their reckoning, unfortunately stood on. At nine o'clock that night she struck on the Hakes so violently, that it was with great difficulty the midshipmen and quarter-masters gained the deck. The scene of horror that now presented itself can only be conceived by those who witnessed it.

'The ship's company, almost naked, were sheltered from the severe cold and heavy sea by the poop, and the greatest exertions were made to get out the boats, the quarter ones having been stove and washed away. By cutting down the gunnel the launch was got off the booms, into which one hundred and ten men crowded; at this time the appearance of the ship, nearly covered by the sea, and having only the main-mast standing, was truly pitiable. The launch, with great difficulty, reached the shore.—The yawl was next got out, but immediately sunk, from the numbers that crowded into her, with the natural desire to avail themselves of the smallest chance of escaping from a state of inevitable destruction.

'Thus cut off from all prospect of escape, the only desire apparent in those who remained was, to clothe themselves in their best suits. The captain of marines and surgeon had themselves lashed in a cot that hung in the cabin, and two of the officers followed their example with the utmost composure.

'At length came the awful stroke—and the sea washing through the belfry, tolled the funeral knell. The captain of the main-top, who was saved on the main-mast, said, he saw Captain Barrett to the last exhorting the men to patience; he was standing on the poop, surrounded by them, when a dreadful sea destroyed every remnant of the ship, and closed his meritorious and useful life.

'Through the whole of this melancholy scene, the conduct of Captain Barrett did honour to his station. From the commencement to its fatal termination, he evinced the most heroic coolness; during which time no possibility of saving the ship had ever existed. The pilots seem to have been deficient in knowledge of the ship's track, for they opposed the warning of the Plantagenet, and differed, after the ship struck, in opinion, whether she was on the Smith's Knoll or the Hakes; Captain Barrett decided for the latter, and the ensuing dawn, by a distant view of land, confirmed it. In the course of this dreadful night, an officer, in the eagerness of exertion, occasioned some disturbance; Captain Barrett said to him, "Sir, true courage is better shown by coolness and composure—we all owe nature a debt—let us pay it like men of honour."

'The fate of Lieutenant Salsford was distinguished by a singular circumstance, which we cannot forbear recording:—A large tarre wolf, caught at Aspro, and brought up from a cub by the ship's company, and exceedingly docile, continued to the last an object of general solicitude. Sensible of its danger, its howls were peculiarly distressing. He had always been a particular favourite of the lieutenant, who was also greatly attached to the animal, and through the whole of their sufferings he kept close to his master. On the breaking up of the ship, both got upon the mast.—At times they were washed off, but by each other's assistance regained it.—The lieutenant at last became exhausted by continual exertion, and benumbed with cold.—The wolf was equally fatigued, and both held occasionally by the other to retain his situation. When within a short distance of the land, Lieutenant Salsford, affected by the attachment of the animal, and totally unable any longer to support himself, turned towards him from the mast; the beast clapped his fore-paws round his neck, while the lieutenant clasped him in his arms, and they sunk together.'

To pass from 'grave to gay,' we quote a laughable anecdote, relating to James Barry, the celebrated painter, premising that he had invited Mr. Burke to dine with him at a small house he occupied in St. Martin's Lane. Mr. Burke accepted the invitation, and kept his appointment:—

'When he rapped at the door, however, Dame Ursula, who opened it, at first deputed that her master was at home; but on Mr. Burke's expressing some surprise and announcing his name, Barry overheard his voice, and ran down stairs in the usual trim of abstracted genius, utterly regardless of his personal appearance: his scanty grey hair, unconscious of the comb, sported in disordered ringlets round his head; a greasy green silk shade over his eyes, served as an auxiliary to a pair of horn-mounted spectacles, to strengthen his vision. His linen was none of the whitest, and a sort of roquelaure served the purposes of a robe de chambre; but it was of the composite order, for it was neither jockey-coat, sartou, pelisse, nor tunic, but a mixture of all four; and the chronology of it might have puzzled the Society of Antiquarians to develop. After a welcome greeting, he conducted his eloquent countryman to his dwelling-room on the first floor, which served him for kitchen, parlour, study, gallery, and painting-room; but it was at that moment so befogged with smoke, as almost to suffocate its pithy owner, and was quite impervious to the rays of vision. Barry apologized; and the bungling chimney doctors; hoped the smoke would clear up, as soon as the fire burned bright; and was quiet at a loss to account for "such an infernal smother," until Mr. Burke, with some difficulty, convinced him he was himself the cause: for, in order to remedy the errors of his chimney, he had removed the old stove grate from the fire-place into the centre of the room, where it was sustained by a large old dripping pan; by way of a platform, to save the carpet from ignition; and he had been occupied for half an hour with the bellows to cheer up the coals to a blaze. He was now prevailed on to assist his guest in removing the grate to its proper situation, and the windows being thrown open, the smoke soon vanished. He now proceeded to conduct his guest to see his pictures in certain apartments on the higher story, where many exquisite pieces without frames, stood edgewise on the floor, with their fronts to the walls, to guard them from injury; and, by the aid of a sponge and water, their coats of dust were removed, and their beauties developed, much to the delight of the guest.—Having lectured con amore upon the history and merits of the paintings, his next object was to display to his guest the economy of his bedroom: the walls of this apartment, too, were occupied by frameless pictures, veiled in perennial dust, which was likewise sponged off, to develop their beauties, and display some first-rate gems of the art. In a sort of recess, between the fire place and the wall, stood a stump bedstead without curtains, and counterpane by a rug, bearing all the vestiges of long and arduous service, and tinted only by the accumulated soil of half a century, which no scourer's hand had ever prophaned. "That, sir," said the artist, "is my bed; I use no curtains, because they are unwholesome, and I breathe more freely, and sleep as soundly as if I reposed on down, and snored on velvet.—But there, my friend," continued he, pointing to a broad shelf, fixed high above the bed, and fortified on three sides by the walls of the recess, "that is my chef d'œuvre."—"Ecod, I have outdone them at last."—"Outdone whom?" said Mr. Burke—"The rats, the d-d rats, my dear friend," replied Barry, rubbing his palms in ecstasy, "they beat me out of every other security in the house—could not keep any thing for them, in cupboard or closet; they devoured my cold meat, and bread and cheese, and bacon: but there they are now, you see, all safe and snug, in defiance of all the rats in the parish." Mr. Burke could not do less than highly commend his invention, and congratulate him on its success. They now descended to the first room; Barry, whose only clock was his stomach, felt it was his dinner hour, but totally forgot his invitation, until Mr. Burke reminded him of it:—"Ods-oh! my dear friend," said he, "I beg your pardon: so I did invite you, and it totally escaped my memory.—but if you will sit down here and blow the fire, I'll step out and get a charming beef-steak in a minute." Mr. Burke took the bellows to cheer up the fire—and Barry his departure, to cater for the banquet. And, shortly after, he returned with a comely beef-steak, enveloped in cabbage leaves, crammed into one pocket; the other was filled with potatoes; under each arm was a bottle of port, procured at Slaughter's Coffee-house; and in each hand a French brick. An antique gridiron was placed on the fire, and Mr. Burke performed the office of cook; while Barry, as butler, set the table, which he covered with a table cloth, perfectly geographical; for the stains of former soups and gravies had given it the appearance of a map of the world. The knives and forks were veterans brigaded from different sets, for no two of them wore the same uniform, in blades, handles, or shapes. Dame Ursula cooked the potatoes in Tipperarian perfection, and by five o'clock, the hungry friends sat down, like Eneas and Achates, to make a hearty meal: after having dispatched the "pinguem ferinam," they whiled away the time till nine o'clock, over their two flaggons "oeteris Racchi," "And Joe'd, and laugh'd, and talk'd of former times."

Mr. Burke has often been heard to declare, that this was one of the most amusing and delightful days of his whole life.

There is one memoir in this work, which may be disputed by the editor of the 'Lives of Eminent Scotsmen'; it is that of Dr. Black, the celebrated professor of chemistry in the University of Glasgow. Dr. Black was born in France, but his father was a native of Belfast, and descended from a Scotch family. Mr. Ryan's reason for introducing him among the 'worthies of Ireland,' if admitted, might authorize him to extend the field very widely: he says—"it would be an act of flagrant injustice, not only to the individual, but to posterity, to exclude the imperishable name of Black, from the trivial circumstance of Ireland not having been the spot of his birth." We always thought such a trivial circumstance of great importance in these matters, but it appears we were wrong, and a distinguished individual may be claimed by any country. The lives of Burke, Curran, and the Earl of Charlemont, which are the most laboured in the volume, are highly interesting, but we shall conclude, for the present, with an anecdote relating to Andrew Cherry, the actor, and the author of the 'Soldier's Daughter,' and other dramatic pieces:

In the town of Athlone, we are told, a circumstance of particular distress attended our hero; but which he bore with all the magnanimity that dramatic ardour could inspire. The business of the theatre was suspended for a short time, in consequence of the benefits having turned out badly: the manager was resolved not to waste any more bills, but wait for the races, which were to commence in a few days. Our hero's being of a timid and bashful turn, and assisted by a portion of youthful pride, was incapable of making those advances, and playing off that train of theatrical tricks, by which means benefits are frequently obtained in the country, and, therefore, he had been less successful than many of his brethren. His landlady, perceiving there was no prospect of payment, satisfied herself for the trifles already due, by seizing on the remnant of our hero's wardrobe; and knowing she could dispose of her longings to more advantage during the races, turned him out to the mercy of the winter's wind, which he endured with all his former philosophy. He rambled carelessly about the streets, sometimes quoting passages to himself, both comic and serious, that were analogous to his situation, but without forming one determined idea of where he was to rest his houseless head. Towards the close of the evening, he strolled by accident into the lower part of the theatre, which had formerly been an inn, and was then occupied by a person whose husband had been a sergeant of dragoons, for the purpose of retailing refreshments, &c. to those who visited the theatre. After chatting until it grew late, the woman hinted to our hero that she wished to go to bed, and begged he might retire; upon which he replied, in the words of Don John, "I was just thinking of going home, but that I have no lodging." The good woman, taking the words literally, inquired into the cause, with which he acquainted her without disguise. Being the mother of a family, she felt severely for his distressed situation; at that time he did not possess a single halfpenny in the world, nor the means of obtaining one. The poor creature shed tears of regret that she could not effectually alleviate his misfortune. He endeavoured to assume a careless gaiety; but the woman's unaffected sorrow brought the reflection of his own disobedience to his mind, and he dropped tears in piteous libation: in his grief he saw the sorrow of his parents, whom he had deserted, to follow what he began to perceive a mad career, in despite of the many unanswered remonstrances he had received, with a fair promise of forgiveness and affection, should he return to his business. This philanthropic female lamented that she could not furnish him with a bed, but offered to lend him her husband's cloak, and to procure a bundle of dry hay; that he might sleep in an empty room in her house. His heart was too full to pay his gratitude in words; his eyes thanked her; he wept bitterly, accepted her kind offer, and retired to rest. The intruding any further on her kindness was painful to him, as she was struggling to maintain a numerous offspring. He therefore carefully avoided the house at meal-times, and wandered through the fields or streets, until he supposed their repasts were finished; at last, so overcome by fasting and fatigue, that he could not rest, he rose from his trooper's cloak in the dead of the night, and explored the kitchen, searching the dresser and all its shelves and drawers, in hopes of finding something that might satisfy the cravings of his appetite, but in vain. On his return to his hay-truss, he accidentally struck against the kitchen table, the noise of which he feared might alarm the family; and, uncertain of the real cause of his leaving his apartment at that hour, they might naturally suppose that his purpose was to rob the house, as a reward for their hospitality: the idea added to the misery he then suffered; he trembled, he listened, but all was quiet; and then renewed his search, (for his hunger overcame his fears,) and to his gratification he found a large crust of stale bread, which he afterwards informed had been used for rubbing out some spots of white paint from the very cloak that composed his bedding: he, however, ate it with avidity, as he was entering on the fourth day without the least refreshment, and returned heartfelt thanks to Providence, whose omnipotent hand was stretched in the very critical moment, to save him from the most direful of all possible deaths—starving! The Cook's Oracle: containing Receipts for Plain Cookery on the most Economical Plan for Private Families; also, the Art of Composing the most Simple and most highly-finished Broths, Gravies, Soups, Sauces, and flavoured Essences, &c. The whole being the result of actual Experiments instituted in the Kitchen of a Physician. The Third Edition, which is almost entirely re-written. 12mo, pp. 464. London, 1821.

We really take shame to ourselves for having suffered a work of such real merit, on a subject of such vast importance, as the 'Cook's Oracle,' to pass to a third edition before we noticed it. We call this an important subject, for although we do not deem eating the proper study of mankind, yet without the practice of it all other studies would soon be at an end; nor let our good housewives take offence if we deem cookery a profound art, and one that requires great attention, good taste, and nice discrimination; for, we are assured, there are not less than seven chances against even the most simple dish being presented to the mouth in absolute perfection; for instance, a leg of mutton. 1st. The mutton must be good; 2nd. Must have been kept a good time; 3rd. Must be roasted by a good fire; 4th. By a good cook; 5th. Who must be in a good temper; 6th. With all this felicitous combination, you must have good luck; and 7th. Good appetite. The meat, and the months which are to eat it, must be ready for each other at the same moment.* If any doubt could exist as to the importance of cookery, after the instance we have quoted of the sevenfold difficulties attending one of its simplest operations, we might refer to the highest authorities. We might quote Archestratus; we do not mean the gentleman of that name who was so small and lean that he could be placed in a tart-dish without filling it, but—

'Archestratus the bard,
Who sang of poultry, venison, and lard.'

He who was a follower of Epicurus, who traversed land and sea in quest of the choicest productions for the gratification of the palate: who wrote a poem on gastronomy, and deemed it useless to hold any communication with men who could give no elucidation on this subject. Need we name Apicius, who spent a million and-a-half of money in the composition of sauces, and finding that he had not above a plumb* and-a-half left, poisoned himself for fear of being starved. Shall we refer to the profusion of Heliozobolus, Lucullus, or Ahasuerus—to Domitian, who assembled the senate to decide how to dress a turbot, or to the Emperor Claudius, who—

'Found the imperial palate tickled
By love of glory less than mushrooms pickled.'

If emperors and princes were not of sufficient authority for our grave readers, we might pass to the philosophers; for, as Shakespeare declared he never found a philosopher who could endure the tooth-ach patiently, so our author protests that he has not yet overtaken one who did not love a feast. It is not merely as lovers of good eating and drinking that we are to consider all who have written in their praise, but many of them have deigned to enlighten the world on the subject, and it is a matter of fact, that the best books of cookery have been written by physicians, e. g. Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Theodore Mayerne, Professor Bradley, Sir John Hill, whose work, yeleft 'Mrs. Glasse's Cookery,' has had more readers than all his other productions; Dr. Le Cointe, Dr. Hunter; and last, not least, Dr. Kitchiner, the author of the 'Cook's Oracle.' And never since eating first came into fashion, was there any person who devoted his attention so largely or so successfully to the rationale of good living as this gentleman. He has studied with the spit in one hand and the pen in the other, and made himself fully acquainted with the practical part of the philosophy of the kitchen. He has endeavoured to illustrate this 'most useful art' of cookery, 'because he knew not how he could employ some leisure hours more beneficially for mankind, than to teach them to combine the utile with the dulce, and to increase their pleasures without impairing their health, or impoverishing their fortune.' He has considered the art of cookery not merely as a mechanical operation, fit only for working cooks, but, as the analeptic part of the art of physic, to teach—

'How best the sickle fabric to support
Of mortal man,—in healthful body how
A bodisful mind, the longest to maintain.'

The aim of the author of the 'Cook's Oracle' is, as he assures us, 'to render food acceptable to the palate, without being expensive to the purse or offensive to the stomach,—nourishing without being inflammatory, and savoury without being surfeiting; constantly endeavouring to hold the balance even between the agreeable and the wholesome—the epicure and the economist.' The author is not a mere theorist, and he declares that 'he has not printed one receipt that has not been proved in his own kitchen, which has not been approved by several of the most accomplished cooks in the kingdom, and has moreover been eaten with unanimous applause by a Committee of Taste, composed of some of the most illustrious gastrophiles of this luxurious metropolis.'

We confess we have not the honour of belonging to Dr. Kitchiner's Committee of Taste, and it will not be expected that an author in his kitchen (garret) should be able to put in practice the five hundred and seventy-four receipts which the 'Cook's Oracle' contains; though we cannot deny that we have frequently indulged ourselves with a 'devilish biscuit,' prepared secundum artem, and have even once or twice ventured on the 'Devil's' himself. Our experience of the doctor's cookery extends still farther: we have a friend, a female friend, whom we occasionally visit, who treats our pampered appetite with many 'tit bits,' which owe their origin to the 'Cook's Oracle,' and so far as our experience can enable us to form a correct opinion, we pronounce them all the very best we have tasted.

In noticing the 'Cook's Oracle,' we shall not follow the author through his directions respecting the odorous and calidificient repellents of roasting, boiling, frying, and broiling, all of which form distinct chapters, in which they are treated practically and scientifically; nor shall we quote one of the numerous receipts with which the work abounds, but confine ourselves to the introductory part. Notwithstanding the practical skill of the author, he did not venture to offer any observation of his own, till he had read all that he could find written on the subject; and this all extended to not less than two hundred and fifty volumes. These, however, are generally mere transcripts of each other, and could afford little real information to a gentleman of the extensive practical knowledge of our author, who not only tells us how to make good dishes, but how to procure a good appetite to enjoy them. The doctor is an economist as well as an epicure, and condemns all excessive preparation. He says,—

'It is your second courses—ridiculous variety of wines, liquors, ices*, desserts, &c.—which are served up to feed the eye—that overcome the stomach, and paralyze digestion, and reduce "children of a larger growth" to sacrifice the health and comfort of several days,—for the baby pleasure of tickling their tongue for a few minutes, with trifles and custards!!! &c. &c.

Indigestion will sometimes overtake the most experienced epicure; when the gustatory nerves are in good humour, hunger and savoury viands will sometimes seduce the tongue of a "grand gourmand" to betray the interests of his stomach, in spite of his brains.

On such an unfortunate occasion, when the stomach sends forth errant signals of distress, for help, the peristaltic persuaders are as agreeable and effectual assistance as can be offered; and for delicate constitutions, and those that are impaired by age or intemperance, are a valuable panacea.

They derive, and deserve this name, from the peculiar mildness of their operation. One or two very gently increase the action of the principal viscera, help them to do their work a little faster, and enable the stomach to serve with an ejection whatever offends it, and move it into the bowels.

* Thus indigestion is easily and speedily removed, appetite restored, (the mouths of the absorbing vessels being cleansed,) nutrition is facilitated, and strength of body and energy of mind are the happy results.—See "Peptic Precepts," from which we extract the following prescription:—

'To make forty peristaltic persuaders.'

'Take—
'Turkey rhubarb, finely pulverized,—two drachms.

Syrup, (by weight,) one drachm.
Oil of caraway, ten drops, (minims.)

Made into pills, each of which will contain three grains of rhubarb.'

'The dose of the persuaders must be adapted to the constitutional peculiarity of the patient; when you wish to accelerate or augment the alvine excretion, take two—three—or more, according to the effect you desire to produce—two pills will do as much for one person, as five or six will for another; they will generally very regularly perform what you wish to-day, without interfering with what you hope will happen to-morrow; and are, therefore, as convenient an argument against constipation, as any we are acquainted with.

'The most convenient opportunity to introduce them to the stomach,—is early in the morning, when it is unoccupied, and has no particular business of digestion, &c. to attend to; i. e. at least half an hour before breakfast. Physic must never interrupt the stomach when it is engaged in digesting food.

'From two to four persuaders will generally produce one additional motion within twelve hours. They may be taken at any time by the most delicate females, whose constitutions are so often distressed by constipation, and destroyed by the drastic purgatives they take to relieve it.'

Of the duties of the host and his guests, our author says,—

'It is the most pleasing part of the duty of the master of the feast, (especially when the guests are not very numerous,) to take advantage of these moments to introduce them to one another, naming them individually, in an audible voice, and adroitly laying hold of those ties of acquaintanceship or profession which may exist between them.

'This will much augment the pleasures of the festive board, to which it is, indeed, as indispensable a prelude, as an overture to an opera; and the host will thus acquire an additional claim to the gratitude of his guests. We urge this point more strongly, because, from want of attention to it, we have seen, more than once, persons whom many kindred ties would have drawn closely together, pass an entire day without opening their lips to one another, because they were mutually ignorant of each other's names, professions, and pursuits.

'To put an end at once to all ceremony as to the order in which the guests are to sit, it will save much time and trouble if the master of the house adopts the simple and elegant method of placing the name of each guest in the plate which is intended for him. This proceeding will be of course the result of consideration, and the host will place those together who he thinks will harmonize best.

'Le Journal des Dames informs us, that in several fashionable houses in Paris, a new arrangement has been introduced in placing the company at a dinner-table.

'The ladies first take their places, leaving intervals for the gentlemen; after being seated, each is desired to call on a gentleman to sit beside her; and thus the lady of the house is relieved from all embarrassment of etiquette, as to rank and pretensions,' &c.

'But without doubt, says the journalist, this method has its inconveniences.

'It may happen, that a bashful beauty dare not name the object of her secret wishes, and an acute observer may determine, from a single glance, that the elected is not always the chosen.'

'If the party is large, the founders of the feast should sit in the middle of the table, instead of at each end; thus they will enjoy the pleasure of attending equally to all their friends, and being in some degree relieved from the occupation of carving, will have an opportunity of administering all those little attentions which contribute so much to the comfort of their guests.

'If the guests have any respect for their host, or prefer a well-dressed dinner to one that is spoiled, instead of coming half an hour after, they will take care to make their appearance a quarter of an hour before the time appointed.

'The operations of the cook are governed by the clock,—the moment the roasts, &c. are ready, they must go to table, if they are to be eaten in perfection.

'An invitation to come at five o'clock, seems to be generally understood to mean six; five precisely, half-past five; and not later than five, (so that dinner may be on table within ten minutes after, allowing for the variation of watches,) at five o'clock exactly.

'Be it known to all loyal subjects of the empire of good living, that the Committee of Taste have unanimously resolved, "an invitation to E.T.A. BETA. PI. must be in writing, and sent at least ten days before the banquet—and must be answered in writing, (as soon as possible after it is received),"—within twenty-four hours at latest," especially if it be not accepted; then, in addition to the usual complimentary expressions of thanks, &c. the best possible reasons must be assigned for the non-acceptance, as a particular pre-engagement, or severe indisposition, &c.'

Our author is one who takes due note of time: in his 'Invitations to Dinner,' he declares that, 'in affairs of the month, the strictest punctuality is indispensable; the gastronomer ought to be as accurate an observer of time as the astronomer. The least delay produces fatal and irreparable misfortunes.' His 'Advice to Cooks' is not like Dean Swift's Advice to Servants, but contains much useful and moral instruction; and while he recommends servants to be dutiful and attentive, he urges kindness and liberality as no less the duty of their employers.

As Dr. Kitchiner has come to the task with qualifications which no previous writer ever possessed, he has produced the best work that has been written on the subject of gastronomy. The 'Cook's Oracle,' in its progress to a third edition, has received justly the praise of nearly all the critics, and we willingly give it the testimony of our approbation.

PERCY ANECDOTES. PART XXIII.

THIS last number of this neat little work is devoted to War: a field so extensive and so full of interesting anecdote, that we almost wonder the brothers Percy should limit the subject to a single part. They, however, appear to have been sensible that their unassuming little volume could embrace but a small portion of the 'disastrous chances,' 'moving accidents,' and 'hair-breadth escapes in the imminent deadly breach,' and therefore adopt an epigraph as modest as it is appropriate, when they term them Anecdotes of War:—

'A page of the great book of war
Where error is deck'd so bravely, that the eye
With delight has scarce leisure to be afraid!'

In the selection of the anecdotes, the editors appear rather to have chosen those which related to remarkable incidents or circumstances of war, than traits of mere heroism, in which, however, it is by no means deficient.

The part is most fitly dedicated to the 'first captain of the age,' the Duke of Wellington, of whom an elegantly engraved portrait is given, though we have seen likenesses of him which we have preferred. The following are extracts:—

'Different kinds of Fear.—When the British under Lord Nelson were bearing down to attack the combined fleets off Trafalgar the first lieutenant of the Revenge, on going to see that all hands were at their quarters, observed one of the men devoutly kneeling at the side of his gun; so very unusual an attitude in an English sailor, exciting his surprise and curiosity, he went and asked the man if he was afraid? "Afraid!" answered the honest tar, with a countenance expressive of the utmost disdain, "No; I was only praying that the enemy's shot might be distributed in the same proportion as the prize-money, the greatest part among the officers."

'When the brave Corporal Catthness

was asked, after the battle of Waterloo, if he was not afraid, he replied, "Afraid! why I was in 'a' the battles of the Peninsula!" and having it explained that the question merely related to a fear of losing the day, he said, "Na, na, I did na fear that; I was only afraid we should be 'a' killed before we had time to win it."

'Piety respected.—In an action with the French fleet, in 1694-5, Captain Killigrew, on coming up with the French vessel, Content, discovered that the whole of the crew were at prayers. He might have poured in his broadside with great advantage; this, however, he refused to do, saying, "It is beneath the courage of the English nation to surprise their enemies in such a posture." Poor Killigrew fell in the action.'

'Mining.—In the siege of Tournay, which, after twenty-one days, surrendered to the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, mining was resorted to by both the besiegers and the besieged, and the consequences were often dreadful. The English miners often met and fought with those of the enemy; and sometimes the troops, mistaking friends for foes, killed their fellow soldiers; sometimes whole companies entered the mines at the very moment they were ready primed for explosion. They were often inundated with water, suffocated with smoke, or buried alive in the cavities, and left to perish; and on some occasions, whole battalions were blown into the air, and their limbs scattered to a distance, like lava from a volcano. One day M. de Surville made a sally, and drove the besiegers from a post they had taken; but being repulsed, and one hundred and fifty men having taken possession of the lodgement, the enemy sprung a mine, blew them all into the air, and overturned all the gabions. On a subsequent day, an inhabitant of Tournay went to the Earl of Albemarle, and offered to discover one of the principal mines of the citadel, on condition that he would make him head gaoler of all the prisons in Tournay; this was agreed to, and the man performed what he had undertaken, so that three hundred men were posted in the mine, and eight hundred in the town ditch to support them; but in the middle of the night, M. de Megriugy sprung two mines, one immediately under the large mine, in which all the three hundred men, before mentioned, were stifled; the other threw up part of the ditch, and buried a hundred men.'

'Respect for the Sanctuaries of the Dead.—When the Swedish army under the command of Charles the Twelfth, was obliged to abandon Courland, and to surrender Mitau to the Russians, after a siege of fifteen days, the conquerors found, on taking possession of the place, that the tombs in the cathedral had been opened, and the remains of their princes scattered about the passages. Apprehensive that this profanation might be imputed to them, they refused to take possession of the temple, until a Swedish colonel had given them a written acknowledgment, that this sacrilege was the act of his own countrymen.'

'Wooden Artillery.—Few narratives of sieges are more entertaining, than that given in the Seir Mutakhereen, of a fort which was defended by the use of wooden artillery, and defended effectually in one of Aurungzebe's campaigns in the Deccan. The commandant was nearly unprovided with cannon, having only one or two defective pieces. The town was, however, a great mart for timber. The governor securing both the timber and the carpenters, garnished his ramparts with wooden imitations of cannon; and being fully supplied with most other requisites when the imperial army arrived, put a good face on the business. He did more, too, for he kept the secret within his own walls; and the enemy, respecting the number of his train, commenced their approaches in due form, affording him thus abundance of leisure to mature his plan of defence. Every piece, as soon as fired, became, of course, unserviceable, but he immediately replaced it by a new one. The balls from the imperial batteries were returned with the utmost facility, as, however ponderous these were, our hero was able to supply pieces of any calibre, and send recochet shot, selon les regles, even with more effect than his enemy. The labours of the Carron foundry never produced more guns in a year, than this man's ingenuity did in one siege. The enemy, tired out, at last, with the obstinate defence which he made from his batteries, determined to carry the place by escalade in open day. Having failed, however, in some similar enterprises, a neighbouring saint was procured, who was to head the attack, and by the sanctity of his character, to inspire the soldiers with greater zeal in a desperate cause. The holy man was raised on a platform, and carried in the rear of the forlorn hope. The governor's good luck still adhered to him. A shot from a wooden gun, when the escaladers were nearly close to the walls, knocked down the saint, on which the party took to their heels. A delay ensued; the siege was at last raised, and the commandant covered with glory.'

'Marlborough.—It appeared from every circumstance of the conduct of the Duke of Marlborough, antecedent to the glorious battle of Blenheim, that he was resolved either to conquer or die on the field; and a short time before the action commenced, he devoted himself with great solemnity to the Almighty Lord and Ruler of Hosts, in presence of his chaplain, and received the sacrament. When the battle was concluded, his grace observed, that he believed he had prayed more that day than all the chaplains in the army.'

'Disinterestedness.—On the death of Marshal Keith, his brother, the Lord Marshal, wrote to Madame Geoffrin, "You can have no notion to what a vast treasure I have succeeded by the death of my brother. At the head of an immense army, he had just levied a contribution upon Bohemia, and I find seventy ducats in his strong box!"

Just Recentment.—At the time of taking the castle of Bude, by Soliman, in 1520, the garrison, without defending itself, offered to capitulate, and obtained the honours of war. As they defiled, the Turks insulted them, and reproached them with a want of courage. A German soldier, unable to bear such a stigma, looked on a Janissary with a threatening air, and said, "What hast thou to reproach me with? I do not command; I obey." At the same time he drew his sword, and ran him through the body.

Words.—After the battle of Jena, Bonaparte dined with Wieland, commonly called the Voltaire of Germany; and gravely conversed with him concerning the horrors of war, and the folly of shedding blood; and mentioned various projects for the establishment of a perpetual peace.

CRUELITIES OF THE FRENCH.

THE circumstances which are particularly to be remarked respecting French cruelty are, that it is wanton, indiscriminate, mixed up with much levity, and that, contrary to the progress of inhumanity in other European nations, it has rather increased than diminished as civilization has advanced; for the massacres of later times have been at least as pitiless and ferocious, as any that occurred in the most barbarous periods. This persistency in a vice which, more than any other, is corrected by social improvement, forms one of its most characteristic features in France; and though it admits of an easy explanation, we must, for the present, confine ourselves to the fact. We will not dwell upon the monsters which that country produced in early times, as Fredegonde, Brunehault; or as Chilperic, the Nero of that country, and Clotaire II. Neither shall we mention the acts of some of their bad sovereigns of later date. It may be said that the utmost blame which can accrue to the people from such acts as these, is, that they tolerated the rulers who perpetrated them; and were either bad, or weak, or foolish enough to submit to governments who sported with their lives. To stamp inhumanity as a national vice, it must be shown to be the vice of the nation, not of its monarchs; and this again is a feature of French cruelty, that in no country of Europe has the bulk of the nation taken so active a part in massacres. It will, therefore, be sufficient to enumerate some of those in which the mass of the population was concerned, to maintain our assertion. The Cottereaux, under Philip II., are represented as laying waste first the environs of Bourges, and afterwards spreading much farther, slaying alive the priests, violating women before their husbands' faces, committing every kind of sacrilege and cruelty to such an extent that the monarch found it necessary to send an army to exterminate them—and they were exterminated. During the crusade against Raymond, Count of Thoulouse, sixty thousand Albigenses were massacred, and seven thousand in a church. Simon de Montfort, whose humanity the Père Daniel thinks he cannot sufficiently eulogize, after the taking of Lavaur, threw the lady of the castle, alive, into a well, hanged her brother, murdered eighty gentlemen, her companions, and burned four hundred heretics, while the clergy were singing a hymn to the Holy Ghost. The Rontiers, in 1185, were as cruel as the Cottereaux in 1183. The Pastoureaux, under St. Lewis, and during the regency of Blanche, committed still greater ravages, and murdered, with excessive cruelty, all who opposed them. These same Pastoureaux, who, in France, amounted to more than fifty thousand, and kept the whole country in terror and in blood, attempted to get a footing in England, but they never rose to any height; for they were immediately subdued, and the chiefs punished by the few sectaries whom they had seduced. Under Philip IV. Hainault was laid waste, and the count of that province revenged himself by burning, plundering, and violating all that he could reach; inasmuch, says Velly, that one would have supposed that hordes of Tartars had combined to ruin Europe.

The following account is given of the Jacquerie, which began near Beauvais, in the reign of John. The peasant, furious at the ill-treatment they said they had received from their superiors, flew to any arms they could find, and laid waste the whole country, murdering every person, not nobles only, but peasants, who refused to join them. Two hundred castles were burned, and their inhabitants massacred. But the nobles soon retaliated, and were as indiscriminate in their vengeance as the Jacques had been in provoking it.

The massacre in Paris, by order of Marcel, happened about the same time, as also the cruelties of the grands compagnies, who, one after another, murdered all who stood in their way, and deluged France with blood. Under Charles VI., the Maillois was massacred at first the tax-gatherers, and afterwards all they met, and reduced Paris to the state of a town taken by storm. To this succeeded dreadful executions, too horrid and too numerous for open day; and many were put in sacks and thrown by night into the Seine. The massacres which took place in Paris, and in France, during the factions of Orleans and Burgundy, certainly surpassed the alternate proscriptions of Marius and Sylla, of Antony and Octavius; though history, which painted the latter as the most odious and destructive, has had the art to slur over the former; but the capital of Italy never, in the worst of times, presented such a scene of thoughtless profligacy and sanguinary levity, as many that occurred in the reign of Charles VI. In Rome, the nod of Marius was a sentence of death. In Paris, every man of the triumphant faction was a Marius, and murdered with a look. The historian (Velly), after recounting, in the course of a few pages, more confusion, cruelty, and bloodshed, and giving a more gloomy picture of Paris than ever London afforded, says, with much naïveté,—"Il y avoit eu jusqu'alors peu de sang versé;" and, indeed, is in company with what followed, he is in the right, for it was after the scenes just mentioned that the worst massacres began. Disguising as is the picture, we are compelled to delineate it, in order to show that in stating the point we meant to prove, we were neither intemperate nor unjust. The 12th June, 1418, was the memorable day on which the populace broke open the prisons; and forcing those who were confined there, Armagnacs, Bourguignons, doctors, criminals, guiltless, all to come out, slew them one by one: the Countable, the Chancellor, seven prelates, the peers and magistrates of the parliament, with many of less note, were dragged from their dungeons and massacred. The prison of the Châtelet alone made some resistance, but it was set on fire, and at length it was rendered. The people rushed in, and either threw the prisoners or compelled them to precipitate themselves out of the windows, upon pikes which were held below to receive them. In the court of the palace, the blood of the murdered flowed ankle deep, and there was not a street in Paris without its assassinations. Every man killed every enemy, or rival, or creditor he had.—Velly, vol. iii. p. 488. Every species of outrage was executed upon the dead bodies during three days; and a sash (écharpe) in the form of that worn as the badge of the triumphant faction, was cut for the Duke d'Armagnac, out of his own flesh, and hung across his corpse. Three thousand five hundred persons perished in three days; and the Septembrisers of the fifteenth century were applauded by the chiefs of the nobility, some of whom, it is said, gained three hundred thousand crowns by their exploits.—(Ibid. p. 471.) Immediately afterwards, the Queen Isabella of Bavaria, with the Duke of Burgundy, returned to Paris in triumph; and the streets, from which the blood, shed by her orders a day or two before, was not yet washed away, were strewn with roses for her solemn entry. 'The reign which followed put an end to the disturbances, and suspended, for a long time, the cruelty of the nation. One of the monarchs, however, whom they called the Grand Roi, was present at an execution of Calvinists, thus described by Daniel as an act of exemplary piety of Francis I.

'Le soir du même jour six coupables furent conduits à la place publique où l'on avoit préparé des feux pour les brûler. Il y avoit au milieu de chaque bûche une espèce d'estrade élevée où on les attachait; ensuite on alluma le feu au-dessous d'eux, et les bourreaux, fâchant d'écarter la corde, laissoient couler jusqu'à la hauteur du feu ces misérables pour leur en faire sentir la plus vive impression; puis on les gardoit de nouveau en haut, et après leur avoir fait souffrir ce cruel tourment à diverses reprises, on les laissa tomber au milieu des flammes où ils expirèrent.'

Our Mary is justly stigmatized as a monster; yet we are not aware that she ever took the diversion of the stake in person; besides—and this alone may serve to mark the feelings of the two nations with regard to cruelty—we do not adore—we execrate her memory. During her reign, too, not more than 283 persons perished by religious persecutions; but Mezerai expresses himself thus in praise of Francis I.: 'Heretics in his reign, and by his order, were burned by dozens, sent to the galleys by hundreds, and banished by thousands.' The persecutions against the Waldenses at Cabrières, Mérindol, Carcassonne, &c., commanded by Francis, and executed by the Baron d'Oppède, were attended with more numerous details of cruelty than all those under Mary; and in one single night more persons perished than in the five years and a half of her wretched reign.

The persecutions under Francis were the forerunners of all that happened in the ensuing reigns; and cruelty, which at this polished period, was very great in France, increased as the nation became more refined. The reign of Henry II. was full of religious persecutions. The strictest orders were given to the judges to show no mercy to protestants. Some of the parliament were put in prison for having proposed to moderate the penalties against them. All who interceded in their favour were considered as accomplices; and at the rejoicings for the birth of Charles IX.—a dreadful omen of his future reign—it was thought a proper accompaniment to the festival to make a bonfire of living heretics, which the monarch applauded from the windows of his palace; though it seems he was much affected when he heard the screams of his household tailor—one of the victims. The shorter reign of Francis II. was of course less bloody; but the name of Charles IX. is sufficient to call to mind all that is horrid. Beside the St. Bartholomew, which in England at least seems to have absorbed all indignation, there occurred, in his reign, the massacre of Vassy and a civil war, which summed up in a very small space of time, much more blood and cruelty and murder, than our entire wars of the Red and White Roses. The age of Lewis XIV. witnessed the massacres at the Hotel de Ville, when the people, too impatient to make distinctions between friends and foes, massacred all they met, Magarines and Frondeurs. The same reign, which the French have designated as one of the great epochs in the history of mankind, by which the whole species was improved and dignified, produced, beside the massacre of the Hotel de Ville, the revocation of the edict de Nantes, the Dragonades, the Comisards, the religious wars in the Cévennes, and the devastations of the Palatinate.

All the horrors which we have recounted, (and we have not given a single one which is not extracted from a French historian, and which does not rest upon French authority,) and an infinitely greater number, which we have spared our readers the pains of perusing, were committed.

CLARE,

THE NORTHAMPTONSHIRE PEASANT.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.
SIR,—With much respect for your impartial review of Mr. John Clare, the Northamptonshire Peasant's poems, I venture to call his attention, through your pages, to the observations which I am about to make, that he may be further encouraged to pursue the celestial art of poetry, with the earnest and best success. It is well understood that many original geniuses have become ruined imitators by yielding their judgment to the voice of party criticism, and have sunk into oblivion under the pressure of envy and malice, as though originality should be clipped, and toned into a particular school, intimating the unworthiness of genius being schooled by nature and operated on by inspirations. Whoever is versed in periodical literature knows how poor Keats was buffeted from one page to another, how much ill-nature was shed in lines of ink, and what rancorous spleen appeared in print,—because he was fostered by a political writer.

Fortunately, however, for classical and self-taught writers too, history presents a long roll of geniuses who have treated unjust criticism with that neglect which it has merited. Keats is an exception, but his constitution, like his taste, was delicate; like a rose-leaf, he was easily blown upward in his fancy, or driven downward by the sadness of his lonely spirit. Mr. Clare is otherwise. His genius is of the masculine order, from whose manly nature, the sensibilities of feeling issue, but never more successfully than when he describes the crinkle of a primrose-leaf or the fluttering of love's confusion. His element is under a hedge, among the various grasses and herbs and mosses; whatever little object draws his eye in the sun-beam wins his admiration and love. His first conception is natural and striking; therefore, the crown of his hat aids his memory to paper; the lines are written, and require but little more embellishment or correction. The advantages of a thousand hallowed volumes of English poets, I conceive, would be of injury rather than service to him, for his poetic reading is already manifest, and imitation, however humble or elegant, will be the result; that 'Young Edwin was no vulgar boy;

And— Deep thought oft seemed to fix his sant eye.

One reason, why so many strike 'their lyre in praise of poetry' is, that they partly acquire a good ear for rhyme, a correct method for the delivery of it, and attempt, but seldom produce, more than excellent verses. Mr. Clare is aware that poems, like timber, can be measured by feet, and finished off like picture frames, yet, if the timber be unsound at heart, or the frames without good pictures, neither the one nor the other are of much value. Poems should be skillfully put together, contain solid sentiments, and the most touching pathos of nature,—

'Divinely felt, to make another feel.'

Shakespeare, with a few original authors, should be the only ones worthy of great application. I believe Bloomfield's amiable muse was never much benefited by listening to the sound of 'read the poets!'—'study the A's down to the Z's,'

'Range them by day and meditate by night.'

This is an affection for perfection, at which soi-disant critics have themselves failed. Who questions that Lord Byron is not, in some respects, the worse for his poetical reading? How many 'Deserted Villages' have been attempted since Goldsmith's career, yet unsuccessfully. The habitual reading of poetry alone is sufficient to make a poetaster feel his way through a monthly periodical. But, allowing one exception, I verily believe, now and then, a fine poem is scattered in periodical pages, far exceeding half, nay, four-fifths of puffed off published poetry; and I have often wished that a work were patronised by the literati to select the best pieces for 'after ages' from those which are destined for 'the soap and candles.' I would not keep Mr. Clare in ignorance of the silliness of some poets, the eccentricity of some, and the disproportionate nonsense of others; but I would not advise him to trust to the strength of their weakness, which is irremediable, from vain notions and obstinate party considerations. If he march the fields with his eye directed to nature he will be original; if he closet himself and imagine nature, he will be an imitator. London has given birth to poets, but the country has made them. Edinburgh will produce a 'Pirate,' but his attributes have been drawn from the scenes of action. Ramsay and Burns danced with the shepherdesses and sung with hobbinols. Cunningham used to sit on the furrows, like Prior's 'Cupid's ploughboy,' and listen to the calm wanderings of the stream.

Morland loved to lean over bridges and broken trees, in sober abstraction, before he soiled his brush. Falconer had never written his 'Shipwreck' but for a tempest; Somerville the 'Chace' but for his actual experience in field sports; and Olney's harp might have been unstrung but for its attractive ruralities. Hence, if Mr. Clare will be great, and form a constellation for the heaven of eternity, let him read good prose with assiduous and ardent attention; let his mind be stored with a clear knowledge of things in and out of their nature; let him reason with truth and virtue: his beauties will touch the heart while they strike the eye, and do much towards refining the understanding, which is the spiritual essence of true poetry. Well then, after all, it will appear, that I would have him unacquainted with metrical authors, ancient and modern, —not so; I would warn him against the danger of the shallows, the rocks, and the storms: he may dip, but not meditate; skim, but not dive. He may consult, but only with a view of correcting his errors. He will have to occupy his niche in 'Fame's proud temple.' He should watch the ellipses and the eclipses. The apostrophe is a very useful little fellow, but should not be abused. That is preferable to that's; against to 'gainst. A hobbling line is, like a lame ploughman, out of its place. Inferior is not full enough for three syllables at the close of a 'Sonnet.' Mr. Clare will comprehend me by re-perusing his works.* It is true, many provincialisms, with other eccentricities, might be brought forward, but his experience will tutor him to expunge them as he advances towards beatified love and eternal triumph.

ST. PANCRAS NEW CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I have renewed my visit to the New Church, St. Pancras, which is finishing very rapidly; and I think it necessary to state one more objection, omitted in my last communication: viz, the monsters' heads that are placing round the porticos of the vestry wings. I trust, Sir, the architect, in his good sense, will see the propriety of making some alteration in this respect, as also with the equivocal and grotesque ornaments over the altar before noticed, for independently of their satirical effect, they but ill accord with the other parts of this structure.

With respect, I am, Sir, your's,

ORIGIN

OF BURYING IN CHURCHES, AND ON THE SOUTH AND EAST SIDES OF CHURCH-YARDS.

UNTIL the time of Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, whose pontificate began in 740, and ended in 748, the custom of burying within the precincts of towns and cities did not prevail in England; and it was not until towards the Norman conquest, that persons, however great their rank, were buried in churches, unless it happened that they were removed thither, on account of their extraordinary sanctity, or in order to be reputed and worshipped as saints. Thus the body of Queen Adlythrydor St. Andry, who died of the pestilence, 669, was translated into the church by her sister; and Bede tells us, that the Lichfield Prelate, St. Chad, was first buried near the church of St. Mary, but that when St. Peter's Church was built, his bones were removed thither, agreeably to the canon of King Edgar, which enjoined that no one should be buried in a church, whose life had not been a goodly one, and worthy of such a burial. The origin of the general custom, now prevalent, of burying in churches (a custom of which almost every one complains, though no one seems anxious to put a stop to it), appears to have been this. Persons, of an extraordinary sanctity, were first placed there as in the cases of St. Andry and St. Chad. Founders and patrons, and other great persons, afterwards crept as near to the fabric as they could, some being laid in the porch; others in the entry of the cloisters; others in the cloisters themselves, before the chapter-house door; others in the chapter-house; and others in the sacristy. Sometimes the bodies were deposited in the wall, first on the outside (of which there is a remarkable instance at Lichfield) and then in the inside. In process of time, our ancestors began to form aisles, and to bury and establish chantries in them, after which they made free with the body of the church, and lastly, except in the cases of sanctity before mentioned, they had recourse (chiefly since the reformation) to the chancel. It appears, that, formerly, all persons of rank and fortune were laid in stone coffins, if we may judge from the number of them that has been found; though Bede says, that St. Awdry was buried, according to her own request, in a wooden coffin. Her sister, Sexburg, however, who succeeded her as abbess, caused her bones to be taken up, after they had laid sixteen years in the grave, and placed in a stone coffin. As to later times, we learn from Thoroton's Nottinghamshire, and Dagdale's Monasticon, that stone coffins were in general use, until the reign of Henry III. inclusive; from which period, down to Henry VIII. their use, according to Browne Willis, got gradually out of fashion. The partiality to the southern and eastern sides of a church yard, in the circumstance of burial, may, perhaps, at first, have partly arisen from the ancient custom of praying for the dead; for, as the usual approach to most country churches is by the south, it was natural for burials to be on that side, in order that those going to divine service might, in their way, by the sight of the graves of their friends, be reminded of them, and induced to offer up prayers for the welfare of their souls. Even now, since this custom of prayers has been abolished, the same obvious situation of graves may excite some tender recollection in those who view them, and silently implore 'the passing tribute of a sigh.' That this motive had its influence, may be concluded from the graves, which, in some instances, appear on the north side, when the approach to the church lies that way. Still, however, even on this case, the south side is well tenanted, and, consequently, there must have been some other cause for this preference. The supposed sanctity of the east is well known, and arose from the circumstance of our Saviour, the Sun of Righteousness, appearing in that quarter, with respect to us; from the tradition of his ascending to heaven eastward, from Mount Olivet; and from an universally received opinion, that he will re-appear in the same quarter at the last day. Hence the customs of building churches with one end pointing towards the east; of turning ourselves in some parts of our prayers, in that direction; and of being buried with our faces inclining that way. Perhaps an analogy was conceived to exist between the Sun of Righteousness and the material sun, from which persons buried within the rays of the latter might have a better claim to the protection of the former. Whatever origin this preference to the south and east may have had, the fact is certain, and is corroborated by many records of ancient times; which mention that those who were reputed good Christians, lay towards the south and east, while others who had suffered capital punishment, or laid violent hands on themselves, were buried towards the north, a custom formerly much practised in Scotland.

AMERICAN NAMES.

Of all people who ever imposed names upon a newly-discovered country, the Americans have certainly been the most unlucky in their choice; witness Big-muddy River and Little-muddy River, Little shallow River, Good Woman River, Little Good Woman Creek, Grind-stone Creek, Cupboard Creek, Biscuit Creek, Blowing-fly Creek, cum multis aliis in the same delightful taste. When this country shall have its civilized inhabitants, its cities, its scholars, and its poets, how sweetly will such names sound in American verse!

Ye plains where sweet Big-muddy rolls along,
And Tea-put, one day to be famed in song,
Where swans on Biscuit and on Grindstone glide,
And willows wave upon Good Woman's side!
How shall your happy streams in after time
Tune the soft lay, and fill the sonorous rhyme!
Best birds, who in your amorous verse will call
On measuring Pork and gentle Cannon
Ball;
Split-Hock, and Stick-Lodge, and Two Thousand Mile,
White-line, and Cupboard, and Bad-bumour'd Isle!
Flow, Little-Shallow, flow! and be thy stream
Their great example, as it will their theme!
Isis with Rum and Onion must not vie,

THE WEST INDIA VIPER.

By a report read before the Royal Institute of France, it appears that the great viper, called Fer de Lance, is one of the most dreadful scourges of the West Indies, but is found only in Martinique, St. Lucia, and another small island. This viper is so savage, that the moment it sees any person, it immediately erects itself and springs upon him. In raising itself, it rests upon four equal circles, formed by the lower part of the body; when it springs, these circles are suddenly dissolved. After the spring, if it should miss its object, it may be attacked with advantage; but this requires considerable courage; for as soon as it can erect itself again, the assailant runs the greatest risk of being bitten. Often, too, it is so bold as to follow its enemy by leaps and bounds, instead of fleeing from him; and it does not cease the pursuit till its revenge is glutted. In its erect position it is so much the more formidable, because it is as high as a man, and can even bite a person upon horseback. M. Moreau de Jonnes was once riding through a wood, when his horse reared; and when the rider looked round to discover the cause of the animal's terror, he perceived a Fer de Lance viper standing quite erect in a bush of bamboo; and heard it hiss several times. He would have fired at it with his pistol, but the affrighted horse drew back so ungovernably, that he was obliged to look about for some one to hold him. He now espied at some distance, a negro upon the ground, wallowing in his blood, and cutting with a blunt knife the flesh from the wound occasioned by the bite of the same viper. When he acquainted the negro with his intention of killing the serpent, he earnestly opposed it, as he wished to take it alive, and make use of it for his cure, according to the superstitious notion of the negroes. He presently rose, cut some lianes, made a snare with them, and then concealing himself behind the bush, near the viper, he attracted his attention by a low whistling noise, and suddenly throwing a noose over the animal, drew it tight, and secured his enemy. M. Moreau saw this negro twelve months afterwards, but he had not perfectly recovered the use of the limb bitten by the viper. The negroes persecute these vipers with the greatest acrimony. When they have killed one, they cut off its head, and bury it deep in the earth, that no mischief may be done by the fangs, which are dangerous after the death of the animal. Men and beast shun this formidable reptile; the birds manifest the same antipathy for it as they do for owls in Europe, and a small one, of the loxia kind, even gives warning by its cry, that a viper is at hand.

HYMNAL TRIUMPH.

ESSENTIALS will form in our conjugal band
To-morrow, if life should be spared us;
And 'tis pleasant to think, that in heart and in hand,
Our God has so equally paired us.

Three blossoms of five are yet opening their charms,
 To delight and secure our affections;
 While peace is our comfort,—how gratitude warms
 The past and the present reflections!
 The world may revile, with vituperous tongue,
 The loves of endearments united;
 But we'll never forsake our pure nest and our young,
 So dearly and happily plighted.

THE FALL OF THE LEAF.

The wind is roaring high and strong,
 The cold this clime pervades;
 But Mercy leads the year along
 As Summer's beauty fades;
 And Agriculture stores the sheaf
 Before the annual 'fall of leaf'.
 The flower so innocent and sweet
 Has vanish'd from the sight;
 The artisans of day retire
 In drear and lengthening night—
 For seasons gone and pleasures brief,
 Hope, faith, and love, insure relief.
 The mind is happy, great, and wise,
 That thinks on change, and keeps Reflection mellow'd for the skies,
 Where nature never sleeps;
 Nor intervenes one pang of grief—
 Earth only shows the 'fall of leaf'.

THE MINSTREL'S HARP.

The way was steep, the evening ray
 Smil'd gaily in the west;
 And glanc'd adown the ruin'd tower,
 That crown'd the mountain's breast.
 No hospitable wander now
 Within the court was seen;
 No bowmen beat the trusty yew,
 All clad in Lincoln green.
 But Silence held her gloomy sway
 Within the ample hall,
 Whose fretted roof and storied pane
 Now totter'd to their fall.
 High on the wall the minstrel's harp
 A mouldrast trophy hung;
 Whose chords had wak'd them to the tale
 The aged minstrel sung;
 Had bade the eye at Percy's fate
 With fearful lustre shine;
 And pour'd the soul of chivalry
 To vindicate his line.
 Peace to the minstrel's honour'd shade,
 Peace to his ancient lore,
 To thee each passing breeze shall sigh—
 'The minstrel is no more.' E. G. B.

EPISTLE

From a Lover in Prison to his Mistress.

From cells of deep solitude, mansions of care,
 Where nought can be heard but the sighs of
 despair,
 And nought can be seen but the taper's dull
 light,
 And walls of my prison; most sad to my sight;
 Borne off by light ruffians from those I hold dear,
 The freedom of writing is all I have here;
 O! dearest of women, my bosom's delight,
 Perhaps never more wilt thou bless my fond sight,
 Perhaps never more shall thy Etheldred hear
 Thy lips breathe the vow of affection sincere.

Perhaps never more in a kiss they'll meet mine, Nor again thy fond arms round my neck will entwine.
 Oh, painful remembrance of all my past bliss,
 Full dear was my happiness purchas'd by this;
 Those arms that have oft been lock'd fondly in thine,
 By power of my foe galling fetters confine,— Those limbs that so often have borne me to thee,
 That form which hath charm'd thee no longer
 is free;
 Yet here, even here, tho' oppress'd by my pains, Tho' bent to the earth by the weight of my chains,—
 Even here, in the mansion of sorrow and woe,
 With transports of love my sad bosom can glow;
 Even here, in this dangerous, a prey to despair,
 No friend to console or my sorrows to share,
 A faint ray of hope in my bosom will gleam,—
 So bursts from the heavens the sun's wa'r-y
 beam,
 When clouds from the westward its brightness
 deform,
 And lightnings blue flashes foretell the dread storm!
 When Fancy in slumber depicts to me
 The fairest of things—the image of thee,
 O then, dearest Emma, my woes are forgot,
 My tortures, my prison, I care for them not;
 In thy tender embrace I am lovingly prest,
 With thy kiss of true love, with thy smile I am blest;
 With rapture long lost my fond bosom now
 glows,
 But the vision expires, and I wake to new woes:
 Such, lov'd of my soul, is thy Etheldred's fate,
 The offspring of sorrow, the victim of hate;
 Sure demons, in every of all my past joy,
 Were leagu'd in fell faction my bliss to destroy.
 But hark! the bolts draw, my tormentors appear,
 I go to my pallet and drop the sad tear;
 They leave me, and, e'en my dull taper's withdrawn,
 My sorrows they mock, and my anguish they scorn;
 Grown frantic, I lay me along the cold stones,
 And hear the damp walls echo back my dull groans.
 Ye tyrants, your tortures will soon be no more,
 A few dreary hours and my sorrows are o'er;
 My soul from its prison will joyfully flee,
 To realms where from sorrow and care all 'are free!
 Farewell then, dear Emma, for ever adieu,
 The last bursting sigh of my soul is for you!

SONNET.—TO MYRA.

CYTHIA is up! and beautiful her light
 Tips ev'ry leaf and dew-drop on the spray;
 How sweet with silv'ry gleams the gentle sight
 Seems ush'd in by her resplendent way!
 Come, Myra, forth at close of this fair day,
 Now the blest hours bring harmony and
 love,—
 Whirl! Flashed! in soft enamour'd lay
 Sing to the illuminated lamp above!
 Whose orb the brightly blue ethereal plains
 Venus by doves in milken car is driven,
 The moon-beams of the night making her reins,
 Guiding their course along the vaulted heaven!
 O light divine! whence purer pleasures flow,
 Teach me thy light that I myself may know!
 14th Sept. 1821. HATY.

TO LOUISA G.—N.

THOU little cherub, in whose smiling face
 The happiness of infancy we see;
 In whose unclouded youthful brow we trace
 No mark of more mature anxiety;
 How joyous are the moments of thy life,
 Free from its care, its sorrows, and its strife.
 Yet wherefore say I free: thy troubles, small
 To us, perchance to thee great griefs appear;
 Or in the loss of thy rebounding ball
 Or broken doll, which draws thine infant tear,
 Or in the picture vanished from thine eye,
 And mourned with many a deep-sighing sigh.
 Alas! the human life—it seems as though,
 From infancy to age, all, were pain;
 Our pleasures fled before us, but to go—
 Re-enter, but to disappear again;
 All, all obtained, we seek for something more,
 And, in the search, lose that we had before.
 Yet some I know there are, whose lot of pain
 Is less than others,—a selected few,
 Whom griefs assail not, whom no sorrows strain,
 Who know the world, and knowing, enjoy
 it too;
 Who bask in life's bright sunshine, and new know
 The shame of poverty or pang of woe.
 And oh, sweet infant, may such be thy fate,
 To know alone the pleasures of the world;
 To see upon thee fix'd no eye of hate,
 No lip contemptuous at thy sorrows curl'd;
 To hear no pamper'd scolder jeer thy name,
 And cast thee off to poverty and shame.
 But may'st thou bask in wealth's religious
 beam,
 Dispersed around by the immortal power,
 With innocence the partner of thy dream,
 And truth the tutor of thy waking hour;
 And may'st thou know of sorrow—so to see,
 Is happier light, thine own prosperity.
 Farewell, sweet prattler, in thy sparkling eye
 I read thy happy heart; oh, may it be
 As happy when maturer moments fly,
 And woman boast an ornament is thee;
 And when old age creeps on, without a die,
 May'st thou review past hours, and calmly die.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—The spectacle of the Coronation has been so productive to the treasury of this theatre, that we are assured it will be followed by a pa-gant still more splendid, representing the principal events in the King's late visit to Ireland. Report says that Mr. Elifston has spent 7000*l.* in preparing this gorgeous spectacle, which is expected to eclipse any thing of the kind ever produced on any stage. The rivalry of the two great houses, for the present season at least, is likely to be the rivalry of expense only; and it is those old-fashioned amusements, called tragedy and comedy, they will, in all probability, be banished the stage altogether, or be left to be produced in the form of comic burlettas and such-like.

dramas at the minor theatres. Seen thousand pounds for a single spectacle! How many deserving authors would half this sum have stimulated to use their best efforts in the legitimate drama; but this is a consideration which cannot be expected to have much influence with managers, who rather vitiate the public taste than try to correct it. If the present rage for spectacle continues, we may expect to see the whole corps dramatique dismissed, and succeeded on the stage by troops of soldiers and itinerant minstrels, who will answer all the purposes of public prosecutions.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Wednesday night, this theatre exhibited a striking proof of the elegance, variety, and magnificence to which we have attained in stage decoration and stage effect. The play was the melo-dramatic opera of The Exile, written by Reynolds, and founded on Madame Cottin's charming novel of Elizabeth. This play was first produced in 1808, when the Covent Garden company were performing at the Opera House, and was at that time particularly fortunate in the performers. Mr. Young, who had previously attracted much notice at the Haymarket, confirmed his fame in the character of Darau. Mrs. Dickens, then in the zenith of her powers and popularity, was Katherine. The songs, which had been composed by Mazzinghi, afforded fine scope for her rapid execution, and the performance of this part was considered as one of her greatest triumphs. The other leading characters were in good hands, and the success of the play was most decided. The merit of the play or its success, were not, however, we suspect, the principal inducements for its revival; but, as the splendour and pageantry of an English coronation had been successful at this theatre, and was still popular at the rival one, the manager thought the Exile would afford him an opportunity to render the coronation of a Russian Empress still more splendid, with the pompous offices and processions of the Greek Church. We would speak of the actors, for Young, in Darau, was as fine as ever; Farreu was the best Governor of Siberia that ever appeared on the stage; Liston, Fawcett, and Egerton were excellent in their respective parts; the Empress Elizabeth was imperially personated by Mrs. Faucit; Miss Foote was lovely in Alexina; and Mrs. Tennant made a very favourable debut in Katharine; but why do we talk of actors, for all their exertions, and almost the story itself, were lost in the gorgeousness of the spectacle. The whole of the scenery was of the most splendid description, and the coronation surpassed anything we ever saw (the real coronation of his present Majesty excepted). The triumphal arch in the great square of Moscow—the gilded barrier which surrounds the stage—the sound of joyous trumpets and drums, intermingled with the distant thunder of artillery—the musicians, followed by guards, whose gorgeous plumes waved in their helmets, were all faithfully exhibited. The ecclesiastical dignitaries, with the sacred ensigns of their faith, followed. Deputations from the tributary states, with their banners, were succeeded by the foreign ambassadors, splendidly attired. The representative of England wore a mantle and star, with an immense plume of ostrich feathers in his hat. The Envoy of Tartary rode a beautiful horse, richly caparisoned. The Chinese ambassador was borne by a noble charger, and was attended by a train of horsemen. After the ambassadors came the young prince, and he was followed by Elizabeth, reclining in a lofty car of gold, lined with blue silk, under a most splendid canopy, and drawn by six horses, attended by grooms in imperial livery. The procession moved to the cathedral, which was truly a splendid scene. The main aisle stretched to a great distance, and, increased by the perspective art of the painter, terminated in a window richly illuminated. The roof was hung with numerous lustres, and the floor was covered with crimson cloth. In the middle was the sacred font, and on the left the altar, on which was placed the imperial diadem. The ceremony was short; indeed, the scene was too dazzling to bear looking on for any time. The whole exhibition was of the most gorgeous and expensive description, and was received throughout with the loudest applause. Spectacle has certainly now reached its acme, for we cannot conceive it to go higher than it has done in the revival of the Exile. The farce of the Lying Valet followed, in which Mr. Meadows played the part of Sharp with great spirit and much comic effect.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—The opera of Rob Roy has proved very attractive at this theatre; and, on seeing it a second and third time, our prejudices in favour of the former representation of the principal character becoming more subdued, we were better able to relish the forcible delineation of Mr. Terry, whose conception of the character of the freebooter, though rather differing from our's, is likely to be very popular.

On Tuesday evening, Mrs. Chatterly made her first appearance in Lady Teazle, for her own benefit; and we have much doubt that there is an actress on the stage, at present, who would have played the character better. It was sportive but dignified; the humour was chaste, and the feeling without affectation.

On Thursday night, Mrs. Inchbold's comedy of Every one has his Fault, was performed for the first time this season. Although there are many comedies on the stage superior to this in dialogue, yet there is scarcely a better acting play, or one in which a more intimate knowledge of the stage is exhibited. Every incident, every word seems to tell; and the humorous scenes are succeeded by others of such deep pathos, that the audience are in smiles or tears at the will of the author. The part of Mr. Irwin was sustained by Mr. Conway, who gave a fine picture of the heart-stricken husband in scenes of such deep domestic affliction. In this character Mr. Conway displayed much true feeling; he was fully master of the character, and in every scene in which he appeared he played from the heart to the heart. Mrs. Chatterly, who excels in scenes of distress and tenderness, played the part of Lady Eleanor admirably. Terry, in one of the most admirable characters in human life, that of the peace-maker, Harmony, was quite at home, and Osberry was a good Selos. The part of Sir Robert Rumble fell to a Mr. Johnson, from the Bristol Theatre, who made his first appearance on the London boards. His reception was highly flattering; but though possessing many requisites for the stage, and no ordinary share of talent, we confess we thought that he had mistaken the character, and forgot that Sir Robert was a gentleman. Of the other characters little remains to be said; they were sufficiently well represented, and the comedy was received throughout with the most decided applause.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—A new burletta, called Bruce, has been produced at this elegant little house; it is a most laughable little production, and, with the other favourite pieces, has attracted crowded audiences nightly.

Literature and Science.

Lithography.—An experiment has lately been made to take off impressions from plants by lithographic printing, which, although it did not succeed so well as was desirable, leaves little doubt but this method may prove of considerable use to botanists.—A specimen of Sibthorpia Europæa, which was gathered several years ago in Cornwall, was, we understand, covered with lithographic ink, and impressed on the stone, from which several impressions were taken. There is a well-known method made use of for taking impressions of the leaves of vegetables by covering them with printer's-ink, and then impressing them on paper. The benefit likely to arise from impressing plants on stone, is owing to the facility of multiplying copies much more accurate in some respects than a drawing can be expected to be.

Fish Flour.—The Indians (says M. Humboldt), in all the Upper Orinoco, fry fish, dry them in the sun, and reduce them to powder, without separating the bones. I have seen masses of fifty or sixty pounds of this flour, which resembles that of cassava. When it is wanted for eating, it is mixed with water and reduced to a paste. In every climate the abundance of fish has led to the invention of the same means of preserving them. Pliny and Diodorus Siculus have described the fish-bread of the Ichthyophagous nations, that dwelt on the Persian Gulf and the shores of the Red Sea.

The Plague.—At a time when a fatal epidemic is making such ravages in Spain, it may be some satisfaction to know, that some time ago, Doctors Aubun and Lafont, physicians at Constantinople and Salonica, have discovered that vaccination is a preservative from the plague. Of six thousand adults vaccinated, none caught the contagion: even infants who were vaccinated, continued to suckle mothers who were labouring under the attacks of the plague, without being infected: and an Italian physician, who is studying in Turkey the symptoms of this dreadful complaint, inoculated himself with matter drawn from a person who had died of the plague, and afterwards underwent vaccination without the contagion developing itself, though he put himself in all possible points of contact with infected persons in the hospitals.

Recipe against Infection.—Forty-six grains of black oxide of manganese, in coarse powder, are to be put into a small strong glass phial, with an accurately ground-glass stopper, to which two drachm measures of nitric acid of 1400 specific gravity, and an equal measure of muriatic acid of 1184, must be added; replace the stopper, and secure the whole by inclosing it in a strong wooden case, with a good screw top, which, when fast, shall rest on the stopper, so as to keep it in its place. To use it, merely open the phial, with the nose averted, and replace the stopper as soon as the smell is perceived; repeat it, of course, occasionally, as you would any other fumigation. A phial so prepared, will last, instead of six months, several years; the mixture ought not to occupy more than one third of the bottle. Any chemist can furnish the ingredients.—This apparatus destroys all kinds of infection.

The forthcoming volume of that excellent annual publication, Time's Telescope, will contain an explanation of saints' days and holidays; with illustrations of British history and antiquities, notices of obsolete rites and customs, and sketches of comparative chronology and contemporary biography; including astronomical occurrences in every month, and a diary of nature, explaining the various appearances in the animal and vegetable kingdoms; the whole being interspersed with amusing anecdotes, and illustrative and decorative extracts from our first living poets. An introduction to the study of conchology will be prefixed, with an accurately coloured plate of some of the most rare and beautiful shells.

Miss Macaulay has a new work in the press, intitled 'Tales of the Drama.'

Mr. Brewer's 'Beauties of Ireland,' a work on which that gentleman has been engaged for a considerable time, is, at length, ready for publication; and we hope that the author of the 'Introduction' to the Beauties of England and Wales will satisfactorily answer a growing wish in the public, for information concerning an island long injuriously neglected by the antiquary and topographer. The work is to be published in parts, and is embellished with engravings by J. and H. Storer, after original drawings by G. Petrie, of Dublin.

LUCRETIVS.

It was the custom with Aertgen, the painter, never to work on Mondays; but to devote that day with his disciples to the bottle. He used to stroll about the streets in the night, playing on the German flute, and in one of those frolics he was drowned in 1564.

Marriage Lottery.—It has often been said, figuratively, that marriage is a lottery; but we do not recollect to have met with a practical illustration of the truth of the simile before the following, which is a free translation of an advertisement in the Lewins Gazette:—'A young man, of good figure and disposition, unable, though desirous, to procure a wife, without the preliminary trouble of amassing a fortune, proposes the following expedient to attain the object of his wishes:—He offers himself as the prize of a lottery to all widows and virgins under 32. The number of tickets to be 600, at 50 dollars each. But one number to be drawn from the wheel, the fortunate proprietor of which is to be entitled to himself and the 30,000 dollars.'—New York American.

At Dieppe, an Englishman is surprised by the appearance of female clerks, inspectors, and supervisors, who look to unloading of ships, keep an account of what is done, and give out the checks and certificates—all indicating the participation of the sex in that country, in the higher functions of life, and contributing to their importance and independence.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

We perfectly agree with Gullielmus in his Lady Morgan and her reviewers; but having dismissed her in the way of our vocation, we have no wish to return to the subject.

We question much that 'Question and Answer' will suit us.

Tragic Darby's first dramatic scene has not the effect on us which he seems to have anticipated.

The sentiment in Chio's song is faulty. Few lovers make a merit of their inconstancy.

We shall be happy to hear from E. G. B. in the way he proposes. We have not forgotten him.

M. Wildergessee will find a letter at our office.

Review of New Books.

The History of Christ's Hospital, from the Foundation by King Edward the Sixth. To which are added, Memoirs of Eminent Men educated there; and a List of the Governors. [By John Bliff Wilson.] 8vo. pp. 307. London, 1821.

We are very far from agreeing with Mr. Wilson, that there is little information to be offered on the subject he has undertaken; and should feel surprised, indeed, if one of the most extensive charities, and a public school which has existed for upwards of two centuries and-a-half, did not afford abundant materials for the historian and the biographer. Even Mr. Wilson's memoir, brief as it is, affords sufficient evidence that the field is sufficiently ample for literary industry. It is, however, a subject of regret, that the author should have undertaken the work at a period when the various duties of the gentlemen connected with the establishment precluded any of them from affording him the least assistance. The records of the hospital are authorities which must contain much information, and we are sorry that any circumstance should have prevented their being brought in aid of a publication, the object of which is to represent the establishment and every person connected with it, in a point of view that could have no other tendency than to do them honour.

In the forty-fifth number of the Literary Chronicle, we gave a brief but connected history of Christ's Hospital; and, therefore, in reviewing the present work, we shall avoid, as much as possible, the ground on which we have already trodden. Mr. Wilson sets out with a well-written and interesting memoir of the illustrious founder of the hospital, the boy King, Edward the Sixth. Then follows the history of the foundation, copied verbatim from Stowe. It is remarkable, that the King lived but two days after he had signed the charter of this corporation, and that, on thus concluding Vol. III.

this great work, which has handed down his name to posterity as a prince of the most benevolent disposition, he exclaimed, 'Lord! I yield thee most hearty thanks, that thou hast given me life thus long, to finish this work to the glory of thy name.'

'The virtues displayed by this young prince could not fail of exciting the admiration of his subjects; neither is it to be supposed that the utility of the foundation just mentioned could be lost upon them. Indeed, it appears that the citizens of London were so animated by the truly royal benefactions of the King, that in the short space of six months, the old monastery was rendered capable of accommodating three hundred and forty boys; and by the end of the year the number was increased to three hundred and eighty. From that time to the present the hospital has continued increasing, both in size and importance; and the three hundred and fifty have been multiplied to the almost incredible number of eleven hundred and fifty.'

In the description of the different apartments of the Hospital, there is an extract from the will of James Amand, Esq. dated Aug. 9, which is curious on account of the anxiety it expresses relative to a portrait, which is preserved in the counting-house:—

'I give the original picture of my grandfather to Christ's Hospital, upon condition that the treasurer thereof give a receipt to my executors, and a promise never to alienate the said picture; and, as often as a change of treasurers takes place, every new treasurer shall send a written receipt and promise of the same effect to the Vice Chancellor of Oxford. Item, I give all the rest of my money and property of every description, (after the payment of my debts, legacies, and funeral, and whatever expense attends the execution of this will,) to Christ's Hospital. And my will is, that whatever of my effects the governors of the hospital shall consider as being of no benefit to the hospital, they, the governors, shall sell all such, (except the picture aforesaid,) to the best advantage, and the money arising from the sale shall go, together with all the money I may leave in specie, or in my banker's hands undisposed of, to purchase 3 per cent. bank annuities, which annuities, together with the securities for money which I leave behind me, shall be made one separate stock, never to be diminished by the hospital, unless my executors require the aid of a part of the said stock in consequence of an unforeseen expense attending this my will. My further will is, that the interest arising from such property, (as long as the hospital shall preserve the aforesaid picture,) shall be applied either to increase the number of blue-coat children, or for the better assisting such of the children as may be put out apprentices by the said hospital. I further desire that the aforesaid picture shall be kept in the Treasury of the said hospital, and that it annually be produced at the first general court held after the first of January in every year, and such part of my will, relative to that hospital, shall be then and there publicly read. I also desire that the picture shall be shown once annually to whomsoever the Vice Chancellor of Oxford shall send to demand a sight thereof; but in case the sight be refused to the Vice Chancellor or his deputy, then I direct that all my bequests given to Christ's Hospital shall immediately cease. And I hereby give and devise the same, from that time, to the University of Oxford, to the intent that the University may buy freehold lands of inheritance, and the rent arising therefrom to be applied as follows: In the first place, the chief Bodleian Librarian shall receive of it as much as will augment his salary to 120l. annually, provided he be a bachelor. Secondly, the sub-librarian, if a bachelor, shall have his salary augmented to 70l. per annum, which augmentation of salary shall continue only as long as they remain bachelors, and shall not be paid again if they marry, until other librarians who may be bachelors are substituted in their room. What remains after paying them, I desire may be applied to the purchase of manuscripts and good printed editions of classic authors, such as may be worthy a place in the library. In this manner I desire such money may be disposed of, as (if either librarian is married) would contribute to the augmentation of his salary were he not married."—One of the executors was the Rev. Dr. Stukeley, the eminent antiquary.

'An erroneous opinion has been entertained, that this picture is the portrait of the Pretender, and which probably may have arisen from the circumstance of one of the ancestors of Mr. St. Amand having married Asceline, the daughter of Robert D'Aubigny, of the House of Stuart, an English baron in the reign of Henry the Third.

In this Hospital there are twelve wards or large rooms, for the children, besides the infirmary, or sick-nard, and each of these wards accommodates from fifty to seventy boys:—

'The whole establishment will accommodate 1150 children, including 80 girls, who are provided for without any expense to their parents or friends, and furnished with every thing necessary to forward their education.

'In 1809 there were 1005 children upon the foundation, of whom 65 were girls.

'Of the 1000 boys,—
161 were presented by companies, parishes, &c.
408 were sons of freemen,
239 sons of non-freemen.
102 sons of clergymen, who had, exclusive of the boys in the hospital, 1000 578 other children.

'The parents of 871 boys had, exclusive of those in the hospital, 3606 other children; and twenty-seven boys had neither brother or sister.

'Out of the 973 boys, there were—
Orphans..... 57
Sons of widows..... 210
Motherless boys..... 93
360'

It appears that the gross income of the hospital, in 1814, was 44,725l., and in 1815, 43,386l. The expenditure for the same years was, 1814, 41,061l. and in 1815, 40,420l. The ceremony of performing the funeral rites of those who die in the hospital, is very interesting:—

'A procession is formed in the square of the Infirmary, consisting of the bedles, the steward, the whole of the boys belonging to the same ward as the deceased, the choir-boys, the minister, (one of the classical masters,) and clerk; then the corpse, followed by his own relations and friends as mourners. As soon as the boys enter the cloisters, they begin singing the Burial Anthem, which they continue all round, and until they reach the curial-ground, when the minister, as in other cases, begins the funeral service. The cloisters upon these occasions are cleared of all but those who assist in the mournful ceremony, which add, greatly to the solemnity; indeed, it is hardly possible to describe the effect when the procession is proceeding round those reverberating remains of the old priory, dismal at all times when cleared of those who give life to the scene, but doubly so upon these occasions. The echo of the Burial Anthem at this time has an effect which those only who have witnessed the ceremony can form a just idea of.'

The biographical part of Mr. Wilson's work, (though avowedly very imperfect,) is the most original, as it contains memoirs of several living individuals, including the amiable George Dyer, the metaphysical Coleridge, that truly clever writer Charles Lamb, Mr. Surr, Meyer the painter, Leigh Hunt, &c. &c. Among the early 'Blues,' are Campian, Camden, and Joshua Barnes. It is impossible to conceive that a school, which admits nearly one hundred and fifty boys annually, every one having the opportunity of a liberal education, should have produced so few men of genius, (admitting all to be such which we have enumerated.) We doubt not, however, that it has produced five times the number, although there may be some difficulty in tracing them. Our last extract shall be Mr. George Dyer's 'Lines meditated in the Cloisters of Christ's Hospital:—'

'Now cease, my song, the plaintive strain;
Now hush'd be Pitt's tender sigh;
While Memory wakes her fairy train,
And young Delight sits laughing by:
Return each hour of rosy hue,
In smiles, and pranks, and garlands gay,
Playful of wing as when ye flew,
Ev'ry month then seeming May;
While, as Invention wak'd the mimic powers,
Genius, still wand'ring wild, sighed for enchanted bowers.

'Then, too, in antic vestment dress,
Pastime would lightly slip along,
Throwing around the ready jest,
Satire and sting, or simple song;
And merry Mischief oft would weave
The wanton trick for little hearts;
Nor Love a tender vo'cy give;
Soft were his hands, nor keen his darts;
While Friendship, with a gay enthusiast glow,
Gave her full half of bliss, and took her share of woe.

'And, what though round a youthful spring
A lowering storm may sometimes rise;
Hope her soul-soothing strain can sing,
Quickly can brighten up the skies.
How sweetly pass'd my youth's gay prime!
For not unfeeling was my tongue:
And, as I tried the classic rhyme,
The critic school-boy prais'd my song:
Nodd mine eye not catch the orient ray,
That promis'd fair to gild Ambition's distant day.

'Ah! pleasing gloomy cloister-shade,
Still, still this wavering breast inspire!
Here, lost in rapturous trance, I stray'd,
Here, lost with horror spectres dire!
For, soon as day dark-veild its head,
With hollow cheek and haggard eye,
Pale ghosts would flit from my death-bed,
And stalk with pest terrific by!
Till the young heart would freeze with wild affright,
And store the dismal tale to cheer a winter's night!

'How like the spirit of the place,
Good Edward's form here seem'd to move!
As lingering still its growth to trace,
With all a Founder's, Guardian's love!

How of his name each syllable
Repeated oft, on youthful ears
Like no unbolty charm would dwell,
And mingle fondness with the prayer!
While still the day, made sacred by his birth,
Brought with the rolling year memorials of his worth.

'Yet, what avails the school-boy's praise,
Though taking Gratitude's sweet name,
The stately monument to raise
Of royal Edward's lasting fame!
Though never on thy youthful brow
Flaunted the helmet's towering crest,
Though ne'er, as martial Glory led,
The corselet sparkled on thy breast;
Yet, blameless spurl'd, to worth so true as thine,
Virtue herself might weave her purest tape line.

'But, ah! what means the silent tear?
Why e'en 'mid joy my bosom heave!
Ye long-lost scenes, enchantments dear!
Lo! now I linger o'er your grave!
—Fly, then, ye hours of rosy hue,
And bear away the bloom of years!
And quick succeed, ye sickly crew
Of doubts and sorrows, pains and fears!
Still will I ponder Fate's unalter'd plan,
Nor tracing back the CHILD forget that I am MAN.'

Although we think Mr. Wilson might have made his work much more valuable, yet we must allow that it is interesting, and we thank him for the first detailed history of one of the most beneficent institutions this truly beneficent country boasts—Christ's Hospital.

A Letter on our Agricultural Distresses, their Causes and Remedies. Addressed to the Lords and Commons. By William Playfair. 8vo. pp. 72. London, 1821.

We should as soon expect to discover the philosopher's stone, the longitude, or the elixir of life, as to find a panacea for the distresses with which this happy country is so unhappily always afflicted. There is not, perhaps, a class in society, of any trade or profession, below actual independence, that does not complain of distresses; and what is remarkable too, the distresses have scarcely changed their character in the course of two or three centuries.

There is an old proverb, that 'a grumbletonian in the stirrup is a tyrant in the saddle'; in politics we have often found it so, and we much doubt if it is otherwise in any thing else.

But of all grumblers, and of all distressed beings, the agriculturists are the most uneasy; the bounties of Providence seem to be heaped on them in vain. Speak to an English farmer about his harvest, and he is sure to complain: are the crops abundant, he grumbles that the price will be such is, when wheat is at 65s. 4d. flour ought not to be above 44s. 1d., for a quarter of wheat produces a sack of fine flour, and half a sack of seconds, and our loaf bread is made from those two mixed together. Lord Somerville, who wrote very distinctly on the subject, explains the matter, and shows that the bran and pollard pay for grinding. The flour was then, on the 4th of August, 1804, 23s. 10d. dearer than it ought to have been, that is, rather more than fifty per cent. above the fair price.*

The author of this work has brought together several important facts, well worthy of the consideration of the agricultural committee, the legislature, and the public in general.

Ryan's Worthies of Ireland.

This second volume of Mr. Ryan's work is not less interesting than the first, but it appears to us not to be edited with so much care. Better memoirs exist than he has given of some individuals, particularly of the self-taught Cunningham; and some stale anecdotes have been admitted in the lives of others, which we would gladly have dispensed with in a work of so much importance. With these exceptions, we give the work our hearty commendation, and adopt a few of its articles in our present number:—

* Common Cormac, or blind Cormac, is supposed to be the last of the order of the minstrels, called Tale-Tellers, of whom Sir William Temple speaks so fully in his Essay on Poetry. He was born in May, 1703, at Woodstock, near Ballindungan, in the County of Mayo, of parents poor and honest, remarkable only for the innocence and simplicity of their lives. Before he had completed his first year, the small-pox deprived him of sight; this circumstance, combined with the indigence of his parents, precluded him from receiving any of the advantages of education. But though he could not read himself, he had the happiness of conversing with those who had read; and although he remained without learning, he yet obtained knowledge. Discovering an early fondness for music, a neighbouring gentleman procured a professor of the harp to instruct him on that instrument, and Cormac received a few lessons, which he practised con amore; but his patron dying suddenly, the harp dropped from his hand—it was unstrung, and stern poverty prevented its repair. But cheered by poetry, the muse of whom he was most enamoured, he listened eagerly to the Irish songs and metrical tales he heard sung and recited round the “crackling faggots that illumined the hearths” of his father and his neighbours. His mind being thus stored, and having no other avocation, he commenced a Man of Talk or Tale-Teller.

He was now employed in relating legendary tales, and reciting genealogies at rural wakes, or in the hospitable halls of country squires. He has been often heard to recite some of those Irish tales which Macpherson has so artfully interwoven with the texture of the epic poems, which he does Ossian the honour to attribute to him. Endowed with a sweet voice and a good ear, his narrations were generally graced with the charms of melody. He did not, like the Tale-teller mentioned by Sir William Temple, chaunt his tales in an uninterrupted even tone: the monotony of his modulation was frequently broken, by cadences introduced with taste at the close of each stanza. In rehearsing any of Ossian's poems, or any composition in verse, it was much in the manner of the cathedral service; but, in singing some of his native airs, he displayed the power of his voice—and on those occasions, his auditors were always enraptured. It is asserted that no singer ever did Carolan's airs or Ossian's celebrated hunting song, more justice than Cormac. But it was in poetry Cormac delighted to exercise his genius. He composed several songs and elegies, which obtained general applause.* His muse, tender and affectionate, was awakened by the call of gratitude, and his poetical productions are mostly panegyric or elegiac. Hesometimes indulged in satire, but not often, though endued with a rich vein of that dangerous gift. Cormac lived much respected and beloved by all classes; he was twice married, and had children by each wife; he died about the age of eighty-five.

Dermody, who has been over-praised for his genius, and whose errors have been treated with too much indulgence, meets with a more impartial biographer in Mr. Ryan, who thus sums up his character:—

‘He was one of those unhappy young men, who preferred a life of daring profanity to the dull and unvariable sameness of virtue; and the time that should have been occupied in the cultivation of his talents, was uselessly spent in their display. He united a depth of poetic intellect, and a great harmony of versification rarely to be met with in the same individual; and could turn with equal facility “from grave to gay, from sullen to serene; but if we thus praise his excellence in poetry, how shall we extol his classical attainments? Horace and Homer he was alike acquainted with, and could, unabashed, before a large company, read a passage in either; then put the book in his pocket, and give a fine poetic translation of the passage he had just delivered; and likewise, to his credit be it recorded, that before he had attained his fifteenth year, he had acquired a competent knowledge of the Greek, the Latin, the French, and Italian languages, and knew a little of the Spanish.

‘We have now filled up the sun-light of the picture, and there remains nothing but the odious task of enumerating the dark and disgusting shades that deformed it. He was an epitome of every variety of vice, and unblushingly avowed it, without even making those excuses that most of her votaries do; such as—“it was against my consent, but I was led into it;—it was unfortunate, but we are all the victims of circumstances;”—excuses, in reality, as frivolous as they are despicable, but which have some weight in the charitable eye of the world. Dermody despised this mental hypocrisy, and setting his arms a-kimbo, laid his hand upon his heart, and said fearlessly, “I am vicious, because I like it.”

* Philip Fitzgibbon was a native of Ireland, and ranked high in the mathematical world. He is likewise celebrated for “a bit of a blunder” that he once committed, arising from the following circumstance:—

‘He was supposed to possess a more accurate and extensive knowledge of the Irish language than any person living; and his latter years were industriously employed in compiling an English and Irish dictionary, which he left completed, with the exception of the letter h, and that he appeared to have totally forgotten.

The dictionary is contained in about four hundred quarto pages, and it is a remarkable instance of patient and indefatigable perseverance, as every word is written in Roman or Italic characters, to imitate printing. This, with many other curious manuscripts, all in the Irish language, he bequeathed to his friend, the Rev. Mr. O'Donnell.

‘During what year he was born is not known, but he died at his lodgings, in Chapel Lane, Kilkenny, in April, 1792.

* Constantia Grierson.—That most splendid talents, united with the most intense application, are not confined either to sex or sphere of life, is fully evidenced by the subject of the present memoir.

‘This prodigy of early learning and acquirements (whose maiden name is nowhere mentioned), was born in the county of Kilkenny, of parents poor and illiterate. Nothing is recorded of her until her eighteenth year, when we are told by Mrs. Pilkington, that she was brought to her father to be instructed in midwifery, and that then she was a perfect mistress of the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and French languages, and was far advanced in the study of the mathematics. Mr. Pilkington having inquired of her where she gained this prodigious knowledge, she modestly replied, that when she could spare time from her needle-work, to which she was closely kept by her mother, she had received some little instruction from the minister of the parish. She wrote elegantly (says Mrs. P.) both in verse and prose; but the turn of her mind was chiefly to philosophical or divine subjects; nor was her piety inferior to her learning. The most delightful hours, this lady declares that she had ever passed, were in the society and conversation of this "female philosopher." My father, adds she, readily consented to accept of Constantia as a pupil, and gave her a general invitation to his table, by which means we were rarely asunder. Whether it was owing to her own design or to the envy of those who survived her, I know not, but of her various and beautiful writings, I have never seen any published, excepting one poem of hers in the works of Mrs. Barber. Her turn, it is true, was principally to philosophical or religious subjects, which might not be agreeable to the present taste; yet could her heavenly mind descend from its sublimest heights to the easy and epistolary style, and suit itself to my then gay disposition.

* The following epigram was written by Mrs. Grierson to the Hon. Mrs. Percival, who

'Mrs. Barber likewise gives her testimony to the merit of Constantia, of whom she declares, "that she was not only happy in a fine imagination, a great memory, an excellent understanding, and an exact judgment, but had all these crowned by virtue and piety. She was too learned to be vain, too wise to be conceited, and too clear-sighted to be irreligious." As her learning and abilities raised her above her own sex, so they left her no room to envy any; on the contrary, her delight was to see others excel. She was always ready to direct and advise those who applied to her, and was herself willing to be advised. So little did she value herself upon her uncommon excellencies, that she has often recalled to my mind a fine reflection of a French author, "that great geniuses should be superior to their own abilities."

'Constantia married a Mr. George Grierson, a printer, in Dublin, for whom Lord Carteret, then Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, obtained a patent, appointing him printer to the king, in which, to distinguish and reward the merit of his wife, her life was inserted.

'She died in 1733, at the premature age of twenty-seven, admired and respected as an excellent scholar in Greek and Roman literature, in history, theology, philosophy, and mathematics. Her dedication of the Dublin edition of Tacitus to Lord Carteret, affords a convincing proof of her knowledge in the Latin tongue; and by that of Terence to his son, to whom she wrote a Greek epigram. Dr. Harwood esteems her Tacitus one of the best edited books ever published. She wrote many fine poems in English, but esteemed them so slightly, that very few copies of them were to be found after her decease. What makes her character the more remarkable is, that she rose to this extraordinary eminence entirely by the force of natural genus and uninterrupted application. As a daughter, a wife, and a friend, her conduct was amiable and exemplary; and had she been blessed with the advantages of health and longer life, there is every reason to believe, she would have made a more distinguished figure in the learned world than any woman who had preceded her.

'Such are all the facts that are left to posterity of this high [ly] gifted female; and we cannot help regretting, that while so many pains are taken to preserve memorials the most minute of individuals whose lives have glided away in a succession of miserable follies, so little has been recorded of a woman, whose mind was a casket richly stored with the gems of ancient and modern learning.'

We shall conclude with a whimsical anecdote of Sir Boyle Roche, who, possessing a very extraordinary memory, had ministerial speeches prepared for him by the late Mr. Edward Cooke, which he used to deliver very correctly:—

'There were some occasions where the worthy baronet's eloquence was not previously thought necessary, and of course no speech was prepared for him. But he was an old soldier, and too full of the esprit de corps, to look calmly on the conflict without a zeal for taking his share of the battle. He sometimes, there, ventured to volunteer an extempore philippic of his own; and then it was that his native genius shone with all its genuine splendour, pure from the mine, and unmarred by the technical touches of any treasury artist;—then it was, that all the figures of national rhetoric, to use the phrase of Junius, "danced the hays through his speech in all the mazes of metaphorical confusion."

'Upon one occasion of this kind, the worthy baronet was doomed to sit dumb, while he anxiously longed to distinguish himself in the contest. He felt his mind pregnant with ardour to shine forth. He endeavoured to collect his scattered sentiments and combine them into some shape for delivery; but in vain. He retired to the coffee-room to reconnoitre his notions, and endeavour to marshal them into some form for operation, but without effect,—all was "confusion worse confounded." A lucky expedient crossed his fancy, and he was determined to seize the opportunity.

'There was a ministerial member in the house, a learned Serjeant Stanley, who was usually in the habit of rising towards the end of a long protracted debate, and about three or four in the morning, amusing the house with an important speech of an hour or more, ingeniously compiled from the fragments of other speeches which he had previously heard in the course of the discussion: but, having so often played off this manoeuvre, he was a good deal bantered by his senatorial colleagues upon his skill in selection: so that he at last determined to attempt something original; and had composed a long speech for the purpose, and anxiously waited to catch the speaker's eye, that he might take the earliest opportunity of delivering his oration, adorned as it was with all the flowers of his wit and fancy. This gentleman just stepped into the coffee-room to cast an eye over his composition and refresh his memory. Sir Boyle took a seat near him, and in the course of conversation, as he darted off in a hurry to catch an opportunity for speaking, unfortunately his speech fell from his pocket on the floor. Sir Boyle picked it up, and on reading it over, thought it would admirably suit his own purpose:—"it was just the very thing he wanted." At a second reading, his powerful memory rendered him master of the whole. He returned to his seat in the house, and took the earliest opportunity of delivering the borrowed oration, to the great astonishment of the whole assembly, and to the utter consternation of Mr. Stanley, who sat biting his nails with anguish, at hearing his elaborate performance, which cost him a week to manufacture, and which had vanished he knew not how, delivered by Sir Boyle, and lost to his own fame for ever. The worthy baronet, having finished this oration, amidst the plaudits of his friends, returned to the coffee-room, where he met the mortified composer; and, without waiting for a formal dénouement, addressed him cordially with "my dear friend Stanley, here is your speech again; and I thank you kindly for the loan of it. I never was so much at a loss for a speech in all my life; but sure it is not a pin-worse for wear, and now you may go in and speak it again yourself, as soon as you please." The discomfiture of Mr. Stanley is easier conceived than described; but the story caught wind, and excited infinite pleasantry at his expense.

'On another occasion, an opposition member had appointed a day for a popular motion, on some national subject; and, for nearly a month before, he had been daily moving for official documents, as materials to illustrate his observations. When the night for the discussion arrived, those documents appeared piled upon the table of the house in voluminous array; and the orator, preparatory to his opening speech, moved that they be now read by the clerk, in order the better to prepare the house for more clearly understanding the observations he was about to submit.

'This operation would have occupied the clerk, and the silent attention of the members, for at least two hours. The house was extremely full; the whole assembly stared at each other; a rueful buzz murmured from bench to bench; and several members observed, that the reading would occupy the whole night,—while others shrunk silently away, unwilling to abide so formidable a trial of their patience.

'Sir Boyle Roche, however, suggested

Hutcheson's Treatise on Beauty and Order:—
'Th' internal senses painted here we see,
They're born in others, but they live in thee;
O! were our author with thy converse blest,
Could he behold the virtues in thy breast,
His needless labours with contempt he'd view;
And bid the world not read—but copy you.'

a happy expedient for obviating the difficulty, by rising to move that a dozen or two of committee clerks might be called in, and each taking a portion of the documents, all might read together, by which means they might get through the whole in a quarter of an hour.

'This suggestion, offered with profound gravity, was so highly ludicrous, that the house joined in an universal laugh, and the question was actually postponed for the night, to give time for the mover to form a more succinct arrangement for introducing his motion.'

Gordon, a Tale. A Poetical Review of Don Juan. 8vo, pp. 79. London, 1821.

SURELY never poem was subjected to such a fate as Lord Byron's 'Don Juan'; unacknowledged by its publisher, censured by the critics, turned out of reading-rooms, and yet read, admired, and abused by every body. It is not enough that it should have passed the ordeal of every periodical, in the shape of review, magazine, and newspaper; but it must be submitted to a new species of scrutiny—a poetical critique, in the pamphlet before us. Our opinion of the poetical merits and moral or immoral tendency of Don Juan is on record; and it is not, therefore, again to express our admiration of the author's genius or to lament its misapplication, that we have taken up this tale, which is 'partly a burlesque parody on the style of Don Juan; partly a sacrifice of praise offered at the shrine of talent, and partly arguments, proving its immoral tendency.' That the author is one who is by no means insensible to the splendid talents of Lord Byron, appears throughout the whole of his poem; and there is much vigour in the poetical character which he draws of his lordship:—

As a bright sun Byron conspicuous stands,
And casts his glowing beams on all around;
He sheds a glorious lustre o'er all lands;
He warms the empire of poetic ground;
His vivifying heat o'er all commands;

The fields with verdure instantly are crown'd:

His light illumines, and his heat dispels
Dampness and chills, for neither near him dwells.

'His wondrous talents pass our mean conception:

He seems aware there are no bounds to them:

All his comports, almost without exception,
He can surpass, and justly may contend:
There's naught so great but there 'twill find reception;

There's naught so violent but he can stem
His furious rage; there's nothing so intense
But he can span its vast circumference.

'There's naught so deep but he its depths can sound;

There's naught so lofty but he'll scan its height;

There's naught so distant but 'tis ever found Within his reach. Creation and a mite
Are one to him. From darkness most profound,

He will bring forth something unknown to light.

There's naught so vile but he can show some beauties:

No one so placed but he'll point out their duties.'

Again, speaking of the poem of Don Juan:—

'O what sweet strains of poetry are here,
Exhibiting decisive proof to all
That none can rival him in his career:

All nature stands attentive to his call,
Towering he soars above our lower sphere,
He hovers in the air, nor fears a fall,
He mounts the skies, and with a voice divine,
As if by Heaven inspired, repeats each line.

'How sweetly does he sing the various qualities

Of Donna Inez, (does he mean his wife?)

Recounting one by one her partialities,
And how she occupied her passing life,
Her dress, demeanor, learning, and formalities,
Her observations, virtues, and belief,

In such expressions, such poetic strains,
The subject was unworthy of such pains.

'How suitable the language to the sense!

And then its purity is quite enchanting:
The overwhelming force of his bold eloquence,
So ravishes the soul, that while 'tis plaining,

With all the power of its omnipotence,
The ideas in your mind which he is chanting,

Resistance all is gone, you are no longer

What once you were: the strong yields to the stronger.

'O what a genius does this man possess!

What intellect, what judgment, and what skill!

There can remain no doubt of his success,
Let him take up whatever design he will;

All difficulties he, with cheerfulness,
Can surmount, and all his verses fill
With such exalted sense and glowing passion,
As you may feel, but 'tis beyond expression.

'His mind seems formed to tower away above
The ordinary flight of noted men;

He soars beyond our intellectual drove;
He deigns no more to be a citizen

Where others live, but in his own alone.
Built by his own bright genius, where the ken
Of great minds can scarcely penetrate,
He sits exalted, and in regal state.

'From thence our tributary world he views,
And looks unmov'd on all that passes here;

Seeming to feel like us, he ne'er bestows
Our cares or sorrows with one falling tear:
Life's bitterest pains, nor even death's adieu,
Can ever with his calmness interfere;

He sits unmoved, and views us weeping, dying;

He neither soothes nor pities, ev'n by sighing.

'His eye is still throughout our nature roaming—

He paints its beauties in the fairest light,
The boiling of the billows, and their foaming;

The revolutions of the day and night,
The beauties of those countries ever blooming,
Filling the soul with joy and sweet delight,
The rising of the sun, and his retiring,

Are so well told the notes seem half inspiring.

'And from his lofty station he perceives
Things all unknown to men of common minds;

His piercing eye at once he boldly heaves
Into yet higher regions, where he finds
Those bold conceptions, he so interweaves
Throughout his work; he casts them on the winds,

The gentle zephyrs waft them down to earth,
We read, and wonder who could give them birth.'

Of the influence which powerful talents will have, even when exerted in an unworthy cause, our author speaks justly:—

'His florid pen is dipped, alas! too deep
In vicious sentiments; o'erwhelming ocean;

With rolling rage it crushes in its sweep
Each noble passion and each virtuous action:

Though Juan is so vicious, it will keep
Its present eminence and great promotion;

So deep in glory has he dipped his pen,
'Twill always be preserved and read by men.

'Oh! 'tis immortal, doom'd to live for ever,
To see an endless rout of rolling days.

When shall its glories cease! oh! never, never,
While there's 'a tongue in man to sound its praise;

His brilliant power united, cannot sever
Duration and his poem, but the blaze
Which he has kindled must for ever burn,
And praise or blame him, at each flaring turn.

'Would that he used his talents for our good!

To raise our race from its degrading fall:
If he man's nature fully understood,

No more would he be! 't would be his page with Guilt,

But o'er our natural faculties he would brood,
Nor fear our terrors, and our hopes mislead,
Not laugh at all religion—our support,
Nor with our pains and deaths make joyful sport.'

We are not, however, certain that

Lord Byron may not, sometime best, write and think differently from what he now does; and do not, like our author, despairing, exclaim,—

'— never will his mighty mind
Yield up its powers to aid our feeble men.'

We have seen a considerable change in his lordship's character, with respect to his friends; and we should not be much surprised to hear of his becoming a moral writer; and that, too, before he reaches the twenty-fourth canto of Don Juan. We have quoted our poetical critic largely on the talents of Lord Byron, and even in praise of the poetical merits of this poem, and we shall conclude with a severe philippic against its immoral tendency:—

'Tis like Arabia's desert burning climate,
Completely free from every thing that's good:

That barren wild appears the true sublime,
A boundless prospect, noble solitude;

No cypress, myrtle, citron, fig, or lime,
Can flourish there; no verdure, spring, or wood;

But the destructive blast, the blue simoon,
Lavish of murder, is its only bloom.

* And there the Arabs, those detested thieves,
Rob every helpless, wandering traveller :
He, who without a loss his way achieves,
Is more than fortunate;—only traveler
These things to Juan—this as sure bereaves
Of virtue—'tis as sure a sepulchre—
It breathes its burning blast—no good appears;
'Tis certain death to him who perseveres.

* Virtue he makes ridiculous, and vice Sets forth in lovely garb, a thing of worth;
Exerting all his powers and artifice
To fill our hearts with vicious baneful mirth :—

Our good desires he strives to sacrifice
To evil passions, which have filled the earth
Already with enough of ill, to milt Ev'n his hard heart, could he for once have felt.

* His poem has no moral life, 'tis dead,
Like Adam's body ere his spirit came :
'Tis full of moral poison ; where 'tis read
It shakes and totters virtue's tender frame :
'Tis like a hemlock draught, o'er which is spread

A decorated covering ; 'tis a flame
Which burns up what is good, and leaves behind
Its useless ashes only in your mind.

* 'Tis like the manichella, which allures
By beautiful foliage, and enchanting fruit ;
It captivates the senses, and secures Convenience proper to convey acute

And deadly, subtle poison ; he ensures
A certain death, who, that he may recruit Exhausted nature, sleeps too near its shade,
He sure expires where his tired limbs are laid.

* 'Tis like a whirlpool, which draws all that float
Within its vortex, careless of their moans ;
Or hidden breakers, where no shoals denote Their hidden dwellings, but where all the foam

Of calmly rolling waves invite the boat,
It glides along—heard ye those dying
grouns ?

O shun the breakers and the whirlpool's fury,
Lest to your death it should perchance allure ye

* Licentiousness is his pervious, where,
Replete with this, unenvied he may dwell :
'Gainst heaven he lifts his hand, devoid of fear,
Like ancient Titans, daring to rebel ;
Don Juan is his strongest weapon here—

Heaven scorns his rage, although he storm and swell—
His meed on earth for such enormous pains
Is, "Byron did it."—Is this all he gains ?

We dare say Lord Byron will laugh at this character of his poem, but, although it is somewhat severe, it contains much truth.

*The Life and Adventures of Guzman
D'Alfarache ; or, the Spanish
Rogue.* By J. H. Brady. 2 vols.
12mo. London, 1821.

This work is a very splendid translation of the adventures of an incorrigi-ble rogue and vagabond. We do not know but that there may be many of our own countrymen who may have run as varied and extensive a career as Guzman ; but, with the exception of Bamfylde Moore Carew, none of them have had so entertaining an historian.

The author, in describing the predicaments and adventures of a nefarious character, has accompanied each with moral reflections, in order that they might produce the proper effect,—a dissuasive from evil. We, however, much doubt, that the frequent exhibition or description of scenes of vice,
how much soever it may be accompanied by moral reflection, is beneficial to society ; and, notwithstanding the antiquity and popularity of the couplet, we much doubt that, in the present age, vice is considered—

'A monster of such frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen.'

It is on this account that we are never anxious to detail scenes of successful villainy, or to familiarize the public to tales of fraud and robbery ;
and, therefore, we shall not follow the hero of this really amusing work through his base but eventful life, but content ourselves with quoting a synopsis of—

'The Laws of Begging.—As beggars of every nation are distinguished from each other by their different modes of imploring alms ; as the German beg by singing, and in troops, the French by their praying, the Flemings by their respectful bowings, the Bohemians by fortune-telling, the Portuguese by their crying, the Italians by long harangues, the English by abusing, and the Spaniards by their haughty growlings : we hereby command them all to observe the following statutes, under pain of our heavy displeasure.

'1. We forbid any lame or wounded beggar, of whatever nation he be, to appear in the quarters frequented by others full of health and vigour, on account of the advantage they will have over the latter. We also ordain, that all such as are in perfect health, form no manner of connexion with blind men, field-preachers, mountebanks, poets, musicians, redeemed captives, nor even with old soldiers that have escaped from a rout, or seamen saved from a shipwreck. For although it is generally allowed, that all these must subsist by imploring charity, their manners of begging being different, it is necessary that each society keep to its own particular rules.

'2. We ordain that beggars have certain taverns assigned them in every country, where shall preside three or four of their ancients with staves in their hands, as emblems of their authority. Which said ancients are hereby empowered to canvass, in the aforesaid taverns, all the affairs of the world, and to give their opinions as freely as they please. At the same time, we permit the other beggars to relate their own heroic exploits, as well as those of their ancestors, and even to illustrate the conversation by boasting of battles they were never in.

'3. We command that every beggar carry a good cudgel in his hand, with a spike at the end of it, if possible. to be provided against emergencies, lest they repent of their neglect.

'4. That each beggar take especial care never to presume to wear any thing new ; that all his clothes be worn out, torn, or patched ; nothing bringing more scandal on the profession than begging in good clothes. Be it, however, well understood, that if, in the exercise of his professional duties, a beggar chanc to obtain some new garment, he is at liberty to deck himself out in it for that day, but no longer. We positively will and command, that he dispose of it the following morning.

'5. To prevent any dispute that may arise between comrades for certain possions, we ordain that the more ancient possessors prevail and take precedence, without regard to persons.

'6. It is permitted that two infirm or sick persons beg in company, if they please, and call each other brothers ; provided they beg by turns and in a different tone, the one beginning where the other leaves off. They are to keep opposite each other on different sides of the street, each singing his own misfortunes ;
they may afterwards divide their profits
as they please.

'7. It is permitted that a beggar wear an old dish-cloth round his head in winter, instead of a bonnet, that while he is protected from the cold, he may at the same time appear an invalid. They are likewise at liberty to walk with crutches, or to have one leg tied up behind them.

'8. Every beggar may have a purse and a pocket, but must receive alms in their hats only.

'9. We command, that no beggar be so indiscreet as to divulge any of the mysteries of our trade, to any but such as belong to our society.

'10. Should any beggar be so fortune-nate as to discover any new trick in the art of begging, he shall be obliged to communicate the same to the company, which ought to enjoy in common the benefit arising from the genius of any of its members. As a recompense, however, to the inventor, and to stimulate his genius to new discoveries, we decree, that he have an exclusive privilege to make the most of his device for three months, during which time we peremptorily forbid any other belonging to our fraternity from interfering with his practice, under pain of confiscating to his use all the profits that may be derived therefrom.

'11. We exhort the members of this society, freely and faithfully to make known to each other all the houses where they know that either private or public alms are likely to be dispensed ; especially those in which gaming or courting is going forward ; for, in such places, large receipts are certain.

'12. We command, that no beggar presume to keep, or lead about with him, any hunting, setting, or other dogs ;
blind men being allowed to be conducted by a little cur, with a string round its neck. This prohibition is not meant to extend to such of our fraternity as may chance to possess dogs of talent. These may be allowed to exhibit their performances as usual, by making their dogs dance or jump through hoops; but they must not presume to take their station at a church-door, where other beggars of the society may be assembled, on account of the great advantage they will have over them.

'13. We command, that no beggar venture to buy meat or fish in the market on his own account, except in a case of extreme necessity; very ill consequences may arise from so doing.

'14. We permit all such beggars as have no children of their own, to hire as many as four, to lead about with them into the churches on festivals; they should not be above five years old, and, if possible, should appear to be twins. If a female conduct them, she should never fail to have one always at her breast; and if a man, he must be sure to carry one on his arm, and lead the next by the other hand.

'15. We command, that those beggars who have any children, instruct them up to the age of six years in the best mode of making collections in churches; that, after having taught them to ask charity for their father and mother, who lie on their beds at home most dangerously ill, they allow them to go alone, though it were better not entirely to lose sight of them. As soon, however, as these children shall have attained their seventh year, we command that they be left to shift for themselves, as being already majors, and that their parents be content to restrict and compel them to return home at stipulated hours.

'16. Beggars of the old stamp, who consider it a point of honour to walk in the footsteps of their ancestors, who have trained them to the profession of begging, will never allow their children to take any other trade than their own, nor to degrade themselves by entering into the service of any one; and if these children wish to be thought worthy of their parents, they will hold every other condition in abhorrence.

'17. Although idleness is the principal divinity worshipped by us beggars, we, nevertheless, think proper to prescribe certain hours of rising. Every one should dress and turn out by seven o'clock in winter, and by five in summer, or even sooner, if he feel so disposed; and should be in bed again by the same hour in the evening, except on extraordinary occasions, and according to the directions of the veterans of the society.

'18. Be forever declared infamous, and banished from our society, all such as shall presume to steal, harbour stolen goods, strip little children, or commit any such villainies.

'19. As it is our wish that all young persons who embark in our profession be treated favourably, we will and ordain, that for the future any brother who shall have attained the age of twelve years, shall be only obliged to pass a noviciate of three years instead of five; and we insist, that after the said term of three years, he be considered a graduate in the profession, and as a subject who has duly complied with and fulfilled all the laws of the institution.

'20. At the same time we require of the said brother, that he make oath never to desert our society, but continue attached to it, and never think of withdrawing himself from our service without our especial leave; promising to pay due submission and obedience to our statutes, under pain of our highest displeasure.'

A Letter, addressed to the Agriculturalists in general, and to the Magistrates and Clergy, on the Subjects of Hiring, Service, and Character; to which are added, printed Forms of Contract between the Master and Servant; also, a Table, shewing what portion of the Poor or other Rates of each County is annually expended in suits of Law, Removals, &c. amounting, in the whole, to the annual average Sum of 327,500l. By a County Magistrate. Post 4to. 1821.

EVERY publication, which has for its object the removing of the grievances of masters and servants, and of relieving parishioners of rates and other little troublesome affairs, deserves to be widely circulated and generally read. It but too often happens that arbitration is referred to, and litigation ensues between employers and the employed, through the want of legal advice or a conciliating spirit. As our author has been so descriptive in his title page, we have but little opportunity to extend our review of his 'Letter,' which occupies about ten pages of sixty-four. Of his quotations from our judges, with regard to the duties of masters and servants, we make one extract:—

'A character is the only property which many people can call their own; and when untarnished, is the most valuable that any man can possess. I beg to be allowed to give a legal caution, by way of protection to the servant, against the malice of the master: viz. "that if without ground, and purely to defame, a false character is given, it will be a proper ground of action."—Judge Mansfield. And let me add, that, though in justice, a master ought not, perhaps, to refuse to give a character to a servant who demands it, "by law he is not bound to give any character at all; although, if he do, he must take care to give a true one."

We are certain that society has suffered great injury by means of false certificates of character. How many merchants have been ruined by unprincipled clerks; warehouses broken open by supposed confidential warehousemen; and have not householders been murdered in their sleep by the connivance of treacherous servant girls! On the other hand, where integrity is proved, the master or mistress must be, indeed, an ungrateful being who would undervalue those services which are continually devoted to either or both.

'OURSELVES.'

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Yatton under Roseberry Toppin,
12th October.

I'Ll tell you what, Mr. Editor, I am not going to be after being trifled with by your criticisms any longer at my expense; do you think I am going to pay postage every week from Roseberry Toppin, merely to see my articles quizzed in your notices to correspondents; had I known you were an Atheist before, I would have had no connexion with you. You will, perhaps, deny you are an Atheist, but I will prove it. Don't you make a mockery of the article 'in the name of God, amen?' now, sir, you would not have done that had you not been an Atheist—but, sir, I would have you to know that whatever your correspondent may be, I am not yet at my last will and testament, and I hope to torment you a good while before you die, unless you make the amende honorable, and we may yet be friends, if you are not an Atheist.—I will convince you I am of some consequence, though you cocknies may call me a Yorkshireman; and for all that, I can shew you some famous errors in the text of your paper: I will only take the last few numbers; but, if you wish it, I will send you another article, containing all the mistakes and blunders your correspondents have made, since the first number of the Literary Chronicle. I wait your answer, which I trust will be favourable to my design.

I don't like, sir, to see things done by halves. In the number for Sept. 8th, you state the fact of a deaf and dumb boy being presented to Louis XVIII., and who had been employed three years, in making, out of his own head, a fine paste-board palace.—You should have added, in justice to the assistance of his most Christian majesty, that the king tapped him on the shoulder, and expressed, by signs, his royal approbation of the work. You are a democrat or a radical, or you would not have left out such an important circumstance.

I see, by your inquiries, you are anxious to know something about Crossfield, who shot at the king; you may rely on the following anecdote, I had it from the father of a respectable bookseller in your city:—Crossfield served his apprenticeship, I believe, at Masham, in Yorkshire, to an apothecary: he was always a sad dog, that is to say, a merry one; there was, in the place, an old cobbler, who was called Thomas,—his usual oath was, 'may the devil fetch me if it be not true.'—Thomas was a bachelor, and as he had nothing to be robbed of, never locked his door over night. Crossfield clad himself in a cow's skin, with a pair of tremendous horns, put two lamp glasses in the place of the eyes, and penetrated easily into Thomas's room, who was sound asleep; C. had some large pins stuck in a card, and scratched the cobbler's face, uttering, with a loud voice, 'Thomas, I've come for thee!'—The poor cobbler started from his bed, gave a horrid scream, ran into the street naked, and Crossfield after him; he fell down with fright and swooned, C. threw off his disguise, and others coming up, they picked up the poor cobbler, took him home, and when he came to his senses, he looked wildly round him, and asked if they had not seen the devil; he then related the story with many embellishments, that he had fought with the devil half an hour, and, to be brief, Thomas reformed, and never invoked the devil afterwards.

In your life of Mrs. Inchbald, is a remark that George Colman said he seldom read five act pieces of anonymous authors; this affords me an opportunity of removing much of the odium thrown by disappointed authors on theatrical managers. No author will think, that less than a day ought to be devoted to his often illegible MS. to form a sound judgment upon it. Now, sir, the average number of pieces presented by would-be dramatists, is between twelve hundred and thirteen hundred per annum, or what would take one man four years to decide upon, or four persons constantly employed the whole year!

Break your printer's head or your own, I do not care which, for having, (page 574) printed bras, arm—for brasses, fathoms.

I perceive you have some doubt about the infernal cookery of a goose, page 596; I will, therefore, tell you what I saw when I was at Strasburg, in 1816.—You must know Strasburg is famous for goose liver patties, and no elegant Parisian dinner is complete without one; they are thus prepared: the feathers are plucked from the breast of a goose, her feet are nailed and tied down to a board, which is placed before a large fire, a pan of milk is set before the goose; as she becomes incommoded by the heat, she is forced to drink; the thirst increases, and she has no other means of calming her agony but by drinking; she is thus tortured until she dies; the whole frame is disordered, and fit for nothing, but the liver is swelled to an enormous size, and of this they make their famous patties, which, I confess, I thought a great delicacy, until I knew how they were obtained.

You mention 'four-and-twenty blackbirds baked in a pie,'—when the late Mr. Pye was made laureat, his first ode was all about birds and the vocal groves, on which George Selwyn exclaimed,—'and when the pye was opened the birds began to sing, and was not that a dainty dish to set before the king.'

With all due reverence, permit me to correct two notable mistakes in page 622: you say the plain song (chant) was so called, as the choir and people sing in unison.—No, sir; the word plain is a corruption of the French word plein (full), introduced by a person who did not know its meaning; it is called, therefore, plein chant (full song), because the choir and people sing in unison. In the same page I find the following:—

'Thou unhappy king of no land,
More wretched than the King of Poland.'

Lord, sir, what blunders are here. Louis XVIII. or Monsieur, as he was called in his brother's life time, did not assume the title of Louis XVIII.; on his brother's death, 1793, the Dauphin was then alive, and, by law, king; he only assumed the title after the death of the Dauphin, in 1797. Again, did the Venetian address Louis XVIII. in English? he did not understand a word of it, and in no other language will the term of no land rhyme to Poland.—This foolish distich, however, intitles its author to the praise of, though he is not witty himself, being the cause of it in others. King John of England was nick-named by Philip of France, Jean Sans Terre, John lack land or no land. A man of the name of Santerre commanded the troops at the execution of Louis XVI. I was in Paris at the time, and dined at a table d'hôte some days after with this man, who was boasting of his preventing Louis XVI. from addressing the people. 'I wonder,' said one of the party, 'that you should be such an enemy of kings, who, as I can prove, are descended from one'—'what, I descended from a tyrant! never!' 'Yes, citizen, from a tyrant and a coward; you are descended from the King of England, Jean Sans Terre;' the whole party laughed, save Santerre, who said, my friend, the joke is a very good one, but pray do not breathe it beyond the walls of this room; for, in the present state of the public mind, it would be sufficient to send me to the scaffold.

Now, Mr. Editor, I think I have given you a good article on your 'Bee,' and if you don't insert it, you may get a hornet's nest about you, for I will print it 'and shame the fools.'

Your devoted humble servant and 'Constant reader,'

BOUR CHOUT.

PS. I am told the Quarterly Review gives one hundred guineas for an article. You shall have mine regularly once a week for ten guineas, which I expect you will jump at.

PROCLAMATION OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Since the time of the Stuarts, I do not believe that any sovereign of England has, in addition to his other virtues, assumed that of being able to cure diseases by touching; with that unfortunate family, it appears to have been one of the prerogatives of royalty frequently exercised. In a late number, you inserted a Gazette notice of Charles the Second on the subject, and I now forward you a proclamation of his father and predecessor, Charles the First, suspending his operations, on account of prevailing sickness, with which he was afraid of coming in contact. I am, yours, &c.

Oct. 16, 1821.

L. G.

By the King,
'A proclamation for suspending the time of healing the disease called the king's evil, until Easter next.

'Whereas, the king's most excellent majesty, by his proclamation, dated the 1st day of July last, did prescribe the times of his healing the disease, called the king's evil, to be Michaelmas and Easter, or within fourteen days next, before or after those feasts; nevertheless his majesty being now informed, that the sickness increaseth in many parts of the kingdom, and foreseeing the danger that may redound to his sacred person, by the confluence of diseased people at this Michaelmas now approaching, hath thought fit further to suspend all access to his court and presence for healing till Easter next, or fourteen days before or after the same. And doth therefore straitly charge and command all persons whatsoever, hereby to take knowledge of his majesty's royal will and commandment herein; and that none presume, until Easter next, or within fourteen days next before, or next after the said feast, to resort to his majesty's court or presence for healing, under pain of his majesty's high displeasure, and to be further punished as shall be meet; and his majesty's said proclamation of the first of July last, or any thing to the contrary therein, notwithstanding; which, nevertheless, in all the other directions and declarations therein expressed, his majesty wilth and commandeth to be duly and strictly observed, under the penalties therein mentioned.

'Given at our Court at Outlands, the second day of September, the fourteenth year of our reign.

'God save the king.'

ON TAVERNS.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

To those who are curious in observing national customs and popular manners, it is amusing to remark what singular changes take place in them in different ages; and what was fashionable in one century, becomes obsolete or vulgar in the succeeding one. This is strikingly exemplified in the case of taverns, formerly so numerous in the cities of London and Westminster. The history of these houses of public resort in this country, may be traced as far back as the time of Henry IV. when the Bear's Head, in East Cheap, was the rendezvous of Prince Henry, and where Falstaff called for his cup of sack, and revelled among his jolly companions. Of little less antiquity is the White Hart, without Bishopsgate, which bore on its front, a few years ago, the date of its erection, in 1480. Among the well-acquainted taverns in the metropolis, of former days, there was none more renowned than the White Rose, (the symbol of the York faction,) in Old Palace Yard, Westminster, which stood near the chapel of our lady, behind the high altar of the abbey church. The gloomy manners of puritanism gave a severe check to these temples of jollity, but the restoration of Charles again revived their popularity. The cavaliers and adherents of the royal party, for joy of that event, were, for a time, incessantly drunk; and from a picture of their manners, in Cowley's comedy of the Cutter of Coleman Street, it may be collected, that taverns were places of much more frequent resort than churches or conventicles. When the frenzy of the times was, however, abated, taverns, especially those in the city, became places for the transaction of almost all descriptions of business. There accounts were settled, conveyances executed; and there attorneys sat, as at inns in the country on market days, to receive their clients. In that space near the Royal Exchange, which is encompassed by Lombard, Gracechurch, part of Bishopsgate, and Threadneedle Streets, the number of taverns exceeded twenty; and on the scite of the Bank there stood no less than four. At the Crown, which was one of them, it was not unusual, in the course of a single morning, to draw a butt of mountain (120 gallons), in gills.

Taverns were formerly, even from the time of Shakespeare to within the last half century, the resort of the great wits of the age. In the time of our immortal bard, the places principally honoured by genius were the Sun and Moon Tavern, in Aldersgate Street; the Devil Tavern, in Fleet Street, close to Temple Bar; and the famous one called the Mermaid, which was in Cornhill. Here Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont, and all the worthies of the age, are known to have assembled; and here was held the celebrated club, which, as has been well observed by Mr. Gifford, 'combined more talent and genius, perhaps, than ever met together before or since.' The Mermaid Club originated with Sir Walter Raleigh, and among its members were Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, Selden, Carew, Martin, Donne, Cotton, and many others, whose names, even at this distant period, call up a mingled feeling of reverence and respect.

It was at the Mermaid Tavern that, in the full flow of confidence of friendship, the lively and interesting 'wit combats' took place between Shakespeare and Jonson; and hither, in probable allusion to some of them, Beaumont fondly lets his thoughts wander in his letter to Jonson from the country:

'Methinks the little wit I had is lost
Since I saw you; for wit is like a roset.
Held up at tennis, which men do the best
With the best gamsters. What things have we seen
Done at the MERMAID? Hard words that have been

So nimble and so full of flame,
As if that every one from whom they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest Of his dull life. Then, when there hath been above

Wit able enough to justify the town
For three days past,—wit that might warrant
For the whole city to talk foolishly
Till that were cancelled, and when that was gone,
We left an air behind us, which alone
Was able to make the two next complain
Right witty; though but downright fools, more wise.'

With what delight should we have hung over any well authenticated instances of these 'words so nimble and so full of subtle flame;' but, unfortunately, nothing on which we can depend has been handed down to us. Fuller, who from the manner in which he mentions the subject, must have had many of these lively sallies fresh in his recollection, does not give us one of them. In his 'Worthies,' describing the character of the bard of Avon, he says, 'Many were the wit combats between Shakespeare and Ben Jonson. I behold them like a Spanish great galleon, and an English man of war. Master Jonson, like the former, was built far higher in learning solid, but slow in his performances. Shakespeare, like the latter, less in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about, and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention.'

How many taverns were frequented by the literati in the early part of the last century, the Spectator, the Tatler, and other British essays, bear abundant evidence; and there is little doubt but many of these papers were produced at a tavern, or originated in the 'wit combats' that frequently took place. Although Sir Richard Steele was extravagant in his uxoriousness, yet we have always admired a passage in one of his letters to his wife, written from a tavern, in which he assures her that he will be with her 'within half a bottle of wine.'

The change that has taken place in respect to the company frequenting taverns, is supposed to be owing to the increased expense; but extravagant charges of tavern-keepers, in Queen Anne's time, were not less deserving of complaint then than they are now. The Duke of Ormond, who gave a dinner to a few friends at the Star and Garter, in Pall Mall, was charged twenty-one pounds six shillings and eight-pence, for four dishes and four, that is, first and second course, without wine or desert.

To whatever cause we may attribute the circumstance, that taverns are not resorted to by men of genius as formerly, we suspect literature has been the loser; and the wit, humour, and friendship which were frequently engendered in a tavern, is but poorly compensated in the conversations of our modern men of letters. B.

THE AMERICAN CHARACTER.

[In our last number, we noticed a work entitled, 'Views of Society and Manners in America,' which purported to be written by an Englishwoman, but which we proved pretty clearly must have been from the pen of an American. As we considered the state of society in the United States to have been very imperfectly and incorrectly represented in these 'Views,' we turned to a work on the same subject, published about six years ago, by M. Beaujour, a Frenchman, from whom impartiality may be rather expected than either from an Englishman or an American. M. Beaujour resided some time in the United States, and gives the following admirable estimate of the character of the inhabitants, which will be found to differ very essentially from that of an Englishman.—Ed.]

THE Americans are so new a mixture of such a number of nations, that hitherto they have acquired no public spirit or national character. Their political opinions savour of those common to all the people from whom they are derived; and as the greatest part of them are of English origin, they have brought over with them to America all the elements of discord which agitate their parent country. In each state, they are divided into two grand parties, similar to those of the Whigs and Tories; and what is most to be regretted is, that neither of these parties knows precisely what it wants, or at least does not adopt the means to obtain it.

The Democratic, or Republican party, composed of the most numerous class of the people, ought to seek the frequency of elections, the rotation of the offices, and responsibility in those employed; but the leaders of this party seek only to maintain power in the hands of the multitude, in order to secure it for themselves.

The Aristocratical party, or, as it is there called, the Federalist party, composed of the richest classes of the inhabitants, seeks to concentrate power, and to take it out of the hands of the multitude, in order to render it less dependent, and to give greater strength to those therewith invested; but in order to concentrate power it would be first necessary to obtain it, and this party disdains its possession.

The Democrats unceasingly cry out against distinctions, at the same time they are seeking after them; and in that country, as well as every where else, they are hypocrites, who agitate and caress the multitude, for the purpose of living at its expense.

The Federalists seek distinctions in riches; and as they cannot find them in any thing that is continually changing hands, they would prefer institutions which would class each rank, and render power unchangeable.

The Democratic party wishes no taxation on lands, because, by fixed and secure imposts, its abettors apprehend giving too much consistency to government. They only seek the variable impost of customs, and care not whether it diminishes, or even fails, as long as a foreign war is likely to take place.

The Federalist party feels the necessity of territorial taxes, in order to render the government independent of external events, and would be pleased with an imposing army and navy. It would also wish that the people, tranquil within, should carry their iniquity without; and it unceasingly presents to them, as a prey, sometimes Canada and then Mexico.

The Democrats appear most attached to France, and the Federalists to England; but the truth is, they neither love one nor the other, and are entirely absorbed in themselves and their party. The error of the Federalists is in appearing attached to a foreign government, which, from being composed of elements of discord, can only perpetuate them in their's. The Democrats only appear fond of France, because the Federalists display attachment to England.

It would be difficult to predict which of the two parties will gain the ascendancy, because the physical strength resides in one, and all the influence of moral causes in the other. The mass of the people is Republican; but in the Aristocratical party are all the large freeholders, rich capitalists, merchants, and especially those who trade with British capitals, the persons interested in the banks and public funds; in short, all the timid men, who prefer the calm of social life to the storms of liberty. It is, besides, under the banners of this party, if ever the government acquires a greater degree of strength, that all the public agents will range themselves, as well as those who aspire to the same rank; and to these will be added the members of the judiciary body, who seek to judge the people without being subject to its judgment, and also all the conductors of the finance, who seek to squeeze the multitude, without being exposed to its fury. This party has one advantage; it has a determined object: this is, to impose on the Americans something substantial, in the manner that it has already imposed on them the forms of the British constitution; and it struggles to alienate them from France, in order to leave them a prey to the entire influence of England. Those who are of this party, incessantly rail at their government, their institutions, even their habits, and conceive there is nothing excellent but in Europe, and with them the whole of Europe is comprised in the little corner of England.

The other party only sustains itself by its mass, and is guided only by its instinct. These two parties are always at variance, and they will quarrel on, till one has crushed the other or given a master to both.

The Americans of all parties, by their moderation, ought to strive to guard against so fatal an event, and enjoy, as long as they can, that degree of liberty which is compatible with their institutions; but they can never adequately enjoy this degree of freedom, till they agree to be governed by wise and enlightened men; for real liberty can only exist in those places where wise and enlightened men govern the people, and where the people have sufficient good sense to suffer themselves to be governed by them.

At present, the parties in their opinions only agree in one point, which is in the elevated idea they have of themselves and of their nation; for the Americans have hardly less national vanity than the oldest people of Europe. Unable, like the latter, to boast of what they have been, since they have themselves but just made their appearance on the scene of the world, they boast of what they are one day destined to become. In their existence, they neither consider the past or the present; and rending with a bold hand the veil which covers futurity from human eyes, they contemplate afar off brilliant destinies which await them; they fear not the vicissitudes of fortune, and, before hand, point out the period when they are to become the first nation of the world. The best informed among them, as well as all the rest, already flatter themselves with these illusions; and, with the compass in the hand, they measure their future grandeur by the extent of their vast territory; and seem to be ignorant, that the largest empires of Asia are now scarcely known, whilst the names of Sparta and Athens, which only occupied a small corner of Greece, are still associated with every idea we have of grandeur and glory.

In fact, the several states cannot have the same political opinions, because their interests are opposed. The states bordering on the Atlantic seek to sacrifice every thing to commerce and navigation, without which they could not be able to subsist; and those of the interior wish that every thing should be sacrificed to agriculture, the principal cherisher of nations. The northern states would willingly establish liberty on every side, whilst those of the south seek to maintain slavery among themselves. With such opposite pretensions, the several states can never possess the same public spirit.

The Americans have no more stability in their character than in their opinions.—Each state, nay, almost each district, has different manners; and in these there are none of those general and striking resemblances, which give to the whole people a particular colour and a distinct physiognomy. The people of the United States possess the habits of every other people; but they have hitherto none of their own. The climate alone has modified these habits; but their institutions have not yet blended them. In the northern states the inhabitants are bold and enterprising, inconstant and light in the middle states, and heedless and lazy in those of the south. A Bostonian would go in search of his fortune to the bottom of hell; a Virginian would not go across the road to seek it. An inhabitant of New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, can never die content, if, during his life time, he has not changed his profession three or four times.

In traversing the United States from north to south, as far as the Hudson, we find English manners, and frequently with the same stiffness that distinguishes them in the north of Scotland; but this stiffness disappears between the Hudson and the Potomac, and particularly in Pennsylvania and Maryland, where the Germans, Irish, and even the French, have introduced into English manners a thousand different shades. It is not till we reach the other side of Potomac, that these manners, strongly tinged with those of the West Indies, appear entirely changed; and whether it is that this change is derived from the influence of the climate, or of negro slavery, it is not the less sensible in every usage of life. There, trade is entirely given up to foreigners, and agriculture abandoned to slaves, whilst the proprietor, under the stately name of planter, attends to nothing but his pleasures. The life of this proud being is a continued scene of indolence and dissipation. Horse-races and cock-fights are his favourite diversions, and all the time he does not employ in these noisy amusements, he passes round a table, either gaming or drinking. He thinks he is under no obligation to work, because his slaves work for him.

But in the interior of the country, and on the other side of the Alleghanys, men are to be met with more laborious and of more simple manners; and notwithstanding this simplicity has been changed in some districts by the perpetual mixtures of new settlers with the old ones, manners are there generally more pure than in the other parts of the United States.

A residence in the United States can never be pleasing to rich men, bred up in good society, nor men of science deprived of the gifts of fortune; which uniformly gives to foreigners so many prejudices against the country. But, even for those who arrive in the United States with the most simple habits and taste, society has there none of those pleasures it every where else possesses; and the European, who is condemned to live there, ought to seek in his duties, or in the bosom of his family, the whole of his pleasures. A person lives there in almost as isolated a manner as in Turkey; as if these two countries, which differ from each other in so many points, should be destined to be alike in this particular one.

Not that among the rich class of citizens there are no assemblies; yet these have only for object, among the women to drink tea, and among the men, to drink wine and other liquors. The conversation of the latter generally hinges on politics, or purchases which some propose and others accept; for the American never loses an opportunity of enriching himself. Gain is the subject of all his discourse, and the lever of all his actions; so that there is scarcely a civilized country in the world, in which there is less generosity of sentiment, less elevation of soul, and less of those soft and brilliant illusions which constitute the charm or the consolation of life. There a man weighs every thing, calculates all, and sacrifices all to his own interest. He lives only in himself, and for himself, and regards all disinterested acts as so many follies, contemns all talents that are purely agreeable, appears estranged to every idea of heroism and of glory, and in history beholds nothing but the ruinance of nations.

Virtue has always been considered as the principle, or the chief spring of all republics; but that of the American republic seems to be an unbounded love of money.

No permanent bond founded on commercial and political interests, can ever be established between the nations of Europe and the United States of America.

But even if the nations of Europe wished to form an alliance with the Americans for temporary considerations, the latter would not be disposed to do it, because their views and interests are at variance.

Separated from Europe by their position, the Americans seek to separate themselves still more by their affections; and they avoid alliance with European powers, in order not to be dragged into their vortex. Neither the glory of the one nor the services of the other, seem to make an impression upon them: their only desire is to remain neutral among all, that they may avail themselves of their quarrels, and enrich themselves by their misfortunes. Like the ship-owners of the Barbary coast, the Americans conceive they can only prosper but when the whole of Europe is on fire; and Europeans, who have lived thirty years among them, have attested that they never saw them more joyful, than on the day when the bombardment of Cadix and the destruction of Copenhagen were announced on the exchanges of some of their principal cities. These unhappy beings rejoiced in the disasters of Europe, without reflecting that the thunder which consumed our most flourishing cities, was one day to fall on theirs.

LORD CLARENDON'S CHARACTER OF THE PLOT OF HAMFEN.

The following portrait of Hamfden is drawn by the great Lord Clarendon, and is preserved in his own hand writing, among the papers of Bishop Sprat, which were presented to the British Museum, in 1759, by David Mallet, Esq. :—

‘He was born to a fair fortune, of a most civil and affable deportment. In his entrance into the world he allowed himself in sports, exercise, and company, which are used by other men of the most jolly conversation, but sometimes he retired to a more reserved and melancholy society, still preserving his natural cheerfulness and vivacity, and, above all, a flowing courtesy to all men.’

‘He carried himself with temper and modesty. His reputation of honesty was universal, and his affections seemed to be so publicly guided, as if no corrupt or private ends could bias them; he was of that affability of temper in debate, and of that seeming humility and submission of judgment, as if he brought no opinion of his own with him, but a desire of information and instruction, yet he had so subtle a way of interrogating, and, under the notion of doubts, insinuating his own objections, that he often infused his own opinions into those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them, and even with those who preserved themselves from his insinuations, and discerned those opinions to be fixed in him which they could not comply with, he always left the character of an ingenious and conscientious man. He was indeed a wise man, and of good parts; and possessed of the most absolute spirit of popularity, and the most absolute faculties to govern the people. In the Parliament, he seemed rather to moderate and soften violent humours than to inflame, so far disguising his own designs, that he seldom seemed to wish more than was concluded, and if any thing unreasonable was proposed, when he found it backed by a majority of votes, he withdrew himself before the question. He was very temperate in his diet, and a supreme governor over his passions and affections, and had thereby a great power over all other men’s.’

‘He was, of industry and vigilance, not to be tired out or wearied by the most laborious, and of parts, not to be imposed upon by the most subtle and sharp, and of a personal courage equal to those parts he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute any design.’

Note. On the back of this paper is a passage from Cicero’s Oratio pro Cato.

* The words seeming and seemed are interlined, and appear to have been added after the portrait was written.

lio, § 8, beginning, Habuit enim ille, and ending hujus imperii tam sceleratus impe (tus), and this title at the top, Catalina.

Original Poetry.

TO AN ABSENT FRIEND.

AGAIN the hour may haply come,
The moments quietly close each other,—
When I shall welcome thee to home,
As holy pilgrim meets a brother;
And thou’st don’t doff thy hat and shoon,
The sparkling bowl shall cheerily
Go round, and e’en the paly moon
Shall set, and day break wearily,
By far too soon. H. A.

THE ROBIN.

The robin hath come to his winter seat,
And begun his winter song,—
The gloomy day he sits and sings,
My stay shall be late and long;
For I love the garden so bleak and bare,
The ivy through ice that creeps,
And sweet is the tear I sit and shed
While November o’er me sweeps;
Deep in the snow the berry’s hid,
The frost hath nipt the green,—
Where the golden blossom cluster’d
The icicle is seen.

To the city-window I come, and eye
The happy inmates round;
But if a crumb I cannot spy,
I quit’t thy unhalloved ground.
The forest hath shook his ample lap,
The hamlet look’d for me,—
All day I’ll sing to thank them,
On the wither’d hawthorn tree.
Deep in the snow the berry’s hid,
The frost hath nipt the green,
Where the golden blossom cluster’d
The icicle is seen. Mac.

SONG.

WHEN in the glimmer of night, love,
The minstrel lifts his arm,
And sweeps the notes,
The melody floats
O’er the soul like the midnight charm
Of a spirit rob’d in white, love.
Then come from thy castle hall, love,
To the dell by the border lake,—
Tis a fairy haunt,—
And list to the chaunt
That the echoes cheerily make
In the cave where the wild notes fall, love.

MY DARLING MAID.

WHERE is the maid of beaming eye?
In what far distant glade
Doth beauty’s queen sequester’d lie,
My own, my darling maid?
O! hasten to becalm my soul;
And quiet retirement’s shade;
Thy presence can my grief console,
My own, my darling maid!
If e’er I try my voice in song,
Or poetry call to aid,
Thy name still trembles on my tongue,
My own, my darling maid!

And tho’ beguil’d by present charms,
My heart ere while hath stray’d,
Still fancy brings thee to my arms,
My own, my darling maid!
And, oh! if prayer avail on high,
By fervent lovers made,
Naught shall call forth from thee a sigh,
My own, my darling maid!
But life continuance he of bliss,
And when ’neath tombstone laid,
Thou’st seek a heaven above for this,
My own, my darling maid!

TRANSLATION OF CATULLUS.

CARM. LXX.

My girl says,—she’d with no one rather wed
Than me—if Jove himself should seek her bed;
She says so: but what woman says, should he Traced in the wind, or written on the sea.

MAY—A SONG.

TUNE—The Birds of Iwermay.

The balmy breath of blooming May
Makes all our hills and valleys gay;
Young Flora decks our rosey bowers
With gay ambrosia breathing flowers,—
The warbling songsters of the grove
So sweetly chaunt their voice of love,
And wake to melody each spray,
To hail the lovely blooming May!
Bright Phoebus sheds his amber dew,
All nature brightens at the view;
The fields and forests all are green,
And naught but love and joy is seen.
The lowing kine and bleating flocks
Blythe wander o’er our glens and rocks;
And kids and lambskins sport and play,
To hail the lassy blooming May!
The primrose and the daisy spring,
And o’er the mead sweet fragrance fling,—
The lily smiles with maiden air,
And roses bud upon the bair,—
The yellow broom is fair to view,
And humble v’let’s darkly blue;
And snow, while hawthorn’s blossoms gay,
Perfume the breath of gentle May!
When smiling Morning lifts her eye,
And paints with gold the glowing sky,
Behold the rose-complexion’d lass,
Light tripping o’er the tender grass,
Along the dew-bespangled dale,
So gaily with her milking pail,
How sweet she sings her artless lay,
To hail the lovely blooming May!
Then, dear Eliza, let us go
Where Calder’s winding streamlets flow
Where clustering poppies beds along
And listen to the merry song;
There, all beneath the birken boughs,
I’ll gather flowers to deck thy brow,
And talk of love the live-long day,
Among the sweets of blooming May!
We’ll kiss and toy, and toy and kiss,
And make our full of heavenly bliss,
Nor envy all the pomp and state
Attendant on the proud and great;
Upon a bed by nature dress’d,
I’ll fondly clasp thee to my breast,
And in soft raptures melt away,
Among the blooming sweets of May!

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—Monday night restored to this house two great favourites, Miss Kelly and Mr. Harley, and with them some relief to the monotony which has long pervaded the performances; though their talents might have been more prominently and more appropriately devoted, than to the excellent but stale farce of the Weathercock. The first piece was the Dramatist, in which Mr. Elliston's performance was Vapid, and only reminded us of 'days of auld lang syne,' when this gentleman's delineation of the character was natural, forcible, and spirited. We do not mean to say that, even now, Vapid could have a better representative, but the Mr. Elliston of to-day is not the Mr. Elliston of ten or fifteen years ago. Miss Kelly, on her entrance in the farce, was greeted most cordially and enthusiastically; and the manner in which she personated the various characters which Variella assumes, received the strongest testimonies of applause; evidence which should induce the manager to let her appear often, and in that lofty walk in the drama which her talents demand. Harley is a very amusing Tristram Finkle, though he caricatures the portrait somewhat too much. The Coronation is still crowned with success. When shall we be able to say of it, Finis coronat opus?

COVENT GARDEN.—The Exile seems likely to banish, (we speak not punningly,) every other drama from this house for some time; and with all our prejudices against mere spectacle, and our regret at its elevation above the regular drama, we confess ourselves seduced, against our better reason, into admiration of the splendid pageantry of the procession and Russian coronation. The drama is above those in which spectacle is usually the principal object; and the actors are so decidedly superior, that it is impossible the play should not be attractive. The character of Daran, though loaded with passages which nearly approach bombast, affords Mr. Young many opportunities, which he well knows how to make the most of; and in some particular parts on Wednesday night, he was honoured with three distinct rounds of applause, by a crowded audience. Mrs. Tennant, who, we learn, was transplanted to these boards from the Adelphi Theatre, is a lively clever actress, and, could she overcome her timidity, would appear to much greater advantage. Her voice is pleasing, but not powerful, and it appears best suited to ballad airs, in the execution of which, simplicity and sweetness, rather than science and power, are required; hence it will be said, that the part of Katherine was not well adapted to her talents. She was, however, very successful in several of the airs, particularly in that of 'The Monkey that had seen the World.' Farren, as the Governor, is highly amusing; and he dances and bustles through the character with as much agility as an old military officer ought to be expected to muster. Liston, in the Baron Altradoff, had little to do, excepting singing a comic song in the Italian style, which he burlesqued with inimitable drollery.

A new farce is in rehearsal, of which green-room report speaks favourably; it is in the afterpieces alone that we must now look for any novelty, for some time.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—A bold and new experiment has been made at this house in the present season, that of keeping it open without the aid of the performers of the two large theatres, on which they had always before depended. This experiment became absolutely necessary; since the season of a winter theatre now lasts the whole year. The experiment, we rejoice to say, has been completely successful, and the Haymarket Theatre boldly competes with its more powerful rivals, for a share of the public patronage. It competes too, on the most noble grounds, and taking its stand on the legitimate drama, redeems the character of the age, by showing that it still possesses no inconsiderable share of admirers.

Mrs. Inchbald's excellent comedy of Every one has his Fault, was played with much effect, until its success was arrested by a still greater novelty, the introduction of a young lady, as Captain Macheath, in the Beggar's Opera, which was played on Tuesday night, in a manner that is likely to ensure it many repetitions.

It is curious to mark the changes which time brings about. There was a period when the female characters in the Beggar's Opera were played by men, and when Polly Penchum and Lucy Lockit could not appear before the audience without being clean shaven; the sexes afterwards assumed their proper characters; but now we have passed to the other extreme, and female Macheaths are all the rage. The young lady who ventured to 'enact more than a woman,' and to appear as the hero of the highway, is, we understand, from the Bristol Theatre, and her name is Blake. As an accident prevented us from attending the theatre on the first night of the performance, we quote an account of her debut from the Times newspaper, the correctness of which, so far as regards the lady's talents, we have since verified.—'She is, in stature, rather beneath the ordinary height of woman, and, so far as her dress allowed us to form a judgment, she appears to be rather inclined to the embonpoint. Her features are soft and pleasing, but not remarkable for expression. The songs of Macheath embrace a greater variety of style, and require a greater variety of power for their execution, than those of almost any other character in English opera. They are old popular airs, the works of different individuals, arranged and harmonized for the opera by Dr. Pepusch, whose music, if we except the cantata "See from the silent grove," is very seldom performed. To execute, with effect, Macheath's varied strains, requires a voice of the finest quality, and a sound judgment to direct and guide it; mellowness and depth in the lower tones, easiness of transition to the higher, and in these combined power and sweetness. Miss Blake boasts some of these requisites, but not all of them. Her voice is a contra alto, deep, flexible, and rich, where depth of tone is demanded; but when a piano key is required, it becomes harsh, though it still manifests power. We speak here of Miss Blake's natural upper notes, we leave falsetto out of the question, for her efforts to get into that key were wholly unsuccessful, and her deficiency in this respect prevented her from bestowing on some of her cadences that graceful finish of which the music was susceptible. Her style of singing is extremely simple. She rarely aims at ornament; but, when she does, she shows that her taste, if not very highly cultivated, has been by no means neglected. The peculiar depth of her voice was even more remarkable when she spoke, than when she exerted her vocal powers. It reminded us of a youth approaching the verge of manhood, and so far rendered the performance more pleasing than it would have been had the "shrill treble" predominated. Miss Blake's execution of the greatly admired air, "When the heart of a man," was spirited, but the defect in her upper voice detracted considerably from the passage. 'Like the notes of a fiddle, she sweetly, sweetly.' Her best solo was "The charge is prepared," which she sang with great feeling. The adieu to Lucy and Polly was natural and impressive. The whole of the "medley" in the last scene, particularly the passage "If thus a man can die," was executed in a very satisfactory manner by Miss Blake. This may be ranked amongst the most trying parts of the performance, and Miss Blake appeared to have directed her particular attention to it. The trio, "Hark! hark! I hear the sound of the bell," which ensues, was exceedingly well sung; and we consider Miss Blake's portion of it as decidedly her finest effort. The shake with which she terminated her cadence, low, firm, and distinct, astonished the audience. Several of this young lady's songs were encored, and her general reception must have fully satisfied her hopes and wishes, however sanguine they might have been.

We heard the young lady on Wednesday night, and must remark, that as to the faisleto, in which the critic of the 'Times' states her to have been unsuccessful, it was impossible to judge, as she laboured under a severe cold, and her performance (though not the vocal part of it) was much interrupted by coughing. This must be a great disadvantage to any one, and when we consider that the numerous encores made her task double, we should have excused a partial failure, had there been such in a single song, which, however, was not the case. The acting of Miss Blake is far superior to vocalists generally; and though she played the character with much spirit, yet she shaded the broad outline with such delicate and ingenious playfulness, that she never 'o'erstepped the modesty of nature.' The chasteness may be extended to her dress, for we never saw a lady so appropriately and modestly clad in man's attire. Miss R. Corri is a most captivating Polly, and gave the beautiful airs of this opera most delightfully. She was encored in all the principal songs. Mrs. Jones, who has a good honest Welsh face, played Lucy Lockit extremely well, both in singing and acting. Terry's Penchum was excellent; and Williams did Lockit pretty well. We believe Mr. J. Russell to be a very respectable man, but if he had passed all his life in very bad company, he could not have played Filch better; it was decidedly the best personation of the character we ever witnessed. The other characters were generally very well sustained; the costume, from the Captain down to 'Crook-fingered Jack' and 'Nimbling Ned,' was very appropriate. The house was crowded.

Previous to the opera, the farce of the Spilled Child was represented, in which Tayleure played Tag, and rendered the scene with Miss Pickle more amusing than we ever saw it. The burlesque was superlative. Mrs. Baker, a very promising young actress, with as much vivacity as any lady, either single or married, played little Pickle charmingly. We ought also to say a word in favour of the gentleman whom we presume to be her husband, Mr. Baker, who, on Monday night, during the absence of Mr. Courway, undertook, at the instant, the part of Mr. Irwin, in Mrs. Inchbald's comedy, and played it very well.

SURREY THEATRE.—We are sure our friends on the Surrey side of the metropolis will be glad to hear that Mr. Dibdin has not suffered himself and his theatre to be idle during the autumn, but that he will 'keep open house' for six weeks previous to his Christmas arrangements. As this was not in contemplation when the summer season closed, some of his performers have got other engagements; he has, however, mustered a good company, and opened, in his usual style, with entire novelty. The evening's entertainments comprised a comic dance, called Valentine's Day; a melodramatic romance, called the Duke's Bride, or the Ruins of the Forest; a new burletta, founded on one of Kotzebue's dramas, and entitled the Veterans, or the Comodore and the Colonel; and a farcical pantomime. In the Veterans, which is a very interesting drama, and admirably performed, a young lady of the name of Dighton, and who, we believe, is a pupil of Lanza's, made her debut. She possesses a fine person, an expressive countenance, and a very engaging voice. She sung a parody on 'If e'er the cruel tyrant Love,' unaccompanied by music, with much sweetness, and was encored. Her diffidence, however, was so extreme, that in acting she was often inaudible, notwithstanding the cheering encouragement which the audience afforded her. So far as we are able to judge, she is a lady of very considerable promise. A Mr. Foster, from the Bath stage, executed some songs in good style. Mr. Herring, (an old favourite,) and Mr. Salter, from the English Opera House, also appeared in the same piece. The whole of the performances were received with much applause, and from the arrangements which Mr. Dibdin has made, we doubt not of his having a successful season.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—A new melodramatic burletta was produced at this house on Monday night, entitled the Corsair's Bride. It is, we believe, founded on the tale of Giovanni Sogarro, but if so, has undergone much alteration in adapting it to the stage. The drama contains some striking situations, and, with the aid of beautiful scenery and much good acting, is a very attractive performance.

Literature and Science.

Proposals are circulating for publishing a Pictorial Promenade round Dorking; including a variety of original and interesting matter, and accompanied with biographical notices and well-authenticated facts, connected with subjects of contemporary interest.

Mr. Mills's Elements of the Science of Political Economy; The Synopsis of British Molluscs, by William Elford Leach, M. D.; and Mr. Samuel Frederick Gray's 'Natural Arrangement of British Plants,' are nearly ready for publication.

Ancient MSS.—M. Maio still continues to be successful in his search after lost works of ancient writers; he has lately found several parts of the books of Polybius, Diodorus, Dion Cassius, some fragments of Aristotle of Ephorus, of Timeus, of Hyperides, of Demetrius, of Phalaris, &c., some parts of the unknown writings of Euanapius, Menander of Byzantium, Prescius, and of Peter the Protector.

The Cambro-Briton.—The admirers of the ancient literature of WALES, and of the Celtic Nations generally, will be pleased to hear, that the above popular work, devoted especially to its cultivation, will immediately be resumed, under the superintendence of the original Editor. It will appear, as before, monthly, and at the former price of 1s. 6d. each number, but upon an enlarged scale, calculated to admit of considerable improvements in the plan of the work. No. 23 will be published on the 1st of November, by SIMPKIN and MARSHALL, Stationers' Hall Court, Ludgate Street, to whom Communications to the Editor, free of postage, are requested to be addressed.

Mr. Gill, for many years one of the Chairmen of the Committee of Mechanics, in the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, in the Adelphi, assisted by a circle of mechanical friends, is preparing for publication, a technical repository of practical information, on subjects connected with the daily improvements and new discoveries in the useful arts.

The Rev. H. Cotes, Vicar of Bedlington, is about to publish 'The Resurrection of Lazarus,' in a course of sermons, from the French of Beaumont.

Statuary Marble.—Some remarkably fine statuary and other marble quarries have lately been discovered at Scavazza, in Tuscany, much superior to any thing of the kind at Carrara, which threaten to rival and lower the pride of the latter-mentioned place. His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany gives great encouragement and protection both to commerce and the fine arts within his dominions.

The Bee.

*'Floriferis ut apes in salubris omnia limant,
Omnia nos itidem depascitur aurea dicta.'*
LUCRETIVS.

Old Maids.—A sprightly writer expresses his opinion of old maids in the following manner:—I am inclined to believe that many of the satirical aspersions cast upon old maids, tell more to their credit than is generally imagined. Is a woman remarkably neat in her person, 'she will certainly die an old maid.' Is she particularly reserved towards the other sex? 'she has all the sequenishness of an old maid.' Is she frugal in her expenses and exact in her domestic concerns? 'she is cut for an old maid.' And if she is kindly humane to the animals about her, nothing can save her from the appellation of an 'old maid.' In short, I have always found that neatness, modesty, economy, and humanity, are the never-failing characteristics of that terrible creature, an 'old maid.'

In an auctioneer's catalogue, printed at Bath, during the present year, we find the following articles enumerated: 'Œuvre's Works' and a 'Musical stool!!' The auctioneer does not, however, state how many times it plays.

The Number XIV.—Amongst the valuable fruits of the labours of those who waste their time in searching for curious coincidences, we find the discovery of the influence possessed by the number XIV., over all the affairs of Henry IV. of France. He was born fourteen centuries, fourteen decades, and fourteen years after Christ; he came into the world on the 14th of December, and quitted it for a better on the 14th of May; there are fourteen letters in his name (Henri de Bourbon), and he lived four times fourteen years, fourteen weeks, and fourteen days.—Louis the Thirteenth was equally entangled with the number XIII.; he had thirteen letters in his name—so had Ann d'Autriche, to whom he was married; the marriage was concluded on when he was thirteen years of age; he was the thirteenth Louis of France, she, the thirteenth Infanta of her name in the Royal House of Spain, and both of them were born the same month and the same year. The historian who recorded these singular facts, does not inform us, whether either of them died in consequence of making the thirteenth at table.

Excessive Fondness of Dress.—Elizabeth of Russia resembled her namesake, Queen of England, in self-idolatry; and both lavished on their own persons every adventitious aid to native charms. Our Elizabeth was said to possess a habit for every day in the year, and she varied its form and decoration to three hundred and sixty-five inventions of excursive fancy. A thick quarto volume was filled with a simple detail of wardrobe appertaining to Elizabeth of Russia. This mania has not been confined to the fair sex. When Dresden fell into the hands of Prussia, during the seven years war, the Saxon Minister, Count Buhl, afforded the victors a spoil of 800 pair of boots, which Frederic ordered should be distributed to his guards.—1200 wigs, which had sat in turn upon the lofty brow of the statesman, were thrown in a heap upon the floor of the public stone, to be sold; and it was whispered that many hundred dozens of shirts, silk stockings, and laced cravats, with every species of masculine finery, had been sent to different marts and converted into cash for the royal treasury.

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

'LIFE,' Chap. IV. the 'Serenade' by H. A. 'Origin of Chess,' 'Sonnets,' 'the Evening Prayer,' 'For Ever,' and 'Lines to the Memory of a Cousin,' in our next.

We are sorry that Mary Ann C., who states herself to be 'aged thirteen years,' does not employ her infant muse better than in eulogizing a female 'who is spoken of as being rather too amorously inclined.' Indecency does not become any age, much less that of childhood.

We thank E. G. B. for his hint. 'We should feel happy in seconding the laudable efforts of 'Humanity,' but the best organ as that he has already adopted—the daily journals.

Review of New Books.

A Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea and Beering's Straits, for the Purpose of exploring a North East Passage, undertaken in the Years 1815—1818, at the Expense of His Highness the Chancellor of the Empire, Count Romanzoff, in the Ship Rurick, under the Command of Lieutenant Otto Von Kotzebue. Illustrated with numerous Plates and Maps. 3 vols. 8vo. pp. 1233. London, 1821.

THE long expected voyage of Kotzebue was published on Saturday last, in an English translation, and we lose not a moment in making our readers fully acquainted with the discoveries of that enterprising navigator; but before we do this, we shall take a retrospective glance at the discoveries which have been made in geography within the last four centuries,—discoveries the most important, since they have not only as it were created new worlds, but done much to improve the old one.

At the beginning of the fifteenth century, all the inhabited world, in which there was any thing like intercourse, was circumscribed within very narrow limits; namely, Great Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Greece; the lesser Asia; the western part of Persia, Arabia, the northern parts of Africa, and the islands in the Mediterranean Sea. These were the old world of our ancestors, and even some of these countries were but very imperfectly known. Germany was almost unexplored beyond the banks of the Elbe, and Poland as little known beyond the Vistula as Hungary beyond the Danube. Muscovy or Russia was as perfectly unknown as China; and all the knowledge they had of India was from a little commerce on the coast about Surat and Malabar.

Africa had once been better known; but by the ruin of the Carthaginians, all the western coast of it was forgotten; the northern coast only continuing to be known. The Baltic Sea was not discovered, nor even the navigation of it known. America was not heard of; the coasts of Greenland and Spitzbergen had never been visited by an European navigator. Angola, Congo, and the Gold Coast, on the west side of Africa, whence such immense wealth has since been drawn, were not discovered; all that mighty ocean we now call the South Seas, was hidden and unknown. The Atlantic was frightful in the distant prospect, nor durst any one peep into it, otherwise than as they might creep along the coast of Africa, towards Santa Cruz; and the North Sea was hid in a veil of impenetrable darkness.

When, however, Columbus discovered America, and Gama opened the true route to the Indies, a host of voyagers, adventurers, and conquerors followed their example; in less than half a century, the quantity of known land was tripled; each year had its discovery, and the limits of the world were almost daily extended. But no sooner did this noble ardour evince a tendency towards commercial war, than suddenly discoveries ceased; the slightest obstacles were sufficient to arrest that progress which had been marked by so much zeal, and problems of the simplest nature were declared difficult of solution. A thousand navigators sailed through the Southern and Pacific Oceans, and all seemed carefully to avoid the new lands which deserved their attention. It was in vain that two men of genius, Tasman and Quiros, sought an unknown world; their example was not followed, for the mind of man was no longer influenced by the enthusiasm of discovery.

Two centuries had elapsed in this way, when our immortal countryman, Cook, opened a new era, and the success of his vast labours inflamed the ambition of enlightened nations. To enumerate the results is unnecessary, since every modern map bears record of the extent and importance of the discoveries. Among the geographical problems yet remaining to be solved, the most important is, that of a northern passage from the Atlantic to the Southern Ocean, or vice versa, from the South Sea into the Atlantic, and to this navigation has of late years been principally directed. For three successive centuries the connection between the two oceans has been sought in vain; the greatest navigators of all nations have participated in the attempt to solve this difficult problem; but in this, as in all other maritime enterprises, the English have principally distinguished themselves: we were the first to make the attempt; and, with the most laudable perseverance, we have continued our exertions, without intermission, up to the present moment.

Russia, which has not possessed a navy much more than a century, has employed it very actively to the improvement of science, and, of late years, to solve the great geographical problem, for which several expeditions have been fitted out. We shall not enter into an account of these or of the discoveries made by those of our own nation, but shall proceed at once to the voyage of Lieut. Kotzebue.

It was for the purpose of exploring a north-east passage that Count Romanzoff, a Russian nobleman of great wealth, which he liberally devotes to scientific pursuits, fitted out a vessel at his own expense. The command of it was given to Lieut. Kotzebue, a son of the able but unfortunate writer of that name, and who had previously accompanied Commodore Krusenstern in a voyage round the world. A vessel of one hundred and eighty tons' burden was built for the occasion, at Abo, in Sweden, and called the Rurick. The astronomical and other instruments were purchased in England, and the expedition fitted out under the immediate superintendence of Count Krusenstern, who has written an able introduction to the present work.

It was on the 30th of July, 1815, that Lieut. Kotzebue, accompanied by two officers and twenty choice sailors, left Cronstadt for Plymouth, where, having completed his equipments, he sailed on the 5th of October, on his voyage of discovery. The vessel touched at Teneriffe and Santa Cruz, and was the first Russian vessel that ever showed its flag in the harbour of Talcaguano, in Concepcion Bay. The commander of the place invited Lieut. Kotzebue and his officers to a party at his house, where the customs were somewhat curious. He says,—

‘There are in the ball-room, on an elevation of two steps, benches covered with red cloth; on these sat the gentlemen and elderly ladies: the young ones had their places on the steps at our feet, and I was quite confused when I observed a handsome young girl, dressed in satin and diamonds, set at my feet; but as I soon perceived that all the gentlemen shared this distinction with me, I took courage, and raised my eyes again. The herb of Paraguay, or rather the leaves of the lau-tree, is known in all the Spanish settlements, and generally used instead of tea: (the herb of Paraguay is used in Chili, to the amount of 1,000,000 dollars, annually) but the custom is not so well known of presenting this tea in a silver vessel, with a pipe to it, out of which every one in the company takes a few sips, and hands it to his neighbour. When my turn came round, I considered it a duty due to propriety, to imitate those who preceded me, though I found it difficult to suppress a certain di-ike, as I was about the twentieth that was to suck at this pipe; but I had scarcely put my lips to it when I drew them back burnt. I, therefore, advise every one to whom tea is presented in this manner, to take hold of the pipe with his teeth. However, the taste of the herb of Paraguay is not bad; it is boiled with sugar, and then kept hot in this vessel over charcoal; it is a sweet aromatic juice which one sips.’

In sailing from Concepcion Bay to Kamschatka, Lieut. Kotzebue touched at Cook's Bay, but he was not welcomed by the natives like La Peyrouse; on the contrary, they displayed much hostility. He sought for the large and remarkable statues on the beach, mentioned by Cook and La Peyrouse, but found nothing but a broken heap of stones, which lay near an uninjured pedestal. This change in the conduct of the natives is said to have arisen from an American captain having, in 1805, landed at Cook's Bay, and endeavoured to seize upon a number of the inhabitants:—

‘The combat is said to have been bloody, as the brave islanders defended themselves with interpidity; but they were obliged to yield to the terrible arms of the Europeans [Americans]; and twelve men and ten women fell into the merciless hands of the Americans. Upon this the poor creatures were carried on board, fettered for the first three days, and not released till they were out of sight of land. The first use that they made of their recovered liberty was, that the men jumped overboard; and the women, who attempted to follow them, were prevented only by force. The captain made the ship lie to, in hopes that they would return on board for refuge, when they were threatened by the waves. He, however, soon perceived how much he had been mistaken; for the savages, used to the water from their infancy, thought it not impossible, notwithstanding the distance of three days' voyage, to reach their native country; and at all events they preferred perishing in the waves, to leading a miserable life in captivity. After they had disputed for some time as to the direction they should take, they separated; some took the direct way to Easter Island, and others to the north. The captain, extremely enraged at this unexpected heroism, sent a boat after them, which returned after many fruitless efforts, as they always dived at the approach of the boat, and the sea compassionately received them in its bosom.’

The first discovery made by Lieut. Kotzebue was of an island, in latitude 14° 57' south, and longitude 144° 28' west, to which he gave the name of Romanzoff's Island. A chain of smaller islands was also discovered. The most considerable of these islands lying at intervals of from one hundred to two hundred fathoms, and united by small coral reefs, is about two miles; the breadth from about a quarter to half a mile; and all of them covered with the finest trees. These islands were called Kurick's chain. Lieut. Kotzebue then touched at Paphny's Island, and opened an intercourse with the natives, who, unlike the other South Sea islanders, do not tattoo themselves. But not to be quite unadorned, most of them have inflicted bloody stripes on their back and breast. They wear their hair very long, and are all naked. Some of them had suffered their finger nails to grow to the length of three inches. Two more groups of islands were discovered, to which the names of Kutusoff and Sivaroff were given.

When Lieut. Kotzebue reached Kamschatka, he made an addition to his crew of six sailors and an Aleutian, and sailed for Beering's Straits, where he discovered a safe anchoring place, to which he gave the name of Kotzebue's Sound. He thinks it calculated to afford essential advantage to the trade in furs, as they are in abundance, and recommends that the Russian government should establish some settlements on the coast of Beering's Straits, to the north.

From Kotzebue's Sound, the Kurick sailed to Oonalashka, its commander intending to pass near the east coast of Asia, and from thence to St. Lawrence's Bay. Landing here, he saw several tents of the Tchukutskoi, which were extremely dirty. The inhabitants are above the middle size, and of robust make. Several of them went on board the Kurick, and sang and danced with the sailors. When Lieut. Kotzebue landed, they went in a friendly manner to meet him, and invited him and his friends to sit down on some skins, and entertained them with a dance:—

‘Before the dance begun,’ says our voyager, ‘I gave the women some needles and beads, and the men tobacco-leaves, and the general joy was much increased by the importance of the presents. The ball now commenced with a solitude; an old dirty, frightful, ugly woman steps forward, making the most curious and certainly most fatiguing motions, with the whole body, without stirring from her position; she distorted her eyes, and made such strange grimaces as excited general laughter. The music consisted of a tambourine, and a chorus of many voices, but had few charms for an European ear. After this followed several men and women, who exhibited themselves separately; but none could equal the skill of the old woman. The conclusion of the ball was distinguished by a very particular dance: twelve women placed themselves close to each other in a half circle, turning their backs upon each other; the whole group sang, and tried to express the contents of their song by motions of the hands and body.’

While Lieut. Kotzebue continued in St. Lawrence's Bay, one of the Tchukutskoi took a pair of scissors by force from one of the sailors, and drew his knife to secure the booty; one of his countrymen, however, darted on him, and wrested his booty from him:—

‘His chief also ran up to restore order; and when I complained to him, that his people behaved very badly, he led me, instead of giving me any answer, to a circle drawn on the ground, about a fathom in diameter; here the criminal is compelled to run at a short trot always one way. This punishment is as painful as it is singular; and I do not believe that any body could run long in that manner without falling down.’

After touching at Oonalashka, Lieut. Kotzebue sailed for the Sandwich Islands, where he was kindly received by the King, Tamuhmah, at Owhyhee, and introduced to his favourite Queen, Kahumana, and two other wives. He gives a singular picture of the court:—

‘The chief employment of the royal ladies consists in smoking tobacco, combing their hair, drying away the flies on a fan, and eating. Tamahmah himself does not smoke, otherwise this custom has become so general in the Sandwich Islands, within these few years, that young children smoke before they learn to walk, and grown up people have carried it to such an excess, that they have fallen down senseless, and often died in consequence. They do not want pipe-tubes, but the pipe heads, which, according to the custom of the country, they have always hanging at their side, constitute a part of the royal ornaments; these were of the size of the largest German pipes, made of dark wood, and mounted with brass, but which only rich people can procure. Kahumanna took a few whiffs with evident pleasure; she then swallowed a part of the smoke, and emitted the rest through her nostrils. Half dizzy, she gave me the pipe, and, as I declined, she, astonished at my European stupidity, gave it to her neighbour, who, after a short enjoyment of it, gave it to the third wife. As soon as the pipe was emptied, a fresh one was filled, and went round in the same manner. The second employment of the ladies is to dress their hair, which is cut short, after their fashion; only over the forehead they let it grow a couple of inches long, smear it with a white sticky substance, and comb it back; the snow-white streaks which by this mode rise above the dark brown countenance, give it a ludicrous appearance. All the three queens were large corpulent women, who had lived to above half a century, and did not look as if they had ever been handsome. Their dress was distinguished from that of the other ladies by various silk handkerchiefs. Before the door, on a mat, was seated the King's daughter, a tolerably handsome girl; behind her stood a little negro-boy, holding a silk umbrella over her head, to protect her from the rays of the sun; two other boys, with tufts of red feathers, drove away the flies from her; the whole group had a pleasing effect. When I was about to rise, Kahumanna held me back, to inquire, with much kindness, after Vancouver, who, during his stay there, had found Tamahmah at variance with Kahumanna, and had reconciled them. She seemed much affected at the news of his death.

Lieutenant Kotzebue next visited the king's son, who had already begun to exercise the rights of his father, and, as is customary on such occasions, had received the name of Lio-Lio, that is, 'dog of all dogs; and such,' says our author, 'we really found him.' The 'dog of all dogs' was naked, and laying on his stomach; he rose lazily, and gaped stupidly on his visitors, holding a conversation respecting them, with a couple of naked chamberlains. Lieut. Kotzebue dined with the king, who drank the health of his guests in the English fashion, and indulged in wine to excess. He is a sensible man, and when he introduced his guest to the Morai, he said, 'these are our gods, whom I worship; whether I do right or wrong, I do not know; but I follow my faith, which cannot be wicked, as it commands me never to do wrong.' The king, at his dinner, is attended by one of his servants, with a spitting-tray, made of wood, in the form of a snuff-box. The royal saliva is carefully preserved, in consequence of a superstition, that so long as they are in possession of this treasure, their enemies are not able to send him any sickness by conjuration.

At Woahoo, another of the Sandwich Islands, our author was invited to dine with the Governor Kareinoku; but, when he arrived, his host was not present, but sent an apology, 'that he begged to be excused for his absence; but his lady was so very tipsy that he could not leave her.' They were, however, entertained with a Woahoo dance:—

The musicians were four men, who beat with small sticks on a hollow gourd, which produced a noise, that might serve for time to the song. Three dancers by profession, who go from one island to another, and show themselves for money, now stepped forward, entirely naked, except bracelets of hog's tusks, and half armour for the feet, made of dog's teeth. They placed themselves opposite to us, close to each other; and expressed the words to the accompanying sound by the skillful movements of the whole body. They were particularly skilful in changing their faces every moment to suit them to the motions of the body. The spectators were enraptured, and at every pause entered the circle to make presents to the dancers; and, in the end, in their enthusiasm, gave even their silk handkerchiefs. After the men had sufficiently distinguished themselves, the scene changed, and a number of young girls arranged themselves in three rows. Their heads and shoulders were tastefully ornamented with wreaths of flowers; the neck adorned with pearls and various fantastic things; besides this, they had only the lower part of their body covered with a coloured tapa. This group had a very pleasing effect, as they accompanied the monotonous music with graceful movements. The last rows conformed to the first, and always imitated the movements of the foremost dancers. The whole bore the impression of pure nature, and delighted me more than a skilfully executed European ballet. The theatre was inclosed with a fence of bamboo canes, behind which, a small house lay concealed; before it promanaded a large hog, guarded by two Kanakas, and which was stroked with much fondness by the high persons who passed by.

This hog was kept to be sacrificed to the gods, when one of the young princes first performed his sacred duties in the morai. The lance exercise is a favourite amusement at Woahoo, though seldom permitted since Tamahmah conquered the island. Lieut. Kotzebue thus describes it:—

'The day intended for the combat, is fixed before hand, that the nobles from all parts may assemble to display their courage and dexterity. There are sometimes above a hundred, who divide themselves into equal parties, and occupy a large space for the scene of combat. Both parties take their positions, and the leader of each advances to the middle of the place. These two then endeavour to hit each other with their lances, of which they have several in their hand; each of them tries to avoid the lance of his opponent by dexterous turns of the body, and both are in constant motion, springing backwards and forwards, stooping at the same time, always throwing their lances. The parties, in the mean time, stand motionless, awaiting the issue; a high spirit animates the party whose leader is victorious, which they consider as a good omen. After this prelude, both sides become animated; troop advances against troop; in a moment all is activity, and the air is full of blunted lances, for such only are allowed in this combat. Their art of war consists in breaking the lines of the enemy, in attacking single parts with superior force, and making prisoners; for this reason, a skilful leader never fails to take advantage of his opponent's mistakes, or to induce him, by a stratagem, to draw his main force to one side, and so to expose the weaker part. If these stratagems succeed, the victory is decided, and the party out-manœuvred submits. The method of proceeding in real battles is precisely the same, with this difference, that the lances are so pointed, as to pierce the enemy at a distance of ten paces; they also hurl stones in their battles, and make use of large clubs of heavy wood. As fire-arms have now been introduced, the use of lances will probably soon go out of fashion. Tamahmah is universally acknowledged to be the most skilful lance-thrower; he has often, to prove his dexterity, suffered fourteen lances to be aimed at his breast, where every throw would have been fatal, and avoided them all with the greatest dexterity. The renown of his invincible valour made the conquest of the islands easy to him. When he appeared with his fleet before Woahoo, the king of that island fled into the mountains, being convinced that the custom of putting the vanquished to death would be practised upon him. "I must die," said he to one of his confidential friends; "but not by the hands of my conqueror; for I will not let him enjoy this triumph. I will sacrifice myself to the gods." His corpse was afterwards found in a cave on the summit of a mountain.'

From the Sandwich Islands Lieut. Kotzebue sailed for Radack; and, on the 1st of January, 1817, discovered a new island, to which he gave the name of New Year's Island. It is situated in $10^{\circ} 8' N.$ latitude, and in longitude $189^{\circ} 4' W.$ The inhabitants approached the ship and bartered some goods, but would not afterwards permit the boat's crew to make a landing. In another island, in the same neighbourhood, they met with no opposition, but, on the contrary, they were well received by the inhabitants. Their leader bore a large shell horn; he was a tall well-made man, of thirty; his black hair, which was elegantly bound together upon his head, was ornamented with a wreath of white flowers, in the form of a crown. In his ear-holes, which were remarkably large, he wore rolls of tortoise-shell, ornamented with flowers; round his neck hung various gay movements; he was differently tattooed, and much more than the others. This man was called Rarik; and a portrait was taken of him, from which Lieut. Kotzebue has given a coloured engraving.

From Radack, Lieut. Kotzebue sailed to St. Lawrence Islands, and had free intercourse with the inhabitants; one of whom, called Kadu, accompanied him in his visit to several of the islands. A connected history of this native we shall give in our next number. On the island of Georgia several senos were seen, to which they approached within a distance of twenty paces:—

'The lions were engaged in a continual warfare about their mates, as they always try to appropriate several, which they commonly conquer from their neighbours by their valour. The heroes are known by the number of their females; they often lie, from eight to ten, close to each other, that their defender may be more easily protect them, and he always goes raging and roaring around them, ready at every instant, in case of an attack, as the number of lions seems to exceed that of the lionesses. They combat so furiously, that blood is seen gushing out; pieces of flesh fly about, and not seldom one of them falls down dead; in which case the victor immediately enters on the rights of the vanquished, and possesses himself of the widowed seraglio. The combat, however, lasts longer when several attack one hero; for, as soon as he is vanquished, the allies begin to quarrel among themselves, and do not cease till the most valiant has gained the victory. The roaring of these animals is beyond description; it is heard at sea during a calm, and when the wind blows from the shore, at the distance of six miles.'

When at St. Lawrence Island, Lieut. Kotzebue found his hopes of penetrating Beering's Straits blasted, on account of the ice, which extended as far as the eye could see to N. E. and then to the N. covering the whole surface of the ocean; he, therefore, determined to return, and on the 3rd of August, 1818, cast anchor in the Neva, opposite to the palace of Count Romanzoff. Here the journal of Lieut. Kotzebue terminates, in the middle of the second volume; the remainder of the work consists of the remarks of the naturalist who accompanied the expedition, on the places visited, and an Appendix, by other authors, which we shall briefly notice.

We cannot here avoid remarking, that of all voyages round the world, this of Lieut. Kotzebue appears to have been the least fruitful in discovery. We say this without meaning the slightest imputation on the talents of the enterprising voyager, which were strikingly displayed in his navigating so successfully in the great ocean, among low coral islands and reefs, which render it extremely difficult. To us it appears that Lieut. Kotzebue was more anxious to discover new islands, however unimportant, which he might honour with the harsh names of his adopted countrymen, than to verify former discoveries. It has even been denied that he has made any new discoveries, and said that the islands which he claims as such, have been known and mentioned under other names by preceding navigators; we think him, however, clearly intitled to all the honour he claims, and as he has evinced the necessary qualifications for the task, we hope he may again be sent to explore the great ocean so often traversed during the last half century.

We have hitherto confined our review to the journal of the voyage, and we now turn to other matters connected with it. In the 'Remarks and Opinions' of M. Chamisso, the naturalist of the expedition, we meet with the following singular anecdote:—

'About the year 1800, Tamaahmah, (King of the Sandwich Islands) on occasion of the birth of a son, invented quite a new language, and began to introduce it. The newly invented words were not related to any roots of the current language, nor derived from any of them; even the particles, which supply the grammatical forms, and are the connectives of the discourse, were transformed in a similar manner. It is said, that some powerful chiefs, who were displeased at this metamorphosis, destroyed the child who caused it, by poison. At his death, the enterprise which had been undertaken at his birth, was abolished. The old language was again adopted, and the new one forgotten.

M. Chamisso has given an ingenious disquisition on the language or dialects of the islands in the Great Ocean, with an extensive vocabulary of those of Chamori, Eap, Ulea, and Radack. He does not confine his remarks to the new discoveries, but extends them to Teneriffe, Brazil, Chili, California, the Philippine and Sandwich Islands, Kamtschatka, &c. &c.

Of the inhabitants of Radack, we are told, that they are slender but well built, and healthy, and of a darker colour than the people of Owhyee. Both sexes wear their long beautiful black hair neatly and elegantly tied up behind:—

'Men and women wear, in their pierced ear-lappets, a rolled pandanus leaf. The roll for the men is three inches in diameter, and for women, only half. It is sometimes covered by a very thin plate of tortoise-shell. Some older people had, besides, pierced the upper edge of the ear, to put flowers through.

'The skilful elegant tattooing, differs according to the sex; in each it is uniform. For the men, it forms over the shoulder and breast, a triangle, pointing to the navel, which consists of several variously combined stripes; similar well disposed horizontal stripes occupy the back and the stomach. With the women, only the arms and the shoulders are tattooed. Besides this regular designing, which is only executed when they grow up, and is wanting in very few, they have all, when children, groups of designs or stripes tattooed over their hips and arms, but more seldom in the face. Amongst these drawings, we sometimes observed the figure of the Roman cross. The place tattooed is very dark, drawn sharply and raised above the skin.

'The dress of the men consists in a girdle, with bast straps hanging down, to which is often added, a smaller square mat as an apron; boys go quite naked till they have arrived at manhood. The women wear two longer mats, fastened with a string over the hips; the girls wear, very early, a small apron.

'The Iru or Chiefs are frequently distinguished by their large stature, never by immoderate corpulency. The tattooing in them generally extends over those parts of the body which are not tattooed in common people, the sides, the hips, the necks, and the arms.

'The houses of the Radackers consist only of a roof, supported on four posts with a hanging floor. They are only high enough to admit a person to sit under them. You climb through a square opening into the upper room, which contains all their little property. They sleep on this floor or in the open space below; and several open huts, of the form of a tent, round about, serve as separate sleeping apartments. The roofs are of cocoa or pandanus leaves; the floor is strewn with very fine fragments of coral and shells, which are found on shore. Only a coarse mat serves for a bed, and a block of wood for a pillow.

The fruit of the wild pandanus forms the chief food of the Radackers, who are described as an amiable people, that treat strangers with hospitality, and never become importunate or troublesome:—

‘Every where,’ says M. Chamisso, ‘we met the picture of peace among an infant people; we saw new plantations, advancing cultivation, many children growing up, with a small population; the affectionate attention of the fathers for their offspring, pleasing unaffected manners, equality in the intercourse between chiefs and other men, no servility to the more powerful, and with greater poverty and less self-assurance, none of those vices which disgrace the people of the more eastern Polynesia.’

‘The inhabitants of Radack adore an invisible God in Heaven, and offer him a simple tribute of fruits, without temples and without priests.’

‘Marriages depend on a free convention, and may be dissolved as they are concluded. A man may have several wives. The woman is the companion of the man, and seems freely and voluntarily to submit to him, in a just relation to the head of the family. In their wanderings, the men go on before as protectors, and the women follow. When any subject is discussed, the men speak first; the women, when called upon, take a share in the conversation, and attention is paid to them.’

The bond of exclusive friendship between two men, which is found in all the islands of the first province in Radack, obliges the friend to give his wife to his friend, but does not bind him to seek for revenge by blood:—

‘We mention with hesitation, alas which Kadu ascribed to urgent want, and the sterility of the miserably earth. Every mother is allowed to bring up only three children; yet fourth and every succeeding one she is obliged to bury alive, herself. The families of the chiefs are not subjected to his barbarity. Natural children are brought up in the same manner as the legitimate. When they are able to walk, the father takes them to himself. When the father recognizes the child, the mother keeps it; when the mother dies, another woman takes care of the child.

‘The corpses of the deceased are enrouled round with strings, in a sitting posture. The chiefs are buried on the islands. A large square space, surrounded with large stones, marks the place, under palms, on the inner shore. They treat in the same manner their enemies fallen in battle, according to their rank. A staff fixed in the ground, with annular incisions, marks the grave of the children who were not allowed to live. We have ourselves seen both kinds of graves.’

The same customs with regard to the burial of the dead, are observed at Ulea and the islands lying more east. M. Chamisso, in an examination of the disputed geographical problems, relative to these parts, is of opinion, that the two continents of Asia and America are separated; and he considers the north-east cape not to be an isthmus which unites both quarters of the globe, but merely a promontory of Asia; but he does not attach any belief to an open north polar sea.

Jerusalem Delivered. Book the Fourth. From the Italian of Tasso; bringing the Specimen of an intended New Translation in English Spenserian Verse; with a Prefatory Dissertation on existing Translations. By J. H. Wiffen. 8vo. pp. 96. London, 1821.

It has long been a subject of regret among the admirers of Tasso, that he has never possessed a translator worthy of him, and that the English reader lost the principal beauties of the bard of Mantua, frittered away as they were in the insipid version of Hoole. It is true that Fairfax's translation was much superior, but, until its recent republication, it was by no means frequently met with even in good libraries. Fairfax's is, however, a very unequal performance; and he passes from the sublime to the ridiculous at a single step. This is partly owing to the age in which he lived, when a fondness for proverbial conceits was general. Carew's Godfrey of Bulloigne, written nearly at the same time as Fairfax's translation, is much inferior to it. Several other authors commenced versions of this great poem, among whom was Gray, whose translation of a fragment of the fourteenth book displays great felicity of language and purity of taste. It, as Mr. Wiffen elegantly observes in his Dissertation, ‘like some solitary marble column, beautified with immortality, speaks eloquently to the imagination, attesting what the finished structure would have been in magnificence and grace.’

It remained for the present age, however, to do Tasso that justice which his admirable poem demanded.

Mr. Hunt, who published a translation of the ‘Jerusalem Delivered’ about three years ago, far surpassed all who had preceded him in the same track. It is to be regretted that this gentleman has written in couplets instead of stanzas, so well adapted to an heroic poem, and that he has been somewhat diffusive; these may by some be deemed venial faults, or no faults at all, but they are, we believe, the only ones to be attributed to his translation, which is faithful, vigorous, and elegant.

Mr. Wiffen, who although a young bard, occupies no unimportant niche in the temple of poetic fame, and of whom we have more than once spoken very highly, had commenced his translation of Tasso before Mr. Hunt's work appeared; and we are glad that he had the courage to pursue it. He has adopted the Spenserian stanza as the happiest measure and the best adapted to the romantic spirit that pervades the ‘Jerusalem Delivered.’ In this, we doubt not, most readers will agree with him, particularly when they see the success with which he has applied it in the fourth book, which is now published as a specimen. Avoiding equally a slavish and verbal fidelity, and that license which often loses all similarity to the prototype, Mr. Wiffen has endeavoured to make his work ‘less a copy than a twin.’ He has transfused much of the genius and spirit of the original in his own elegant and harmonious version; and that it is neither deficient in vigour or dignity, let the following stanzas bear witness. They are descriptive of Lucifer, and his passionate harangue to his synod of fallen angels:—

‘There was a majesty in his fierce face
That deepening others' fears, increased his pride;
His eyes were bloodshot, and instinct with rays,
That like a baleful comet, far and wide,
Diffused a venomous splendour, which out-vied
The fascinating snake's; barbarous and hoar
His grand beard swept his breast, and, gaping
Charybdis on the Sicil shore,
Yawned his terrific jaws, besmeared with foaming gore.
‘His breath was like those sulphurous vapours born
In thunder, stench, and the live shot-star's light,
When red Vesuvius showers, by earthquakes torn,
O'er sleeping Naples in the dead of night,
Funeral sales: whilst he spoke, affright
Hushed howling Cerberus, Ceto'so's shriek;
Cocytus paused in his lamenting dirge;
The abysses trembled; horror chilled each chek;

And these the words they heard the shouting giant speak.

"PRINCES OF HELL! but worthier far to fill

In Heaven, whence each one sprang, his diamond throne,

Ye! who with me were hurled from the blest hill,

Where glorious as the morning star we shone,

To range these frightful dungeons—ye have known

The ancient jealousies and fierce disdain Which goaded us to battle,—overthrown

We are judged rebels, and besieged with pains,

Whilst o'er his starry domes the happy victor reigns.

"And for th' ethereal air, serene and pure, The golden sun, and starry spheres, his hate

Hus lock'd us in this bottomless obscure, Forbidding bold ambition to translate

Our spirits to their first divine estate. Then, ah the bitter thought! 'tis this which stings me to madness,—did he not create The vile worm man, that thing of reptile clay, To fill our vacant seats in those blue fields of day?

"Nor this sufficed; to spite us more, he gave

His only son, his darling, to the dead. He came; he burst the portals of the grave;

Compassed our kingdoms with audacious tread;

The spirits in torment doomed to us, he led Back to the skies—his richly-ransomed

throne;

And, in our teeth, Hell's conquered ensigns spread,

Aboard on Heaven's bright battlements up-bung,

The whilst ten thousand saints loud alleluiahs sung.

"But why renew afflictions too severe By numbering up the wrongs already known?

When, and on what occasion did ye hear He paused in wrath, and left his works undone?

No more o'er past indignities I run, But present injuries and future shame—

Must we slight these? Alas! we cannot shun

The consciousness that now his hated aim Is the wide nations round from darkness to reclaim.

"What! shall we pass in sloth the days and hours,

Cherish no wrath-born lightnings in our veins,

But leave his principalities and powers To reap fresh laurels on the Asian plains?

To lend Judah in their servile chains, And spread his worshipped name from clime to clime?

Sound it in other tongues, in other strains! And on fresh columns sculpture it sublime,

To teach a future age, and mock almighty Time?

"And must our glorious idols be o'er-thrown?

Our altars change to his? our temples nod? Gold, incense, vows, be paid to him alone?

And Baal bow before the shrine of God? In the high groves where erst we made abode

Must pure, nor claim, nor smoke remain?

And shall the myriad spirits who bestowed Tribute on us, that tribute now disdain,

And o'er dispeopled realms abandoned Pluto reign?

"No! for our essences are yet the same, The same our pride, our prowess, and our

power;

As when with sharp steel and engirding flame,

In godlike battle we withstood the flower Of heaven's archangels; we in evil hour

Were foiled, I grant, but smiling chance, not skill,

Made them victorious—still we scorned to cover;

The fire of glory—timelessness of will, Burnt it not in our hearts? does it not burn there still?

"Then longer why delay! arise, take wing,

My hope, my strength, my sweet familiars, fly;

Plagues and swift ruin on these Christians bring,

Ere reinforced by any fresh ally; Haste! quench the spreading flame of cli-

valry,

Ere in its blaze Judea all unites; Your arts exert, your upstart-arms play;

Enter as will among their armed knights, Now practice open force, and now use secret sleights.

"Let what I will be fate! give some to troil

In exile, some in battle to be slain; Let some abandoned to a lawless love,

Make woman's smiles and frowns their joy and pain,

And brilliant eyes their idols; let some sustain Their swords in civil strife; let some engage

In crimes against their king; let murder reign

With treason, rage with murder, hate with rage;

So perish all—priest, king, page, noble, serf, and sage!"

We always admired Mr. Hunt's translation of Tasso's beautiful picture of the lovely Armida, and Mr. Wiffen's version is equally happy:—

"Never did Greece or Italy behold

A form so fancy and to taste more dear! At times, the white veil dims her locks of gold,

At times, in bright relief they re-appear: Thus, when the stormy skies begin to clear,

Now through transparent clouds the sunshine gleams,

Now, issuing from its shrine, the gorgeous

Shore Lights up the vales, flowers, mountains,

leaves, and streams,

With a diviner day—the spirit of bright beams.

"New ringlets form the flowing winds amid

The natural curls of her rependent hair; Her blue eyes, rolled beneath its shadowing lid,

Locks up its wealth with more than miser

care;

The rival roses upon cheeks more fair

Than morning light, each other's claims oppose,

But on her lips, whose breath the love-sick

air

Wooes for its violet scent, the crimson rose,

Its whole voluptuous bloom in crowned domi-

non throws.

"Ripe as the grape just mellowing into wine

Her bosom swells to sight; its lily breasts,

Smooth, soft, and sweet, like alabaster shine,

Part bare, part bid by her embroidered vests;

Whose jealous fringe the greedy eye arrests,

But leaves its fond imaginations free,

To sport, like doves, in those delicious nests,

And their most shadowed aceries to see;

Peopling with beautiful dreams the lively phantasy.

"As through the waters of a crystal spring,

Blue with excessive depth, the sunbeam

darts,

Cleaving the still glass with its gorgeous

viege,

It leaves no wrinkle on the wave it parts:

So, noiseless, Fancy dives in virgin's hearts

Through vestures as untrussed, to explore

Their amiable secrets, their shining arts,

And the mind's cells, whence Love his golden ore

Draws to illume desire, and charm us more and more."

The corresponding passage to the second stanza above quoted, is thus given by Mr. Hunt:—

"In native curls her waving ringlets flow,

Yet added curls the breathing fangs bestow;

Her eye was fix'd upon herself alone,

As greedy of Love's treasures, and its own;

Glow'd on her cheek the rose's purple light,

Though soften'd by the blending ivory's white;

But on her lips, whence breezy fragrance,

In all its genuine lustre, bloom'd the rose."

The arts used by Armida, while in the camp, are described with much knowledge of human nature:

"All arts th' enchantress practised to be-

guile

Some new admirer in her well-spread snare,

Nix used with all, nor always the same while,

But shaped to every taste her grace and air:

Here cloistered is her eye's dark pupil, there

In full voluptuous languishment is rolled;

Now these her kindness, those her anger

bear,

Spurred on or checked by bearing frank or cold,

As she perceived her slave was scrupulous or bold.

"If she marked some too bashful to advance,

Sick if unnoticed, diffident if seen,

First flew her beautiful smile, her thrilling

glance,

Sunny as summer and as spring serene:

Thus reassured, their dying hopes grew keen;

The faint mistrose, the languishing desire

Reviving brighten in their eager men;

Those looke a thousand amorous thoughts inspire.

And Fear's pale frost-work melts in Fancy's lively fire.

"If some made bold to press her virgin palm,

Too rashly building on her former charms,

She grew a miser of her eye's blue charms,

Spared her fond smile, and frowned them into fear;

But through the wrath that fired her first anxiety,

And ruffled her sweet cheek, they might discern

Rays of forgiving pity reappear;

Thus do they drop, but not despair, and yearn

Towards her in deepest love when she appears most stern."

Through all these shifting tempers whilst each knight

Fluctuates disturbed, uncertain of her choice,
Through fire and frost, smiles, tears, fear,
hope, delight,

The benevolent witch their agony enjoys:

If any one presumes with trembling voice
To tell his secret pain, her guilefulness
The glorious vision of his soul destroys;
Sbe nor perceives his meaning, nor can guess—

The very fold of Love and girlish simpleness.

* Or shiding down her eyes, the blood's warm brightness

In roshing crimson o'er her features flowed,
Irradiating with fire their ivory whiteness,
That all her visage like Aurora's showed,
When in the first dawn on her eastern road
She flies the' embrace of Titan, and in shame
Extinguishes the star,—whilst anger glow'd
Yet deeper on her cheek, a flower of flame,
Beside whose rosy hue, all rosiness tooks tame,

* If she perceives one hastening to avow
His mournful flame, she stops her charmed ears;

Now shuns his converse, grants an audience
now,
Then flies, returns, smiles, frowns, and disappears.

Thus in a war of wishes, sighs, and tears,
In vain pursuit he wastes his life away;
And with deluding hopes, afflicting fears,
Fares like the hunter who at dying day
Has lost in lonely woods all traces of his prey—

* These were the arts by which Armida took
A thousand spirits captive to her sleight,
Or rather these the arms, with which she strook,

And made them bondslaves in their own despite.

What marvel e'er Love subdued the might
Of Theseus' lance, and Hercules the strong,
When those who drew the sword in Jove's right,

Thral'd to a wanton's tears—a syren's song, Wore his enfolding chains, and gloried in the wrong!"

Should this specimen of a new translation of Tasso's work be as well received as we anticipate, Mr. Wiffen will publish the whole very shortly.
We look forward to it with some degree of confidence; and although he has selected the fourth book as best suited for a specimen, on account of its singleness of action, yet we must wait for some of the later books, which are equal in poetic merit and superior in interest, before we give that decided opinion of Mr. Wiffen's success which the beauty of the sample before us has almost seduced us to anticipate.

Observations, chiefly in Reply to Remarks made in Parliament during the last Session, on the Subject of Guvernment Clerks. By a Clerk.
Svo. pp. 78. London, 1821.

IT will be in the recollection of such of our readers as pay attention to the proceedings of Parliament, that, among the various plans of economy and retrenchment talked of during the last session, one was a reduction in the salaries of government clerks. Indeed, one of the ministers stated, that a reduction of salaries in all the departments of the public service, was under the consideration of government. This assertion called forth remarks in favour of the measure from several members, particularly Lord Milton, Mr. Hume, Mr. W. Burrell, and Mr. Creevey, who argued it on several grounds,—as, that clerks should make sacrifices as well as landholders,—that provisions were cheaper, and, therefore, less salary necessary,—that clerks were better paid than military officers,—that government did not require gentlemen for clerks,—and, lastly, that if the clerks felt themselves aggrieved, they might give up their places.

It is in reply to these several arguments, (if they deserve the name,) and in opposition to the measure generally, that the pamphlet before us is written.
The author combats with much force,
all that has been said in favour of reducing the salaries of clerks, first denying the right of government to do so,
and then showing, that if they possess the right, justice and policy would equally forbid the exercise of it. Some of his arguments are of great force, and well worthy the consideration of the legislature, and particularly such members of it as labour to save 2000l. out of an expenditure of fifty millions, and that, too, by decreasing the comforts or encroaching on the necessities of a few junior clerks. This able advocate of the clerks, in denying the right of the government to reduce their salaries, thus reasons:—

'These persons, [government clerks] on entering upon their several duties, have,
for the greater number, found, that by the settled, positive, and determinate rule of their respective offices, they were entitled to certain salaries, subject to an addition in proportion to the length of service spent by them in those offices, as well as to certain allowances, guaranteed by 50 George 3, cap. 117, in case, after fixed periods, they were desirous of retiring from their stations. Now, have we not here a vested interest,—as clear and defined a vested interest as it is possible to possess? How then, I ask, can such a property, with fairness, be knocked on the head? When a person enters a government office, he resolves on sacrificing the first and best years of his existence, to forego every other possible chance of rising in fortune—for what, can it be supposed? for the puny salary which, at his onset, scarcely allows of his putting foot into his mouth?—impossible. For what then? I demand; for the certainty of the employment; for the certainty of finding, in due time, an increase of revenue; for the certainty of that increase being to a certain extent; for the certainty, should life be spared, of being able to retire, in age or sickness, on a certain allowance; for the advantages, it is true, of the present, but more, as it is seen, for those in the womb of time. These are the inducements which prompt a man to dispose of his talents and labour to government; and, for the due execution of the contract on the part of government, he relies on the good faith of the country, on acts of Parliament, on that inward feeling, which tells him, that the solemn, the deliberate, the prudent determinations of one set of ministers, will not be wantonly kicked down by another set, and, still less, kicked down by those very ministers themselves; that the decision of to-day will be the decision of to-morrow; that the rule of the Monday will stand good for the Saturday; and that ex post facto laws are not of the soil of England. These have hitherto formed the clerks' sheet anchor; and is his hold at once to be shivered to atoms, because a short-sighted policy points him out, at the present hour, for destruction? If, after having conferred rights on certain offices,—rights, let it not be forgotten, which probably induced most of those persons, who are now in them, to engage themselves; if, after having legislatively conferred rights, those rights are, with impunity, to be torn in tatters; where, I beg to know, is the security which any man in the kingdom can have for the value of one obole of his property. Does not the right to an estate rest on the same right as that right which has been conferred by act of the legislature on the clerks? And will not the same power which destroys the one lay its iron grasp, if it pleases, on the other?

—Is this the tenor by which property in England is henceforward to be held.
Whenever any of the princely sinecures enjoyed by certain great and potent lords, have come under the consideration of Parliament, has it not been an acknowledged principle, that not even the fractional part of a farthing could be taken from the present possessors, and that, were the sinecures entailed on a hundred lives, the same due regard to justice would be adopted towards them all. If it be desirous to remunerate the clerks employed in the offices of government, differently from the rate at present followed, there could assuredly be neither impropriety nor illiberality in legislating for the future; but, for the individuals, who, at this day, find themselves in the service of the state; men who have devoted their time under different ideas, under other bargains, (whether profitable or not for the country it was the government's business, at the time of concluding them, to determine;) surely such men, however humble they may be, ought no more to find their rights invaded than the high and mighty seignior, or any other holder of property in the kingdom. Had the clerks been in receipt of large emoluments, arising from fines or fees of any description, the growth of the war and of the war alone, there would, indeed, be some semblance of justice in withdrawing, during the peace, that which but for the war would not have existed; but this supposition is no wise the case with the clerks, and there remains, consequently, in reality, no better reason for squeezing them than that their poverty and nakedness court the attack of the hungry and the powerful.

* Much has been urged of late respecting the distresses of the country; they may be great: can, however, the evils of which we complain, be got rid of or lessened by the commission of any signal act of severity, on the very persons who so largely participate in the privations to which those distresses give rise, as do the clerks; yet much, generally speaking, as the little comforts of the clerks have, of late years, been abridged, I am willing to allow, that even they could, with justice, be called on to surrender a portion of their property. Yes, the case does exist in which, were it under operation, the present mode of clerks, notwithstanding their rights, ought to be made to experience a reduction in their salaries,—I allude to the case of shipwreck.

* If England can no longer satisfy the just demands of her creditors, her creditors, like all other creditors, must be content with a composition, and, in case of that event, I know of no reason why clerks should be paid in full, whilst their equals are compelled to give for a part a complete and perfect quittance; if that black day of reckoning has, indeed, arrived, or is to arrive, the clerks ought and must suffer in common with every class of people, for bankruptcies admit not of preferences; but, until government has declared itself insolvent; until the country has been positively and decidedly told that it can no longer afford to be honourable, that it can no longer afford to pay twenty shillings in the pound to fair claimants, I take it to be as clear as the sun at noon-day, that impartial justice can never assimilate with that principle which goes to deprive the labourer of his hire, and, by silencing the clamour of one party, work the downfall of another;—a principle which, happily for England, has never yet been openly avowed or acted upon within the limit of her empire; a principle which, whatever may be the clerks' fate, would, if once recognized, annihilate, at a blow, the very contract which binds society together, and which would cause, in ten seconds, ten million-fold more of real mischief and misery to ensue, than ever the dirty parings of a few score scribblers' salaries could effectuate of good in the course of ten centuries.

ries. Thus much for the abstract right which government has to withdraw from the clerks any portion of those salaries which the government itself decreed to them.

We confess ourselves friends of economy and retrenchment, but it is not to the salaries of clerks that we should look for either; and we would barely hint to some of our most busy members, that the money spent in printing useless papers, which they frequently call for, amounts to treble the sum they could obtain by any reduction in the salaries of clerks.

Memoirs of the History of Scotland, from the Restoration of King Charles the Second, A. D. 1660. By Sir George Mackenzie, of Rosehaugh, Knt. 4to. pp. 332. Edinburgh, 1821.

THE MS. from which these Memoirs are printed, is said to have been rescued from the hands of one of those foes to literature, a retail shop-keeper, in Edinburgh. Fortunately, the grocer dipped into the bundle of papers he purchased before he consigned them to the base purposes of wrapping up his soap and sugar, and finding a small quarto MS. bound in vellum, handed it to Dr. McCre, who transferred it to Mr. Thomson, of the Register Office, Edinburgh, who has now given it to the public.

Singular as this story appears, yet we have no doubt of the genuineness of the work, which contains a narrative of events relating to Scotland, from 1660 to 1663, and then, after a lapse of six years, it is resumed again, and continued from 1669 to 1679.

Sir George Mackenzie, who was Lord Advocate in 1677, was the author of several works on the laws and antiquities of Scotland, some elegant Latin compositions, particularly the tract intitled 'Idea eloquentie forensis,' and 'Characteres quorundam apud Scotos adnotorum.' He also wrote a volume of Moral Essays. Of his qualifications for an historian, Sir George seems to have been fully sensible, as he declares 'that no man hath writ an history who knew more intimately the designs, and observed more narrowly all the circumstances of those actions he sets down, than myself; having being either actor in or witness to all the transactions which I mention.' Although this work does not bring forward any new facts of much importance, yet we consider it as one of those collateral aids to history, which should not be disregarded. We shall make two desultory extracts to shew its style and character. The first relates to the acts of the first session of the Scottish Parliament after the restoration:—

* The Protector had, to maintain his tyranny over Scotland, built four citadels in it, with much art and expense; one in Air, a second at Leith, a third at Perth, a fourth at Inverness; and had planted them with English garrisons. These had till now been continued, by the mediation of Chancellor Hyde, who retained some fear that Scotland was yet too fanatic to be trusted to their own loyalty; and with him Duke Albemarle concurred, to gratify the officers and soldiers who had serv'd under him, and were yet under his command; and these two had led Middleton, then Commissioner, into the same belief, who likewise thought fit to have them as a guard to his authority here. But at the constant intreaties of the Earl of Lauderdale, who represented that Scotland had now manifested their aversion from these former rebellious principles, they were removed; and the citadels themselves dismantl'd, seeing his majesty had no revenues to maintain garrisons in them; and, if they had been kept empty, they might have proved so many defenses for such as intended to rebel. The materials and ground whereupon they were built, were bestowed in this manner:—Air was disposed to the Earl of Eglington, who, thereafter, employed the same to the manufactory of cloth, newly erected there; Perth, to the magistrates of the town; Inverness, to the Earl of Murray; and Leith, to the Earl of Lauderdale, with the privilege of erecting it in a burgh of regality; which he did, to force the magistrates of Edinburgh to buy it from him; for he boasted to settle a trade there which would break theirs: to prevent which, Sir Andrew Ramsay, provost of Edinburgh, did thereafter induce the town to buy it at the rate of 5000 lib. sterling; and this was the foundation of his court with Lauderdale, who hated him formerly as one who waited entirely on the Earl of Middleton.

* Thus Scotland was entirely freed from the English soldiers and garrisons; and Lauderdale, upon this account, deserved well of his country, and magnified himself in it as a great testimony of his love for Scotland; and to evidence his affection the more, he did, in presence of his majesty, sit down and kiss the warrant with great demonstrations of joy. But this excessive boasting, that he had prevailed in this over Hyde, Middleton, and all the English, did somewhat contribute to renew the old discords which had formerly been entertained betwixt the nations; and occasioned the making of those severe acts, whereby the Parliament of England debar'd the Scots from freedom of trade in their plantations, and from enjoying the benefit of natives in the privilege of shipping.

'The Parliament of Scotland, taking to their consideration how much and how unjustly this kingdom was injured, by an suspension cast upon it for the transactions at Newcastle in anno 1647, at which time the King was delivered to the Parliament of England; which was called, in some histories, a selling of the king; did, by an express act, condemn and reprobate all that that easy, and declare that the same was no national act, but was only carried on by some rebels, who had falsely assumed the name of a parliament. Nor wanted there many even in that Parliament, who protested against all that procedure, and who had the courage and honesty to cause registrate that protestation. And I must here crave leave to expostulate with our neighbours of England, for inveighing so severely against our nation, for delivering up their king; seeing he was only delivered up to their Parliament, who first imprisoned, and thereafter murdered him: whereas how soon even our rebels discovered their design, they carried into England a splendid and mighty army for his defence; and when his murderer came to their ears, they proclaimed his son their king, and sent commissioners to treat with him, and bring him home to Scotland; and when he was arrived, they did contribute their lives and fortunes for his safety. And, albeit, some bigot presbyterians did use him unkindly, out of too much kindness to their own principles; yet even these did very generously oppose Cromwell, and such as had murdered their king: as is clear by the attack made by General Major Montgomery, at Musselburgh, and by the Remonstrators at Linlithgow. They fought also two battles for him at Dunbar and Worcester; and suffered the greatest hardships imaginable. After which, first the Earl of Glencairn, and then the Earl of Middleton, did keep the fields under his display'd banner; nor did ever his majesty want some Scots to stand in arms for him in Scotland, till it pleased God, in return of this loyalty, to make them the great instruments of encouraging General Monk, in his bringing home the king; having offered to assist him with their lives and fortunes against Lambert, and saving contributed three months' cessper allowance, for payment of his armies. And so remarkable was our loyalty to the world and amongst strangers, that his majesty was always called King of Scots; and it was believed and presumed in all places where our nation travelled, whether in England or beyond sea, that a Scot was still a royalist.'

The work contains some very acute reflections on the union between England and Scotland, and on the state of parties, religious as well as political. Of the fanatics of his day, he says,—

'These irreligious and heterodox books called "Nepthali" and "Jus populi," ad made the killing of all dissenters on presbytery seem not only lawful, but even a duty, amongst many of that profession; and in a postscript to "Jus populi," it was told, that the sending of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's head to the king, would be the best present that could be made to Jesus Christ. Animated by which principles, one Master James Mitchell, a profligate fellow, who, for scandal and ill-nature, had been thrown out of the Laird of Dundas's house, where he serv'd as chaplain, did, in July 1668, watch to kill that Archbishop; till wearied with want of opportunities, he at last shot at him, in his own coach, upon the publick street, and at the foot of his stairs. But Providence so order'd it that he miss'd him, but shot the Bishop of Orkney, who was in the coach with him, leaving the small leads in his arm; of which wound he languish'd till his death. Mitchell having in the crowd escap'd, every man running to the Archbishop, he lurk'd that night in the garden that belonged to the Lord Oxenford, in the Cowgate, and from thence, pursu'd by his own conscience, fled to Holland; but was, by Divine Providence, which design'd him for a sacrifice, instigated to come home; where, being taken at a burial, he deny'd the fact, albeit the pistol was taken about him; and being brought to the Council in February, 1674, he was referred to a Committee; but desiring to speak with the Chancellor, and he having taken him in to another room, he fell upon his knees, and confess'd the whole matter, without asking either life or promise of any favour. When his lordship return'd, Sir John Nisbet, who was then Advocate and one of the Committee, prest that he might sign his confession; which he did, and renew'd his confession before the Council, the Duke of Lauderdale, then Commissioner, being present without interceding for his life on either of these occasions. Whereupon the Council, who were jealous that he might retract his confession, order'd him to be pursu'd criminally; having only design'd to cut off his right hand, if he should adhere to his confession. But he, being persuaded that extrajudicial confession was not binding, re-fus'd; whereupon the Council declar'd, that he had forfeited any promise that was made to him; and being sent prisoner to the Bass, he continu'd there till December, 1677; at which time new discoveries having been made of a design to kill the Archbishop, Sir George Mackenzie, his Majesty's Advocate, was ordain'd to proceed against him; and a libel being given him, founded upon the 4 Act of 1671 part. Ja. 6. whereby the invading Privy Counsellors' death, Sir George Lockhart was, at his lord advocate's earnest desire, appointed to plead for him: and he having rais'd an exculpation, in which he offer'd to prove that, if he emitted any confession, it was upon promise of life et epetencia, this was admitted to his probation: and having led the Duke of Lauderdale, the Chancellor, Hatten, and some others, they all depon'd, that they knew of no promise given antecedently to his confession, and so he could not be said to have confest upon promise of life: after which, his advocates desiring that the Act of Council might be read for proving their exculpation, that was justly refus'd, because no man can make use both of wit and witnesses; and the truth was, that the Act of Council, being posterior to the confession, could not prove that the confession was emitted upon promise of life; and that act design'd to annul the confession, and so could not be made use of for asstructing it. Probation being thus fail'd, and his majesty's advocate having spoke to the assise, Sir George Lockhart refus'd to speak for Mitchell, being unwilling to offend Lauderdale; for which many blam'd him in this, as they did his management of the process in not adducing the Act of Council first: and the assise (Jan. 9, 1678) having all in one voice found the pannel guilty, he was hang'd, railing against the king and the council, without any contrition for his personal sins.

'The fanatics continuing still their insolencies, to that height that the orthodox clergy were forced to abandon their churches and homes, and fresh intelligence coming daily of their preparations to rebel, even from the Lord Dundonald, a most cautious privy councillor, and from the President of the Session, who always favour'd them, the Duke of Lauderdale thought it his duty to inform the king of the whole scheme of affairs, and of some offers made by the Earl of Atholl, Marr, and others, of bringing out their Highlanders, to repress their designs, before they were ripen'd into a rebellion. For it was most easy for two or three conventions, by joining together, to make an army of ten thousand men, to whom all of that persuasion would probably gather; against whom, the king could only oppose his own standing forces, not exceeding fifteen hundred in all: nor could his majesty probably expect great assistance from the militia, which consists of commons much inclin'd to that opinion, the heritors also being inclin'd to the party. In return to which, the king wrote a letter, commanding an host to be rais'd and led into the west, where they should take free quarter from such as refus'd to secure the peace: but yet, to make (Oct. 27) the western shires more inexcusable, this letter was direct to the Earls of Glencairn and Dundonald, and the Lord Ross, to be communicated to them.'

As Mr. Thomson has discovered a very laudable spirit, in bringing these Memoirs before the public, we regret that he has almost rendered them a 'sealed book,' by the limited number of copies, which, we understand, he has printed, and by the high price at which the work has been published.

LIFE,

AS DISPLAYED IN THE SOJOURNINGS OF
LOFTUS GREY.

Collected, Methodized, and Conglomerated,
By W. B. L.

CHAP. III.

A FEW minutes' conversation, as we moved from the spot to which we had thus been drawn, was sufficient for the formation of such an acquaintance as a staid Quaker maiden of sixteen could properly contract, or as a smitten youth of less grave conceits could in any conscience desire. We soon became acquainted with each other's life, birth, and parentage, and the known neighbourhood of our dwellings and the probability of future rencontre removed all hesitation and restrictions from our discourse. The 'material' of her history was pithy and concise, and might have racked the inventive faculties of an ordinary novelist. Her father was engaged in some mercantile speculations on the Continent, she waited his return in the family of some friends and distant relatives, and her name was Mary Prendergast.

It required no very mighty stretch of wit to imagine that these same friends and relatives might possibly experience some tender apprehensions, touching the exact fitness of a young girl's appointment with a person whose gratitude was of so ardent a nature, and I therefore requested, as a personal and still more signal favour, that she would forbear to mention the occurrence of an accident so light and trivial as that which had just happened, and to allow me the enjoyment of that exquisite feeling, in placing into her own hands, with renewed acknowledgments, the handkerchief for which I and my dog felt such inextinguishable gratitude!! 'I know not,' she said, 'if in this meeting thee again, and in such a place, I be doing a proper thing—if it be unseemly, I pray thee to urge not what I should avoid.'—I brushed up all the logic I was master of at this appeal to my prudence, and with the assistance of heaven and a few lucky principles of reasoning and qualities of syllogism, which neither she nor I rightly understood, happily blended in a sweet variety of moods, simple, conjunctive, complex, and compound, succeeded in proving, that, so far from unfitting, it was, in point of truth and legitimate reasoning, not only an excusable act, but an absolute and imperative duty, the non-performance of which was to entail divers griefs, and be productive of sundry consequences, much to be deprecated and deplored!

She could not say a word.

But, ah! how in speaking of my beloved Mary, can the pen describe a levity of language that so belies the aching of the heart which directs it. How can a light idea be expressed, when every one that is connected with the remembrance of her, should seem with woe and sorrow.

We met again, and again, and again, and soon, too soon, alas! I wrought her young heart into the purest love that ever dwelt in woman. Dear girl! she loved me long, long ere she dreamed of such a passion; and when I at length pressed upon her the fervour of my own feelings, when I openly avowed the existence of the most ardent attachment that the soul could experience, and urged her to the confession of her own, she blushed, and was surprised, and trembled, and said not a word. Oh! how touching was that maiden bashfulness, how glowingly depicted that purity and innocence, as she yielded to my warm intreaties, to my devoted protestations, to my solemn oath of eternal affection; how blessed, how far ever blessed, that moment, as she told me in the silent voice of her blue eye, so did she love me, too.

Why should I detail the pleasures which were then experienced. Nay, I could not, I could not describe that joyousness of heart, that feeling of delight, that fire of gladness which thrilled through every vein and faculty then. I can, and I do sometimes bear to think of them; and then I go out and wander up and down like a beaten bark upon the ocean, and unseen by all but the eye of heaven, weep like a child.

This could not last for ever.

The glad times of life are but a passing breath; they are limited and evanescent, and are gone almost before we feel their presence; alas! not even youth; light, buoyant, and unthinking youth is exempt from the common lot of man. An accident, a mere accident at last effected that discovery which we had so long and so subtly endeavoured to avert. Mary was wrested from my heart and arms, at a moment when I might least have suspected the probability. Our meetings were made known by the stupidity of a clownish cow-boy—we were watched, and—we were parted.

Days and nights passed away, and still in every possible garb and disguise did I endeavour to gain tidings of my poor Mary. I haunted her dwelling—I tried to bribe the servants into kindness and loquacity—they were intolerable. Of money, I had more than an ample allowance, and all that had amassed in the absence of means to waste it, did I now gather together to bend the stubborn hearts of the rigid and scrupulous menials to my purpose; it was all, all ineffectual. Desperation often accomplishes that which prudence fails to effect. I resolved, at all hazards, to scale the garden wall, and wait the occurrence of some fortuitous event which might communicate some, if but ever so little, intelligence of the girl without whom all things else were black and dreary. Many difficulties interposed to prevent the execution of my design; but I was young, desperate, and determined; of the value of life, I nothing knew nor cared; therefore the loss had been trivial, although I had known that its forfeiture would have been the result. The seclusion of the country, and the stillness of night enabled me to complete my fixed purpose, and, after the intervention of many obstacles, and two or three slight unnoticed contusions, I at length found myself, in the dusk of a lovely autumn's evening, crouched beneath some bushes, in the garden of my beloved Mary. It was not of such length, but I could have faintly heard any noise which the domestics might have made about their occupations, but all was still and quiet, and nothing but the deepest silence prevailed there; except the casual appearance or removal of a passing light, there was nothing to indicate its habitation; once, indeed, I heard the shutting of a door, but then all was still again as ever. I had thus lain for nearly two hours, without the slightest prospect of success in seeing or hearing of Mary; the moon was shining intensely bright; and I must have waited till its situation in the heavens threw the shadow of a large tree, which stood close by, over that part of the wall by which I had obtained access, to enable me safely to retreat, when I heard the distant sound, as of a gate clapping. I was all ear, I listened long and fervidly; I listened to the stillness, till confused amidst voices and of things rung through my head in the wildest obscenity; I knew this was but auricular deception, and I tried to recover the lost sense. I leant my face upon my hands, and arranged my straying faculties as well as I was able. I remained in this situation until the sound of a light foot-stepping beat on my hearing. I raised my head, and beheld, through the foliage of the bushes which intervened, a woman, walking very slowly, and as I thought mournfully, through the path; when she approached that part in which I lay, she turned again in the same steady mood. I impatiently awaited her return, and listened to her receding steps, with an uneasy irritation; she again returned, and seemed making for the path which my secreting bush bordered. She passed it, and I saw that it was—oh! heaven, it was Mary!

But how altered! how changed that face and form! how pale and full of sorrow did she appear.—'Mary dear, dear Mary,' cried I, as I moved from my concealment; the sweet girl started, and uttered a faint cry, and then sprang into my arms, scarcely conscious of the reality of my presence. We spake few words, but, oh! how much was said and told in the short moments we were together. She recounted to me her sufferings and privations, the cruel strictness of her friends, their heart-breaking demeanor; but this and all these, she said, were nothing; she could have borne it all, and have lived upon the prospects which hope had given her; even this was denied. They had received communications from her father, who had found it necessary to abide for several years in Spain, whither his engagements had led him, and who had sent home his desire that my poor Mary should make immediate arrangements to join him here. This was too much. The thought of such a separation had never entered into my contemplations. I could have raved with very madness. Mary essayed to quell these conflicting passions. I swore that nothing should part us; that I lived, could live, but in her presence. I bade her remember all that had passed between us, our promises, our mutual protestations. I asked her if she could thus separate herself for ever from one who thus loved, adored, and idolized her. What did she say? Oh! never, while I live. I forgot the look, the tone of voice with which she answered in the words of the innocent Ruth: 'Think me not false, nor of my faith, little. We say, may meet again, and that, too, soon, and then we will part no more; yea, whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more else, if aught but death part thee and me.'

How rapidly passed the few moments we were together; we saw the impropriety of remaining too long; and, under the pledge of meeting in the same spot on the morrow evening, we parted—parted, never to meet again!

My heart was lighter and happier after this interview. I had indulged in hope and in illusive dreams of happiness in after times, and I rose the next morning at break of day; and though I had experienced but little sleep, I rose refreshed, and with a brain less fevered. It had been my sole delight to linger around her dwelling, while all else were buried in quiet and repose, and I again directed my steps towards the scene of our last night's transient meeting. As I drew towards the spot, I thought I could distinguish the sounds of voices and of things most unusual at such an early hour, in such a place. I sped quickly on, and as an abrupt angle in the lane disclosed to me her residence, oh! what a scene did I see—a carriage, laden with luggage, at the instant departing from the door; and the family all risen, and tokening farewell to those within it. The whole truth burst at once on my mind; I would have sprung forward, but I had not the power to move. I stood fixed to the spot in wilder astonishment; my eyes were rooted to the vehicle as it rolled rapidly away. Another moment and it was gone! Then, then did I dart forth with the swiftness of the lightning, over bush and bar, through field and moorland,—nothing, no obstacle, no impediment stopped my way. Alas! it was all in vain! I followed, till, overcome by weakness and intensity of feeling, I fell along the road, insensible and broken-hearted. I know not how long I lay, but when I recovered, the day seemed far advanced, and the rain was beating violently upon the heath which stretched before me. I rose with much difficulty, and sat myself down upon a stone which stood near me; I tried to collect my recollections, and to gain the meaning of my being there; too soon did my memory explain all I desired to know.—My breathing was short and painful, and I seemed to have a palpable weight upon my heart; I felt the extent of my loss, but I could not weep; I thought again, and again, of what I had and should have to experience, but I could not shed a tear; oh! what mental and bodily anguish I was in. The day was dark, and the rain pouring down very fast, as I said before;—after remaining in that position, I think it must have been an hour or longer, I arose, and without knowing whither I was going, slowly pursued my way across the dark and desolate common. It seemed a wilderness to me; all the world was a wilderness; all things looked gloomy and unnatural, and the sky and the earth appeared blank and fearful; there was no living being within sight, and I felt as though there were something not right in the world, and it made my heart cold and icy to think so. It was a long time before I saw any thing to remind me of the existence of men, and when I at length beheld a small cottage on the wayside, and heard the voices of children, I started, and felt shocked and unhappy at it.

I was met and accosted by a labourer, who said that I looked ill and pale as death, and begged me to walk home to the cottage with him, and rest a little. I did so; and they gave me bread and cream, or something I know not what; and then I felt revived, but I would not remain long, I said I must go on; they asked me if I was going to —, and the name startled me; it was a small sea-port town, and Mary had mentioned it as the place of her probable embarkation. I requested he would tell me its distance, and the shortest mode of reaching it. He told me two or three times over and over again, before I could thoroughly comprehend what he said; my faculties were so weak and treacherous, that I could not follow half a dozen words together, before I had forgotten all that was said to me. They, both he and his wife, talked together apart from me, and then they both besought me to stay the night there, and said, that then I should be better, and on the morrow morning, be fitter for the journey; but I would not remain. I believe the man must have accompanied me for some distance, but I cannot distinctly recollect. I know that I travelled all night, it could have been to no great distance, for it was not until the morning had far advanced that I reached the town, and it was not many miles that he had mentioned to me as the length. I went onwards, I knew not exactly wherefore, to the beach, and then the few vessels which I saw, somewhat recalled me to my recollection. I asked some sailors that were loitering about, if any vessel were then bound for Spain? he pointed me to one in the offing, and told me she had just sailed, and that there was another nearly underweigh; he brought me, at my request, to the master of it, with whom I was anxious to engage as a passenger; he had more honesty than scruple, for, with the present payment of the sum which I then possessed, and the promise of the remainder when arrived at our destination, he agreed to take me on board; and, within three hours after entering the town, I was on my way to a foreign and unknown land. Then, day after day, I remained fixed to my own birth, and no intruders could move me to come upon deck with the few passengers who went out with us. I only wanted quiet and solitude, and so that I was not teased by their well-meant assidues, the broil and bustle of the scene were insufficient to affect me. We had been at sea five days, when, as I one evening sat brooding on the troubles of my heart, thinking of all that was past, and was to come,—the more than usual noise and commotion above, mingled with a long continued peal of thunder, roused me from that torpor and lethargy of mind which I had all along experienced. I then perceived the violent motion of the vessel, and almost unconsciously went up to witness a scene which promised well to harmonize with my own struggles;—heavens! what a scene presented itself! the wild ocean throwing its furious waters up towards the sky—the white lightning pouring down from the cloud and springing from wave to wave, to immeasurable distance—the horrible roaring of the billows, which seemed to vie in strength with the thunder, as it increased with every coming moment—the hoarse voices of the crew, and their uncouth and violent gesticulations—the cries of the women, and the creaking of the vessel, as they broke upon the ear at intervals. It seemed as if the world itself had been dissolved in the tottering of the universe! Such a display of elementary strife and fearful uproar must have been overpowering and numbing to any spectator, except me; but I, though amazed, regarded it with, I might almost say, indifference; my feeling and perception to all external things, whether in repose or in commotion, were now altogether callous; and I looked on unconcernedly as to consequences, whether of good or of evil tendency.

The storm increased with every increasing minute. The captain and his crew were toiling and striving with the energy of desperation, leaving no means untried to avert the impending destruction. The water was growing rapidly in the hold, and all exertions could not keep it under. All at once, the captain flagged, and looked around as if he would communicate something which he had not power to do—and there he fell upon his knees and prayed God to help us, for the vessel had sprung a leak, and no power but His could save us. The thunder still kept roaring on, and the transitions from light to utter darkness, occasioned by the lightning, was truly horrible. In a moment after, a deafening cry of 'lost,—and, 'O Lord save us,'—sprung from all parts of the ship; the waters poured into it in all directions, rushing and splashing with a violence indescribable; one more and a last lurch it gave, and then — —And then, COURTEOUS READER, I awoke, and found that all this hubbub had been occasioned by nothing but the tea-kettle boiling over into the fire, whilst I had extended to five minutes after the usual time, my afternoon's comfortable nap.

MARRIAGE,

And the various means of obtaining a Wife.

(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

'The treasures of the deep are not so precious As are the concealed comforts of a man Lock'd up in woman's love. I scent the air Of blessings, when I come but near the house.'

What a delicious breath marriage sends forth! The violet's bed's not sweeter. Honest wedlock

Is like a banqueting house built in a garden. On which the spring's chaste flows take delight

To cast their modest odours."

Middleton's Women beware Women.

So important was the marriage state considered among the Romans, both in a moral and a political view, that they not only rewarded those who married, but decreed penalties against men who remained in a state of celibacy. Fines were first levied on unmarried men about the year of Rome 350; and when pecuniary forfeitures failed to ensure their obedience to these conual edicts, their contumacious neglect of the fair sex was punished by degradation from their tribe. Celibacy continued, however, to gain ground in Rome; and to counteract its effects, we find that, in the year 518 from the foundation of the city, the censors had recourse to the extraordinary measure of obliging all the young married men to pledge themselves on oath to marry within a certain time.

Augustus followed the example of Caesar and augmented the penalties on bachelors, while he bestowed rewards on those who had a numerous offspring born in wedlock. Marriage also gave numerous advantages to fathers of families; they obtained the preference in all public employments; and if they had not obtained the age required by law, so many years of that period were dispensed with as they had children. Distinguished places were assigned to married men in the public theatres; they had precedence of their unmarried colleagues, and they were exonerated from the discharge of several burdensome public offices. Such were the immunities granted to married men among the Romans until the reign of the Emperor Constantine who modified them in several points and abolished the penalties imposed on celibacy.

The reluctance of the Romans to matrimony is strongly contrasted not only with the moderns, but also with some other nations, about the same period, particularly in Babylon, where an auction of unmarried ladies used to take place annually. The virgins of marriageable age in every district were assembled on a certain day of every year. The most beautiful were first put up, and the man who bade the largest sum of money gained possession of her. The second in personal appearance followed, and the purchasers gratified themselves with handsome wives according to the depth of their purses.

But alas! it seems that there were in Babylon some ladies for whom no money was likely to be offered, yet these also were disposed of, so provident were the Babylonians of furnishing each woman with a husband. When all the beautiful virgins were sold, the crier ordered the most deformed to stand up; and after he had openly demanded who would marry her with a small sum, she was at length adjudged to the man who would be satisfied with the least; and in this manner the money arising from the sale of the handsome women served as a portion to those who were either of disagreeable looks, or that had any other fault or imperfection.

To come at once to our own times, it would appear that there is no necessity for laws to encourage matrimony, or to tax celibacy, since, to use a homely provincial phrase, 'more people are marry than boil the pot on Sundays.' The union, too, is effected without the Babylonian mole of an auction, though there is frequently a very spirited competition for a female; and those of either sex who are not fortunate enough to get suited often adopt singular methods.

One of the most chivalrous methods we ever heard of to obtain a wife was that adopted by King Sagar. Avilda, the daughter of the King of Gothland, contrary to the manner and disposition of her sex, exercised the profession of piracy, and was scouring the seas with a powerful fleet while a sovereign was offering sacrifices to her beauty at the shrine of love. King Sagar perceiving that this masculine lady was not to be gained by the usual arts of lovers, took the extraordinary resolution of addressing her in a mode more agreeable to her humour. He fitted out a fleet, went in quest of her, engaged her in a furious battle which continued two days without intermission, and thus gained possession of a heart to be conquered only by valour.

A still more romantic story is related of an Englishman, who sought the hand of a very charming lady with whom he was passionately in love, but she constantly refused him. As he had reason to believe she loved him, he entreated to know the reason why she refused her consent to their union. The lady, subdued by his constancy, told him that her only motive for refusing him, was that having by an accident lost a leg she had it replaced by a wooden one; and she feared that sooner or later this circumstance would chill his affection for her. This she declared her only motive. The lover protested that this would never make him change his love; but she persisted in refusing to marry him. Fired with love which,

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns, and determined that nothing should obstruct his design, he, under the pretext of going a distant voyage, left his aid and hastened to Paris, where he had one of his own legs amputated. When he recovered he returned to London, went to the lady and told her that there was now no obstacle to their union, for that he was equally mutilated as herself. The lady conquered by such a proof of affection, at last consented to marry him.

Our modern lovers go much easier to work, than attempting to subdue the abdures fair in the way we have mentioned. In France and England it is no uncommon thing for gentlemen to advertise for wives, and ladies for husbands, and both in London and Paris there are offices where negotiations of this nature are carried on; but the most singular method of all is, that adopted in America by means of a lottery. In No. 127 of the Literary Chronicle, there is mentioned an instance of a young man seeking a wife and a fortune by this means; and a recent traveller in the United States gives a curious account of a similar plan being put in actual practice.

'On the 21st day of December last,' says he, 'I was passing through the state of South Carolina, and in the evening arrived in the suburbs of the town of —, where I had an acquaintance, on whom I called. I was quickly informed that the family was invited to a wedding in a neighbouring house; and on being requested, I changed my clothes and went with them. As soon as the young couple were married, the company was seated, and a profound silence ensued. A young lawyer then arose, and addressed the company very handsomely, and in finishing his discourse, begged leave to offer a New Scheme of Matrimony, which he believed would be beneficial; and, on obtaining leave, he proposed,—

'That one man in the company should be selected as president; that this president should be duly sworn to keep entirely secret all the communications that should be forwarded to him in his official department that night; and that each unmarried gentleman and lady should write his or her name on a piece of paper, and under it place the person's name which they wished to marry; then hand it to the president for inspection; and if any gentleman and lady had reciprocally chosen each other, the president was to inform each of the result; and those who had not been reciprocal in their choice kept entirely secret.

'After the appointment of the president, communications were accordingly handed up to the chair, and it was found that twelve young gentlemen and ladies had made reciprocal choices; but whom they had chosen, remained a secret to all but themselves and the president. The conversation changed, and the company respectively retired.

'Now hear the conclusion. I was passing through the same place on the 14th of March following, and was informed that eleven of the twelve matches had been solemnized, and that the young gentlemen of eight couples of the eleven, had declared, that their diffidence was so great, that they certainly should not have addressed their respective wives, if the above scheme had not been introduced. Gentlemen under twenty, and ladies under fifteen, were excluded as unmarriageable.'

We shall now close this desultory paper with an amusing anecdote of a different description from any we have yet quoted. It is related by Sir Walter Scott, in the 'Border Antiquities of England and Scotland;—

'In the 17th century, the greater part of the property lying upon the River Etrick, belonged to Scott of Harden, who made his principal residence at Oakwood Tower, a border-house of strength still remaining upon that river. William Scott, (afterwards Sir William) son of the head of this family, undertook an expedition against the Murrays, of Elbank, whose property lay at a few miles distant. He found his enemy upon their guard, was defeated, and made prisoner in the act of driving off the cattle, which he had collected for that purpose. Our hero, Sir Gideon Murray, conducted his prisoner to the castle, where his lady received him with congratulations upon his victory, and inquiries concerning the fate to which he destined his prisoner:—"The gallows," answered Sir Gideon, for he is said already to have acquired the honour of knighthood, "to the gallows with the marauder."—"Hont na, Sir Gideon," answered the considerate matron in her venacular idiom, "would you hang the winsome young Laird of Harden when ye have three ill-favoured daughters to marry?"—"Right," answered the baron, who caught at the idea, "he shall either marry our daughter, mickle-mouthed Meg, or strap for it." Upon this alternative being proposed to the prisoner, he, upon the first view of the case, stoutly preferred the gibbet to "mickle-mouthed Meg," for such was the nickname of the young lady, whose real name was Agnes. But at length, when he was literally led forth for execution, and saw no other chance of escape, he retracted his gallant resolution, and preferred the typical noose of matrimony to the literal cord of hemp. Such is the tradition established in both families, and often jocularly referred to upon the borders. It may be necessary to add, that mickle-mouthed Meg and her husband were a very happy and loving pair, and had a very large family, to each of whom Sir William Scott bequeathed good estates, besides reserving a large one for the eldest.

FITZHENRY.

INNOVATIONS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

THERE is something in our nice conception of the exact shades of meaning in the words of a language, which every one feels (and more especially if he understands more languages than one), but which it is impossible to explain. For instance, the word mœurs has by some been translated morals, and by others, manners, while each party must have been aware that his word but imperfectly expressed the idea intended; both are right, but both deficient; as the original has an intermediate meaning, or rather includes both, with all the hair's-breadth ideas associated between them. Yet still, though so expressive a word, it can never be properly Anglicised, and we ought rather to content ourselves with our deficiency, than attempt to graft so heterogeneous and crab-like a mixture upon our stock. The word ennui has lately made more rapid strides among us than its laziness would seem to countenance (and the fascinating tale which bears its name has aided the adoption), but how miserable a figure does it cut in our English uniform! Fashion prescribes that its Gallic pronunciation shall be preserved; and surely it is enough to give an Englishman the vapours to twist his jaws to the barbarous attempt at ong vece. The trial is ridiculous, and while for our comfort we have lassitude, weariness, spleen, langour, and the blue devils at command, I should think our vocabulary is as rich and copious as the heart of melancholy itself could desire.—Some recent adoptions have highly pleased me, as according well with the standard of simplicity, and improving themselves at the same time to the judgment of the linguist in their etymology; and such words as telegraph, panorama, and kaleidoscope, will hold a deserved place in our dictionaries as long as these elegant inventions shall be known; but never can common sense or English ears be reconciled to the horrid jargon of ayd-de-caung, sang-froy, bong-tang, shay-doo-ter, bong-mo, ecclate, sec-de-vaung, rong-de-voe, o-ture, day-numaung, tray, day-be, and such like trash, which is like to delude us to infinity. Can a mere Englishman pronounce them; or, if he could, why must he ape a knowledge above his conception? He may mangle them till he is tired, or till the feelings of his hearers are completely excruciated, but never will he fully comprehend their meaning, nor articulate them at all better than a jack-daw. Let us take one or two instances from these samples for inquiry, and see if consequence, beauty, or necessity, can offer any thing in their favour. Bon-mot (good word) will, by any Frenchman, be understood as wit well expressed; but our witticism gives all the sense, and a deal more of propriety; for what will be thought of a counsellor who should offer his services to speak a bon-mot for a criminal at the bar? We have a provincialism which deserves some degree of tenderness and respect from the extent of its circulation, and for a still better reason, that it was till lately the standard pronunciation, and perhaps ought to have been so continued. No small degree of ambiguity has crept in upon us, by pronouncing beat, feat, meat, &c. as beet, feet, meet, &c. It is true, that if the old sound were continued, assimilating with bait, gait, wait, &c. some confusion would still remain, but certainly not so much as would be sacrificed. One of this class still retains its primitive sound, and if great be allowed to rhyme with strait, surely treat has an equal right to the privilege. Take then your new fangled Anglo-gallicism trait, and it will be found not a whit behind the other in absurdity: it is totally untractable, and will no more class with English perspicuity, than a pig will class with a zebra, or Borahski with Daniel Lambert. Pronounce it as you will, and you gain nothing but a confusion of ideas; call it tray, and it smells of the butler's pantry, of the jannet's shop; or your hearers are left to guess, whether you mean your dog or a tea-board; pronounce the terminating t, and it may then become turtle-soup, lolly-pop, or any other nick-nack in epicurism. And why admit this illegitimate upstart, when our good old feature contains every tittle of the other's meaning?—Feature of the face, of the mind, of the country, of a book, is as comprehensive and analogous in every respect whatever.

It is useless to investigate the crowd of gallicisms that might be presented, and ninety-nine in a hundred of them would be found as useless in their application. Two or three examples may be stated to show the effort a language is capable of making to rehere itself from the harsh admixture of foreign intrusion;—the word curmudgeon must be acknowledged to be whimsical and grotesque both in appearance and sound; no length of time or literary patronage can make it an elegant word, though it can hardly be denied to be an impressive one; and it harmonizes infinitely better with us than its original cœur méchant (bad heart). Liftenant is another christened subject, lured into submission, and losing what little importance he had in military gradation, by merging into unintelligible nonsense. For a post of honour to be thus turned into ridicule, may to some be a subject of regret; but in the language of the kitchen much precision ought not to be expected;—and blomonge may be as easily comprehended as bleuc-mangé (white eating). A few words, by way of digression, may show that our transmarine neighbours can rival us in similar absurdities. They have adopted boo-lin-gris for bowling-green; and roushif for roast-beef; and if those alone who are faultless are intitled to 'cast the first stone,' we have no right to commence the fray.

I have given these instances as borrowed from the French, that being more generally understood than any other language, and because our literary, commercial, and (would to God I might not add) our murderous intercourse, have exposed us most to the innovations of which I complain. Many other examples might be adduced as taken from other languages, and which are countenanced by the literary world—of these (to avoid prolixity) I shall only state the ill-matched and discordant terminations from the Greek and Latin plurals. We have naturalised the useful and expressive word memorandum, and why should not the forms its plural, and thus correspond with our general rule?—But no—

'He drew his bow, and shot at random,
And killed his wife for a memorandum.'
or, as our innovating pluralists would have it—

'And kill'd two men for memoranda.'
Thus we have phenomena, stimuli, strata, fungi, errata, and a thousand more ready to fasten upon as individual caprice may suggest, and with the facility of the vampire—each one contributing his share towards the obscenity and eventual destruction of a language, which, probably, has had more varied capabilities displayed by the genius of its writers than any other which ever existed.

But whatever reasons or apologies may be given for these mongrel innovations, at this evil were not sufficient, the public are fostering another malady, and altering our pronunciation as fast as ignorance or levity can dictate. Singularity appears to be the predominant whim; and I fear many of our distinguished contemporaries had rather be remembered by their absurdities than sink into oblivion. M.

SONNET.

As pines the dove when from its partner torn,
And, solitary, droops in gloomy shade;
So doth my wounded bosom ever mourn,
When thou art far away from me, sweet maid.

But if, again, his partner dead returns,
Is little heart with pleasing rapture beats;
With love increases 'till its gentle bosom burns,
And tastes, once more, of much-lost joys—lost sweets.

So when again thou'st present to my view,
The gloom dispenses from my troubled breast;

And when I find thou still to me art true,
I feel, indeed, that I am truly blest.

So happy, that for one sweet kiss of thine,
The world and all its treasures I'd resign.

SERENADE.

FROM AN ARABIC MS.

Supposed to have been written during the most splendid era of Arabian literature and magnificence in Spain, A.D. 912 to 961, in the Catiphele of Abdurahman III.

THE moon has topp'd the mountain height,
And rides her cloud-built tower,
And looks in the wave thro' the dark-eyed night—

Oh, that's the holiest hour

For love and silence.

And there are the stars

In their paly cars;

They sport the clouds so cheerily;

They strain the dew

Thro' the dark'ning blue,

And drink to the night so cheerily:

And echo cries 'so cheerily'—

Till all is silence.

Then list to the chaunt,

In the fairy haunt;

On the mountain tops,

Where the eagle stops—

And then we'll move,

On the breath of night,—

Like the couler dove

To his mid-air flight—

To love and silence.

SONNET TO A DEER.

Written in Kippin Forest.

TAV, umorous tenant of the woodland shade,
Ah! do not urge away thy rapid flight—
Yet can I be surprised thou shun'st my sight,
By my presence thou art fearful might?

No, surely, no; by cruel sport betrayed,

To glut the tyrant man's ambitious reign;

He hunts thee panting o'er thy native plain,

And dares thy hornbeam covert to invade;

But I will not infringe thy wide domain,

Nor will I hunt thee with the pealing bound;

Do not erect thy head, thy fears are vain,

Nor agile, o'er the shrubs and brushwood

bound—

Alas! he flies my hateful sight, a guest

Ungrateful, and leaves a rankling pang within my breast.

THE EVENING PRAYER.

SWEET soft, O wind of evening!

Above the poet's grave—

And every tree around it

In solemn honour wave!

On earth no sound delighted

His museful fancy more,

Than thine—at awful midnight—

In calm or the ocean's roar.

But chief he loved thy whisper,

The song he heard thee sing,

When cavalierly wooing

The tender-bosom'd spring.

The woods and rivers hail'd thee

In answering echoes round;

The nightingale sung sweeter,

As a rival he had found.

O lovers lonely wand'ring

At such a hallowed hour!

What looks!—what aspirations!

Did homage to its power!

Sweet soft, O wind of evening!

Above the poet's grave—

And every tree around it

In solemn honour wave!

SERENADE.

WAKE, my love, the orb of night

Glisters in their midnight sphere,

Bury life has 'twixt its light

To distant regions dark and dear.

All is still—the day is gone—

Silent Night rides through the air,

Sense to Somnus' cave is flown;

Wake thee, then, my beauteous fair.

Now the glittering meteors blaze,

In the moon-lit placid sky,

And cast around their varied rays,

List and hear Alonzo sigh.

Now the goddess Silence reigns

Where Noise so lately held his court;

Listen, listen, to my strains,—

Strains by love and madness taught.

Wake, my love, the jealous Morn

Swift returns, with all his train;

Soon night's stillness will be gone,

And busy life return again.

The Drama.

THERE has been no change in the performances at Drury Lane and Covent Garden during the week, except in the afterpieces at the latter house, which have been somewhat varied. Some forthcoming novelties are talked of at both theatres, of which we shall give an early account.

SURREY THEATRE.—That favourite

little actress, Miss S. Booth, made her first appearance at this house on Monday night, in a melo-dramatic romance, entitled Mariette, the Maid of Switzerland. The piece is already familiar to the public under the name of Therese. Miss Booth sustained the character of the heroine, which is one of intense feeling, with great effect, particularly in her interviews with the Countess and the villain Carwin. The character of Carwin falls to the hands of a gentleman new to this stage. He has a good face and figure, and gives promise of being a good actor. In some of the early scenes he was rather tame; but when writhing under the tortures of guilt and accusation, in the last act, he displayed much appropriate energy. Mr. Bengough was the Pastor, and looked and acted the character extremely well. The Count and Countess had good representatives in Gomery and Miss Poole; and Her-ning was highly amusing in the old Farmer.

MR. BENGOUGH'S BENEFIT.—On Wednesday night, this very deserving actor had a benefit at the English Opera House, when, much to the delight of a crowded audience, he introduced that phenomenon of human intellect, Miss Clara Fisher. The impression which this child made on the public four years ago, will not easily be forgotten. She was then only six years of age, and yet sustained the character of Richard the Third with striking effect. She has since made the tour of the country theatres, and visited Edinburgh with great success. On this evening she played Little Pickle, in the Spoiled Child, and was the smartest little romp we ever saw in the character. Her next character was a singular one for a child, Crack, in the Turnpike Gate. We wish Munden could have seen how well one of his best characters could be played by a mere infant. Her last effort for the evening was in the Actress of All Work, in which she sustained about half-a-dozen as varied and strongly contrasted characters as ever were brought together in the same drama. In every character she undertook, she displayed a correctness and a power of delineation which might put many old actors to the blush. We were happy to see, among her audience, the first tragedian of the day, Mr. Kean, who was ardently recognized. He appeared anxious to afford his support to, and testify his approval of this extraordinary child.

Literature and Science.

The Scottish Novels.—The author of the Scottish novels is the most fortunate writer of this or any age; and, if the following statement, which has just appeared in the Monthly Magazine, can be relied on, each of his works must be a fortune to both author and bookseller. His first editions are 20,000 copies (we have heard even 30,000), and to this is usually added another of 10,000. The following, then, is something like the account between him and his printer, for a novel of three volumes, of fifteen sheets each:—

1800 reams of paper, 26s.	£2340
Printing forty-five sheets, at 211.	945
Advertising	100
Commission and other expenses	600
	£3985
Taking the returns at only 11. 1s. per copy, the retail price being 11. 11s. 6d.	21,000
We have a net produce of Profit on first edition £17,015

If to this be added 8000l. for the profit of the second edition, it appears that each of these novels of three volumes, yields the enormous profit of £5,015l.!

Monument to Mr. Rennie.—It having been proposed to erect a statue to the memory of the late Mr. Rennie, on Waterloo Bridge, the erection of which he superintended, Mr. Dodd, the architect, who actually designed this noble structure, has addressed the following letter on the subject to one of the daily papers:—

SIR,—If there is any impartiality or independence in your paper, which I presume there is, I am sure you will readily insert the following truths in vindication of those that have too often suffered by other persons reaping both the honours and profit of their previous labours; for, although I have often contradicted the mis-statement of Mr. Rennie's friends respecting the Waterloo Bridge, it appears now too much to hear them talk of raising a statue to him on that bridge as its architect, when the real fact is, that Mr. Rennie was not the architect designer. This is well known to all the original subscribers; and it is also known that the plans and designs of it, which were approved of and sanctioned by Parliament, were not from the head or hand of Mr. Rennie, but Mr. Dodd; and an act granted for its erection, in which the present dimensions of its arches, piers, &c. were inserted as it now stands, and contracts were made with Jolliffe and Banks, and other persons, for its building, and the works proceeding before Mr. Rennie had any thing whatever to do with it. Therefore, how far

Mr. Rennie, after doing little more than superintending, and seeing the stone and lime put in their place, is intitled to have his statue on this national ornament, the public will be the best judges, after this fair statement of facts that cannot be contradicted.

R. DODD.

Lactometer.—In consequence of the numerous frauds practised in Ireland, in the adulteration of skimmed milk, Mr. Davy, of the Cork Institution, has been led to direct his attention to the subject, and has constructed a simple lactometer, which detects the fraud hitherto practised, in an article of the most extensive consumption.

The Bee.

*Floriferis ut apes in salubris omnia lianant,
Omnis nos itidem depascitur aurea dicta.*

LUCRETIVS.

A Persian poet takes the following liberty with the fair sex: 'When thou art married seek to please thy wife; but listen not to all she says. From man's right side a rib was taken to form the woman, and never was there seen a rib quite straight; and would'st thou straighten it? It breaks, but bends not; since then 'tis plain that crooked is woman's temper, forgive her faults, and blame her not; nor let them anger thee, nor coercion use, as all is vain to straighten what is curved.'

A French Kettle.—The following is related as a fact: There is a very large cauldron in a house at Paris, which is called 'La Marmite Perpetuelle,' from its having been on the fire eighty-seven years; during which period it has boiled more than 800,000 capons; and it boils nothing else. It is situated near the principal market for fowls, which have thus only a step to be carried from the market into the cauldron. At any hour, night or day, on applying to that succulent house, a boiled capon issues from its nutritious gulph, where they are incessantly regenerated, in a wonderful manner.

A Common Scold.—At Philadelphia, lately, Catherine Fields was indicted and convicted for being a common scold. The trial was excessively amusing, from the variety of testimony, and the diversified manner in which this Xantippe pursued her various propensities. 'Ruder than March wind,' she blew a hurricane; and it was given in evidence, that, after having scolded the family individually, the bipeds and quadrupeds, the neighbours, hogs, poultry, and geese, she would throw the windows up at night to scold the watchman. Her countenance was an index to her temper—sharp, peaked, sawn, and small eyes.

A Good Appetite.—The man of whom several accounts have recently been published of swallowing jack-knives, bullets, marbles, &c. died lately in an almshouse in consequence of overloading his stomach with those articles. He gave a history of his life to the attending physician, in which many wonderful facts will doubtlessly appear. On opening his body, twelve knives, all shut, were found in his stomach, one of them four inches and a-half in length and one sold a quarter wide, and among them the pocket-knife of the Philadelphia physician, with his name on it. An authentic report of this very remarkable case will undoubtedly be made in the 'Medical Repository,' with more particulars than it would be advisable to give on our hasty authority.—American Paper.

Quick Work.—Some years ago, there was a woman who lived in a village in Glamorganshire, South Wales, whose husband, with the little fortune he got with her, bought a small farm; he had hardly closed the purchase, when death closed his eyes; however, not intimidated with this, the widow married a second husband, who sowed it; he likewise died, and she tried a third, who reaped it, but death soon snatched him away; she then married a fourth, who threshed it, but he also followed the fate of his predecessors; and she then married a fifth husband, with whom she enjoyed the produce of it. All this happened in less than eighteen months.

Sketches of Upper Canada, Domestic, Local, and Characteristic: to which are added, Practical Details for the Information of Emigrants of every Class; and some Recollections of the United States of America. 8vo. pp. 339. Edinburgh, 1821.

WE have so frequently stated the importance we attach to the remaining British possessions in America, that we shall not detain our readers one moment with any disquisition on that subject; but merely observe, that of all the writers who have hitherto undertaken in account of our transatlantic possessions, Mr. Howison is the most minute, and, we believe, as well-informed and as accurate as any that have preceded him. He confines himself principally to Upper Canada, a colony growing rapidly into importance, and possessing advantages of soil and climate superior to the neighbouring province. Mr. Howison's information was collected during a residence of two years and a-half; and, though it is rather of a personal and domestic nature, yet the commercial, political, and agricultural state of the province is not neglected. The work assumes the form of letters, which are written in an easy and familiar style, though not altogether free from affectation. Our author dismisses Lower Canada in a single letter, from which we shall make a single extract, respecting the general character of the Canadians:—

'I remained all night at La Chêne, and, on a early hour next morning, was provided with another calash and driver. This man possessed a most happy disposition, and was altogether so free and easy in his manner, that he afforded me much amusement. Though a carpenter by trade, he kept a calash for the accommodation of travellers, and would either hire a horse or a nail, as best suited his purpose. The Canadian post-horses are, in appearance, the most wretched animals imaginable, being lank, clumsy, and rough-coated; but they become both active and spirited under the influence of the whip, which their drivers generally use very freely. I believe no member of the Four-in-hand Club, when mounted on the box, feels more elated than the Canadian peasant does while driving his sorry horse and shackling chariot. He is all life and gaiety, and talks to his horse and to the traveller alternately. He points out the beauties of the prospect, and if the carriage or harness gives away, he dismounts and repairs it, regains his seat, and dashes on. He relieves his horse by walking up every hill, and compliments himself upon this sacrifice, by calling to the animal, "Ah pauvre cheval! Vous avez un bon maître." &c. The Canadian peasantry display a native politeness, a presence of mind, and a degree of address, which, though extremely pleasing, sometimes betray their possessors into too much familiarity; however, there is so much gaiety and sentiment in these mistakes, that one cannot but heartily excuse them. My drivers always shook hands with me, and wished me a good journey, before we parted, and they sometimes politely asked me to join them in drinking a glass of cider. The Canadians are dark-complexioned, and generally meagre, although rather athletic. Their eyes are small, sparkling, and animated; but none of the men have any pretensions to personal beauty.'

'I was much struck with the politeness of the common Canadians. They never passed without uncovering; and when two drivers came within call, they always saluted each other by the word monieur. The children make a low obeisance to every gentler stranger; and I cannot help mentioning a trifling incident which was occasioned by this custom. A little boy, who had apparently just begun to walk, stood at the door of a cottage, with an immense broad-rimmed hat upon his head. When I approached, he took it off and bowed, but in attempting to regain the erect posture, he found the weight of his chapeau too great, and fell forward on his face, but without receiving any injury. I thought at the moment, that it would have been well if the British Government had furnished Lord Amherst with a hat of this description, to be used on his first audience with the Emperor of China. It would have occasioned a prostration highly gratifying to his majesty, and from its being entirely accidental, of course quite satisfactory to our administration.'

The first regular settlement in Upper Canada, is called Gleggarry, and, as may be conceived from its appellation, contains a large proportion of

Scotch; it is not in a very flourishing condition, principally on account of the want of some capitalists; all the settlers were very poor when they commenced their labours, and few of them have more than sixty or seventy acres cleared. In sailing up to Kingston, on the St. Lawrence, the party landed on one of those numerous islands, which are to be met with in this noble river, and were gratified with what, to an English sportsman, would be a great novelty—a deer hunt by torch-light. The party hearing a noise in the night, were afraid of being surprised by some Indians, but,—

'The supposed Indians were no other than the crew of a brigade of bateaux, and the shouts we heard were raised in consequence of their having seen three deer, in the pursuit of which they requested us to join. This proposal was acceded to by all parties, and some began to kindle large fires in several parts of the island, while others stript the lincory tree of its bark; and made torches. Thus prepared, we sallied forth, some carrying arms, and the others being provided with blazing flambeaux. Intending to surround the deer, and gradually close upon them, we dispersed into a large circle, and sent two dogs among the brushwood, to rouse the game, which they soon accomplished, and we accordingly made regular encroachments upon their precincts. The deer, when they saw themselves thus environed, sprung from one side to the other, leaped into the air, reared upon their hind legs, and at last sunk down apparently in despair; but, upon the discharge of a couple of fowling-pieces, they again started, and having escaped our circle, plunged into the river.

'Several of the boatmen had remained upon the banks of the island, that they might prevent the deer from taking the river; but when they found this impracticable, they shouted to us and ran to the bateaux, and immediately unmooored them. The remainder of the crew soon followed, with arms and torches, and all rowed out in pursuit of the game. Nothing could be more brilliant and picturesque than the scene which succeeded. We saw the heads and antlers of the beautiful animals moving with graceful rapidity upon the surface of the water, while the brightness of their eyes rivalled that of the transparent drops which sparkled around them. When the shouts of the crew and the dashing of the oars assailed their ears, the exertions they made to escape were inconceivably strong—sometimes raising themselves almost entirely out of the water, and sometimes springing forward several yards at one leap. The bustle among the boats, the glare of the torches, and the ferocious countenances of the crew, were finely contrasted with the meekness and timidity of the deer, and the whole effect was heightened by the islands around, the wild and romantic features of which were strikingly displayed at intervals, when the ruddy light of the torches happened to fall upon them.

Several shots were fired, though apparently without effect, and I began fervently to hope that the deer might escape. Two of them eluded their pursuers, but the battalions surrounded the other, and the Canadians beat it to death with their oars, and, having taken it on board, returned to the shore.

Of Kingston, which is the largest town in Upper Canada, our author gives a good account:—

Kingston contains about five thousand inhabitants, including military. The plan of the town is elegant and extensive, but not yet nearly realized. Most of the houses are built of lime-stone; inexhaustible quarries of which lie in the immediate vicinity of the town, and are of the greatest importance to it, as Kingston, being the key to Upper Canada, will always require strong fortifications. There is nothing the least interesting or remarkable, in either the streets or buildings of this place. The better class of people, most of whom are in the mercantile line, live in good style, but are not very hospitable; and there appears to be little polish among them, and not much social communication.

The natural position and local advantages of Kingston are such, that by means of proper fortifications, it might be made almost impregnable. It lies behind a point of land, on the extremity of which there is a strong fort, that commands the town and the entrance into the harbour so completely, that although an enemy had possession of the former, he could not occupy it with safety, nor receive any supplies by means of the latter.

The bay affords so fine a harbour, that a vessel, of one hundred and twenty guns can lie close to the quay. The St. Lawrence, which carries one hundred guns, was in this position when I visited Kingston, and I enjoyed an opportunity of seeing every part of her. She is built in the plainest style, but is amazingly strong and beautifully modelled. Near her lay the Prince Regent, a sixty-gun frigate, the elegant form and just proportions of which have excited the admiration of the best judges of naval architecture. There were several other frigates in the harbour, the names and dimensions of which I have now forgot.

Kingston was a place of great importance during the last war, as it alone afforded us the means of successfully carrying on our naval operations on Lake Ontario. You are aware that no affair of any importance ever took place between the American fleet and ours; the respective forces were for a long time so exactly balanced, that neither of the parties deemed it prudent to venture upon a general engagement; and the warfare consisted almost entirely of a system of reconnoitering, in the course of which we were alternately the pursuers and the pursued. However, at last, when the St. Lawrence was finished, we gained a decided superiority, for she made us master of Lake Ontario without firing a single gun, the enemy's fleet never having ventured far out after she left Kingston harbour.

Mr. Howison embarked for York on board the Frontenac, the largest steam-boat in Canada; her deck is 170 feet long, and 32 feet wide, and her burthen 740 tons. Of Lake Ontario and its periodical increase of waters, we are told:—

Lake Ontario is two hundred and thirty miles long, and sixty broad at its widest part. Its waters are quite transparent and colourless, but rapid and unpleasant to the taste. Soundings are rarely to be met with, except near the shore; and, as very few islands or points of land present themselves upon its expanse, it is adapted for every kind of navigation, and, of course, admit vessels of the largest size. The current which moves forward this immense body of water is distinctly perceptible, being, on an average, at the rate of half a mile an hour, but varying with the direction and strength of the wind.

The most remarkable phenomenon which this and the other lakes exhibit, is that increase and rise of their waters, which is said to take place at regular periods. It occurs, in a moderate degree, every seven years, and to a very great extent once in thirty or forty. In the year 1816, the waters of Lake Ontario were seven feet and a-half perpendicular above their average height, and Lake Erie was affected in a similar way. I have visited the shores of Lake Ontario several times, accompanied by a person who resides upon them, whose intelligence and indisputable veracity made me put full confidence in the information he gave, and from whom I received proofs of the accuracy of what I have stated. I likewise saw the remains of a large storehouse which had been built a few years before, in a situation that seemed quite inaccessible to the lake, although the waters have surrounded and nearly demolished it.

This singular phenomenon affords a problem very difficult to solve. The quantity of water that must be required to increase the depth of Lake Ontario, and all the other lakes, seven and a-half feet perpendicular, is so vast, that it is impossible to conceive where its source can lie. The height of the waters of the lakes, indeed, varies a few inches almost daily; but this is occasioned by changes in the direction of the wind. When it is east or north-east, the waters are driven back, or at least impeded in their course, and consequently an accumulation takes place, which makes the lakes rise; but if it blows from the south, or south-west, the direction in which they flow, their waters are hurried towards the St. Lawrence, and, of course, decrease in height in proportion to the strength of the wind.

The town of York is disadvantageously situated on the shore of Lake Ontario; it has some good houses, and contains about three thousand inhabitants. The town is defenceless at present, and the trade inconsiderable. Mr. Howison re-embarked on board the steam-boat, and when at the village of Niagara, met with an affecting incident:—

One evening, says he, "as I strolled along the beach of the lake, in front of Niagara, a woman, whom I had observed at some distance, approached, and, after several low curtsies, requested me to follow her; and, as she seemed to be in deep affliction, I immediately complied, without asking an explanation. She conducted me to a kind of cave, under a high sand-bank, the mouth of which was barricaded with a chest of drawers, several trunks, &c. A mattress occupied the floor of this wild abode, and two children played gaily with one another upon it, the one attempting to beat his merry companion with an old pillow, and raising shouts of laughter and delight every time he succeeded in giving a blow. The mother, who continued to shed tears, told me, that she and her family were Irish emigrants. They had been induced, by a series of misfortunes, to set sail for Canada, with the intention of obtaining land, and had, after many difficulties, got thus far in their voyage; but, being now destitute of money, they were unable to procure a lodging, and knew not where to apply for work, assistance, or information. "A husband and these two boys," said the woman, "are all that now remain to me. My little girl died in the ship, and they threw her into the sea. Aye, sure, that was the worst of all," continued she, in an agony of grief. "Poor babe! she had neither prayer nor a wake!"

Our author has a taste for the picturesque, and frequently describes the romantic scenery he witnessed, with much spirit:—

The environs of Queenston are beautifully picturesque and romantic, and nothing can be finer than the prospect of the Niagara River. Immediately above the village its channel narrows much, and the banks rise to the height of three hundred feet perpendicular, while at the same time they become wild and rocky, and are thickly covered with trees of various kinds. In some places they partly over-arch the river, and throw an appalling gloom upon its waters, now dashed into turbulence and impetuosity by the ruggedness of their sloping bed. It was night when I first viewed this scene, and as the moon gradually rose, she threw a broken light successively upon different portions of the stream, and sometimes brought to view the foamy bosom of a rapid, at other times unveiled the struggling and heaving waters of a whirlpool, while the mingled roar, on all sides, excited a shuddering curiosity about those parts of the river that rolled along in darkness.

Over the precipice, on the summit of which I stood while I contemplated this scene, many of the American soldiers had rushed at the close of the battle of Queenston heights. They were so warmly pressed by our troops and the Indians, and had so little prospect of obtaining quarter from the latter, that a great number wildly flung themselves over the steep, and tried to save their lives by catching hold of the trees that grew upon it; but many were frightfully dashed to pieces by the rocks, and others who reached the river perished in their attempts to swim across it. Several, who had dropped among the cliffs without receiving any injury, were afterwards transfixed and killed by falling upon their own bayonets, while in the act of leaping from one spot to another. I almost imagined I saw these unfortunate men writhing in all the agonies of a protracted death, and gazing with envy at their companions, who were convulsively catching for breath among the sullen waters below. Were the Canadians inclined to be superstitious, they could not select a more suitable place than this for the haunt and appearance of unearthly beings. The wildness of the scenery, the gloom of the cliffs, and the melancholy incident I have just related, would subject Queenston heights to the suspicion of any people more under the influence of imagination than the Canadians are, and make them conjure up half a dozen bleeding sentinels at the top of the precipice, every night after sunset.

About four miles above Queenston, there is a singular and interesting part of the Niagara river, called the Whirlpool. The banks here are extremely high and perpendicular; and, in addition to the natural channel, the current of the river has formed a semicircular excavation in them resembling a small bay. The mouth of it is more than a thousand feet wide, and its length about two thousand. The current, which is extremely rapid, whenever it reaches the upper point of this bay, forsakes the direct channel, and sweeps wildly round the sides of it; when, having made this extraordinary circuit, it regains its proper course, and rushes with perturbed velocity between two perpendicular precipices, which are not more than four hundred feet asunder. The surface of the whirlpool is in a state of continual agitation. The water boils, mingles up, and wreathes, in a manner that proves its fearful depth and the confinement it suffers; as trees, that come within the sphere of the current, are swept along with a quivering zig-zag motion which it is difficult to describe. This singular body of water must be several hundred feet deep, and has not hitherto been frozen over, although in spring the broken ice that descends from Lake Erie collects in such quantities upon its surface, and becomes so closely wedged together, that it resists the current, and remains till warm weather breaks it up. The whirlpool is one of the greatest natural curiosities in the Upper Province, and is the more interesting to the mind, as its formation cannot be rationally accounted for.

The last war forms an important era in the history of Upper Canada, and, as such, is continually referred to by the people, who fought nobly; Mr. H. states its consequences to have been very injurious to the province, and the main cause of its present embarrassed state. Our author gives an excellent description of the falls of Niagara, a passage or two of which we quote:—

'The extent of the Falls has never been correctly ascertained, as, indeed, their peculiar form, and several other circumstances, render this impossible. The height of the great Fall, as taken with a plumb line by some engineers from the United States, was found to be 149 feet 9 inches. Its curve is supposed to extend 2100 feet, and its arc may measure nearly half that space. The breadth of Goat Island, which divides the two cataracts, has been found to be 984 feet, and that of the American Fall 1140 feet. Therefore the whole circumference of the precipice over which the cataracts fall is 4224 feet, and the width of the cataract itself 3910 feet. At one time, the Table Rock extended fifty feet beyond the cliffs that support it, but its projection is not so great at present.

'There have been several instances of people being carried over the Falls, but I believe none of the bodies ever were found. The rapidity of the river, before it tumbles down the precipice, is so great, that a human body would certainly be whirled along without sinking; therefore, some of those individuals to whom I allude, probably retained their senses till they reached the edge of the cataract, and even looked down upon the gulf into which they were the next moment precipitated.

'Many years ago, an Indian, while attempting to cross the river above the Falls, in a canoe, had his paddle struck from his hand by the rapidity of the current. He was immediately hurried towards the cataract, and, seeing that death was inevitable, he covered his head with his cloak, and resigned himself to destruction. However, when he approached the edge of the cataract, shuddering nature revolted so strongly, that he was seen to start up, and stretch out his arms; but the canoe upset, and he was instantly engulfed amidst the fury of the boiling surge. A dog, which I have seen, was carried over the Great Fall some years ago, and suffered no injury except the fracture of two of his ribs. Dead wild-ducks are found in great numbers along the banks of the river, near the bottom of the cataract, on the mornings that succeed dark and stormy nights. Some people suppose that these animals are carried over while asleep; but more probably they get entangled among the rapids above, and are swept away before they are aware of their danger.'

'It was not until I had, by frequent excursions to the Falls, in some measure familiarized my mind with their sublimities, that I ventured to explore the penitralia of the Great Cataract. The precipice over which it rolls is very much arched underneath; while the impetus which the water receives in its descent projects it far beyond the cliff, and thus an immense Gothic arch is formed by the rock and the torrent. Twice I entered this cavern, and twice I was obliged to retrace my steps, lest I should be suffocated by the blasts of dense spray that whirled around me; however, the third time I succeeded in advancing about twenty-five yards. Here darkness began to encircle me; on one side, the black cliff stretched itself into a gigantic arch far above my head, and on the other, the dense and hissing torrent formed an impenetrable sheet of foam, with which I was drenched in a moment. The rocks were so slippery, that I could hardly keep my feet, or hold securely by them; while the horrid din made me think the precipices above were tumbling down in colossal fragments upon my head.

'It is not easy to determine how far an individual might advance between the sheet of water and the rock; but were it even possible to explore the recess to its utmost extremity, scarcely any one, I believe, would have courage to attempt an expedition of the kind.'

Irish Melodies. By Thomas Moore, Esq. With an Appendix, containing the Original Advertisements, and the Prefatory Letter on Music. 12mo. pp. 254. London, 1821.

HOWEVER proud, as Englishmen, we may feel of our own particular country, we must confess that we possess little national music, and that we are indebted for many of our most popular airs to the Scotch and the Irish. The music of both Scotland and Ireland is very characteristic of the respective countries; that of Scotland is plaintive and romantic, and that of Ireland is the truest of all comments upon its history. 'The tone of defiance, succeeded by the languor of despondency,—a burst of turbulence dying away into softness,—the sorrows of one moment lost in the levity of the next,—and all that romantic mixture of mirth and sadness which is naturally produced by the efforts of a lively temperament, to shake off or forget the wrongs which lie upon it.'

Though the beauties of the national music of Ireland have been long very generally felt and acknowledged, yet, through the want of appropriate English words, and of the arrangement necessary to adapt them to the voice, many of the most excellent compositions remained in obscurity, until Mr. Power, with true national feeling, projected the 'Irish Melodies.' The object of the work, which was commenced in 1807, was to form a collection of the best original Irish melodies, with characteristic symphonies and accompaniments, and with words containing, as frequently as possible, allusions to the manners and history of the country. The task of arranging the airs was assigned to Sir John Stevenson, who, in conjunction with Mr. Bishop, has enriched them with some delightful symphonies and accompaniments. The poetical part was undertaken by Mr. Thomas Moore, the first lyrical poet of the age. In this duty, which he has executed with masterly genius and ability, Mr. Moore has been accused of merely selecting airs as a vehicle for dangerous politics; but we think this is judging him very harshly, and that the touches of national and political feeling which he has introduced, might have been fairly passed without censure.

The 'Irish Melodies' were published in eight successive numbers, in the third of which Mr. Moore wrote an ingenious prefatory letter upon music, from which we shall make an extract. He says,—

'Though much has been said of the antiquity of our music, it is certain that our finest and most popular airs are modern; and, perhaps, we may look no further than the last disgraceful century for the origin of most of those wild and melancholy strains, which were at once the offspring and solace of grief, and which were applied to the mind, as music was formerly to the body, "decantare loca dolentia." Mr. Pinkerton is of opinion, that none of the Scotch popular airs are as old as the middle of the sixteenth century; and though musical antiquaries refer us, for some of our melodies, to so early a period as the fifth century, I am persuaded that there are few, of a civilized description, (and by this I mean to exclude all the savage Ceanans, cries, &c.) which can claim quite so ancient a date as Mr. Pinkerton allows to the Scotch. But music is not the only subject upon which our taste for antiquity is rather unreasonably indulged; and, however heretical it may be to dissent from these romantic speculations, I cannot help thinking that it is possible to love our country very zealously, and to feel deeply interested in her honour and happiness, without believing that Irish was the language spoken in Paradise; that our ancestors were kind enough to take the trouble of polishing the Greeks; or that Abaris, the Hyperborean, was a native of the north of Ireland.'

It was not intended to separate the poetry of the 'Irish Melodies' from the music; but this became necessary, since they were not only published in America, in two editions, but also in Paris, and in a volume in Dublin. To protect, therefore, the proprietor, (who, we have heard pays the immense sum of an annuity of 500l. per annum for them), Mr. Moore has undertaken to revise a complete edition of the poetry of the eight numbers, which are published in a neat little volume, and at a price comparatively moderate.

Of the poetical merits of the 'Irish Melodies,' it is unnecessary to say a single word, since they are universally acknowledged to be the most admired compositions of the sort of modern times; and while, to Irishmen, their principal attraction may be their nationality, yet their extensive popularity has principally arisen from their superior merit. Though these songs are pretty generally known, yet we doubt not our readers will feel glad to see a few of them transferred to our pages, which we shall do without further comment:—

'WE MAY ROAM THRO' THIS WORLD.

'We may roam thro' this world, like a child at feast,

Who but sips of a sweet, and then flies to the rest;

And, when pleasure begins to grow dull in the east,

We may order our wings and be off to the west;

But if hearts that feel, and eyes that smile,

Are the dearest gifts that heaven supplies,

We never need leave our own green isle,

For sensitive hearts and for sun-bright eyes.

Then remember, wherever your goblet is crown'd,

Thro' this world whether eastward or westward you roam,

When a cup to the smile of dear woman goes round,
Oh! remember the smile which adorns her at home.

'In England, the garden of beauty is kept
By a dragon of prudery, plac'd within call;
But so oft this unamiable dragon has slept,
That the garden's but carelessly watch'd after all.

Oh! they want the wild sweet-briery fence,
Which round the flowers of Erin dwells,
Which warns the touch, while winning the sense,
Nor charms us least when it most repels.

Then remember, wherever your goblet is crown'd,
Thro' this world whether eastward or westward you roam,

When a cup to the smile of dear woman goes round,

Oh! remember the smile which adorns her at home.

'In France, when the heart of a woman sets sail

On the ocean of wedlock, its fortune to try,
Love seldom goes far in a vessel so frail,
But just pilots her off, and then bids her good-bye!

While the daughters of Erin keep the boy
Ever smiling beside his faithful oar,
Through billows of wee and beams of joy
The same as he look'd, when he left the shore.

Then remember, wherever your goblet is crown'd,
Thro' this world whether eastward or westward you roam,

When a cup to the smile of dear woman goes round,

Oh! remember the smile which adorns her at home.

'ERIN! THE TEAR AND THE SMILE IN THINE EYES.

'Erin! the tear and the smile in thine eyes,
Bleed like the rainbow that hangs in thy skies!
Shining through sorrow's stream,
Saddening through pleasure's beam,
Thy suns, with doubtful gleam,
Weep while they rise!

Erin! thy silent tear shall never cease,
Erin! thy languid smile ne'er shall increase,
Till, like the rainbow's light,
Thy various tints unite,
And form, in heaven's sight,
One arch of peace!

'ONE BUMPER AT PARTING.

'One bumper at parting!—tho' many
Have circled the board since we met.
The fullest, the sweetest of any Remains to be crown'd by us yet.
The sweetness that pleasure has in it,
Is always so slow to come forth,
That seldom, alas, till the minute
It dies, do we know half its worth!

But fill—may our life's happy measure
Be all of such moments made up!
They're born on the bosom of Pleasure,
They die 'midst the tears of the cup.

'As onward we journey, how pleasant
To pause and inhabit a while
Those few sunny spots, like the present,
That 'mid the dull wilderness smile!
But Time, like a pilchard master,
Cries, "onward!" and spins the gay hour,
And never does Time travel faster,
Than when his way lies among flowers.

But, come—may our life's happy measure
Be all of such moments made up;
They're born on the bosom of Pleasure,
They die 'midst the tears of the cup.
'This evening we saw the sun sinking,
In waters his glory made bright—
Oh! trust me, our fast-fell of drinking
Should be like that far-well of light
You saw how he finished, by darning
His beam o'er a deep billow's brim;
So fill up, let his shine at our parting,
In full liquid glory, like him.
And oh! may our life's happy measure
Of moments like this be made up;
'Twas born on the bosom of Pleasure,
It dies 'midst the tears of the cup!'

'WHILE HISTORY'S MUSE.

'While history's muse the memorial was keeping
Of all that the dark hand of Destiny weaves,
Beside her the genius of Erin stood weeping,
For her's was the story that blotted the leaves.
But oh! how the tear in her eyelids grew bright,
When, after whole pages of sorrow and shame,
She saw History write,
With a pencil of light
That illum'd all the volume, her WELLING-TON's name!

'Hail, star of my isle!" said the Spirit, all sparkling
With beams, such as break from her own dewy skies:—

"Thro' ages of sorrow, deserted, and darkling,
I've watch'd for some glory like thine to arise.
For, tho' heroes I've number'd, unluck was their lot,
And unhallow'd they sleep in the cross-ways of Fame;—

But, oh! there is not
One dishonouring blot

On the wreath that encircles my WELLING-
TON's name!

'Yet, still the last crown of thy toils is remaining,
The grandest, the purest ev'n thou hast yet known;
Tho' proud was thy task, other nations unchaining,
Far prouder to heal the deep wounds of thy
own.

At the foot of that throne, for whose weal thou barest blood,
Go, plead for the land that first cradled thy fame—

And, bright o'er the flood
Of her tears and her blood,

Let the rainbow of Hope be her WELLING-
TON's name!"

'I SAW FROM THE BEACH.

'I saw from the beach, when the morning was shining,
A bark o'er the waters move gloriously on;
I came, when the sun o'er that beach was declining,—
The bark was still there, but the waters were gone!

Ah! this is the fate of our life's early promise,
So passing the spring tide of joy we have known!

Each wave, that we danc'd on at morning, ebbs
from us,
And leaves us, at eve, on the bleak shore alone!

'Ne'er tell me of glories, serenely adorning
The close of our day, the calm eve of our night:—
Give me back, give me back the wild freshness of morning,
Her clouds and her tears are worth evening's best light.

'Oh, who would not welcome that moment's returning,
When passion first wak'd a new life thro' his frame,
And his soul—like the wood, that grows precious in burning—
Gave out all its sweets to love's exquisite flame!"

'NEVER ASK THE HOUR.

'Ne'er ask the hour—what is it to us
How Time deals out his treasures?
The golden moments, lent us thus,
Are not his coin, but Pleasure's!
If counting them over could add to their blisses,

I'd number each glorious second;
But moments of joy are, like LESLIE's kisses,
Too quick and sweet to be reckon'd.
Then fall the cup—what is it to us
How Time his circle measures?
The fairy hours we call up thus,
Obey no wand but Pleasure's!

'Young Joy ne'er thought of counting hours,
Till Care, one summer's morning,
Set up, among his smiling flowers,
A dial, by way of warning.

But Joy loved better to gaze on the sun,
As long as his light was glowing,
Than to watch with old Care how the shadows stole on.

And how fast that light was going.
So fill the cup—what is it to us
How Time his circle measures?
The fairy hours we call up thus,
Obey no wand but Pleasure's."

We understand that a surreptitious and defective edition of these 'Melodies' has been published, but that the proprietor of the genuine one has obtained an injunction against it. We mention this in order to guard our readers against the attempted fraud.

A Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea and Beering's Straits, for the Purpose of exploring a North East Passage. By Lieutenant Otto Von Kotzebue.

(Concluded from p. 691.)

HAVING, in our last, given a copious analysis of the voyage of Lieut. Kotzebue, it now only remains to us to give a connected history of Kadu, which we promised. It was while the Rurick was at Aur, one of the St.
Lawrence islands, that Lieut. Kotzebue met with this islander, who, as soon as he got on board the ship, expressed a wish to remain there, and accompany Lieut. Kotzebue on his voyage. Kadu, though not of noble birth, was a confidant of the King Toua, who employed him to carry his commissions to the other islands. Kadu's friend, Edock, who was with him, endeavoured to dissuade him from such a step, and even attempted to drag him by force, but Kadu was determined. The following account of this native was gathered from him, at different times:—

'Kadu was born in the island of Ulle, belonging to the Carolinas, which must lie at least 1500 English miles to the west from here, and is known only by name on the chart, because Father Cantara, in 1733, was sent from the Ladrone, as missionary to the Carolinas. Kadu left Ulle with Edock, and two other savages, in a boat contrived for sailing, with the intention of fishing at a distant island; a violent storm drove these unfortunate men quite out of their course: they drifted about the sea for eight months, finding, but seldom, fish for their food, and at last landed, in the most pitiable situation, on the island of Aur. The most remarkable part of this voyage is, that it was accomplished against the north-east monsoon, and must be particularly interesting to those who have been hitherto of opinion that the population of the South Sea Islands commenced from west to east. According to Kadu's account, they had their sail spread during their whole voyage, when the wind permitted, and they plied against the northeast monsoon, thinking they were under the lee of their island; this may account for their at last coming to Aur. They kept their reckoning by the moon, making a knot in a cord, destined for the purpose, at every new moon. As the sea produced abundance of fish, and they were perfectly acquainted with the art of fishing, they suffered less hunger than thirty, for though they did not neglect, during every rain, to collect a small stock, they were often totally destitute of fresh water.
Kadu, who was the best diver, frequently went down to the bottom of the sea, where it is well known that the water is not so salt, with a cocoa-nut, with only a small opening; but even if this satisfied the want of the moment, it probably contributed to weaken them. When they perceived the island of Aur, the sight of land did not rejoice them, because every feeling had died within them. Their sails had long been destroyed, their canoe the sport of the winds and the waves, and they patiently expected death, when the inhabitants of Aur sent several canoes to their assistance, and carried them senseless on shore. A Tamon was present at the moment; the iron utensils which the unfortunate men still possessed dazzled their deliverers, and they were on the point of striking the fatal blow, to divide their spoil, when Tigedien, the Tamon of the island of Aur, fortunately came in time to save their lives. When Kadu afterwards offered all his treasures to the preserver of his life, he was generous enough to refuse them: he took only a trifle, and forbade his people, on pain of death, to do any harm to the poor strangers. Kadu, with his companions, went to Tigedien's house, who took paternal care of him, and conceived a particular affection for him, on account of his natural understanding and kind heart. According to his reckoning, it must be about three or four years since his arrival here. Kadu was engaged in the woods when the Rurick came in sight, and he was speedily sent for, as they expected from him, who had travelled far, and was generally accounted a very sensible man, an explanation of this strange phenomenon. He had often told them of ships, which, though they had visited Ulle during his absence, he had heard of; he even knew the names of two men, Lewis and Marmol, who had come from the great island of Britannia; and he, therefore, by the description, knew our ship. Being very partial to the whites, he urged the islanders to go on board, which they, at first, declined, for, according to tradition, the white men devoured the black. How they came to this opinion was an enigma to us, for, except an ancient tradition, that, at a very remote period, a large ship had sailed past Kawen, they had no other idea of European ships, but such as had been communicated to them by Kadu. His promise to harter some iron for them, at last induced them to come on board, and here he immediately remained with us, as the reader is already informed. The precaution with which we had him watched was quite superfluous; he slept quietly during the night, and awoke with the first dawn of morning, cheerful and happy.

Lieut. Kotzebue sailed on the 24th of February, for the island of Stobual, near which the Rurick cast anchor, in eight fathoms, on a bottom of fine coral. Five boats which had followed the Rurick from Aur, and in which there were three tamons, or chiefs, Tiarsur, Lebeuliet, and Kadu's benefactor, Tigedien, then went on board the vessel:—

Kadu, who had been presented with a yellow cloak and red apron, walked proudly in his ludicrous finery, without condescending to notice his companions, who gazed on him with astonishment from their boats, and could not conceive the metamorphosis. In vain they cried "Kadu! Kadu!" He did not deign them a look, but walked proudly about on the deck, always taking care to turn himself in such a manner that they might be able to admire his finery. When I learnt that there were three tamons in the boats, I commissioned Kadu to invite them, as I could not extend the permission to all the savages on account of their numbers; he felt greatly honoured, conducted himself with much dignity, and, after a short speech, first introduced to me Tigedien on deck, as the most distinguished. This old man, with silver-white hair and beard, had a venerable and pleasing countenance, but his tall strong body was bent with age. He presented me with some rolls of Mogan; and, while I was conversing with him, Kadu invited the other chiefs, who were likewise very old, on board. The dress of the tamons differed but little from that of the other savages; they were only more tattooed, and wore round their necks ornaments of fish-bones, which I afterwards learnt supplied the place of orders. Kadu, to give himself consequence, conducted the guests about the ship, gave them explanations of all the wondrous things which they saw, and knew how to conduct himself so cunningly, as to make it appear that he had a perfect idea of every thing he tried to explain; he talked with particular diffuseness on trifling subjects, and generally produced laughter. When they saw a sailor take a pinch of snuff, and questioned him, who had never seen it himself, he was not at all embarrassed; he took up the box, and certainly told them many surprising things respecting it, as they listened to him with the greatest attention; but when, to make the matter quite plain to them, he took up the snuff to his nose, he threw the box from him, and began to sneeze and to cry so immoderately, that his astonished auditors ran from him in different directions; but he soon collected himself, and knew how to turn the affair into a joke. Kadu's explanation of the cannon convinced us that he was acquainted with them; for he told them that if the islanders ventured to steal any thing, they would beat down all the cocoa and bread-fruit trees with them; and further related, that Lewis and Marmol, in their visit to Ulle, when the inhabitants had stolen something from the ship, had not ceased shooting down the trees till the property stolen had been returned. Setting aside this little difference, they must have conducted themselves with much humanity, as Kadu had a very great respect for white men, and liked so much to be with us. The tamons now attempted to disavow him from his resolution, but he only shook his head, embraced me, and said, "I remain with you wherever you go!"

We learnt that there was still another chief, of the name of Lamary, under whose power the island groups, from Aur to Bigar, were subjected, and who was now absent to assemble a military force, with which he intended to seize upon the group of Mediuro, lying to the south of Aur. Its inhabitants often make incursions upon Aur, Kawen, and Otdia, to seize provisions, of which they are in great want, on account of the numerous population. An incursion on Lamary's island, by which a man lost his life, was now to be punished. Kadu told us that the most shameful pillage was committed upon Otdia; the enemy destroyed every thing they could not carry off. By this information the riddle was solved, why we every where had found newly planted trees. The people appeared to us unfit for war, and their short miserable lives confirmed us in this opinion. We now learnt that even the women take a part in the war, loaded with baskets filled with stones, which they throw, as they form the rear-guard, over the heads of their warriors, into the hostile army; they likewise afforded succour to the wounded, and Kadu, who has been in many such battles, assured us that the women were of great service in war. Tigedien, the most distinguished of the three chiefs, supplied the place of Lamary during his absence, and was treated by the people with extraordinary respect. Lebeuliet, the second in rank and dignity, is possessor of the group of Kawen, but resides, in time of peace, in Aurick, and the young chief there, as well as the amiable princess, are his children. Tiarsur, the youngest of them, possesses the group of Otdia, and is father to our old friend Aurick; and it afforded him great pleasure that we were able to give him some account of him. The tamons returned to Stobual, with many presents, whither they also invited me; but as I had still to make observations to determine the situation of this place, I deferred my visit on shore. Kadu wished to accompany the tamons, which I permitted him to do, though I was firmly convinced, that inconsistent and sickle as the South Sea islanders are, he would not return. He was carried off in triumph. All the canoes followed that of Tigedien, hence, elevated to the rank of a distinguished man by our favour, he occupied the place of the tamon. In the afternoon I went on shore, and immediately took an excursion, accompanied by the active tamon Tiarsur. The island of Stobual is half a mile in length, and a quarter of a mile in breadth; the fine mould forms here already considerable hills. The palm and bread-fruit trees thrive extraordinarily, and I was agreeably surprised by a young plantation of twenty banana trees. There is more here than on the other islands; they daily brought us some of it. That the most, compared with that of the Sandwich Islands, is very small, is probably owing to the want of moisture, though the people assured me that they would thrive very well, if they were not so often destroyed by the inhabitants of Mediuro. Very numerous habitations convinced me of the thick population of this island. In my promenade I came up to the habitation of Lebeuliet, the chief, where a considerable number of men and women formed a circle round Kadu, who had been attracted by his new costume; but I was astonished when I saw him make a speech, at which his audience almost melted into tears; one old woman sobbed aloud. Tigedien's eyes were bathed in tears, and it was easy to observe the effort which it cost Kadu himself to suppress his emotion. He frequently mentioned Aur, Ulle, and Totabau. I was not sufficiently master of the language to understand the connection of the speech, but my supposition seemed correct, that he was taking leave of the chief and the people. As much as I could understand from it, he first spoke of his sufferings on his voyage from Ulle to Aur, painted the generous reception of Tigedien, and concluded with the hope that he might, one day, through me, see his native home again. When Tigedien now began to speak, Kadu shed a flood of tears, the people were deeply moved, and an affectionate embrace of Tigedien and Kadu closed this truly affecting scene. Kadu accompanied us on board, and, as his determination to remain with us appeared to be immovable, he was received into the cabin among the officers, which flattered him very much, as he easily perceived the difference between us and the sailors, and thought he, belonged to the tamen of the ship. He sat with us at table, accustomed himself with incredible readiness to the use of knives and forks, and, in fact, conducted himself with as much propriety and good manners as if he had long associated with civilized people. Our gentlemen treated him with so much kindness that he soon became very much attached to them, and they likewise were happy to have him about them, on account of his good qualities. I cherished the hope, that when we had learnt better to understand each other, I should obtain from him much information, as well respecting the Carolinas, as the newly-discovered groups of islands.

Eddock now made a last effort to induce Kadu to return with him, but he still refused, although he appeared to suffer much in parting with him. On the 27th of February, the Rurick left Aur, amidst the sound of drums and the songs of the savages, which Kadu thought was done to wish them a good voyage: Kadu, to whom a shirt and a light sailor's jacket had been presented, appeared delighted with his dress and in excellent humour, till the motion of the ship made him low spirited and sea-sick. The vessel sailed for the group of islands called Ailu; three boats approached, in which Kadu recognised some old acquaintance, with whom he held a long conversation. The narrative proceeds:—

'Near Ailu, three boats immediately came up to our ship, and Kadu, in his sailor's dress, did not neglect to place himself on the deck, in such a position that he could be distinctly seen. He condescendingly called out to them that he was Kadu, they need not fear to come on board; but they, scarcely trusting their eyes, did not venture, till after they had had a long conversation with him. After they had sufficiently examined and admired the dress of their old friend, he explained to them with much dignity all the other objects, and thought it quite natural that they should behave to him with as much submission as if he had been a distinguished tamen. Afterwards he had even the politeness to accompany them on shore, and took, without ceremony, the place of honour in the canoe; the simple savages sung and rejoiced, and carried him on their shoulders through the water, without considering that he had only been a common man like themselves a few days before; a zeal which he probably heightened by some old nails which he took with him from the ship to give to them. When he arrived on shore, he sat down with much gravity; they all surrounded him, standing, and he related to them his important adventures and experience.'

Kadu again went on board with Lieut. Kotzebue, and the islanders presented them with several coco-nuts, without desiring any thing in return. When off the group of Suwaroff Islands, our author continues:—

'Two of Kadu's fellow-sufferers, whom Lamary had brought to this island, came to us; one of them, a very old man, was particularly beloved by Kadu, and he resolved to take him with him without saying a word to me. The old Carolinian was beside himself for joy; but fell into a violent passion when I refused his request. He abused Kadu, and besought me to leave the latter in his stead; and in vain were all my representations, that he could not endure a voyage in his old age. I would willingly have complied with his unremitting entreaties, if I had not expected his death almost to a certainty. After the islanders had sufficiently admired all the treasures, Kadu asked my permission to accompany them. M. Chamisso also went, to make himself farther acquainted with the island. The old Carolinian was obliged to be taken by force into the boats, as he would absolutely stay; and they all left us. In a few hours M. Chamisso and Kadu returned on board, accompanied by several canoes filled with coco-nuts. They had not been able to land, as it was impossible to penetrate into the basin of the group, on account of the small opening and the contrary wind; and on the outer side they were unable to pass on account of the violence of the breakers, through which Kadu and the other savages swam, while M. Chamisso waited his return in the boat. I now again represented to Kadu, that it was the last moment that he had to reflect. I told him that we should never return to Radack; that he could have no hopes of ever going to Ulle; and that he had to expect a long and fatiguing voyage. He threw both his arms round me, vowed to remain with me till death, and nothing remained for me except to keep him, and with a firm determination to provide for him as a father. He distributed in haste all his treasures, and we left Ulrick.'

The Rurick encountered a dreadful tempest, which alarmed Kadu very much, as he said he expected that the white waves would kill the poor ship. Kadu soon gained a knowledge of the Russian language, so that conversation was pretty well conducted. Nothing gave him so much astonishment as mountains of ice and snow, and no wonder, since he had seen nothing but low islands, covered with the loveliest verdure. He one day caught some flakes of snow on his hand, and was seized with shuddering when he saw them dissolve:—

'Kadu, who found himself very well in Onalashka, though he did not like the air, was much surprised that he did not see a single tree on the island, and that neither coco-nuts nor bread fruit were to be had. He took a lively interest in all the new objects which he saw; the Aleutian mode of living under ground did not please him at all; he thought it was better in Radack and Ulle, and asked us whether people lived so at St. Petersburg? We gave him such a splendid description of that city, that he was seized with the greatest desire to see it soon. He looked at the large oxen with astonishment and fear; and his joy was without bounds on being informed, that the meat which we ate daily on board the ship, was the flesh of these animals. We asked him why he was so rejoiced, and he timidly confessed, that he thought we ate men, and that it might one day be his turn. Soon after our departure from Radack, he had been present when a barrel of salt meat was opened; he observed a piece of the ribs; he remembered the warning of his friends, not to go with us, because we ate the blacks; from that moment, the poor fellow regarded himself as ship-provision, and looked forward, with horror, to the moment when we should be in want of food.'

A man on horseback, which Kadu saw at Woahoo, frightened him very much, as he thought him a dreadful monster. The Rurick afterwards sailed to Otdin, where Kadu saw Lagedinck, and several of his friends, to whom he related all his adventures while on board:—

'On the 3d of November, in the morning, M. Chamisso returned with Kadu, and I was disagreeably surprised with the news, that the latter intended to stay here. It was but yesterday that he promised never to leave me, and this sudden alteration of his resolution was quite an enigma, which Chamisso soon solved. Kadu had learnt on shore, that his little child in Aur languished very much after him, ran about in the woods all day to seek him, and could not sleep in the night. This news had softened his paternal heart, and brought him to the determination of remaining here. He seemed still to struggle with himself, when he related it to me with much emotion; but when I, though with a heavy heart, as I really loved him, approved his plan, he resolved to execute it, and promised to raise our plantations with affection, and to call the different plants by our names. Future navigators will therefore find, instead of yams, taro, and potatoes,—timaros, tamisios, and totabus. Every one on board the ship would know from his own mouth whether he really intended to leave us; and he told to each, individually, how his child called "Kadu" in the woods, and could not sleep in the night. The separation was very painful to me, and I could only console myself with the idea, that he might be useful here, and would not, perhaps, long survive in our cold climate. As he intended to leave the ship to-day, because we sailed to-morrow, we all collected presents for him. He looked at his treasures with mute astonishment, and was only afraid that the Radackers could not resist the temptation of robbing him. I did not doubt that Lamary, as soon as he heard of it, would not fail to take from him the greatest part, and to avoid this, left some very considerable presents for him also. The old chiefs of Ormed and Lagediack were not forgotten. Some hogs and dogs, which I intrusted to Kadu's care, were then put into the boat, and I accompanied him with Chamisso on shore, he having previously taken an affectionate farewell on board the ship. Lagediack received us on shore, gazed with astonishment at the treasures, which were spread out, and was enraptured at the presents given to him. Kadu's riches I had brought into Rarik's habitation, where he concealed them, and the islanders, who were delighted at the sight of them, were, perhaps, already forming plans in secret, for appropriating them to themselves. To protect Kadu as much as possible against such an event, I intended to make an exhortation to all the savages. Lagediack immediately despatched two cryers, who went about the island, and made known his orders, that they should assemble. Some drums were beat, and all the inhabitants of Otdia, men, women, and children, were soon assembled. They were informed that Kadu intended to remain here, and that I was going to speak to them on the subject. The people, full of expectation, formed a circle, in the middle of which stood Chamisso and myself. Kadu, in the mean time, dressed himself in Rarik's house, probably to make a strong impression on the savages, on this solemn occasion. After we had been waiting for some time, he at last came out of the house, with measured paces; he had put on a white shirt, a sabre buckled round his waist, which he held naked in his right hand, and his head covered with a straw hat. The Radackers were astonished when they saw him enter with a serious countenance with his murderous weapon, and he sat down with much gravity on the branch of a tree. The sun had already set, when Kadu made the following speech, in which he had been tutored. I must previously observe, that Kadu, from our accounts, had formed a very high idea of the tamon of Russia, of whom he told the Radackers a great deal. "The great tamon of all tamons," said he, "of the land of Russia, has commanded that Kadu shall remain here, to take care of the plants and animals left here by the Russians. Nobody dare hinder him on pain of death; on the contrary, every inhabitant shall assist him to cultivate the land, for which he is to be rewarded;" though the promised rewards were to arise from their labour itself. I also permitted myself the following fiction, in order to give more weight to the speech: "A large ship will come from Russia in ten months, to bring the Radackers iron and other necessary articles; but if it finds that the plantations are destroyed, the guilty persons will be punished with death! Let nobody venture to rob Kadu, or to do him any injury; this crime will also be punished with death." At the conclusion, I promised large rewards to such as should, on the arrival of the ship from Russia, come on board with their new cultivated fruits. Kadu delivered his speech with much dignity; the islanders promised faithfully to fulfil our wish, and, to make them acquainted with my great power, I had given orders on board, to fire, on a signal being given, two guns, and to throw up a rocket. It was now quite dark; I told the islanders to look at the ship, in order to see the fire with which we would punish their disobedience. The signal was given, the cannons thundered, and the poor savages were petrified with terror; but the rocket caused still more alarm, which; hissing through the air, illuminated the whole island. Lagediack threw both his arms round me, and begged me to put an end to the terrific scene; but Kadu was much pleased at the impression the fire had made, for he now thought himself secure against any attacks. Some presents which I distributed restored tranquillity. We gave Kadu two copper medals with the portrait of the emperor; the one he was to wear himself, and to present the other to Lamary, in my name. He resolved to bury some of his treasures, and go with the rest to Ormed, to his old benefactor. On taking leave, Kadu seemed to be fully sensible how hard it was to part from us, for he cried like a child, and implored me to come again. The attachment of this good-hearted man moved me very much, but I was still more deeply affected with the universal lamentations of the savages at our departure. Lagediack kept close to me, and frequently asked me whether we would really return. Men, women, and children accompanied us to the boat; Kadu went on before with a drawn sword; and the torches, with which they lighted the way, gave the whole procession a very solemn appearance. After we had put off, they all sat on the shore, and joined in a song, in which our names were frequently repeated.

Paramythia; or Mental Pastime; being Original Anecdotes, Historical, Descriptive, Humorous, and Witty: collected chiefly during a long residence at the Court of Russia, by the Author. 12mo. pp. 175. London, 1821.

THAT several of these anecdotes are original and that some of them are true, we will not deny; but few, very few of them indeed, are either descriptive, humorous, or witty. The author, who appears to be an artist that has passed many years in Russia, gives 'a local habitation and a name' to almost every fact he relates, and identifies himself with them. He is anxious to convince his readers that every anecdote is now published for the first time, and yet we meet with many old acquaintances among them. Who has not heard of the Highlander, who, on seeing a pair of snuffers for the first time, snuffed the candle with his fingers, and deposited the snuff in the socket; and yet our author relates this as having occurred to his own servant, a Russian boy!

We should not have noticed even this stale joke (and it is not the only one), had not the author assumed a high a tone as to the positive originality of every anecdote. We have another objection to this volume, less indurible even than its dullness and insipidity,—the silly plan of ushering in every 'Scrap,' by a sort of meretricious common-place sentimental introduction, which frequently has nothing whatever to do with the particular anecdote it prefaces. But a trace to criticism, and let the author speak for himself, which he shall do in a few of the best anecdotes we can glean from his volume:—

'General ——— was one of the parvenus, lifted, by the French revolution, from obscurity; his father having held the situation of Swiss, or porter, to Louis the Sixteenth. When appointed, by Bonaparte, ambassador to the court of Russia, he was much in the habit of boasting in society and at court, of his estates and possessions in Languedoc, Champagne, &c. &c.; upon which, a very witty and beautiful lady, the Countess Valerica Zooboff, said to him, with great naïveté, "Languedoc, Champagne: mon cher général, et moi je vous croyais toujours Suisse."

'In the reign of the Emperor Paul, his regulations and orders were promulgated with such rapidity, that it could only be equalled by the counter-orders that were often within a few hours issued. It was, indeed, impossible to know how to act, as to avoid offending, which gave rise to some one wittily observing, it was all

"order," "counter-order," and "dis-order."

"On birth days and other great occasions, it is usual for the foreign consuls to go to court. The consul went; and, placing himself in one of the rooms, took his station as usual, waiting to be presented when the empress passed by. The master of the ceremonies announcing, as she walked on, the names of the noblemen and gentlemen present, at last announced, 'the British Consul, Mr. C—.' The consul bowed, but unfortunately standing under a cut-glass chandelier, and being somewhat fidgety, as most of my countrymen are upon great occasions, had got somehow or other the toupee of his bag-wig entangled in the wire of the drops; so that, when he bowed (and that he did very low), there was at least two feet between his bald pate and the suspended perrwig, and he could not, on rising, get his head into dock again. The smothered laugh was against him, and it required all his good sense and good nature, when he got home, to make so unlucky a day as pleasant, as he did most others, to his amiable family."

"A very hospitable and very rich English merchant, in the city of St. Petersburg, who was much in the habit of receiving the young noblemen and gentlemen who visited that city, had at his table one day an English traveller of rank, who had that morning been to see the collection of wild beasts. On expressing his surprise that a large elephant he saw there should be able to endure the severe frost of so cold a climate, the merchant (to set him right on the subject) told him, that her imperial majesty had often said she would never again receive elephants as presents, as they were the most expensive appendages of her establishment. Each elephant, said he, eats a pond, or about forty pounds weight of nutmegs every day, to warm its system. The traveller stared, calculated the expense to a fraction, noted the information he had received in his common-place book, and, in his next letter to his honoured papa and mamma, delighted them with the result of his judicious statistic inquiries."

"Count Stroganoff, president of the Imperial Academy, a post he filled with infinite credit to himself, as he was truly a man of taste and virtue, so was he a nobleman of large fortune, great wit, and polished manners; and he had a splendid establishment. His urbanity led him to keep open table; and, indeed, so liberal was he in this respect, that on those days when he dined with his sovereign or with his fellow-peers, the table-cloth was still spread, and the guests very cheerfully set down to the repast, choosing one among themselves to do the honours of the feast. I was frequently one of his excellency's guests; and one day, when every thing went on well, the count got so happy, that, after the company had taken the usual parting glass of sparkling champagne, he ordered his butler to bring more. The man, who always stood behind the count, did not whisper, but said, quite loud, il n'y en a plus. The count told him to go to his friend at the wine cellar, and get more. Point d'argent, point de Suisse, votre excellence. What then? said our noble host, wont he trust me any farther? Non, Monseigneur, was the reply. Why, then, sit still, gentlemen, sit still, and we must be content with a good glass of frozen punch till my rents come in. Aha! pour le ponce si vous voulez, j'ai les moyens, said the butler, rubbing his hands with delight, and running away to make it."

"When the present emperor came to the throne, and people were allowed to walk, ride, and dress rationally, and not like the old-fashioned wax-figures of the fifteenth century, her imperial majesty enjoyed, in common with others, this national reformation. She was walking in the summer-gardens, dressed with tasteful simplicity, and being really a beautiful well-formed interesting person, was noticed by an officer in the guards, who, having only seen her at court in a hoop-petticoat, lappets, and all the other cumbersome paraphernalia, did not know her. He was much struck with her, accosted her, and went a step too far in his behaviour and importunities. The empress was obliged to call a court servant to assist her escape from this enterprising knight, and, when she got to the palace, mentioned the circumstance to the emperor. He soon discovered the offender, but contented himself with saying, next morning, on the parade, that some officer in his guards had greatly insulted a lady who was dear to him in the summer-gardens: that when he relaxed the strict sumptuary laws which lately existed, he meant his subjects should enjoy a rational liberty; but he was sorry to find it had already degenerated into licentiousness. He further added his hope that such improper conduct would never be repeated; and concluded by trusting the gentlemen around him would think him mild, when they were told it was her imperial majesty who was the unfortunate lady so offended."

The Young Ladies' and Gentlemen's Arithmetic; illustrated by upwards of 400 Original Examples, and intended as an Introduction to the Author's Complete Course of Arithmetic. By W. H. White, of Bedford. pp. 108. 1821.

THE importance of arithmetical and mathematical science, needs no eulogium. Among the various authors, compilers, and editors, who have used their endeavours to encourage so laudable a pursuit, none are so eligible, none so successful, as those that express their intentions in simple terms and avoiding technical phraseology and abstruseness, are, paradoxically speaking, when most learned, most easily understood. Mr. White's work, though one of the least, is one of the best, cheapest, and most perspicuously written works of the kind which we have ever reviewed.

Foreign Literature.

Histoire des Français.

History of the French. By T. C. L. Simonde de Sismondi. 3 vols. 8vo. pp. 1517. Paris and London, 1821.

A HISTORY of France has long been a desideratum in the literature of Europe; and yet there is scarcely any subject which affords such ample materials. France has long been reproached for a want of historical talent; that reproach can attach to her no longer, since she has produced one of the most able historians of this or any age in the person of Sismondi. This gentleman is well known in the literary world, by his history of the Italian Republics, a History of the Literature of the South of Europe, &c.; and his well-earned fame will now be rapidly enhanced by his history of the French. In a very able Introduction, he thus states his views of history generally, and the cause why the French have been defective in this branch of literature:—

"We may, I think (he says), state generally, that the great cause of the coldness of the history of France, and of almost all modern histories, is the want of truth; of that complete, unreserved, unbiased truth, which is found only in the histories of antiquity. No modern history is absolutely free from those obligatory falsehoods, those conventional flatteries, those respectful reticences, which destroy at once our confidence in the historian, and our understanding of the events which he relates. The religion and the policy of the state, those two grand levers of human society, have never been approached with entire frankness: historians have never ventured openly to attach blame wherever they thought it deserved. Even those writers who dared to attack the church or the monarchy, have veiled accusations, often exaggerated, under protestations which were no less false. Their declarations of respect were no less false. Their declarations of respect were to mark their aggressions; they seemed to reckon on their readers not taking all their words literally; and they have exerted much ingenuity in depriving themselves of the character of sincerity, which is, of all others, the most essential to those who desire to be listened to. The slavery of the press has not alone hindered those who have written history from telling the truth as they had seen it and knew it to be. The authority which is ascribed to past times, has disfigured historical criticism, by rendering it subservient to every party, and to every kind of ambition. Many great writers have not hesitated to distort facts, in order to sanction, under their guarantee, opinions which they would have ventured to lay down in theory: many others have fancied they saw in the past, every thing which they desired in the present. They have sought in history the rights of the present generation, and not examples to serve posterity as guides; they have applied to past ages for the limits of the prerogatives of the throne, or those of the liberties of the people, as if nothing could exist now but what had existed formerly; and truth has suffered, because all parties have disfigured ancient events, to convert them into arms in favour of new pretensions.

Speaking more particularly of the history of France, he says,—

‘Writers have always attempted to render it subservient to establishing the rights either of the kings, of the dukes and peers of the parliaments, of the prelates, or of the people, instead of investigating the errors of every species of power, to avoid them in future. Men no less ingenious than learned, have, on this occasion, done violence to all facts, in order to bring them in support of their own theories.’

‘The partiality which most historians have imposed on themselves as a national duty, fancying that their patriotism commanded them to be the advocates of the nation and its princes, and to show, in spite of the testimony of foreign historians and of subsequent events, that all the kings of France were good or great men; their armies always victorious, and their people (except when they threw off legitimate authority) always loyal and happy. To dissimulate the faults of the government is, in the historian, still more imprudent and criminal. In collecting national records, we should think less of the reputation of the dead than of the advantage of the living. Clovis, Philippe le Bel, or Louis XIII. will not suffer by the reproaches cast upon their memories; but the sufferings which they inflicted on their cotemporaries will be renewed for us or for our posterity, if we do not learn by their example what perfidy may be allowed to false piety, what crimes may be hidden under the cloak of policy, what cruelty may be the consequence of a single weakness: if we do not see in all the abyss to which absolute power leads.’

The rigid plan which M. Sismondi has adopted in his own work, is thus stated:—

‘My work was begun and completed from the originals, according to the advice which I formerly received from the great historian, John de Muller. I studied history in the cotemporary writers. I endeavoured to represent it in the light in which it appeared to them; and it is only after having exhausted these original authorities, and formed an unprejudiced opinion from them, that I had recourse to subsequent writers. Then only I often learned the existence of historical controversies, of which I had not before suspected the possibility. I have lost something by this process; but the contrary method would, I think, have been more injurious. History, thus contemplated at its source, appears to me so new, so different from what I supposed it to be, that I seem to myself to have gained more by guarding against the prejudices of compilers, than I can have lost by renouncing the aid of their information.’

That portion of M. Sismondi's history, which has now appeared, embraces a period of six hundred years, from the fourth to the tenth century, and, consequently, includes the monarchs of the Merovingian and Carolingian race. The unimportant events M. Sismondi passes over slightly, but when he comes to subjects worthy of his pen, he labours them with great talent and ingenuity; hence the history of Pepin, Charles Martel, and Charlemagne, are admirably written; the last in particular, which is by far the best portion of his valuable work. We have already mentioned that M. Sismondi draws his facts from the original sources, and not from modern writers; and an instance of the value of such a plan is found in the letter to Louis the Germanic, in which the clergy condemned the memory of Charles Martel more than a century after his death. This letter has been generally misquoted; but M. Sismondi thus gives it from the original:—

‘It is because Prince Charles, father of King Pepin, was the first of the Kings and Princes of the Franks to divide and separate the property of the church, that, for that cause alone, he is damned eternally. We know, in fact, that St. Eucherius, Bishop of Orleans, whose body rests in the convent of St. Fridon, being in prayer, was carried into the world of spirits; and that, among the things which he saw, and which the Lord showed him, he recognized Charles exposed to torments in the lowest depths of hell. The angel who conducted him being interrogated on this subject, answered, that, in the judgment to come, the soul and body of him who takes away the goods of the church shall be exposed, even before the end of the world, to eternal torments, by sentence of the saints who are to judge with the Lord. The sacrilegious plunderer shall be laden with the penalties not only of his own sins, but of the sins of those who had bestowed their property, for the love of God, on holy places, on the lamps of divine worship, on alms to the servants of Christ, and for the redemption of their own souls. St. Eucherius, when he came to himself, called St. Boniface, and Fulrad, abbot of the convent of St. Dennis, and first chaplain of King Pepin, to whom he related these things. He recommended that they should go to the sepulchre of Charles; and that if they did not find his body there, it would be a proof of the truth of his vision. Boniface and Fulrad accordingly went to the convent, where the body of Charles had been interred; and having opened his tomb, a dragon instantly sprung out of it, and it was blackened in the inside, as if he had been burnt. We ourselves have seen men who lived till our times, and who were present at these occurrences, and they attested the things which they saw and which they heard. These things coming to the knowledge of Pepin, he caused a synod to be assembled at Leptines, at which St. Boniface, together with George, a legate of the Apostolic See, presided. We have the acts of this synod, which attempted to restore all the ecclesiastical property which had been taken; but, as Pepin could not restore them all, on account of his war with Gaifer, Prince of Aquitaine, he at least mortgaged them to bishops, directing that they should pay tithes, and that each household pay twelve pennies to the church till the whole could be restored.’

A history, written with such care and such talents as this author has displayed, needs no other recommendation; it must necessarily supersede every work on the subject.

The Mediator,

AN OCCASIONAL PAPER,
No. I.

Cogito, ergo, sum.—DESCARTES.
I think, therefore, I exist.

It may naturally be required at the hands of the writer of this paper, to advance sufficient reasons (provided he hath them) for the revolutionary spirit evidently betrayed in the very title of his work: the why and the wherefore of his most unheard-of temerity in presuming to deviate from the supreme authority of Steele, Addison, and Johnson, to follow the more questionable one of Hawkesworth, in daring to insult the sense of the people of England, by using more than three syllables in the name of his paper. This abuse of language (which Mr. Locke hath unaccountably omitted in his chapter so intitled), as it nearly concerns the interests of science, and strikes at the root of learning in general, the title being that part of a work by which alone its merits may be properly determined, and the knowledge of titles being that upon which the fame and character of our profoundest scholars depend; this, most flagitious of all attempts at undermining the fabric of our glorious constitution, demands some account of the causes which led to its commission, which may palliate though they cannot excuse it.

To so reasonable a request, the author hopes the following will afford a full and satisfactory answer; especially to those who are of an argumentative and a logical turn of mind, for to none other doth he profess himself accountable; for, as Mr. Locke justly observes, 'God made us men, but left it to Aristotle to make us reasonable creatures'; and, therefore, one might as lief expect to find truth in the bottom of a well, as to pretend to any degree of rationality without having sounded the profundities of irrefragable logic. The author takes this to be evident to the most illiterate, and so without farther delay will proceed to his justification.

His first reason, then, for the choice of the above title, and which, indeed, may seem to render all other superfluous, is this, videlicet: it suiteth his own fancy (this may be called, in the vein of Touchstone, the reason unmanly; or, after the practice of the schools, the reason, which is no reason at all).

To those accustomed to the logical method of proof, and the strict deduction of the conclusion from legitimate premises, any other reason will doubtless appear unnecessary; but, lest any scruples might arise in the minds of juvenals in ratiocination, there is another argument scarcely less cogent than the above, which is of that species beautifully denominated by Father Malebranche, 'knock him down,' and whose efficacy, both physical and metaphysical, he is said to have confirmed, by repeated experiment on the head of Antouy Arnauld, doctor of the Sorbonne, in their contest concerning the Theory of Ideas.

Secondly, then, the paper called the Meditator, is so denominated, because &c. If the reader remain not unconvinced, we must only hand him over to Pyrrho or David Hume, as one guilty of incurable scepticism; his last mode of argument being, that it is most approved use among the orators of the present day, and, indeed, to speak the truth on't, is wholly unanswerable.

The fair sex, indeed, of whom, in the outset, the author professeth himself a respectful and distant admirer, may require a looser and more popular explanation; and, though he cannot consider himself strictly as accountable to them, yet as Cules potest pungere anak (an elegant rendering of our vulgarism, 'a giant may sting a giant'), I would not wish to offend them by neglect.

Thus, then, to address them in propria persona (proxies in such matters being rather unlucky). As there hath already appeared a paper of this description, intitled 'the Bee,' I at first had intended, in order to make something of a flush, and shew what a noise it should create in the world, by giving it a title of similar import, to have christened it 'the Humbug;' but this thought I dropped, and for the following reason: I wished to give the public some insight into the manner of my own life and conduct. Now, these are peculiarly meditative, as will appear in the sequel, and hence have I chosen the appellation of Meditator, as a suitable title for papers which contain the history of myself. This, then, is a kind of a reason for the singularity of my option, but is not much insisted on, the two first being more conclusive and logical.

These papers, therefore, shall be devoted exclusively to myself, and if any one should be so of undiscerning a genius, as to prefer reading the life of Julius Caesar or Alexander the Great, I can only say to him, with the Archbishop of Grenada, 'Fare thee well, Mr. Gil Blas, and I wish thee a little more taste.' First, therefore, the public may be anxious to have some assurance that they are not holding evil communication, and that I am neither what the Spaniards have heretofore affirmed of our nation in particular, nor what my Lord Monboddo hath indubitably demonstrated of all nations in general, i. e. neither a devil nor a monkey. The following description of my outward man will, I hope, set their fears at rest. But, first, I beg leave to mention an attribute of mine, which, although not strictly referrible to my exterior, is yet a tacit proof that I shall become highly popular. I suppose if I can show any physical similitude between myself and the Spectator, it will be a sufficient passport to similar immortality, and though I may hereafter write blasphemy or sheer nonsense, my claim to a seat on Parnassus beside him, will be as undoubted as that of his shad-

dow. Listen, then, O Isles! I'm as silent as Queen Cleopatra in balm! and in this particular differ from the Spectator only in the cause of my silence: his was voluntary, mine, alas! is not so. Should I ever dare to write an epic, it shall begin with—'Hail, holy Babel,' or some such.

As to my physiognomy, I confess it is directly the reverse of my prototype. His, as he tells us, was curt and compressed, like the Dutch countenance of a lady's snap-dog. Mine, on the contrary, is rather of the Manchegan countour, as that of the monk of St. Francis,—pale, thin, and long, rather peculiarly cast, yet not so much so as to be fairly called ugly, grave as ever Cassius', and slightly inclined to the melancholy.

Now, sir, I warrant me, your superficial thinker will adduce this discrepancy from the prince of periodicals, as an argument against my wit, as my similitude, in point of taciturnity, was in favour of it; but, sir, on the contrary, I pledge myself to prove from this very discrepancy, and that logically too, the very opposite conclusion.

As thus, sir, I take as an undoubted premiss, the following proposition: Every man who possesseth a short phyz is a brilliant wit, for the truth of which we have a complete logical induction in the aforesaid example of the Spectator. If it be said this induction is vicious, being but a singular instance, evetible by an opposite one, my response comes as pat as a knight to a distressed virgin, though they should have as little probable connexion as the moon with a pot of ale; videlicet:—though the Spectator is certainly but one, I believe it will be allowed that he is a host in himself, so that, instead of one instance, we have a host of them, and so complete our induction sufficiently. Again, I take as an axiom, what I dare say the reader, having gone thus far with me, will find little scruple in granting, viz. that my head is turned; and being turned on the pillar of my neck, so us to bring the flat of the nose to an horizontal position, I believe it will be allowed that my visage is now as short as one could wish, when it is recollected that I premised a deficiency in its breadth, when lying in a natural position. Hence the conclusion is obvious, and my adversary's argument goes for nothing. Having satisfied the acute and metaphysical as to this point, it only remains to say that my person corresponds prettily with my countenance, being spare though not ill-turned, my chest a little in the shade of my head and shoulders, and my waist not larger than that which might be supposed to fill a moderate lady's arms.

It may concern the public to know that I am about the middle size, wear a glass, and take my pocket handkerchief out of my left skirt. I declare, on the veracity of the oaks of Dodona (and that was never questioned, notwithstanding that a wooden prophet is somewhat akin to Dagon), I have no means of coming at the precise year in which I was born; for, being yet unmarried, there has been no perennial growth by which my age can be accurately computed. It may be said, even if there had, I should not have been an atom the wiser; such growth as I allude to, being coeval only with the date of marriage, and therefore in any case can be of no chronological importance, unless, like Eve, I was married the day I was born. But this objection is futile, and may be answered satisfactorily in this wise. That, beside marriage, by the laws of uxorious Scotland, legitimating all offspring antecedent to that blessed ceremony, and thereby giving the happy bridegroom a legal claim to an ex post facto coronation, I say, beside such consideration, it is on all hands allowed that before the performance of that laudable act, we are as nothing; our years of singleness vanish noteless amid the infinite waste of eternity, and our existence is nothing more than a state of lifeless vegetation, unless a man can be said to live who enjoys his health, his book, his friend, and his bottle, in comfort, peace, and serenity of mind—barely; an assertion which manifestly outrages all decency and common sense.

I have been thus particular in describing my person and physical qualifications, for another reason beside that cited above, viz. that of satisfying the vast curiosity which the public must undoubtedly have about every item which goes to make up the sum of my attributes; and, indeed, I have to apologise that my printer hath not as yet hit off a proper design of me, to embellish the head of this paper. For my own part, I wished to be drawn in my college academicals, with my right hand firmly grasping Aristotle's Logics, and an owl (emblematic of my wit) perched upon my left shoulder. To give life and truth to the picture, I might also be drawn as devouring a custard fresh from the pastry-cook, and wrapt in one of my own Meditators; which would be at once a sign of my affluence and the estimation in which my work will be held by the public. But my printer is more ambitious: he wants me to agree to a device which shall represent me on Parnassus, and in the following position.

My body being thrown into the attitude of a fathered Mercury, with the finger and thumb of the right hand, I tweak Homer by the nose, taking Virgil under the short rib with the other; at the same time, my left foot is to be placed accurately on the culminating point of Shakespeare's belly, a section of which, perpendicular to my leg, being supposed parallel to the horizon: i. e. Shakespeare being on the flat of his back, the effect of this pressure on the aforesaid parts may be duly notified by a correspondent protrusion or expulsion of his eyeballs and tongue. My body being thus firmly supported upon one leg, the supernumerary one may be employed in dispossessing Milton, fundamentally, from his seat in the clouds.

Though I may thus be supposed to have gotten rid of my ablest antagonists, yet, the lower seats being still occupied by the inferior scribes, who are nevertheless generally most troublesome and clamorous about their right of precedence, they remained yet to be disposed of. It was here the invention of my printer shewed itself most happy, in the choice of a delicate and appropriate emblem. 'Twas a long time, indeed, before I could prevail upon the rascal to let me into what he called his master-stroke, which is this: he is to be introduced under a petticoat—as the Genius of Poetry, performing the part of my auxiliary, by emptying a chamber-pot on the heads of those who are seated below.

This design seems to me to border somewhat on the ludicrous, beside the conceit implied in it being rather presumptuous; for though I confess I am not without the—

Itch of picture in the front,

With bags and wicked rhyme upon 't,

yet I think the reader will agree with me as to the propriety of a few alterations I suggested, but to which the printer hath some unaccountable objections.

As I never perceive the spirit of composing so strong within me as when I am about going to sleep, I propose that Parnassus shall be converted into my flock-bed (which can be done by a few strokes of the brush); Homer's nose into the snuff of a candle I have just extinguished with my fingers, and Virgil into a favourite cat, in the act of suffering for her depredations on my cream-basin. A joint stool, upon which I step when getting into bed, may appropriately represent Shakespeare, and my printer may retain his original occupation, merely substituting his own posteriors for Milton's, which would considerably improve the back ground, as Milton was, by all accounts, disproportionately heavy, in the last part of him which he shewed to the public. Thus, the reader will perceive the wonderful economy and keeping of my group; a printer, a joint stool, a candle, and a cat, perform all that was ever done on Parnassus by Homer, Virgil, Milton, and the Genius of Poetry.

My printer is, however, not quite satisfied with the part assigned him, but I hope to bring him round. His own device he calls by the name—Poet's Pinnacle, but will not allow mine to be denominated Printer's Province. I shall duly communicate to the public any future particulars of this proceeding, which I shall judge to make for their interests. P. WILDERSENE.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—The impartiality and candour ever observable in the conduct of your paper, has induced me to trouble you with a few remarks on National Education,—a subject, sir, which I conceive will not be misplaced in a work whose aim is the welfare of society, and whose objects of research must naturally embrace every institution connected with the improvement and instruction of mankind. Should the following observations meet your approbation, by giving them an early insertion, you will oblige

Your constant reader and correspondent, B.

ON a reference to the page of history, even in the earliest ages of society, we may discover the rudiments of national education. The Jews, as the most regularly organized nation, might, indeed, have been supposed to have pursued some fixed plan in the education of their progeny, since they lived under a divine legislation, whose principles were pure and wise as the Being from whom it emanated. But such was the complicated nature of the Jewish economy, so numerous its legal requirements, and so extensive the application of it civil as well as religious enactments, that some fixed system of national education became necessary to instruct the people in all the particulars of their duty. This task was assigned to the high priest and his assistants; and it was positively commanded that the whole law should be read over once every seven years, at the feast of tabernacles, in solemn assembly of all the people; and the substance of it, as contained in the Song of Moses, should be learned by heart by every Israelite, and that every king of Israel should be obliged to make a copy of it, with his own hand, from that which was committed by Moses to the custody of the Levites, for his own private instruction. The Rabbies add, that if the king had not written a copy of it before he came to the crown, he was obliged to write two afterwards, the one to be deposited in his treasury, and the other to be kept about him for his daily meditation and direction. But, from the perfection to which this people arrived, at a very early period, in the arts and sciences, we are led to conclude that their great legislator, Moses, 'who was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians,' was careful to have them properly instructed in those trades and employments which would be so necessary to their prosperity when they came to be established as a nation in the land of Canaan.

But it is not to the Jews alone that we may refer for arguments in support of a national system of education, as every regularly established colony, however small in number and rude in manner, affords an example of its practice; though, to the persevering industry of Dr. Bell and Mr. Lancaster is to be attributed the state of perfection to which it has now arrived. After the controversy which has so long subsisted between these two champions of learning respecting their several claims to originality, I shall not dwell on the comparative merits of either, but view the system generally, as a public institution, whose ultimate object is the instruction of the rising generation.

Religion, the knowledge and practice of which involves both the temporal and eternal welfare of the human race, is here, as it was with the Jews, the great end and aim of the institution; and its principles, though they may be differently explained in the two establishments, are so clearly developed in both, as to lead the pupil to an intimate and practical knowledge of the duties he owes to God, his neighbour, and himself. As the application of this system extends at present only to the children of the poor, the studies are confined to reading, writing, arithmetic, and needle-work, of the steady improvement in which, as well as the orthodox opinions of the children in the important article of religion, the yearly examination of the several schools offer convincing evidence. These elementary instructions, however excellent and useful in themselves, have been objected to by some, as being defective in extent; and it has been inquired, to what end is all this learning, if the children, when dismissed from the school, are totally ignorant of every means of gaining a livelihood? This observation has been particularly made relative to the girls, who, on going out to service, have been found totally incapable of every domestic employment, and qualified only for sempstresses and nursery governesses.

Though this is an evil of which there are too many examples (I may say in both sexes), yet it appears not to be without remedy; and, accordingly, means have been taken in an establishment at Mile End, to institute a manufactory, on the same principle as that at the school for the blind, where the various handicraft trades are taught. But this still appears to embrace only the boys, whilst the girls remain unacquainted with domestic employments. It has been suggested, that this may be remedied by sending out each girl above ten years of age, in regular rotation, one day in each week, to the houses of respectable families in the neighbourhood, to assist the servants, for their keep, by which means they will in time be qualified in those employments, on which, from their station in society, they will most probably depend for their livelihood.

If this plan was generally adopted, the evil complained of would be effectually remedied, and society at large proportionately benefitted. The extravagance, insolence, and ignorance so generally found among servants, and the high wages they frequently demand, would by this means be removed, whilst the instructions they had imbibed in the school, would tend powerfully to correct that looseness of morals, at present so lamentably prevalent among this class of society.

All this could be easily effected by the agency of the mistresses of the schools, who, by inquiry, could ascertain the proper places to send the girls to; and there can be no doubt but every respectable housekeeper would willingly embrace such an offer, if made on the terms proposed. Let the plan be but generally adopted, and society will quickly find the benefit of its operation.

FOREVER.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Can you serve me, your most humble servant? Forever! You may depend on my importance, and find me in many places,—since an election never takes place without me, and I am there used in the way of expressing the highest triumph. Whenever your most Gracious Majesty George the Fourth appears in public, I am uppermost on the lips of his subjects. I was also to the lonely woman who is departed, of much consequence; and yet time shows how little I am attended to. I am used more than on occasion sanctions in many of your domestic circles, 'Forever quarelling!'—Then reproached as a sot,—'Forever drinking!'—As a book-worm,—'Forever reading!'—Sometimes 'Forever gossiping!' That woman's clack—is Forever going? Her ladyship—is Forever painting? And then, cries the wrathful divine, a wicked man—is 'Forever d—d!' I sincerely trust, sir, I am quite secure from any condemnation, seeing that happiness—is Forever sure! Doubtlessly so; yet pardon me, sir, if I tell you that an illiberal critic—is Forever abusive! I have great complaint to make against those persons who leave their property so illiberally, and to be so soon possessed. Why not leave it Forever? Ah! sir, how immense would my wealth be if I could ever hope to be in possession of it! which, like happiness to the fond pursuer, is ever within view, but never within grasp. I should be more successful if an angry foe called Never were not opposed to my interests; however, Sometimes aids my cause. Whatsoever, Whosoever, and several other relatives have my warmest thanks, and, to prevent your disliking me, reject every article sent you of every other description, since I assure you, with great modesty, there can be no writer like one who writes— FOREVER!

LORD MAYOR'S SHOW.

SCARCE the shrill trumpet or the echoing horn
With real impatient chides the tardy men,
When Thames, meandering as thy channel flows,
Its ambient wave Aurora's Lord surveys:

No prouder triumph, when with eastern pride
The burnished galley burst upon the tide,
Thy banks of Cydnus say—'tho' Egypt's queen
With soft allurements graced the glowing scene;
Though silken streamers waved and all was mute,
Save the soft trillings of the mellow lute;
Though spicy torches chased the lingering gloom,
And zephyrs blew in every gale perfume.
But soon, as pleased they win their way,
And dash from bending oars the scattered spray,
The dome wide spreading greets th' exploring
eyes,
Where erst proud Rufus bade his courts arise.
Here borne, our Civic Chief the broken steer,
With pointing fingers, numbers o'er and o'er;
Then pleased around him greets his jocund
train,
And seeks in proud array his new domain.
Returning now, the pond'rous coach of state Rolls o'er the pavement that groans 'neath its weight,
And as slow paced amid the shouting throng,
Its massive frame majestic moves along,
The prancing steeds with gilded trappings gay,
Proud of the load, their accepted lord convey.
Behind, their posts, a troop attendant gain,
Press the gay throng, and join the smiling
train;
While martial bands with nodding plumes appear,
And waving streamers close the gay career.
Here too a Chief the opening ranks display,
Whose radiant armor shoots a beamy ray;
So Britain erst beheld her troops advance,
And prostrate myriads crouch beneath her lance;
But though no more when threat'ning dangers nigh,
The glittering cuirass clasp the warrior's thigh;
Aloft no more the nodding plume waves;
Or polished helm bedecks his manly brows;
A patriot band still generous Britain boasts,
To guard her altars and protect her coasts;
From rude attacks her sacred name to shield,
And now, as ever, teach her foe to yield.

A COMPARISON.

THE dew-drop that glitters on you blooming rose,
That sparkles so beauteous and bright,
The transience of this state of life truly shows,
And how certain and swift is its flight.

That dew-drop will waste when the bright sunny ray

Shall around all its richness and sweetness be spread,

And that glittering brightness will all fade away,
And naught shall remain in its stead.

When once 't has dissolved, it will never again
Grace the air in which lately it shone;

But, like ended life, may for ever remain
Deplor'd, tho' for ever 't's gone.

Like the dew-drop, life glitters and glories awhile,

In the face of the sun and its ray;
But destruction and death do around them

both coil,
And both swiftly, alas, fade away.

A moment they glitter—a moment they glow,
And look as for ever they 'd last;

In a moment they flee,—all that's left is to know

That they were, and that now they are past.

THE CULPRIT AND THE COLONEL.

A TALE OF TRUTH.

THE other day, a hardy son of Mars,
Whose front bears many honourable scars,
Whose sun-burnt brow oft dropp'd the briny sweat

Within the torid zone, in dog-star heat,
Was very dry, but fate severe

Denied the price of one poor glass of beer;
Hard was his case, indeed, so let me tell ye,
The veteran stripp'd his back to serve his belly,

For which poor back was doomed, with martial
rigour,

To pay with skin for linen and for liquor.
The appointed morning came, the bugle's throat

Warned the battalion to the fatal spot,
Where the drum-major, with his hateful squad,
The instruments of torture had displayed;

The colonel gave command the lash to ply,
And thus the veteran spoke and heav'd a sigh—

Thus he remonstrated; for no condition
Could bring him to the meanness of petition:

'Tis hard this back, which ne'er was turned on foe,

Should, for a trifle, such treatment undergo,

§ Struck dead—Gloss. Conquered, sub-

While others, whom I easily could name,
May with impunity commit the same.
Sir, in your regiment there is a man
Who from his neighbour stole a fine new suit;
You know the thing was done, you know the man,
Yet on the business you've been always mas-
I humbly own I merit well the lash—
But why make fish of one and fether feed?
The colonel wisely look'd, and Heracles aside,
And swore it was an arrant lie by G—;
'However,' he added, 'name him, and by
heaven,
Thy sentence every lash shall be forgiven.'
The culprit sternly answered, 'that I can',
And (as the prophet said of old,) 'thou art the
man

Who stole the suit—nay, more, upon my life,
In that same suit you stole your neighbour's wife!

To call this truth I can't, indeed, pretend,
But this I can inform you, to be brief,

The colonel heard it scarcely to an end,
When off he sneaked—not much unlike a thief. D. H.

TO THE MEMORY OF A COURIER.

TEN winters 'tis indeed—it seems but yesterday—

Since round the social fire-side, snugly placed,
The joke was wont to glad the merry circle,
And thine among the rest;

And now! where now? companion of my youth—

Inseparable, till Death's icy touch
Chill'd all the springs that once gave play
To soul as lively as e'er warm'd mortal.

Where now, Companion—nameless—whittles!

Alas! 'twere task full hard to trace a vestige
Of thy corporeal frame—except, perhaps, a bone

Might still remain, memento of thy being;
All else commingled with the dust—
Corrupted—withered into naught.

Sad thought! but thought ineffably more do-mal,

Were this the goal—the all-concluding aim!
No; thine immortal soul has wing'd its way
To realms of happiness serene,
To realms where sorrow, sin, corruption, are unknown,

And yet regret thy earlier call to bliss:
Regret the summons of a much-lov'd kinship
To inherit the reward of spotless youth!

Wouldst fain withhold him from eternal bliss;
Nay, wouldst almost drag him back to this pilgrimage,

To taste a little more thy bitter cup,
And mid allurement stand the test still longer.

Till, per-adventure, man's most deadly foe
Had so wound round him as to make his chain
To heaven full problematical—How strongly
How paradoxical a proof of friendship!

To wish him here again—again to struggle
With the world's evils—sorrow, pain, temptation.

And for what? to exchange a few more woes
Poor benefit, to set against the chance
Of deviating from the narrow path to glory?

No; let us rather feel contented—grateful
That he has been removed from jeopardy
Before temptation had the power to warp him
Grateful that he has gone to blissful mansions
Where he, please God, shall ever nise us,
There in celestial harmony to dwell for ever.

The Drama.

DERRY LANE.—On Saturday night, unold favourite made his first appearance for the season at this house, and was received with that ardent joy which always welcomes Munden after a temporary absence, however short. The part selected for him was Peter Post Obit, in the comedy of Folly as it flies. This is one of the worst comedies of a bad school. Its author, Reynolds, was a man of dramatic ingenuity, who knowing the stage and the talents of the performers well, wrote every piece for the moment and for the individuals. His comedies were for an age, and not for all time, and he might have increased them as the managers do their free admissions, 'not transferable.' Why this comedy was chosen we know not, unless to put Munden's talents to the severest test, by showing how much he could make of a bad part, and much he certainly did make of it. His anxiety to avoid the duel with Curator, and when that could no longer be done, his eagerness to render it harmless, were in admirable humour; but his best scene was his triumph after the bloodless rencontre. He returned from the field waving his pistol with great courage, and singing, with exultation, 'None but the brave deserve the fair;' fresh with his blushing honours thick upon him, he braved Dr. Infalible, and upon the bare supposition of an insult, threw his card on the floor, as valiantly as ever champion threw a glove. Munden's drollery in this scene was rich and exuberant. The part of Tom Tick was originally written for Lewis; on this occasion it was ably personated by Mr. Elliston. Harley's Dr. Infalible, Knight's Gilbert, Coper's Melmoth, and Mrs. Edwin's Lady Melmoth, all possessed as much spirit as the characters were susceptible of, and the comedy, on its revival, was well received.

On Monday, a new musical comedy, in two acts, was produced, entitled Maid or Wife, or the Deceiver deceived. It is founded on a French piece, in one act, performed last season at the Argyl Rooms; it has, however, been considerably altered in adapting it to the English stage. The following is an outline of the plot:—

Sir George Rakewell (Elliston), a gay married baronet, who affects to be very uxorious, has a smart valet, Ready (Harley), to whom he has promised annuity, so long as he shall remain single. Ready is, however, privately married to Fanny (Miss Copeland), a villager. Lady Rakewell being from home, Sir George goes to the village to seek a pretty girl he had seen, and gives Ready orders to assume authority, in his absence, over the other servants. Of this Ready avails himself, orders dinner, and the chair to give his Fanny a drive. Sir George returns, after an unsuccessful search after Fanny, who is the new object of his passion;—she returns at the moment, and Sir George believes this to have been managed by Ready as an agreeable surprise; the dinner provided for Ready and his wife, is served up to Sir George and Fanny, and Ready is obliged to wait on them at table. Tormented with jealousy and trembling for his annuity, he despatches a messenger to inform Lady Rakewell that Sir George has been taken seriously ill. She returns, and, after some amusing incidents and well sustained equivokes, the marriage of Ready is discovered, and, though dismissed from the office of valet, he is made steward.

This piece is, we understand, the first production of a gentleman, who has also composed and selected the music. The plot is light, and the dialogue possesses little merit, but the situations are admirable, and the succession of incidents so rapid, that the attention is kept on the qui vive the whole time. The acting was very good; Miss Copeland, who has been transferred from the Surrey Theatre, where she was a great favourite, made a most successful debut, and played with great spirit. She sung a gay lively air, in the second act, with much taste, and was loudly encored. Harley was excellent in Ready; and in any thing bearing the semblance of an intrigue, few play better than Elliston. The piece was completely successful.

COVENT GARDEN.—On Tuesday night, Goldsmith's admirable comedy, She Stoops to Conquer, was performed, for the purpose of introducing Mrs. Chatterley on this stage. We have seen this lady passing from one theatre to another, and gradually improving in every character she undertook, until we now find her at home, in one of the great winter theatres, and supporting characters in the first line of her profession. In the part of Miss Hardcastle, Mrs. Chatterley gratified the wishes of her best friends. To the most judicious conception of the character, which, however, is very original, she added a share of spirit and vivacity, and an arduous and intelligence which rendered it admirable. With a good person, highly expressive features, and a voice which is at once agreeable and well managed, she secured the audivided approbation of a crowded audience, and proved herself worthy to sustain the high rank she had assumed. The whole of the performance was received with great applause.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—This theatre closed its season on Friday night, with an address, spoken by Mr. Terry, in which is the following passage:—'Our short summer privilege gradually encroached upon, and each succeeding year made less and less by the invasion of the winter houses, has at length been entirely taken away from us by one of them. Since, then, the winter theatres are becoming summer ones, and are striving utterly to deprive us of that small portion of the year which had hitherto been left free to our use, it is but fair, (indeed it is the only chance we have remaining,) that we, availing ourselves of the full extent of the royal license granted to the property, should, in return, endeavour, as much as possible, to make the summer theatre a winter one.'

We know of no circumstance connected with the drama which has given us so much pleasure as this declaration on the part of the managers of the Haymarket Theatre. We understand that the royal license extends to eight months, and since the experiment of producing a company independent of the two great theatres, has been tried and succeeded, we trust they will 'spin their term of freedom out to its due length.' It is a duty the proprietors owe to themselves, whose property has been invaded by an unfair monopoly; it is due to the public, who has been liberal in its support of this theatre; and, above all, it is due to the legitimate drama, to preserve its last remaining temple from the profanation of spectacle and pantomime. This is a subject on which we feel ardently, and, therefore, though we dismiss it at present briefly, we shall feel it our duty to return to it soon.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mr. Dibdin is determined, that if his autumnal season is short, it shall be 'a merry one;' a succession of novelties have been performed; and Miss S. Booth, who would be an acquisition to any theatre, has supported some of her most favourite characters, particularly Priscilla Tomboy, Amanthis, and Little Pickle, in which it would be difficult to find her equal. Notwithstanding nine theatres are now open nightly, in London, the Surrey has had an ample share of that patronage which it so justly merits. There have been some new appearances, of which we shall speak in our next.

ADOLPH THEATRE.—Two new pieces have been produced at this house during the week; the first, intitled the Marriage Bachelor, is a spirited version, in one act, of the French piece brought out at Drury Lane on the same evening, under the name of Maid or Wife. The names of the characters are altered, but the plot and the principal incidents are of course the same. The parts sustained at Drury Lane by Mr. Elliston, Harley, and Miss Copeland, were, at the Adolphi, filled by Mr. Burroughs, Wrench, and Mrs. Baker (from the Haymarket), who played very well, and secured the piece a hearty reception. On Thursday, a burletta, called Love's Alarm, was acted for the first time. It, too, seems of foreign origin, and is an amusing trifle. It was well received. The house boasts nightly a crowded audience.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—We have not yet had an opportunity to visit this house, which opened on Saturday last; but if we may judge from the numerous favourite actors engaged, it must present very strong attractions.

WEST LONDON THEATRE.—A theatre, situated in Tottenham Street, which has successively had the name of the Tottenham Street, Regency, and West London Theatres, has made a bold attempt; nothing less than that of producing the Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles, which, says the play-bill, has not been performed for 2240 years. It is adapted to the stage by Mr. Fancit, the author of 'Justice,' the 'Miller's Maid,' &c.; the two first acts are principally from the plays of Dryden and Voltaire, on this subject; the third act is almost a literal translation from Sophocles.—Mr. Huntley, as Œdipus, and Mrs. Glorier, as Jocasta, were powerfully energetic; and Œdipus possesses a sufficient number of classic admirers to make it popular even in the humblest of the minor theatres. Who, then, will dare to say that the public taste is vitiated?

Literature and Science.

Discovery Ships.—Letters have been received from the discovery ships under the command of Captain Parry, dated 16th July; they were then at Resolution Island, in Hudson's Bay. They had met with some heavy icebergs and considerable obstructions from the ice, which was then melting fast, but having passed these inconveniences, they were pursuing their voyage of discovery up the inlet at the north of the bay. The officers and men were all in the highest health and spirits; well and amply provided with every kind of provisions, and delighted with the security and excellence of their ships, which, though deeply laden, had proved quite manageable.

A Danish family, desirous of purchasing a beautiful mummy for one of the museums in Copenhagen, wrote to M. Dumreicher, Danish consul at Alexandria, who, assisted by M. Tedenat, the French consul, procured an intelligent man to set out for Upper Egypt, with a firman from the Pasha, to search the tombs of the ancient kings. For the greater dispatch, they employed two different parties of the natives, from Longsor and from Karnack. The former were the most fortunate, discovering a tomb that had never been opened, and where they found, on the third day, a mummy with five cases; they asked for this 6000 piastres of Egypt, (1331.) which was paid them. The fellahs of Karnack, thus disappointed, and having had three days' toil for nothing, had warm disputes with those of Longsor; and mischievous consequences might have ensued, as their villagers took a part in the quarrel, if the possessors of the mummy had not given 1000 piastres, (221.) extra to the Arabs of Karnack, to whom also some participation was made by those of Longsor. This mummy is the most superb and beautiful of all that have been hitherto discovered. To judge of it from the ornaments in relief, which decorate the cases, and especially one whereon gold has been lavished, from the rich style of the amulets, from the largeness of the papyrus, and all the hieroglyphical embellishments about the body, it must have been that of some Egyptian king or prince. This conjecture is corroborated by the number of cases, as the mummies of the greatest persons in general have only three.

The Russian frigate, Voslock, Captain Bellinghausen, has arrived from a voyage of discovery, &c. in the South Pacific. She reached 70° south, nearly in the track of Captain Cook, and reports his Sandwich land to be an island or islands.

The Emperor Alexander has erected at Abo, in Finland, a magnificent observatory, the direction of which he entrusted to Balbeck, the celebrated astronomer.

Characteristic Anecdote.—When Lord Amherst, on his return from his late embassy to China, mentioned to Bonaparte that the interesting people of the Loochoo Islands, according to Captain Hall's account, used neither arms nor money, Bonaparte broke forth—"No arms! Sacre! how do they carry on war then?" When the same circumstances were related to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he exclaimed, "No money! Bless me! how do they carry on the government?"

Memoir of the Origin, Progress, and Improvement of Glass Manufactures: including an Account of the Patent Crystallo Ceramic, or Glass Incrustations. [By Apsley Pellatt, jun.] Post 4to. pp. 42. London, 1821.

MR. PELLATT, who is connected with one of the most eminent glass manufactories in town, has prefaced the account of a very singular discovery in the art of glass making, by a brief but succinct memoir on its origin and progress, from the glass-houses of Tyre to those of our own times. Pliny informs us, that some merchants being driven by a storm at sea to the mouth of the River Belus, were obliged, during their stay there, to dress their victuals by kindling a fire on the sand, where the herb kali grew in abundance; and that the salts of this plant, on its being reduced to ashes, incorporated with the sand, or with stones fit for vitrification, and thus produced glass; and Mr. Pellatt says, the sand which lay for about half a mile round the mouth of the river, was peculiarly adapted to the making of glass.

The art of glass making was certainly known to the Egyptians, although there exist but few specimens of antiquity to prove the fact. The glass-houses of Alexandria were celebrated among the ancients for the skill and ingenuity of their workmen, and from these the Romans procured all their glass ware:—

In the reign of Tiberius, a Roman artist had, according to Pliny, his house demolished,—according to other writers, was beheaded, for making glass malleable. The Roman architects are known to have used glass in their Mosaic decorations. Several specimens have been found among the ruins of the villa of the Emperor Tiberius in the island of Capri. Similar specimens also are yet to be seen in Westminster Abbey, cemented into the sides of the tomb of Edward the Confessor. They are flat pieces, of about a quarter of an inch thick: the underlayer has a reddish granulated appearance, and is perfectly opaque; the upper surface is of white transparent glass. Between the two is a very thin layer of gold leaf,—the whole being fused into one substance. This description of gilded glass was, no doubt, highly valued; and the perfect state in which it is found, affords a convincing proof that the art of incrustation was, to a certain extent, known to the ancients. The pieces which have hitherto been found, are, for the most part, about an inch square, or of the same size in a diamond form.

During the reign of Nero, great improvements were made in the Roman glass. The perfectly clear glass, which bore the nearest resemblance to crystal, was so highly valued, that Nero is said to have given for two cups of no extraordinary size, with two handles, 6000 sesteritia, or near £50,000 sterling. The inferior kinds of glass had come into such general use in the time of Pliny, as to have almost superseded cups of gold and silver. The glass-makers of Rome were formed into a company, who had a street assigned them in the first region of the city. A tax was laid upon them by Alexander Severus, which existed in the time of Aurelius, and probably long after.

Glass-making in Britain, is supposed to be of very ancient date: if the opinion of Pennant be well founded, of a date prior to the Roman conquest. The art of manufacturing glass into such ornaments as beads and annulets, was certainly known to the Druids.

Our author, after an account of the relics of glass making, at an early period, found in England, notices the state of the art at Achaetee and in China, and then gives the following singular instance of ancient art:—

A most singular art of forming pictures with coloured glass, was practised by the ancients. It consisted in laying together fibres of glass of various colours, fitted to each other with the utmost exactness, so that a section across the fibres represented the objects to be painted; and then cemented by fusion into a homogeneous solid mass. In the specimens of this art which were discovered about the middle of the last century, the painting has on both sides a granular appearance, and seems to have been formed in the manner of Mosaic work; but the pieces are so accurately united, that not even by means of a powerful magnifying glass could the junctures be discovered. One plate described by Winkelmann, exhibits a duck of various colours, the outlines of which are well decided and sharp, the colours pure and vivid; and a brilliant effect has been obtained by the artist's having employed in some parts an opaque, in others a transparent glass. The picture appears to be continued throughout the whole thickness of the specimen, as the reverse corresponds in the minutest points to the face; so that were the glass to be cut transversely, the same picture of the duck would be found exhibited on every section. It is conjectured, that this curious process was the first attempt of the ancients to preserve the colours by fusing them into the internal part of the glass; which was, however, but partially done, as the surfaces have not been preserved from the action of the atmosphere.

Without going further into the history, we shall notice the subject of glass incrustation, which was known to the ancients but very imperfectly. About forty years ago, a Bohemian manufacturer first attempted to incrust in glass, small figures of a greyish clay; and although he was not very successful, the idea was caught by some French manufacturers, who succeeded in incrusting several medallions of Bonaparte, which were sold at an enormous price. England, always remarkable for perfecting the crude inventions of other countries, has done it in this instance:—

A patent has recently been taken out for ornamental incrustations, called Crystallo Ceramic, which bids fair to form an era in the art of glass-making. By the improved process, ornaments of any description, arms, cyphers, portraits, and landscapes, of any variety of colour, may be introduced into the glass, so as to become perfectly imperishable. The substance of which they are composed is less fusible than glass, incapable of generating air, and at the same time susceptible of contraction or expansion, as, in the course of manufacture, the glass becomes hot or cold. It may previously be formed into any device or figure by either moulding or modelling; and may be painted with metallic colours, which are fixed by exposure to a melting heat. The ornaments are introduced into the body of the glass while hot, by which means the air is effectually excluded, the composition being actually incorporated with the glass. In this way every description of ornamental glass-ware may be decorated with embossed white or coloured arms or crests. Specimens of these incrustations have been exhibited, not only in decanters and wine glasses, but in lamps, girandoles, chimney ornaments, plates, and smelling-bottles. Busts and statues on a small scale, caryatides to support lamps or clocks, masks after the antique, have been introduced with admirable effect.

The composition used in the patent incrustations, is of a silvery appearance, which has a superb effect when introduced into richly cut glass. Miniatures, however, may be enamelled upon it, without the colours losing any of their brilliancy; and thus, instead of being painted on the surface of the crystal, may be embodied in it.

A most important advantage to be derived from this elegant invention, respects preservation of inscriptions. Casts of medals and coins present no equal security for perpetuating them. The inscription, when once incrustated in a solid block of crystal, like the fly in amber, will effectually resist for ages the destructive action of the atmosphere. Had this art been known to the ancients, it would have perpetuated to us many interesting memorials. In laying the foundation of a public edifice, an incrustation of this kind will be a record are perennius.

It is probable, however, that a collateral advantage of no small importance will result from the invention, inasmuch as it will tend very considerably to enhance the value of British glass wares, and to extend the application of glass to new purposes of domestic utility. The highly ornamental effect which may by this means be given to glass, will recommend these incrustations in the place of metallic ornaments for door-plates or handles, bell-pulls, and the inlaid work of tables, looking-glasses, and other sorts of furniture, besides plateaus, and the decorations of the table or sideboard. The extension of any branch of national industry at the present time, is a consideration of the greatest moment. Nor will the invention be considered as wholly unimportant as connected with the progress of the arts. Whatever serves to connect more intimately the ornamental with useful, has obviously a beneficial operation more or less directly on the fine arts.

This interesting little work contains several engraved specimens of the art, which are coloured to represent the incrustations; and they are so elegant that there can be no doubt of the invention meeting that liberal patronage which it merits, and that the tables and side-boards of our nobility and gentry will soon be very generally adorned with glass of this manufacture.

Travels in Palestine, through the Countries of Bashan and Gilead, East of the River Jordan; including a Visit to the Cities of Geraza and Gamala, in the Decapolis. By J. L. Buckingham, Member of the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, and of the Literary Societies of Madras and Bombay. 4to. pp. 553. London, 1821.

THOUGH Palestine has been so often travelled by Protestant antiquaries and Catholic devotees, who have written largely on the subject, yet in a field so ample, and embracing so many recollections, there is still left ample gleaming to the industrious and intelligent traveller.

OF Mr. Buckingham's qualifications for the task, his valuable work bears ample testimony, but there is something so romantic in his personal history, that we cannot avoid rapidly sketching it, as detailed in the preface.

A passion for visiting distant regions was a prominent passion with Mr. Buckingham in his infancy. At nine years of age, he went to sea, and, twelve months after, in 1796, he was taken prisoner and conveyed to Corunna, and marched through a great part of Spain and Portugal. When he was liberated, he made several voyages to America, the Bahamas, and the West Indies.

The Mediterranean next became the scene of his wanderings; Sicily, Malta, the continent of Greece, the islands of the Archipelago, the coasts of Asia Minor, and the Gulf of Smyrna gave him a foretaste of future gratification. He next visited Alexandria, ascended the Nile, stopped a short time at Thebes, where he met the accomplished and lamented Burckhardt, and made an accurate chart of the Nile as far as he ascended. In traversing the desert, he was stripped naked among the mountains, plundered of money, papers, arms, and instruments, and left to travel this rocky path naked and bare-foot, scorched by day and frozen by night, in the depth of an Egyptian winter. He was two days without food or water, and the first nourishment he received was some raw wheat. At Cairo

Mr. Buckingham applied himself with great zeal to study the Arabic language, and, after making some progress, he assumed the dress of an Egyptian Fellah, crossed the desert of Suze to examine its port, and, after visiting the most remarkable ruins in Lower Egypt, crossed from Dametta to Rosetta, and returned to Alexandria.

Mr. B., in the dress of a Mamouk, next set out with a caravan of five thousand camels and about fifty thousand pilgrims, for Mecca; the vessel in which he embarked upset in a squall, but he narrowly escaped, and arrived at Jeddah. Here he found a ship, with English colours; bound for India, in which he made the voyage; after a stay of some months in India, he returned to Egypt, well furnished with books and instruments, for the future travels of which his work contains the account. 'So much for Buckingham,' now for his book.

The most novel and interesting portion of Mr. Buckingham's work, is the description of the country beyond the Jordan; and, therefore, from that part we shall principally make our extracts. It was on the 25th December, 1815; that Mr. B. embarked on board a small vessel for Syria. After encountering a severe gale, which the ignorance and incompetence of the captain and crew rendered doubly dangerous, the vessel arrived at Soor, the ancient Tyre. Soor is about a mile in length and half a mile in breadth; it contains about eight hundred substantial stone-built dwellings, besides other smaller habitations for the poor. The dress of the mercantile people, who are chiefly Christians, is similar to that of the same class at Cairo:—

'The women were habited partly after the Egyptian and partly after the Turkish fashion; some wore black veils, with openings for the eyes; others only covered the mouth and the lower part of the face, as in Smyrna; and others again wearing over their heads a square piece of white muslin, which fell low down on the back, had their faces totally concealed by a veil of coloured but transparent muslin, like the women of Mekka and the southern parts of Arabia Felix.

In the court of the house where we lodged, I observed a female, whose garments appeared to resemble those of the Jewish women in Turkey and Egypt. The face and bosom were exposed to view, and the waist was girt with a broad girdle, fastened by massy silver clasps. This woman, who was a Christian, wore also on her head a hollow silver horn, rearing itself upwards obliquely from her forehead, being four or five inches in diameter at the root, and pointed at its extreme; and her ears, her neck, and her arms, were laden with rings, chains, and bracelets.

The first peculiarity reminded me very forcibly of the expression of the Psalmist, 'Lift not up thine horn on high; speak not with a stiff neck: all the horns of the wicked will I cut off, but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted;' similar illustrations of which Bruce had also found in Abyssinia, in the silver horns of warriors and distinguished men.

From Soor, Mr. B. proceeded to Acre; on his way he met with much hospitality, and found that the English were always spoken of with great respect. Our author gives an interesting account of Acre, now called Acco, having changed its Greek for its original Hebrew name; and we pass it over to quote an anecdote of the celebrated Hadjee Ahmet, Pasha of Acre:—

‘He was a man famous for his personal strength, his ferocious courage, his cruelty, and his insatiable avarice, as well as for the great power which the active exertion of all these qualities together procured from him. Some short time before his decease, he was conscious of the approach of death; but so far from showing any remorse for his past actions, or discovering any indications of a wish to make atonement for them, the last moments of this tyrant were occupied in contriving fresh murders, as if to close, with new horrors, the bloody tragedy of his reign. Calling to him his father-in-law, Sheikh Taha, as he himself lay on the bed of death, “I perceive,” said he, “that I have but a short time to live. What must I do with these rascals in my prisons? Since I have stripped them of every thing, what good will it do them to be let loose again into the world? The greatest part of them are governors, who, if they return to their posts, will be forced to ruin a great many poor people, in order to replace the wealth which I have taken from them; so it is best, both for their own sakes and for that of others, that I should destroy them. They will then be soon in a place where they will neither be permitted to molest any one, nor be themselves exposed to molestation. Yes, yes! that’s best!—dispatch them!” In obedience to the charitable conclusion of this pathetic apostrophe, twenty-three wretches were immediately added to the long list of the victims of Jezza Pasha’s cruelty; and, it is said, they were all of them thrown into the sea together, as the most expeditious mode of execution.’

Jezza had likewise in confinement at Caiphor, Naissif Pasha, whom it is supposed he had no intention of leaving behind him; but being probably surprised by death before he had made up his mind on the precise time and manner of his execution, Naissif Pasha escaped and retired to Damascus. This is the Pasha who took possession of Cairo while the French army marched out of it to attack the Grand Vizier, and who so gallantly defended that city against the united force of the enemy under Kleber, during thirty-four days, and at last made an honourable capitulation for his retreat.

In journeying from Acre to Nazareth, Mr. B. observed a party of men and boys playing at cricket, using a round staff for a bat, and a ball neatly covered with goat’s skin, and tolerably elastic. Nazareth, Mr. B. says, is situated in a deep valley, not on the top of a high hill, as has been erroneously stated, but rather on the side of a hill, nearer its base than its summit. The fixed inhabitants of the town are about two thousand, five hundred of whom are Catholics, three hundred Maronites, and two hundred Mohammedans; the rest being Schismatic Greeks. Mr. B. took up his abode at the Franciscan Convent, where he was hospitably entertained. Speaking of the interior of the building, he says,—

‘Over the door of each small chamber, I observed painted a number and Ace Maria, while over that of the Padre Guardiano’s was written his title in addition. On the door of the chamber in which I slept was written Ace Maria purissima, and immediately opposite to it, Hac sunt necessaria, in large Roman capitals.’

Mr. Buckingham, in continuation of his account of this city or village, says:

‘The church of Nazareth is built over a grotto, held sacred from a belief of its being the scene of the Angel’s announcing to Mary her favour with God, and her conception and bearing of the Saviour. On entering it, we passed over a white marble pavement, ornamented in the centre with a device in Mosaic; and descended by a flight of marble steps into a grotto beneath the body of the church. In the first compartment of this subterranean sanctuary, we were told, had stood the mass which constitutes the famous chapel of Loretto, in Italy, and the friars assured us, with all possible solemnity, that the angels appointed to the task, took out this mass from the rock, and flew with it, first to Dalmatia, and afterwards to Loretto, where it now stands; and that, on measuring the mass itself, and the place from which it had been taken, they had been found to correspond in every respect, neither the one by the voyage nor the other by age, having lost or altered any part of its size or shape.’

Proceeding farther in, we were shown a second grotto, or a continuation of the first, with two real granite pillars, of about two feet in diameter at its entrance; and we were told, that one marked the spot where the Virgin rested, and the other where the Angel stood when he appeared to Mary, exclaiming, “Hail thou, that art highly favoured! the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women.” The pillar on the right is still perfect, but that on the left has a piece of its shaft broken out, leaving a space of about a foot and a half between the upper and under fragment. The latter of these continuing still to be supported by being firmly embedded in the rock above, offers to the eyes of believing visitors, according to the expression of the friars, “a standing miracle of the care which Christ takes of his Church,” as they insist upon its being supported by the hand of God alone.

‘The grotto here, though small, and about eight feet in height, remains still in its original roughness, the roof being slightly arched. In the outer compartment, from whence the chapel of Loretto is said to have been taken, the roof as well as the sides have been reshaped, and plastered and ornamented; so that the original dimensions no longer remain; with-in, however, all is left in its first rude state, to perpetuate to future ages the interesting fact which it is thought to record.’

‘Passing onward from hence, and ascending through narrow passages, over steep cut out of the rock, and turning a little to the right, we came to a chamber which the friars called “La cucina della Santa Madonna.” They here shewed us the chimney of the hearth on which Mary warmed the food of Jesus while yet an infant, and where she baked the cakes for her husband’s supper when he returned from the labours of the day. This was an apartment of the house, as they observed, in which the Son of God lived so many years in subjection to man; as it is believed by all, that he was brought up from childhood to manhood in Nazareth.’

‘The fact of Joseph and Mary having resided in this house, and used the very room in which we stood as a kitchen, has nothing at all of improbability in it; and, as excavated dwellings in the side of a steep hill like this would be more secure, and even more comfortable than fabricated ones, it is quite as probable that it might have really been the residence of the Holy Family as of any other, since it is here, in the midst of Nazareth of Galilee, where Joseph and Mary are admitted to have dwelt, and the child Jesus to have been brought up.’

‘The church erected over this sacred spot is large, and well furnished with some few tolerable paintings, but still more gaudy ones. It has also a double flight of marble steps, and a gilt iron railway, leading up on each side of the grotto, which is left open, and faces the entrance to the church, producing an impressive effect. Below, in the grotto itself, is an altar of white marble, very finely executed, and a painting of the Annunciation, of great merit, as far as could be judged in this obscure depth, except that its effect is lessened by a diadem of gold and precious stones on the head of the Virgin.’

‘Among all the pictures I observed a departure from costume and propriety, which could only be accounted for by religious zeal. Joseph, the carpenter, was arrayed in purple and scarlet; Mary, beautiful, and dressed in the richest robes. If the painters could have taken their models from among the same class of people at Nazareth now, they would, perhaps, have approached nearer to truth; as these are, probably, still very similar in person, complexion, and apparel, to those described in the history of those times. In Europe, remote from the scenes themelves, Scriptural subjects may be treated in any way that best displays the talent of the painter; but it is impossible to witness certain delineations of country and costume upon the spot where the scene itself is laid, without being forcibly impressed with their want of even general resemblance.

There is an organ, which is played by one of the friars; an abundance of fonts, and altars, and candlesticks; a fine sacristy, or dressing-room, for the priests; and store-rooms for the moveables of the church, consisting of flags, tapers, silken curtains, silver crosses, incense-pots, &c. exhibited only on festival days.

The synagogue in which Jesus read and expounded the prophet Isaiah on the sabbath, is shown here within the town; while the precipice from which the exasperated people would have hurled him is pointed out at a place more than a mile distant to the southward, and on the other side of the vale. It is more probable, however, that the precipice which overlooks the town was really the scene of this outrage.

Mr. B. ascended Mount Tabor, on the summit of which were three gro-tos:—

In one of these grottoes, which they call more particularly "The Sanctuary," there is a square stone used as an altar; and on the 6th of August, in every year, the friars of the convent come from Nazareth with their banners and the host, to say mass here, at which period they are accompanied by all the Catholics of the neighbourhood, who pass the night in festivity and light large bonfires, by a succession of which they have nearly bared the southern side of the mountain of all the wood that once clothed it.

Mount Carmel, Dora, and Casarea, were next visited by our enterprising traveller, who then proceeded by Jaffa and Ramlah to Jerusalem. When at Jaffa, Mr. B., he says, determined to ascertain the truth respecting Bonaparte's having murdered his prisoners in cold blood; and, therefore, inquired of the son of the French consul, Damiani, who said such massacre actually took place:—

"It was related to us, that Bonaparte had issued a decree, ordering that no one should be permitted to pass freely without having a written protection bearing his signature; but publishing, at the same time, an assurance that this should be granted to all who would apply for it on a given day. The multitude confided in the promise, and were collected on the appointed day, without the city, to the number of ten or twelve hundred persons, including men, women, and children. They were then ordered on an eminence, and there arrayed in battalion, under pretence of counting them, one by one. When all was ready, the troops were ordered to fire upon them, and only a few escaped their destructive volleys. A similar scene was transacted on the bed of the rocks before the port, where about three hundred persons were either shot or driven to perish in the sea, as if to renew the deeds of treacherous murder which the men of Joppe had of old practised on the Jews, and which their heroic defender had so amply avenged."

Mr. Buckingham carefully visited all the holy places in Jerusalem and its neighbourhood, of which he gives a very interesting description, and an excellent plan of the Holy City. While at Jerusalem, Mr. B. learnt that his present Majesty had, the year before, sent a present of £1500 to the guardians of the Holy Sepulchre. Of the friars we are told,—

"The mode of life pursued by the friars, is a mixture of indolence and exertion at intervals; and to them it is certainly not a happy one. They generally retire to sleep at eight o'clock, and are obliged to rise again at half past eleven, to attend the midnight mass. At one they again lie down, and are all stirring at five, the morning hour of service throughout the Holy Land. Coffee is made for them at this hour, and at ten they take an early dinner, after which they sleep until past noon."

On the sabbath of the Jews, Mr. B. attended the morning service at the Synagogue, which he thus notices:—

"After some time passed in reading and responses, we went into the central rooms, which were both of them longer than the outer ones; and at the end of these were curtains for the veil of the temple. In the principal room this veil was of purple cloth worked with gold; and on its centre were the two tables of the law in Hebrew, nearly in the same form as we have them in English in our own churches."

"The priest who officiated had, during this last week, arrived here from Amsterdam. The book from which he read rested on a piece of crimson velvet, worked with Hebrew letters of gold; after an apparent weeping on the part of the people, who covered their faces with the white head-cloth, and moved to and fro as if distressed for the loss of something, a man walked round the synagogue, crying out with a loud voice, and circling the first word only at every subsequent exclamation. This we learnt was the sum offered for the sight of the Tozot or Scriptures. Advances were then made by individuals of the audience, and repeated by the crier, until either a sufficient or some specified sum was raised."

"The priest then made a loud shout, and all the people joined; when some of the elders drew aside the veil of the temple, and opening a recess like that of a sanctum sanctorum, took from thence a cabinet, highly ornamented with silver. In this were two rolls containing the law of the law on parchment, rolled round a small pillar in the centre, which, on being turned, exposed the writing on the roll successively to view. On the top of the roll was fixed two silver censers, with small bells, and it was carried round the assembly, when each of the congregation touched the writing with the cords at the front corners of his head-cloth, after placing these cords to his lips, then across his eyes. The cabinet was followed by a boy bearing four silver censers, with bells, on a stand, and after every one had touched it, it was placed on the altar, in the central sanctuary, before the priest."

From the retrospective view of Jerusalem given by our author, we learn that the city is about two miles and a half in circumference, and that it at present contains about eight thousand fixed residents, one half of which are Mohammedans; but the continual influx of strangers makes the total number of persons in the city from ten to fifteen thousand generally. In identifying the sites of many places mentioned in Scripture, Mr. B. says, the spot where as Calvary, may be still considered the place of the crucifixion of our Saviour, notwithstanding the objections that have been made:—

"The place called Golgotha, and translated "the place of a skull," has been, by all writers, supposed to have been without the precincts of the ancient Jerusalem; but there is no positive authority that I am aware of for such a position. It has been thought, first, that, as a place of execution, it would be held defiling; and next, as a place of burial, that it could not have been included within the walls. We are at least assured that the tomb in which Jesus was laid was near to the place of his crucifixion: "now in the place where he was crucified, there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein yet was never man laid, there laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jews preparation-day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand." It is fair to presume, that a respectable Jew, like Joseph of Arimathea, would hardly have been so near a sepulchre newly hewn in the rock, and in a place that was defiled by being the scene of common execution; and I think it very sufficient to induce a belief that it was not a place commonly devoted to so ignominious a purpose. All the groups represent Jesus as being hurried away by the multitude, who seized indiscriminately upon one of the crowd to bear his cross. "And when they were come to the place called Calvary or Golgotha, there they crucified him between two thieves. None of them, however, speak of a calvary as being a place without the city, or as being a place of public execution, but leave one to infer, that it was an unsuspicious place, just pitched on for the purpose as they passed."

The Revenge of Taran. A Poem.
By Edward Ball. 8vo. pp. 60.
London, 1821.

MR. BALL is, we believe, the author of some dramas, which were produced at the Norwich Theatre, where they were very well received, though we have not heard of their being transplanted to the London stage. The poem of the 'Revenge of Taran' is evidently the production of a gentleman acquainted with the stage; it is highly dramatic, or rather melo-dramatic, and is by no means deficient in those little artifices called clap-traps, which, to possess their due force, are carefully distinguished by a word or two of italics. So much for what we conceive the faults of the poem; and, in justice to the author, we must say, that the language is vigorous, and there are many passages of considerable beauty; the story is one of terrific interest, and it is well-told. The subject and the object of it are thus stated by the author:—

'The subject of this story may be traced to a legend, mentioned by Dr. Johnson, in his 'Journey to the Western Islands,' wherein it is recorded, that, in some remote time, the Macdonalds of Glangary, having been injured or offended by the inhabitants of Culoden, and resolving to have justice or vengeance, came to Culoden while their enemies were at worship, and shutting up the church, set it on fire. Their piper played a tune while the unfortunate victims were burning.

'The design of this story is, to prove that a tale of real horror may be produced by natural means, without resorting to super-human agents, as in the 'Vampire' and 'Frankenstein,' since we rest assured that such characters as are here represented, or worse, actually have existed.'

We shall select a passage from that part of the poem which introduces the legendary tale; it relates to an abused female, who takes shelter at the hall of Inis Thona, with a child in her arms, the history of which is thus unfolded:—

'Full to the sight, her beauteous charge, she offer'd

A blooming child in balmy slumber buried,
Whose form was such as cunning liars give

To Cupid sleeping in seraphic stillness.
This boy! nay, start not, in his infant veins
The blood is noble; hear me, Inis Thona,
I am a wretch, e'en by a witch betray'd.
Once, tho' these looks be bright, I was fair,
And a proud chieftain lov'd, or swore he lov'd me;

Ofte where the green oak hangs its manning shade,

We met in secret, O! I hate the word,
For honour thins not the broad glare of day;

Enough, I was betray'd, despis'd, abandon'd,—
I was a mother, and my guiltless boy
Possess'd no father—nothing, but my shame:
Well, well 'tis pass'd—I am not what I was—
My heart is flint now, I can tell it all.
He that I lov'd, another's prize became,
And e'en the image of himself, my child,
Was doom'd to leave his fond distracted mother.

O! I remember while my te-ris eyes
Bent calmly on the cone of that poor babe,
How my heart swell'd, till it did seem too big
For the narrow limits of its hiding place;
Revenge, I cried, revenge!
Yes, and I call'd on God to witness it.
Months roll'd away, a stern and sullen maniac;
Where'er I pass'd the voice of pity follow'd,
Or fear, with timid step, forsook the path.

'One tranquil eve, serene as hopes of heaven,
As I sat in scenes of strange and wilder'd fancy,
I wander'd sadly from my infant's grave;
On my lone way, for fate need'd have it so,
I met the hapless wife of him I lov'd;
(In one fair hand she led this sleeping boy)—
Is this my hated rival? I exclaim'd—
The fiend was in my heart, my brain, my looks,

And loudly vainly shriek'd that wretched mother—

I said upon her form, the gripe was death,
Black odious death that mars the loveliest vi-sage;

There, as she lay, I laughing gaz'd upon her—
My bless'd eye feasted on her blasted charms,
My glad ear triumph'd in her orphan's cries:
Her son became my prey—I bore him off
Far from the land and dwelling of his fathers,
And swore to train him up a curse, a scourge
To him that had a curse drawn down on me.'

We are tempted to make an extract of a somewhat different description; it is a pretty plaintive song:—

'The Mountain Chief now steers his way
Across the sil'ry water—
And now beneath her lattice greys,
He calls on Owlin's daughter.
Yon waning moon still lights the lake
To guide us safely over,
Then Ella dear, arise, awake,
And welcome back thy lover.

'Alas! alas! brave mountain chief,
The warble is not sleeping,
And the w't' by slain, O mountain chief!
In spite of Ella's weeping.
Come down, come down, my only love,
And let these arms entwine thee;
This faithful breast thy home shall prove—
This fond heart we'er resign thee.

'Strange fated sounds mine ear assail—
I hear some minstrel playing.
No, love, 'tis but the nightingale
That chides our rash delaying.
That sound, 'twas sure my father's rave—
I hear their fierce swords clashing.
No, love, 'twas but some angry wave
The rocky borders lushing.

'Now Ella with her lover flies,
But ere they cross the water,
Lord Owlin, ho! the beadsman cries,
A chief has stol'n thy daughter.
Still fester on that chieftain rides,
O'er moss, and mound, and bair,
Till Ella's angel form he guides
To Kelva's haunted prior.

'They kneel, the hallow'd rites prevail,
And Ella's cheek is blushing,

When lo! adown the sacred aisle,
Lord Owlin's band comes rushing—
A blow from Owlin's warlike blade,
The proud chief moves to slaughter;
O! spare my father, cries the maid,
He comes to bless his daughter.

'Subdu'd, the chieftain drops his brand,
His Ella's wildness heeding,
When, ah! from Owlin's cruel hand,
His gallant breast is bleeding.
He faints, his pale cheek paler grows,
His vain strength death oppresses—
But now, where late heav'n heard his vows,
The chieftain's young life closes.

'Frantic and loud is Ella's grief,
Her gold hair loosely flying,
She kisses wild her murder'd chief—
Help! help! the maid is dying!
The blue beam Ella's eye forsoakes,
Those phrenetic throbs are over—
It breaks, that gentle heart it breaks,—
She sinks beside her lover.

'The church is drear, the requiem slow,
The dirge, too, sadly kneeling—
But sadder far the strain of woe
In childless Owlin's dwelling.'

Sketches of Upper Canada, &c.

By John Howison, Esq.

In our extracts last week from Mr. Howison's interesting volume, we gave an account of Lake Ontario and the falls of Niagara, and we now quote a corresponding notice of Lake Erie:—

'Lake Erie is two hundred and forty-six miles long and sixty broad, at its widest part. The depth averages from fifteen to eighteen fathoms over its whole extent, and, in consequence of this remarkable shallowness, it becomes rough and boisterous when the wind blows strongly from any point of the compass. At these times a very high and dangerous surf breaks upon its shores, which, in many places, resemble the beach of the sea, being strewn with dead fish and shells, and infested with aquatic birds of various kinds. Often during storms the lake is covered with such a thick mist, that it is impossible to see to the distance of ten yards from the shore. The waves then roll with terrific violence from amidst the cloudy obscurity, and suggest to the imagination the appalling dangers which threaten those vessels that are exposed to the tempest; for the navigation of the lake is rendered highly dangerous, by reefs and projecting points of land, and by the nature of the banks, which, towards its western extremity, are so bold and precipitous, that, when a vessel is driven upon them, shipwreck becomes almost inevitable. Scarcely a summer passes in which there is not some shipping lost on Lake Erie. South-west winds prevail much during a great part of the year, and often, for weeks together, prevent vessels from sailing westward; hence steam-boats are the craft best suited for the navigation of this inland sea.'

'When tempests happen upon Lake

Erie, its waters sometimes suddenly rise to the foot of these perpendicular sandbanks, and beat against them with such dreadful vehemence as entirely to cover the beach. Persons travelling upon it during storms have sometimes perished in the waves, being unable to escape their fury; for the lake often rises with such rapidity, that one has no chance of gaining a place of safety before he is overwhelmed by the flood. At these times, the bateaux which coast along are so liable to be driven upon a lee-shore and beaten to pieces, that those who are on board often abandon their vessels and cargo, and try to save themselves.

A person who resides upon the shore of Lake Erie, related to me a very affecting incident which occurred there many years ago. An Indian woman, and her child, who was about seven years old, were travelling along the beach to a camp a few miles distant. The boy observed some wild grapes growing upon the top of the bank, and expressed such a strong desire to obtain them, that his mother, seeing a ravine at a little distance, by which she thought she could gain the edge of the precipice, resolved to gratify him. Having desired him to remain where he was, she ascended the steep, and was allured much farther into the woods than she at first intended. In the mean time, the wind began to blow vehemently, but the boy wandered carelessly along the beach, seeking for shells, till the rapid rise of the lake rendered it impossible for him to return to the spot where he had been left by his mother. He immediately began to cry aloud, and she, being on her return, heard him, but instead of descending the ravine, hastened to the edge of the precipice, from the bottom of which the noise seemed to proceed. On looking down, she beheld her son struggling with the waves, and vainly endeavouring to climb up the bank, which was fifty feet perpendicular height, and very slippery. There being no possibility of rendering him assistance, she was on the point of throwing herself down the steep, when she saw him catch hold of a tree that had fallen into the lake, and mount one of its most projecting branches. He sat astride upon this, almost beyond the reach of the surges, while she continued watching him in an agony of grief, hesitating whether she should endeavour to find her way to the camp, and procure assistance, or remain near her boy. However, evening was now about to close, and as she could not proceed through the woods in the dark, she resolved at least to wait till the moon rose. She sat on the top of the precipice a whole hour, and, during that time, occasionally ascertained that her son was alive, by hearing his cries amidst the roaring of the waves; but when the moon appeared he was not to be seen. She now felt convinced that he was drowned, and, giving way to utter despair, threw herself on the turf. Presently she heard a feeble voice cry, (in Indian,) "Mamma, I'm here, come and help me." She started up, and saw her boy scrambling upon the edge of the bank—she sprang forward to catch his hand, but the ground by which he held giving way, he was precipitated into the lake, and perished among the rushing billows.

The inns of Canada, as might be expected, afford little accommodation; they have all the disadvantages without any of the conveniences of an American inn. A tolerable meal can scarcely be procured at any of them; some of them are not even provided with bread, and if the mistress of the hotel should fall short of tea, she will send one of her children into the woods to gather the leaves of hemlock, hickory, or evergreen, of which she boldly serves up an infusion to her customers. At one of these inns, Mr. Howison met with an Indian named Robert Turkeyfoot; he was a 'very harmless person,' who had only scalped eleven Americans. At the village of St. Catherine's Mr. Howison arrived on a Sunday, and went to church:—

'Most of the young women were adorned with a variety of the brightest colours; (but they did not seem to have adopted any particular fashion, each dressing herself in the style she conceived to be most becoming. There was as much vanity and affectation among them as would be found in a congregation of any country church in England; but they assumed greater airs than rustic females are accustomed to do there. The young men who came to church were generally mounted upon jaded farm-horses, the decoration of which seemed to have occupied more of their attention than that of their own persons; gaudy saddle-girths, glittering bridles, and other time accoutrements, being profusely exhibited by these candidates for the admiration of the fair. Large waggons carrying loads of amphibious Dutch, who had probably vegetated in some swamp during twenty or thirty years, occasionally arrived, and conveyed the ponderous Fraus and Myneheers to the door of the church, which I entered along with the congregation. Presently an old man, dressed in a showy blue coat, white pantaloons, top boots, and plated spurs, made his appearance, and, to my astonishment, proved to be the priest. The form of the service was presbyterian; and during the whole course of it the people continued going out and in without any regard to silence or decorum; while the schoolmaster of the village, with a string of pupils, made his appearance only a few minutes before the blessing was pronounced. At the conclusion of the service the clergyman gave out a hymn, which was sung by a party of young men who sat in the church gallery. The sound of a miserably-played flute and a cracked flageolet, united with the harshness of the voices, produced a concert both disagreeable and ludicrous. When the hymn was finished, the preacher proclaimed several marriages, and dismissed the congregation.'

Between Queenston and the head of Lake Ontario, the farms are in a high state of cultivation, and their possessors comparatively wealthy; but our author represents them as untutored incorrigible beings. While in this part of the country, he witnessed a forest on fire, of which he gives an interesting description—

'The land around was covered with pine trees, and three months' drought had rendered these so dry and combustible, that hundreds of them took fire, in consequence of a few sparks, blown from an oven, having kindled the brushwood beneath them. Immense volumes of black smoke rolled from different parts of the forest, and, when the wind divided these, the flames were seen raging on every side, and ascending to the tops of the tallest trees; while the roaring, crackling, and crashing were incessant, under the cloudy obscurity. Large burning splinters of timber, that must have been detached from trees by the expansive power of steam, were sometimes projected high into the air like rockets, and descended again, leaving a showery train of glowing sparks behind them. The wind was hot and suffocating as the vapours from a furnace, and the vast glare of the conflagration overspread the heavens with a copper-colour most dismal and appalling. The inhabitants around hurried about in the utmost alarm, momentarily expecting that the flames would communicate to their barns and fences; and the tumult was increased by the bellowing of a number of cattle, which had rushed in a state of terror from the woods, where they had been feeding.

'About midnight, the conflagration, which had commenced the preceding day, had in a great measure ceased. Many of the largest trees were charred from top to bottom, and, being now in a state of glowing redness, they stood like dazzling pillars of fire in various parts of the forest. The upper boughs of others were still enveloped in flames, and resembled meteors as they waved in the wind, the trunks from which they projected being concealed by the darkness. In the morning I walked out to view the scene of devastation, which presented an aspect truly horrible. Many hundreds of acres of land were divested of the verdure that had lately covered them. The branches trees stood in dreary blackness, and the wind scarcely sounded as it swept among them. Not a single bird animated the prospect; and the desolate shriek of the racoon, deprived of its den, alone proved that the tenants of the forest were not entirely extirpated.'

Speaking of a body of the Mohawks

Indians, who are in Canada, but much degenerated by drunkenness and depravity, Mr. H. says,—

'The Indians are in possession of some valuable secrets, which nothing will induce them to disclose to any white person. They dye the quills of the porcupine, and other substances, of colours more beautiful and permanent than we know how to produce, and are acquainted with various vegetables that possess strong medicinal powers. Some can prepare a bait which never fails to allure certain animals into the trapset for them; and almost every Indian knows where salt springs are to be found; but these being the resort of deer, &c. they are particularly unwilling to tell where they are situated, lest other hunters should frequent them, and destroy the game.'

Mr. Howison fully believes in the power of fascination in snakes, which has been so often denied by naturalists. He saw a frog fascinated by a snake, and believes that this power is sometimes exerted on human beings; he, however, admits that fear alone is sufficient to produce upon the living system all those effects that constitute fascination. There is a colony formed here by Colonel Talbot, where great numbers of emigrants from the Highlands of Scotland have settled:—

'Great numbers of emigrants, from the Highlands of Scotland, have lately taken lands in the upper part of the Talbot Settlement. These people, with the clannishness so peculiar to them, kept together as much as possible; and, at one time, they actually proposed, among themselves, to petition the governor to set apart a township, into which none but Scotch were to be admitted. Were this arrangement to take place, it would be difficult to say which party was the gainer, the habits of both being equally uncouth and obnoxious. However, the Scotch, notwithstanding their dislike to an American and Canadian neighbourhood, do not fail to acquire some of those ideas and principles that are indigenous to this side of the Atlantic. They soon begin to attain some conception of the advantages of equality, to consider themselves as gentlemen, and become independent; which, in North America, means to sit at meals with one's hat on; never to submit to be treated as an inferior; and to use the same kind of manners towards all men.'

Mr. Howison uses some very illiberal epithets against the Scotch peasantry settled in Canada; he accuses them of ignorance, cunning, and stupidity, and says, 'the ne plus ultra of vanity, impudence, and rascality, is thought to be comprised under the epithet—Scotch Yankee.' Mr. Howison, in travelling, had a creek to ford, which he knew not how to accomplish, until he saw an Indian, to whom he called:—

'When he advanced, I rejoiced to find, by his salutation, that he understood English; and no sooner had I explained the nature of my difficulties, than he cried, "Stop, my friend, be patient, I will assist you." He accordingly began to cut away, with his tomahawk, the ice that projected from the edges of the stream; and having done this on both sides, he told me there was no depth of water, and I of course immediately forded the creek.'

'Perceiving that I was cold, he hospitably conducted me to his wigwam, which stood contiguous to the road, and was rendered comfortable by a blazing fire in front. In the interior I found a woman making leggings, and ornamenting them in the Indian style. At the request of her husband, I seated myself beside her, and entered into conversation with him, in the course of which he gave me a great deal of information respecting himself, and I gratified him by being equally communicative. The Indian wigwam, or camp, is constructed chiefly of bark, and is open in front, that its inmates may sit or lie with their feet to the fire. I found this one extremely comfortable, except when the wind blew the smoke in my face; and I believe I would have requested permission of its owners to pass the night with them, had not a regard for my horse induced me to proceed to the half-way house.'

In the course of his journey, Mr. H. witnessed an amusing scene between a woman afflicted with the rheumatism, and a doctor of the settlement she employed:—

'This gentleman happened to make his daily visit when I was present, and entered the room carrying a pair of large saddle-bags, in which phials and galleps were heard clattering against each other in a most formidable manner. He did not deign to take off his hat, but advanced to his patient, and shook hands, saying, "How do you do, my good lady, how I've done?" "Oh, doctor," cried the patient, "I was wishing to see you—very bad—I don't calculate upon ever getting smart again." "Hoity, toity," returned the doctor, "you look a thundering sight better than you did yesterday." "Better!" exclaimed the sick woman, "no, doctor, I am no better—I'm going to die in your hands." "My dear good lady," cried the doctor, "I'll bet a pint of spirits I'll raise you in five days, and make you so spry that you'll dance upon this floor." "Oh," said the woman, "if I had but the root doctor that used to attend our family at Connecticut; he was a dreadful successful man." Here they were interrupted by the entrance of her husband, who was a clumsy credulous-looking person. "Good morning to you, doctor," said he, "what's the word?" "Nothing new or strange, sir," returned the doctor.—

"Well now, doctor," continued the husband, "how do you find that there woman?"—no better, I conclude!—I guess as how it would be as well to let you understand plainly, that if you can't do her nether no good, I wouldn't wish to be run into no expenses—pretty low times, doctor—money's out of the question: Now, sir, can you raise that there woman?"

"Yes, my good sir," cried the doctor, confidently, "yes, I can—I offered to bet a pint with her this moment, and I'll make it a quart, if you please, my dear friend."—"But, doctor, are you up to the nature of her ailment?" inquired the husband. "Oh, perfectly," said the other, "nothing more simple; it arises entirely from obstruction and constitutional idiosyncrasy, and is seated under the muscular fascia. Some casual excitement has increased the action of the absorbent vessels so much, that they have drawn the blood from the different parts of the body, and occasioned the pain and debility, that is now present."—"Well now, doctor," cried the husband, "I swear you talk like a lawyer, and I begin to have hopes that you'll be pretty considerably apt to raise my woman." The doctor now opened his saddle-bags, and, having set forth many small parcels and dirty phials upon the table, began to compound several recipes for his patient, who, when she saw him employed in this way, put out her head between the curtains of the bed, and cried, "Doctor, don't forget to leave something for the debilitation." When he had finished, he packed up his laboratory, and ordered that something he had left should be infused in a pint of whisky, and that a table-spoonful of the fluid should be taken three times a day.

"Will that raise me slick?" said the woman; "I guess I had as well take it four times a day." As the doctor was mounting his horse, I heard the farmer say, "Doctor, don't be afraid about your pay, I'll see you satisfied; money, you know's out of the question, but I've plenty of good buck-wheat."

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE PERCY ANECDOTES. PART XXIV.

The last number of the Percy Anecdotes is devoted to Pastime, and, among a variety of other amusing articles, contains the following:—

'The City Common Hunt.—The citizens of London were formerly permitted to hunt and hawk in certain districts; and one of the clauses in the royal charter granted to them by Henry the First, says, that they "may have chases, and hunt as well and as fully as their ancestors have had; that is to say, in the Chiltre, in Middlesex, and Surry." Fitzstephen, who wrote in the reign of Henry the Second, says, that the Londoners delight themselves with hawks and hounds, for they have the liberty of hunting in Middlesex, Hertfordshire, all Chilton, and

In Kent, to the waters of Grey, which extends the limits far beyond the words of the charter. These exercises were not much followed by the citizens at the close of the sixteenth century. "not," says Stowes, "for want of taste for the amusement, but for want of leisure to pursue it." Styrpe, however, so late as the reign of George the First, mentions, among the modern amusements of the Londoners, "riding on horseback, and hunting with my lord mayor's hounds, when the common hunt goes out."

"This common hunt of the citizens, the only relic of which is in the Easter hunt, at Epping, is thus ridiculed in an old ballad, in D'Urfey's "Pills to Purge Melancholy," called the London Customs; which shews that of old, as now, cockney sporting was not held in the highest estimation.

"Next once a year into Essex they go;
To see them pass along, O 'tis a most pretty show:

Through Chesepide and Fenchurch Street, and so to Aldgate pump,

Each man with his spurs in horse's sides, and his back sword 'cross his rump.

"My lord he takes a staff in hand, to beat the bushes o'er;

I must confess it was a work he ne'er had done before:

A creature bounceth from a bush, which made them all to laugh;

My lord, he cried, a hare! a hare! but it proved an Kesex calf.

"And when they had done their sport, they came to London, where they dwell,

Their shoes all so torn and scratch'd, their wives scarce knew them well;

For 'twas a very great mercy so many 'scap'd alive,

For of twenty saddles carried out, they brought again but five."

"Great Exploits.—In France, the game was formerly so plentiful, that, according to Mr. Young, there was in the open fields about Mongeron, upon an average, a covey of birds in every two acres, besides favourite spots, in which they much more abounded. On the last day, which the unfortunate Louis XVI. enjoyed in the field, he himself shot 572 head of game, in eight hours.

"The feats of a royal party from Vienna, in the Bohemian territories, in 1753, which continued twenty days, is a curious record of slaughtered game; it gives the names of the twenty-three sportsmen and spoilswomen, and gives the list of game killed by each, commencing with stags, roebucks, boars, foxes, &c. The emperor or himself had the greatest number of shots, namely, 9794, of which 978 were in one day. Her imperial highness the Princess Charlotte was in the field every day, one of which she fired 889 times. The total number of shots was 116,351, and the game killed, 47,950.

"In the year 1758, the Emperor Francis I. had a grand shooting party on the estates of the Prince Colloredo, in Bohemia, which lasted eighteen days. The party consisted of three princesses and twenty noblemen, besides the emperor and prince. They killed, after firing 116,200 shots, 1710 stags; 3216 fawns and deer; 932 foxes; 13,243 hares; 29,543 partridges; 9409 pheasants; 740 larks; 1343 quails; 1967 woodcocks; 513 wild turkeys; 117 wild fowl, and various other birds.

"At a hunting match given by the Prince Esterhazy, the Regent of Hungary, on signing the treaty of peace with France, in a single day's sport, there were killed 160 deer; 100 wild boars; 300 hares; and 80 foxes.

"The King of Naples, in a sporting journey to Vienna, in 1793, through Austria, Bohemia, &c., killed five bears; 1820 boars; 1960 deer; 114 does; 1625 roebucks; 1121 rabbits; 13 wolves; 17 badgers; 16,351 hares; and 354 foxes: the sporting monarch had also the pleasure of doing a little in the bird way, by killing, upon the same expedition, 15,350 pheasants and 12,335 partridges.

"As shots in the field at game, Mr. Jenkins, near Petworth, and Cottesingham, who was formerly game-keeper to Lord Ros, were the best of their day. The former has killed twenty brace of partridges in a day, at forty shots, without selecting the shots, but taking them fairly as they happened; and in four days shooting has never missed. The latter (says Mr. Daniel, in his excellent work, the "Rural sports") I was out with, when he killed, in two days, forty-three successive shots (many of them in corer) at partridge, pheasant, woodcock, and hare; and his style of shooting, when open, and he could give time, was most regularly deliberate.

"In 1810, John Lacy, Esq. of Wimborne Minster, shot, in one day, thirty brace of partridges, ten brace of hares, and twelve couple of rabbits. His day's sport was from sun rise to four o'clock.

"Lord Kingston made a considerable bet that he would shoot forty brace of partridges, on the first of September, on his manor, at Heydon. His lordship shot forty-one brace and a half before sun set.

"1811, Mr. S. Clark, of Worthingham, in Suffolk, engaged, for a bet of fifty guineas, to kill and bag forty-seven shots out of fifty. He killed the first forty-eight, missed the forty-ninth; killed the fiftieth, and continued shooting, until he killed the ten following, making sixty shots, with the loss of only one bird.

"His Grace the Duke of Rutland is very fond of field sports, and is deemed an admirable shot. One day, in October, 1815, this nobleman, when shooting at Cheveley Park, killed not fewer than a hundred and twenty-five head of game, in the course of five hours. These were forty-one partridges; nineteen pheasants; forty-three hares; and twenty-two rabbits.

"Innocent Sportsmen.—In the sporting season of 1784, on the day before one of the annual parties at Clumber broke up, two sets of sportsmen went out, each consisting of three persons, and a bet was laid which should kill most game. Lord Lincoln, General Philips, and Captain Lascelles, were the one party; and their antagonists were the Rev. Mr. Lascelles, Mr. Cotton, and Lieutenant-Colonel Strickland. It was calculated that, on an average, each man of the six got sixty shots. The winning triumvirate killed—three birds!

"In 1806, four gentlemen of Camberwell undertook, for a wager of five guineas aside, to shoot at twelve pigeons, and great bets were depending; but, to the great amusement of the persons assembled to witness the determination of the wager, not one of the competition brought down a single bird!

"Extraordinary Chase.—Many years since, a stag was hunted from Whitfield Park, in the county of Westmoreland, until, by fatigue or accident, the whole pack was thrown out, except two fox-hounds, bred by Lord Thanet, who continued the chase during the greatest part of the day. The stag returned to the park whence he had been driven, and as his last effort, leaped the wall, and died as soon as he had accomplished it. One of the hounds ran to the wall, but being unable to get over it, laid down, and almost instantly expired. The other hound was found dead about half a mile from the park. The length of this chase is uncertain; but as they were seen at Red-irk, near Aunan, Scotland, distant by the post road about forty-six miles, it is conjectured that the circuitous course they took, could not make the distance run less than one hundred and twenty miles!

"Reputation.—Seneca relates, of one Canius Julius, that he was playing at dice when the Centurion, who led a troop of condemned men to death, commanded him also to join them. Having scarcely finished his game, he counted his men, and said to the person with whom he played, "beware, when I am dead, that thou believest me not, and say thou hast won the game." Then bowing to the Centurion, he said, "bear me witness that I have the advantage by one."

"Leaping Treason.—King William the Third was passionately fond of the chase, and made it a point never to be out of his in any leap, however perilous. A Mr. Cherry, who was devoted to the royal family, took advantage of this, to give the most pardonable design which is ever formed against a king's life. He regularly joined the royal hounds, and set himself foremost, and took the most desperate leaps, in the hope that William might break his neck in following him. One day, however, he accomplished what was so imminently dangerous; that the king, when he came to the spot, took him by the hand and drew back. "It is said that Mr. Cherry at length broke his own neck, and thereby relieved the king from his hazard."

"Crow Shooting in Italy.—A noble

traveller gives the following remarkable account of crow shooting in Italy. "Being called up (says the author) early in the morning, a few days after Christmas, we proceeded with two servants about a mile from the city of Milan, and entered a large meadow covered with hoar frost, when my friends conducted me to a cottage, a little on one side of the meadow, where we found five or six peasants, with a good fire, and several fowling-pieces, and abundance of ammunition in readiness. Being told that every thing was not prepared, we drank coffee till the peasants, who had left us about an hour, returned, and informed us that we might proceed as soon as we pleased. We, however, advanced no further than the porch of the house, where, as we waited some time without the appearance of any crows, I was questioning myself what this farce would end in, when we first saw about fifty of them flying at a considerable height, but directly towards us. I was eager to fire at them, but my friend checked my ardour; stay, said he, they will descend presently, and approach so near to us, that we may shoot them without trouble. And soon after, to my utter astonishment, I observed them stop their course all at once, take several circuits round the meadow, and afterwards descend a few at a time upon the ground upon which we were waiting for their appearance. Not knowing the secret, my curiosity still increased, especially as I observed that the whole of them not only descended, but that they seemed to have stationed themselves, as it were, in various parts of the field. But this was not all; for, upon a closer inspection, I found their heads were absolutely fixed upon the ground, from whence, after a struggle of some duration, I saw them successively rising, and apparently with a white cap upon their heads, and which I soon perceived to be made of strong cartridge paper. It was now that this comedy commenced, and began to take a tragical turn; for the crows, to liberate themselves, putting themselves in a number of laughable attitudes, brought forward the peasants, who, clapping their hands, and setting up a loud cry, the motion of the crows became the most confused imaginable; flight, if such an awkward movement deserves the name, was in all directions, often striking against each other, and that with such force, as frequently brought them to the ground. It should be observed, that the noise of their talons scratching upon the thick paper caps that inclosed their heads, had no small effect; till, in the end, taking to our fire-arms, we were employed near an hour in shooting them; at the termination of which, I was informed by my friends, that holes being purposely dug in the ground, and filled with papers of a conical form, and the narrow extremities of the latter containing each a piece of raw meat, it was the smell of the flesh that brought the crows to the spot. It is further to be observed, that the inside of this paper cap was so copiously larded with birdlime, attached so much the closer by the pressure of the crow's heads after the meal, that it was impossible for them to disengage themselves."

The Anecdotes of Pastime are dedicated to the Earl of Darlington; of whom a sporting portrait is given.

Retrospection; a Tale. By Mrs. Taylor, of Ongar. 12mo. pp. 230. London, 1821.

Mrs. TAYLOR is a writer who blends, in the happiest manner, instruction with amusement. This is the character of all her works; whether she be relating the history of 'The Family Mansion,' pointing out the 'Reciprocal duties of parents and children,' giving 'Practical hints to young females, on the duties of a wife and a mother,' describing 'Maternal solicitude for a daughter's happiness,' or teaching children and servants to know their duties to their instructors or their mistresses, she is equally happy in adapting her style to the subject, and rendering it at once useful and attractive. Retrospection is, in these respects, equal to any of the numerous former productions of this lady; and, as few sensible persons can indulge in retrospection without advantage, so very few, we are confident, will read Mrs. Taylor's interesting tale on the subject without pleasure.

The Meditator, AN OCCASIONAL PAPER, No. II.

*Kent. This is not altogether fool, my lord.
Fool. No, faith! lords and great men will not let me; if I had a monopoly on't, they would have part; nay, the ladies, too, they'll not let me have all fool to myself; they'll be snatching.*
SHAKESPEARE.

In my first and last paper, I printed myself out—if I may be allowed to give that expression to the typographical delineation of my 'outward man.' I do not speak of that allegorical device of my printer, in which I am represented as a—

Feather'd Mercury, new-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill, that being rather a representation—though, I confess, an immodest one—of the relations which my figurative parts bear to those of the great geniuses who are indebted to a generous world for leave to sit, night and day, upon forks—yes, forks—and, in return for all their excellent sayings, their infatigable rhymes, which have peopled so many garrets and mad-houses, their spicy jests, and their juicy expressions—out of which is daily squeezed, spirit sufficient to enliven the insipid waterish humours of many a modern invention; in return for these, their authors are permitted, by general consent, to take the benefit of the Phœnician air upon their haunches; and, amid hail, rain, wind, or snow, to enjoy themselves eating grass, like so many Babylonish kings, and swallowing clouds to allay their poetical famine, a-top of a dragon-backed hill, which, I dare say, sprouts ample cushions of mossy plush and flowery velvet, to preserve such sacred and sweet-kissing netherlands from the granulous imbrications of bare earth, and the salient pumells of mountain-pebble.

I say, this is not the delineation I allude to, but to that which I myself, inspired less by vanity than by an empty ale glass, and more by a cup of pindaric beverage than by the ambiguous influence of the moon or stars, with pencil dipped, not in a rainbow, and I'll tell you why,—

First, because it is morally impossible. 'I will hang my bow in the clouds';—now I being but a beast of the earth, and clouds being fowls of the air, there can be no communication between us, unless I were a bat; but I am not a bat, inasmuch as I can distinguish a knave from a minister of state, and that without flying directly in the face of either, which is not what can be done by every one.

Secondly, because it is mathematically improbable that such a thing could be done. For, even suppose I had Pelion and Ossa, and the Peak of Teneriffe, and the mountains of the moon, all clapped on top of one another, like Peter's hats, and Jacob's ladder to boot; and suppose me as high in the heavens as a wild goose, or a poet out of his element, on Pegasus, I say suppose all this; well—I'm here, and there is the rainbow under my nose; well—I present the point of my pencil, when—bah! it's off, like a ghost at the voice of a priest in a holy circle, or a grame rock on a dung-hill, being, indeed, like the ghost, an optical delusion, and as little capable of affording me a drop of good luk as a ghost of braking my back-bone.

But, as I was saying, the delineation I allude to is that which I myself, inspired by what I told you above, and which, I dare say, is as much as any modern author can say for himself,—with pencil dipped in—neither gall nor blood—nor the oil of flattery, nor—

In what, in the name of God? it's so long a-coming, and ashered in with such big insinuations and fearful protractions, that it must scare the senses and revolt the blood, else we shall laugh, perhaps, at a gray mouse disemborned by the opening chambers, or a swollen toad bolting into open daylight, the monstrous pile which inclosed them having shaken to its very centre, by the thick reverberation of its tramontane throes and unnatural labours,—as when the parrot screams from its cage, the monkey chatters on its stand, and the lap-dog yowls from under its mistress's chair, as the brazen knocker thunders through the halls and echoing corridors; the door opens, and who have we? The moon and seven stars, I suppose, dropped from the empyrean, to visit its sister Chastity at the west end; or St. George and the dragon bound hand and foot with a garter,—or the presiding deity of an earthquake, one of the clattering blacksmiths of Mount Etna;—no, but an old woman! an old woman, by all the immortals that ever kissed Hebe!

Three warnings!—no, but three thousand! one for every particular nerve, organ, and functionary of her body. The palsied head, scarce held from its dusky and eternal pillow, by most protractive vanity; the tremulous indistinctive voice, piteously requiring that it be no longer strung to mortal tendency; the dry inflexible palm, the next akin to utter marble, droops to the earth, and seems to court its closer neighbourhood, whilst the impotent and succumbing joints, which kept God's image perpendicular, now wearied by their long and unrequited servitude, which might have merited a cushion at the altar or the bed-side, in the peaceful attitude of piety, refuse their wonted subservency, and threaten to give down their unwilling burthen at every step beyond a sepulchre; but these, these are mere ensigns to a host of rebel dispositions; rebels to avaricious old age, which would possess the gift of life, though it cannot enjoy it, but loyal still to nature, which would bring the sapless, leafless, withered stalk again into its parent bosom, after a summer of four score years, when it founts, not scents, the air that shakes its fragile body, turning to inevitable dust even while it strives to live beyond its time; but nature is invincible; the most elementary and indivisible particular of the whole frame cries out against this procrastination, and daily loosening the several bonds of that vast and wonderful cohesion, which held them in a certain form together, tell a tale by implication, which all can understand but those of whom it is told.

Or the burly dowager, unseemly excessive in the least allowable parts; preponderant over the crazy couch, which sinks under the oppressive mass, its surface does not measure; flushed with intemperate blood, unwieldy, super-solid, and gross,—feeding the inveterate flame, which burns like naphthaline fire in her countenance, with the never-failing unction, engendered of heated blood and unbecoming fleshlines;—pshaw! this suits well in a blazing saloon, jewelled, flowered, preciously robed, and bared to the shoulder-top and the nipples.—

—Pah! give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination.

Now, I beg leave to ask, is not this an interruption? You imprecate, because I do not satisfy your own prurency, and, nevertheless, stop me on the very point of my apoclypse, by a coc-a-lane story of an impious gray-bearded dowager, and one over-fat; as if one could help her growth of beard, or the other her growth of size. No; but one might dedicate her beard to better purposes than having it plucked behind her back, by irreverend boys and wenches; the other might stand less in door-ways, nor occupy the useful dimensions of a drawing-room which she can't ornament.

Yes, but this is neither here nor there; let's shoot in the plane of our nose.

You ask, in what my pen was dipped. Why, what a vengeance should it be, but ink?—ink—plain, black, everlasting ink (if my readers choose, and its duration wholly depends on their wills; so that I am not to blame if my ink is not right Methusalem). I say, my pen or pencil was dipped up to the shoulder, in ink, made carefully from a strong decoction of the herb, known by every he that wears a head, under the name of the Devil's tail.

Now, mind, when I say this, I do not mean to make either of two uncharitable insinuations, which, by the retraction of the nasal nerve, and the crow's foot in my reader's eye, moreover by the apparition of sarcastic juices mantling to his lips, as he ticks them in expectation of seeing, brought out by my assistance, the picture etched by his own wicked imagination, on the plain and innocent surface of my last expression; when I say that my pencil was dipped in ink, extracted by means of a scalding infusion, poured upon the ornamental scion which grows out of that part of Beelzebub's body which is the direct antipodes of, and corresponding member to his head; when I say this, namely, that my ink was so prepared, as affording the true and genuine black, so long denied by philosophers to exist at all, except in a sun-beam, but placed by the vulgar, with great appearance of propriety, in the person of the hero of Paradise lost, as is evident from the popular expression, 'as black as the devil'; I say, when I say this, I protest on a Quaker oath, I intend no reflection either upon the natives of Africa or the established church.

And I will prove this logically, and to every unbiased satisfaction. For, though both these fraternities wear the worshipful livery of Dan Satan, the former in their skins, and the latter outside of them, which unholy tan in all three, both sons and father, proceeds from one and the same cause, to wit, external heat; in the parent, from that of the everlasting flames of utter darkness; in the children, respectively, and in the inverse order of merit, from that of the arid sands and saltry winds of Africa, and from the total subjection of the body apostolical to the torrent influence of royal sun-beams, which, as Dr. Herschell lately discovered, beside their visible and lucid rays, possess latent and most powerfully-exciting ones; having this secret property among others, that, like the vile smoke of pitch and bitumen, they can make a sheet of white paper* a learned Theban fly, turn a Saxon-haired pigeon into a black rook; and by their alchemical tricketry, transform me one, whose God is a biped, with a bat, and ball, and cap, with diamond-bells, and whose bible is James Stuart's, into a

Now, for all this, I am ready to prove that I have nothing of the kind in my head. What! though you have used the words which convey the insinuations in direct terms. Yes, sir; pray, am I the first person who used words without any ideas annexed to them? A fool, a poet, or an orator, could do that. I assure you, sir, the difficulty lies not in this; but in the very opposite.

However, to go on with my proof, which will effectually silence such objections, being in the purest strain of the logical. You'll grant me, I suppose, that the same body cannot be in two places at one and the same time; very good—and I have already proved, from my reader's indicative physiognomy, that these very ideas are in his own head; hence, if there's any truth in Aristotle, they can't be in mine;—which, I believe, at once clears me of the business, and so we proceed to—

ON SERVANTS.

M. DENON, in his travels, observes that, in Egypt, servants are a species of vermin, which breed and feed upon you without your being able to prevent it, or to defend yourself from its injuries. If you have one domestic, you are almost sure to be served by another, who has never so much zeal as when he has no wages, and who never pays you real attention but while he is the servant of your servant; but scarcely has this latter acquired a garment, before he must have a horse, and next another officiator, who takes the third rank in your household, and which officiator proceeds like the rest. M. Denon continues: 'I have seen some servants, who, at the commencement of the campaign, (of the French when in Egypt,) were groans, masters at the end of it of three domestics, and by promotions, which they impudently made among themselves, retaining no other branch of servitude than that of holding the stirrup when their master mounted, during which there was a satellite at hand, to hold their pipe, or rather to testify to all eyes the dignity to which they were arrived.'

In a recent review, we gave some account of the aristocratic insolence of servants in the United States; and we now add, from a modern and intelligent writer, a summary of their delectable qualities.

When young women so far condescend as to go from home, to live in any family as helpmates, (servants they will not allow themselves to be called, nor will they stile their employer master or mistress,) one of their first inquiries is, which room they are to receive their friends in, when visited by them; and, when thus engaged as helpmates, they will still choose what kind of help they shall afford. I have known the lady of the house obliged to open the front door when any one knocked at it, if the black servant was not in the way; and the lady has assured me, that, though the young woman who attended her child and did a little needle-work was in the passage close by the door at the time, she would walk off and leave it to the master or mistress of the house, or any other that would condescend to open it; for she would quit the house immediately, sooner than be seen doing, or even be required to do, any thing so menial. To wait at table or tea is equally beneath her dignity; and should any visiting company wish to see the infant that is under the care of the young woman, as nurse-maid, I have known the child brought to the door of the apartment, for the mistress of the house to receive from her, but no farther; and I was assured that no persuasion could prevail on her to bring the child in, unless permitted to sit down as one of the company, and then she would be free and frolicsome enough, and handy as might be wished. We had with us a very worthy young woman, who went out as a servant; and, contrary to most that do so go out, would not leave us, though four times the wages were offered we had agreed to give her. She was proud to take our youngest child in her arms when walking in the streets; a thing so very menial, that I was told by some of the inhabitants, their proud wenches could as soon be prevailed on to draw a wheel-barrow along the streets; yet, in point of person, accomplishments, and even property, few if any of them could altogether vie with this our maid servant. The only exceptions are, when children have been left poor orphans, and bound out until eighteen or twenty-one years of age, but these are rare. The others will do as little as they can, will visit and be visited as often as they like, for which they must have great wages; or, sooner than go out to service, they will stay at home with their fathers, mothers, brothers, or relations, who rather encourage their pride than their industry, and sit at their spinning-wheel, to earn from four-pence to six-pence a day. English families, being known to expect more attention, find much greater difficulty in procuring female servants; and, respecting male servants, whether for the house or farming, they are nearly as bad. Soon after making my first purchase, near Newport, in Rhode Island, I was frequently called upon by men, who, understanding I was an English farmer, had a desire to live with me, in expectation of learning something new. Their manner of application was curious enough, generally by walking in with their hats on, (let who would be in the room,) give a slight familiar nod of the head, take a chair and draw near the fire; and, inquiring if it was Mr. — they spoke to, they would commence the following dialogue: 'I hear Mr. — has bought a beautiful farm.'—'Yes.'—'I guess now, you've brought some strange notions with you from the old country.'—'I cannot say how strange they may appear here.'—'I warrant, now, you'll want some kind of help to assist on this farm.'—'Yes.'—'Well, I vow you, I should like to learn some of the old country notions.'—'Very likely.'—'Why, to tell the truth, I have heard a main good character of Mr. —, and, if we could agree on terms, I swear I don't believe that I should have any objection to live along with Mr. —, if it were only to learn some of your English notions, you.' But nine out of ten that applied, would walk off, without further inquiry, on understanding they were not to sit at my table at their meals; the same or similar provisions would not satisfy them. The very few that would condescend thus, must be paid extravagantly for it, and the whole of them must rather be advised with than directed as to what should be done upon the farm, especially if any thing was directed which they were not accustomed to, notwithstanding it was their avowed desire to learn something new. And, should they not approve when either directed or consulted, they are not easily persuaded to the attempt, but will refuse to do it, and say, 'I guess now this is one of your strange notions.' However, it should be acknowledged, they do all this in inoffensive language; just observing, 'if we cannot agree it is better to part; well knowing that they can have other employ directly, while you may be weeks or months before you obtain other help.

THE ARCTIC LAND EXPEDITION,

Under Lieut. John Franklin, R. N.

SOON after the expedition under Lieut. Franklin had arrived on the coast of Hudson's Bay, they proceeded from York Factory, the grand depot of the Hudson's Bay Company, towards their wintering ground at Cumberland, the central post of the interior, a distance of about nine hundred miles from the coast. Lieut. Franklin, Dr. Richardson, Mr. Back, and Mr. Hood, attended by the hardy Orkney men, who had been engaged to man the boats in the rivers of the interior, had worked in the Company's service several years, and understood the language of many of the Indian tribes, left the factory on the 7th of September, 1819, with a fair wind, under a salute from the depot, and amidst the acclamations of the officers and men of the Company. Of the immense quantity and variety of provisions supplied by Government for the use of the expedition, the greater part was left at the factory; those who knew the country and the difficulty of travelling through it, having represented the impossibility of conveying European food, which at the bay receives the name of luxuries, to any considerable distance. The hardships attending the progress of travellers were in fact shown to be so great, as would render it absurd to calculate upon such a thing as the slightest change of diet in the winter season; and when it was mentioned by Lieut. Franklin, that he had brought with him preserved meats and soups in portable cases, to support the expedition in the cheerless regions through which they were to pass, there was a general laugh amongst the officers of the Company, at the idea of associating any thing like comfort with the formidable character of the enterprise. Some of those difficulties may be estimated from the account of the sufferings of the adventurers, in their advance towards Cumberland, to which place the writer of this article accompanied them. On the third day after their departure from the factory, the boats of the Company, which were proceeding to the various trading posts in the interior, came up with the expedition in the Steel River, distant about sixty miles from the place at which they set out. Most of the rivers in that part of America abound with rapids and falls. The rapids are generally more navigable near the banks, but they frequently extend across the stream, and then the labour of the boat's crew becomes excessive, every man being obliged to turn into the water and assist in carrying the boat, sometimes to the distance of half a mile before they gain the head of one of those terrible impediments. The Company's men, upon turning one of the points of the river, observed the officers of the expedition making desperate efforts to get through the mud along the banks; some of them were up to their knees, others up to their waste, while the men were handing the boats over a most violent rapid, which, though but half a foot deep, rendered it necessary that those who stood in the water should hold fast by the boat, the impetuosity of the stream being so extraordinary as not unfrequently to overturn a man in an instant, and dash him to pieces against the rocks and huge stones which lie scattered along the bed of the river. Indeed, before the Company's boats had reached those of Lieut. Franklin, it was suspected that the expedition had already met with more hardships than they had any notion of encountering at so early a period. Several of the tin cases which had contained the preserved meats, were seen at the different up-pulling places (the spots of ground on the banks chosen for passing the nights upon), and those miserable abodes were drenched with rain, and presented an appearance the most appalling. Two black bears were seen prowling about, and devouring some of the luxuries which the travellers had ascertained it was impossible to convey in any considerable quantities further up the river; and along the banks were seen strong symptoms of the inexperience of those who had gone forward. The traders with the North American Indians, in travelling to their posts, kindle fires of immense magnitude upon landing to put up for the night. Every man carries his fire-bag, containing all the necessary apparatus. They proceed to hew down the trees, an office which they perform with wonderful dexterity. The fires are lighted, the tents for the officers pitched, and the only regular meal taken during the twenty-four hours, served up in as comfortable a manner as possible under the circumstances. As the travellers advanced, the mild season not having yet begun to disappear, vast herds of grey deer were observed passing the rivers towards the Esquimaux lands, and the Indians who were accompanying the expedition, gave extraordinary proofs of their activity, by rushing upon the animals in the water and striking long knives into their hearts. Lieut. Franklin, on entering the Hill River, so called from a neighbouring eminence, the only one that presented itself between York factory and Cumberland, had reason to express surprise that trading goods could be transported to the interior in spite of such frightful obstructions. His men were fatigued in the extreme, and he found it indispensably necessary to request that the officers of the Hudson's Bay Company would lighten his boat of the greater part of the luxuries and instruments. This accommodation was readily given, and, after the most laborious efforts, the expedition reached the Rock depot, one of the Company's posts, having devoted seven days to the exhausting toil of working up thirty miles of their journey. Upon arriving at the depot, the expedition were treated with great hospitality by Mr. Bunn, the officer in charge, who entertained them with the titmouse, a fish which they admitted was the most delicious they had ever tasted, and which was caught in God's Lake, an immense piece of water, so named from the abundance and excellence of its inhabitants. Mr. Hood, who is one of the draftsmen of the expedition, took a sketch of the Rock-fall and the post, which presented one of the most beautiful objects in these desolate regions, and introduced a distant view of a wigwain (an Indian tent) with its inmates.

Five days after the expedition left the Rock depot, they reached another post, having encountered numberless difficulties similar to those which have been described. There was, however, some relief to the painful sameness of the journey in several beautiful lakes, through which they had to pass. At Oxford House post, which was reached four days subsequently, they were provided with pimmikin, the celebrated winter food of the country, made of dried deer or buffalo flesh, pounded and mixed with a large quantity of the fat of the animal. This food constitutes the luxuries in winter, is the most portable of all victuals, and satisfies the most craving hunger in a very short time. The officers of the expedition were not a little surprised at the difficulty of cutting their meat, but they soon reconciled themselves to the established practice of chopping it a hatchet. During the summer, ducks, geese, partridges, &c. are to be had in the greatest abundance, but the frost soon drives all those delicacies out of the reach of the active Indian, and pinnikin becomes the only resource of the traveller. The next post at which they arrived was Norway House, upon leaving which they entered upon Lake Winnipic, at the further side of which they had to encounter the grand rapid, extending nearly three miles, and abounding in obstructions quite insurmountable. Here they were obliged to drag their boats on shore, and carry them over the land, or, to use the technical language, 'launch them over the portage.' The woods along the banks were all in a blaze, it being the custom of the natives, as well as of the traders, to set fire to the trees around the up-putting places, for the double purpose of keeping off the cold and the wolves, whose howling was increased in proportion to the extent of the conflagration. The expedition passed several other rapids and falls along a flat, woody, and swampy country, across five miles of which no eye could see. At length they reached the White Fall, where an accident took place, which had nearly deprived the expedition of their commander. While the men were employed in carrying the goods and boats across the portage of the fall, Lieut. Franklin walked down alone to view the rapid, the roaring of which could be heard at the distance of several miles. He had the boldness to venture along the bank with English shoes upon his feet, a most dangerous experiment, where the banks are flint stones and as smooth as glass. He was approaching the spot from whence he could have taken the most accurate observation, when he slipped from the bank into the water. Fortunately, the water into which he was precipitated was still water. Had he lost his footing ten yards lower down, he would have been hurried into a current which ran with amazing impetuosity over a precipice, presenting one of the most terrific objects his eyes had yet fixed upon amidst all the horrors of the journey. Lieut. Franklin is an excellent swimmer, but he had on him a sailor's heavy Flushing jacket and trousers, heavy English shoes, and a large neck handkerchief, the weather having begun to set in very cold. He swam about for some time, and made vigorous efforts to get upon the bank, but he had to contend against a smooth precipitous rock, and was just exhausted, when two of the Company's officers, who were at a short distance from the fall, looked up and saw him struggling in the water. With the assistance of their poles, they raised him out of his perilous situation, in which he had been nearly a quarter of an hour. The moment he reached land, he fell to the ground, and remained without motion for some time. His powerful constitution, however, soon lulled the effects of the accident, and he had happily only to regret the injury his chronometer, for which he had given a hundred guineas, received in the water. After a tedious journey of forty-six days, the dangers and distresses of which rather increased than diminished as they advanced, the expedition arrived at Cumberland, a post situate on the banks of a beautiful lake, and blockaded against the incursions of savages, the attacks of wolves and bears, and the more ferocious assaults of rival traders.

THE MINE OF WIELIEZKA, IN POLAND,

Described in a Letter from a Traveller who visited it.

THE day after our arrival at Cracow, we visited the magnificent mine of Wieliezka, which may be appropriately termed the Palace of the Gnomes. The gigantic magnificence of the objects which it presents to the view, surpasses any thing which the most fertile and powerful imagination can conjure up. I was the first who descended into the abyss, by means of a rope, to which I had recourse, in order to avoid the labour of winding round a well-staircase, composed of not less than five hundred steps. On my descent, I found myself at the entrance of a large chapel, hollowed out of the salt, of which substance every thing it contained, columns, altars, and statues, was formed. This chapel has existed for four hundred and seventy-five years. Here I was joined by my fellow-travellers, who had descended by the staircase, and we proceeded through a vast labyrinth of galleries and passages, eight feet high by twelve in breadth, and which are self-supported. We at length reached a series of immense saloons, from three to four hundred feet in height, in the middle of which were wooden staircases, which descended deeper into the abyss, and were lighted by thousands of tapers. When we had descended one of these to the depth of about one thousand feet, we came to a lake of some hundreds of feet in diameter, which we navigated by the light of tapers and torches, while the music of a military band was heard from a niche at its extremity.

The walls of the grotto were cut into pilasters and illuminated, and at least eight hundred spectators had assembled on the bank where we embarked. The vault, about three hundred feet above us, feebly reflected the ruddy flame of the torches. As we returned, we stopped upon a wooden bridge thrown over a chasm, on looking about which, we perceived at an immense depth down, a hundred miners, employed in excavating the rock. They did not seem larger than infants, and sang, in perfect unison, hymns, the sound of which appeared as though it arose from the centre of the earth, while the regular striking of iron instruments upon the salt rock marked the measure exactly. After we had wandered over immense tracts of the obscure regions, alternately ascending and descending thousands of staircases, sometimes constructed of wood, sometimes of bright and transparent salt, we at length stopped in the last saloon, which is cut in the most exact proportion, and ornamented with transparent arms of the House of Austria and Saxony. Here we found two tables, abundantly supplied with all the delicacies of the season. Having refreshed and rested ourselves, we made a second peregrination through the mine. Three immense columns of salt, upwards of thirty feet in height, fell with a loud crash at our feet. These immense blocks, blasted with gunpowder, were rent in a shower of unequal masses through the dusky void. The noise of the explosion, like a thunder clap, rolled with a heavy and gradually subsiding sound, from gallery to gallery. Farther on, we saw stables, in which were above forty horses, condemned to labour beneath the surface of the earth, and which had been deprived of their sight by continued darkness, at the end of a year or two. At length, having satisfied ourselves with the wonders, a part of which I have above described, we returned to the light of heaven, after a sojourn of three hours in the bowels of the earth.

TO MARY IN DEATH.

My Mary sleeps—the sleep of death!
Whilst here I mourn with life opprest,
My parted soul, with fainting breath,
When shall my woes and sorrows rest?

Not till I, love, like thee, and blest,
Shall o'er my heart its throbbings ease,
Nor till this image shines, confest
In Beh'n's, where all its joy and peace!

Lo! at thy shrine—O maiden fair!
With pallid cheek and hollow eye,
I come to shed the burning tear,
And court thy spirit how ring nigh!

And weaving where thy relics lie,
Methinks I hear thy angel tongue,
In flowing accents softly sigh,
"Thy Mary's mournful dirge is rung!"

Within thy mould'ring silent tomb
Be mine!—my best and last recess;
Where o'er our beds the flowers will bloom
And fondly lie, and anthers press!

Thrice hallow'd hour!—when we in bliss
With out-stretch'd arms, shall clasp entwined!

And love is free from cold distress,
And pure as thy seraphic mind!

Yes! Mary, we shall meet above,
No more to be in anguish torn;
Where thou and I shall taste that love
Which earth denied to hearts so warm!

From every wreck and chilling storm,
That o'er our lives impending hung,
When last I clasp'd thy lovely form,
That to this bleeding bosom clung!

Then, Mary dear!—departed shade!
No shadow shall pierce, from death's cold dart;
Nor sever'd love again invade
The bond which bound thee to my heart!

O sacred thought, never to part
From thee whom I all love deplore;
Where, Mary, thou wilt ease my smart,
And we shall live—divide no more!

HARR.

TO —

Oh, bright and rare was childhood's hour,
When first we felt wild passion's power!
But clouds, that disappointments raise,
Have darken'd our maturer days.

The joys we knew were form'd to fade,
The hopes we cherish'd soon decay'd;
But feelings grew within my heart
That may not alter or depart.

Better or worse it might have been,
If I had ne'er thy beauty seen;
But whether fraught with good or ill,
I know that I must love thee still.

Yet would to heaven, that unknown
To me thy many charms had shown;
That worthier lips than mine had kiss'd
Beatitudes, no bosom could resist!

Still I hear me—tho' the words be vain—
Through chance and change, through joy and pain,
Thou hast not ceased one hour to be
My inmost soul's idolatry!

Aye, how wert still the dearest thing
That wealth, or power, or art might bring;
The object of each fondest thought,
Spirit of visions rapture-fraught!

Long years, even though we were apart,
Thy name was magic to my heart!
And never love, despair, fear, pride,
Were weak, if against thy influence tried!

Yet had it been unkind in Fate,
To link thee to so dark a mate;
Since crime and care must be my own,
'Tis best to bear them both alone!

THE RETROSPECT.

Ah! whither are flown the gay visions of youth
That so sweetly deceived for a while;
And, cloth'd in the form of immutable truth,
So placidly spoke in the smile?

For then, my companions were Pleasure and Health,
Ambition no charms could unfold;
Nor even the gorgeous apparel of wealth
Could tempt me to covet her gold.

Alas! how relentless the sentence of Time,
How unbouded his absolute sway;
The bower of my youth that was then in its prime,
Is mouldered and sunk in decay.

The roses I trained with such diligent care
No longer their fragrance distil;
The laburnum and woodbine no longer are there,
And mute is the voice of the rill.

The briar and the night-shade now bend o'er
the spot,
Where echo was waked by the song;
And silence proclaims that each sound is forgot,
That once wandered its mazes among.

But still, as if weeping the joys that are past,
The dew-drop bespangles the thorn;
As it yields to the will of the turbulent blast,
O'er the desolate wilderness borne.

As faithful remembrance retraces the scene
So sacred to Friendship and Love, Tho' the deep vale of years has widen'd between,
It can still a fond retrospect prove.

But, ah! desolation has blighted the rose
That once bloom'd in the shade of the bow'r; Unskreen'd by the woodbine, the night-breeze
now blows
Where music had floated before.

So the day-dreams of Pleasure for ever are gone,
The blessings of health are no more;
But at Sorrow's keen touch every comfort is flown—
And what can the prospect restore?

The life-stream flows languid and cold in my breast,
That once bounded with youthful delight;
And that heart, where the beams of contentment would rest,
Is dark'ning the shadows of night.

But still 'mid the weeds of misfortune and woe,
The blossom of Hope shall arise;
And point, from this desolate region below,
To a brighter abode in the skies.

SAMUEL.

Tis holy lamp burnt dull and dim
For Eli,—age had wearied him;
He sunk to rest beside the ark,
And Samuel watch'd the dying spark.

His golden ringlets gracefully
Curl'd on his snowy neck, while he,
With one faint glance to the holy light,
Closed his blue eyes, and welcom'd night.

Pale silence reign'd o'er dome and hall—
O'er chequer'd floor and sculptur'd wall;
Till a voice uprose from the holy ark,
And Samuel cried—'twas dimly dark—
The spirit of air seemed floating on Sweet harmonies, 'till the sound was gone;
He started from the dream-like bands;
With trembling force, his little hands
Awak'd his guide in holiness,
Who hush'd his fear with mild caresses.

When yet again the vision'd sound
Stole on his ear in slumber drows'd,
And, like a dream of wild import,
Fitted by in shadowy sport,
He dropp'd before the darken'd fune—
In silence, and listen'd fearfully—
As the war-horse thunders o'er the plain—
On the airy wave roll'd the prophecy;
'Twas the voice of a spirit—a sound of the sky:
And the hand of the Lord war'd the chattering fire,
For the sins of the son, on the head of the sinner—

A FRAGMENT.

And when his pale cheek rested on
The cheek of her who now is gone,
He felt love's truest happiness;
'Then, must we part,' he cried,—and 'yes'
Upon her lips reluctantly
Hush'd, while on her trembling eye
A dewy tear-drop vainly started,
And left him—left her—broken hearted.

The evening star, like blue-eyed love,
Rose the darkening clouds above,
And beamed the fountain grot upon,
Whose silver waters now are gone;
There came a flood—there came a blight—
And swept them both away in night;
The evening star—the twinkling rill—
The one has set, and both are still.

A desert wide is there, and by
The groat the moon beams tranquilly;
But naught is there that once has been,
And sky and clouds are only seen. H. A.

HASSAN, THE GALLEY SLAVE.

KIND Ocean, cried Hassan, as o'er the high
waves
The galley he urged to the opposite shore,
Why dost thou not open, and to thy cold grave
'Scatch me from the pains I endure at the oar.
Oh! ye waves that around me so furiously drive—
Why not stifle my sighs in thy roar;
Why not snatch his life, who has no care to live,
For till death I must tug at the oar.

Why, ye arrows that round me in times past have flown,
When facing the strong front of war,
Didst thou not to me as to others thou'st done,
Nor left me to sigh at the oar?

And why didst thou, Mercy, when 'twas by the foe,
A misfortune I e'er must deplore,
Not allow me to feel the blest life-ending blow
That had saved me woe at the oar?

All the night long I sigh, and until the new
morn,
Think on that I shall never see more—
On my land, on the blest land from which I was torn,
To waste all my life at the oar.

Yes, I have a land! the poor galley slave,
And I have led armies to war;
Oh! would in the battles that I'd found a grave,
Which now I shall so at the oar.

He said; and his heart strings, too weak to control
The sighs of his bosom, would heave and
more!
To naught sunk his senses—his God he soul—
Never more to be vexed by the oar.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Monday night restored Mr. Kean to us, in excellent health, undiminished powers, and with all his popularity. It was really gratifying to see all the entrances to the theatre completely blocked up at an early hour in the evening, and, on entering the house a few minutes before the rising of the curtain, to be told by the box-keepers, 'every place taken.' We say this was gratifying, for we would cheerfully be squeezed up in a corner to see a crowded house paying homage to Shakespeare and the best living representative of the immortal characters he has drawn. The play was Richard the Third, one that has been so often played with Kean for the hero, that notwithstanding the excellence of the performance, we wonder it still continues so attractive. Mr. Kean, on his entrance, was greeted most enthusiastically, by loud cheers from all parts of the house, and never did we see him better deserving of applause. He was in excellent voice, and rendered his Gloucester a more complete performance than he, perhaps, ever before made it. It possessed all the beauties and all the spirit of his former representation, and was freed from the mannerism that attended some parts of it. Mr. Cooper played Richmond better than it has lately been represented. Mr. Penley was a tolerable Buckingham; Miss Smithson whined through the part of Lady Anne, but Mrs. Egerton gave due effect to the character of the Queen.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Kean appeared in the character of Othello; his performance of this part has long been acknowledged to be his masterpiece; and though we might vary the terms of praise, yet we could say nothing stronger than what we have frequently said, that it is the most finished performance on the stage. Miss Smithson was the Desdemona of the evening, and it is one of the few characters in which she is tolerable. This lady is, it appears, to be the tragic heroine of this theatre, and that, too, when Mrs. West and Mrs. Glover are without engagements; this is positively too bad. Mr. Cooper played Iago admirably, and really looked an honest Iago, 'though a perfect devil'; the performance throughout was justly honoured with loud and reiterated plaudits.

On Tuesday night, a new comedy, in three acts, was produced at this theatre, entitled Lost Life. The plot is very complicated, and the characters very numerous. The scene is at a watering-place, Bognor, we believe, where a dashing milliner, Emma, from Cranbourne Alley, (Mrs. Edwin,) with her mother, (Mrs. Harlowe,) is attempting to form an opulent match, and has in her train, at one and the same time, Captain Freshwater, (Penley,) an amateur sailor, whose principal delight is to sail in his yacht from Blackfriars to Chelsea Reach; a young citizen, Featherbrain, (Cooper,) who has taken possession of an estate prematurely; and Daffodil, (Harley,) a poet and perfumer from Love Lane, who writes verses, celebrates the birthdays of all the poets at the Magpie and Punch-Bowl on Highgate Hill, and wears his hair divided on the forehead, and falling on his shoulders a la Peterarque. This character, which is a smart satire on the Cockney school of poetry, and one of its leaders in particular, is well drawn, and was admirably sustained by Harley: Emma keeps all these three lovers quite happy, until they, unfortunately for her, agree among themselves, each to bring his fair one at a given time and place, and they at last discover they had all been paying their adorations to the same object. Munden was a Mr. Solomon Pilgrim, the uncle of Featherbrain, who was reported to have lost his life, but only lost his Memoirs, and comes back to recover his estate, which had been taken by Featherbrain. Knight's part was a bad version of Dominie Sampson, but it was admirably played. Miss Smithson was a niece of Pilgrim's, with whom Featherbrain is also in love, and ultimately marries. A variety of equivocations take place, which terminate, as usual, in a full explanation. The piece, which is said to be by Mr. Moncrieff, is one of his best efforts, and if cut down to a farce of two acts, and stripped of about half-a-dozen characters, might be rendered a very amusing production. As it is it was well received, and will, with the Coronation, we doubt not, run for several evenings.

Mr. Fitzwilliam, from the Surrey Theatre, and Mr. Loveday, from Dublin, made very successful appearances at this house; the former in O'Rourke O'Daisy, in Hit or Miss; and the latter in Michael, in the Adopted Child. We shall have occasion to speak further of them by and by.

Beazely, was performed at this theatre, for the first and last time. It was entitled The Venison Pasty (a foul libel on a very excellent dish), and was an outrageous and an attack on the decency and good sense of an audience as we ever witnessed. It was broad and coarse ribaldry, not redeemed by a single stroke of wit, by a single turn of invention, by a single happiness of expression. It was dull downright indecency from beginning to end, and would have been hissed off the stage even in the unfastidious age of Charles II. From the rising to the fall of the curtain there was not a good scene, incident, situation, or expression; and disapprobation, which was manifested at the beginning, accompanied it throughout. We really pitied the performers: Jones endeavoured to be gay and lively; Liston to excite a laugh by his power of face; Blanchard, to keep his audience in good humour; Mrs. Gibbs to be cheerful;—but all would not do; poor Mrs. Chatterley, quite ashamed of her part, hung down her head, and endeavoured to stifle the disgraceful language she was doomed to utter. As soon as the curtain fell, Mr. Jones appeared, to announce that the piece was withdrawn; but as he was not clearly understood, the tumult continued, and Mr. Fawcett, the manager, after a short pause, made his appearance, to announce that the management acquiesced in the wishes of the public, and that on Monday the farce of the Blind Boy would be presented.

The Twelfth Night was performed early in the week, when Miss M. Tree resumed her favourite character of Viola. She sung sweetly, and acted with as much spirit as usual; but she appears not sufficiently recovered from her indisposition, and the effort was evidently painful to her.

SURREY THEATRE.—The celebrated melo-drama, The Maid and the Magpie, was produced here on Monday last, for the first time, for the benefit of Miss Booth, who sustained the heroine with great judgment and feeling. Since that evening, the part has devolved to Mrs. Fearman, in whose hands, it is but just to remark, it loses little or none of its interest; while the drollery of Herring, as the rustic, and Finn, as the Jew, give great zest to the performance. This latter gentleman, it may be recollected, we had lately to speak of in a very different line of character, and his able personation of the Jew shows him to be possessed of much versatility of talent; indeed, we are at a loss to tell in which line he excels, though we hesitate not in pronouncing him already a great acquisition to the effective company of the Surry.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—The 'management' of this theatre (we know not whether the 'minors' may be allowed this winter-theatre phrase or not) have shown considerable judgment in producing pieces admirably suited to the talents of the company, which, for broad farce and burlesque, is without a rival. Three new pieces have already been brought out, and a succession of novelties are promised. One of these pieces, intitled Life in London, has a great deal of good acting by Messrs. Oxberry, Tayleur, and a Mr. Power, from the Dublin stage, who possesses great versatility of talent. A sort of Tom Thumb tragedy was produced on Thursday, intitled Rumfuskun, in which Oxberry, Tayleur, and Miss Healy, were highly amusing. Teresa Tomkins, a burlesque parody on the melo-drama of Thérèse, which was a favourite last season, has lost none of its attractions in the transfer of many of the characters.

LUCRETIVS.

Restored Royalty.—The again-restored King of Sardinia wished to upset the finest bridges, built by Bonaparte over the Po, to take up the coins and medals impressed with his image and superscription; and his Austrian queen was so inimical to innovation, that even vaccination has not escaped her censure. On hearing that the Governor's bills, at Genoa, were over at two in the morning, she expressed her surprise at hours so revolutionarily early, and observed, that it was the effect of vaccination, which left the young people feeble, and unable to bear fatigue!

Ashton Theatre.—On paying a visit to the theatre of Ashton-under-Line, a stranger would think that he had mistaken the scene of amusement. At the front of the entrance is observed in great characters the following quotation from the Scripture:—'Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? come, and see.' The reason of this 'profane application of Scripture is said to be, that the building had originally been erected for a Methodist conventicle; and that the theatrical manager, upon the premises being converted to their present purposes, thought the above an equally excellent invitation to his customers.

Women.—It is in vain that we make sometimes strong resolutions to avoid an intimate connexion with the fair sex. It is to no purpose that we make ourselves acquainted with their faults; we never can raise in ourselves a perfect dislike to the sex. We have in our hearts a love of women, implanted by Nature herself, that renders void every resolution we might have formed to hate them. Pygmalion, who had conceived so strong an aversion to women, that he had determined always to live single, continually amused himself with making beautiful statues of women; and entertained his fancy with designing those charms which nature has endowed them with. His heart betrayed itself by his employment, without his being conscious of it; and it appears as if Nature pleased herself with putting him to confusion and distress, by obliging him to seek in his art for that enjoyment, of which he is vain thought to deprive himself.

Singular Naval Costume.—The officers of the Swedish navy are considered as military officers, and in full dress are obliged to wear spurs! It used to excite the surprise of our officers, on walking aft, to see the captain of the ship strutting about the quarter-deck with spurs on. As to the Jack Tars, it put them in such a rage, they would have advised a war with Sweden to oblige the king to lay by the offensive costume, which irritated and offended them in a great degree.

Tompson, the most celebrated watch-maker of his day, was accosted, in Moorfields, by a brother of the trade, who, after the usual salutations and inquiries about business, said, 'I believe, Mr. Tompion, you and I are the two most distinguished men of our profession in existence.' 'Indeed!' exclaimed Tompion, who knew nothing of the individual's abilities. 'Yes,' was the reply: 'You are, of all watch-makers, the best, and I am the worst.'

The Cambrian Thief.

Not overtook I with wit or legal sense,
A Cambrian justice did the laws disclose:
Before his worship, deep in solemn thought,
A sacrilegious rascal once was brought;
A dozen witnesses gave ample proof
He stole the lead from off the church's roof:
'Shenkin, the justice cried, 'my message mark'

Now Shenkin Shenkin was his worship's clerk,
'Go bring me, Shenkin, down my great law-book,

And, 'mong the l's, for lead on church's lock;

• Ovidii Metamorph. lib. x. lin. 243.

I'll warrant, Shenkin, in a little time,
This thief shall hang, to expiate his crime:
In vain he looks for 'lead, no 'lead' he sees;
'Here's pewter, Sir,' quoth Shenkin, 'mought
the P's'

But pewter's not the thing, 'his worship said;
'Pity there is no law for stealing lead'
Then, with stern countenance, the legal chief
Most solemnly harangued the lucky thief:
'Till kindling into rage,—'Upon hur's bonnet, Cot up hur's nails! right shall be done upon hur!

If ever he caught pilloining pewter,
Hur shall be hang'd, that's a law, none can con-fute a hur.

Review of New Books.

The Principles of Forensic Medicine, systematically arranged, and applied to British Practice. By John Gordon Smith, M. D. 8vo. pp. 503. London, 1821.

WHILE medical jurisprudence has been long and sedulously cultivated in many parts of the continent, and, since the revolution in France, has engaged much attention in that country, it has remained in comparative obscurity in England until the present day. The want of attention to this subject has been felt in almost every case where medical practitioners have been examined on questions belonging to the department of forensic medicine, as the discrepancy in their testimony has not only been very remarkable, but has been injurious to the profession.

The earliest production in this country professing to treat of medical jurisprudence, was an abstract from a foreign work, published under the name of Dr. Farr's Elements. The next appeared in 1815, and one or two other works, on the same subject, have appeared since, but they are little intended for practical reference.

Mr. Smith is the first of our medical professors to give us any thing like a systematic treatise on this important subject. Having, originally, intended to devote himself to the duties of a public lecturer on medical jurisprudence, he prepared a text book, and devoted his attention almost exclusively to the subject, which he appears to have studied with great zeal and attention. He treats the subject in a philosophical, professional, and popular manner; and we would recommend that no magistrate or coroner should be sworn into office until he had read this work; and that barristers, medical practitioners, and juries, should consult it before they undertake to speak or decide on the subjects which it embraces.

We will not follow our author through all the ramifications of this important subject, as we merely wish to call the public attention to it: we say the public attention, for this must not be considered as merely a medical work; and as there is no householder but may be called on a coroner's inquest, so we unhesitatingly assert, no one can go to such an inquest so well prepared to discharge the important duties of his office, as he would be if he had perused this work.

Mr. Smith has divided his book into several classes and sections, as—the reality of death and the phenomena attending it—sudden death—death by personal agency—poisoning, suffocation, drowning, hanging, smothering, strangling—deaths by wounds—suicide—infanticide—and questions arising from injuries to the person not leading to the extinction of life, mental alienation, personal identity, &c.

Although Mr. Smith's work requires to be viewed as a whole, and not to be judged by any extracts which may be detached from it, we shall not enter into a formal analysis, nor indeed make many quotations. The subject of poisons is very ably treated by the author in their classes, of animal, mineral, and vegetable; and as corrosive sublimate is one of the most common, we give Mr. Smith's tests for its detection:—

The following are some of the tests most to be relied on for the detection of this poison under various circumstances. The aqueous solution of cyanurate of mercury is transparent, without colour or smell. When applied to vegetable colours, it changes them as acids do. If to this fluid a saturated solution of carbonate of potash be added, a deep brick-coloured sediment is produced, consisting of carbonate of mercury at the maximum degree of oxidation, while there remains in the liquor a muriate of potash. The sub-carbonate of potash produces a clear brick-coloured precipitate, composed of carbonate and oxide of mercury.

Lime-water gives a precipitate of a deep yellow colour, which, by the quantity of the test being increased, becomes red, and consists of oxide of mercury, retaining a little muriatic acid. By the continued addition of lime-water, a precipitate of a fine yellow colour is obtained, consisting of an oxide at the maximum degree.

Ammonia produces a white precipitate, composed of muriatic acid, ammonia, and oxide of mercury, forming a true triple insoluble salt.

All the foregoing precipitates, if rubbed on a bright plate of copper, render it white and silvery.

A watery solution of corrosive sublimate made at a high degree of temperature, on being allowed to cool, deposits crystals of a slender, compressed, and tetradic form. If these be pounded in a glass mortar and exposed to ignition, volatilization takes place, a dense white smoke is evolved, and a pungent smell,—but not resembling that of garlic, the characteristic of arsenic. This smoke will tarnish a clean plate of copper, and on the tarnished part being rubbed, a silvery appearance will be produced, characteristic of quicksilver; and if a portion of these crystals be exposed to heat with charcoal, in the form of a paste, the product will be quicksilver, carbonic acid, muriatic acid, and oxygen; in other words, we shall obtain metallic mercury.

A concentrated solution of corrosive sublimate produces no change on milk; but if to milk containing one part of this substance in fourteen, the syrup of violets be added, the colour is changed to a pale blue. Pure potash will turn it to a blackish grey; and a plate of copper dipped in it then undergoes the same changes as with the sublimate.

Ordinary soup, if limpid, becomes slightly turbid when it contains a small quantity of this salt in solution; but as soup is frequently turbid of itself, the change might not be perceptible. The tests already mentioned will produce the effects as in an aqueous solution; but here we cannot draw any inference from the colour of precipitates.

On the subject of impostors, Mr. Smith has a curious chapter, from which we select a few passages:—

The shaking palsy is a frequent plea on the part of an idle beggar, and is always suspicious, especially where the person appears to be otherwise in an ordinary state of vigour. This ingenious order, however, understands the art of mimicking wretchedness too well not to have the details of their appearance in some degree of keeping. A man of the name of Drake, in the Royal African Corps, assumed an appearance of total insensibility, under which he resisted every sort of treatment. At the end of several months he was removed to Hulsea Hospital, in a state of apparent natural sleep. At this time, an attempt being made to open his mouth forcibly, the temporal muscles were thrown into violent action, and the jaw remained firmly closed. He resisted even the shower-bath, and also electricity; but on a proposal being uttered in his hearing, to apply red hot iron, his pulse rose; and on preparations being made to remove him to Bethlehem Hospital, an amendment began to appear immediately. People have gone farther than this,—imitating even death itself, the very pulse becoming imperceptible. Such cases are at least reported; and the story of Colonel Townshend, who, in the presence of Dr. Cheyne and other professional men, put on all the appearances of death, and was resuscitated of his own accord, has long been notorious. In this instance, neither pulse nor respiration could be perceived for more than half an hour. He died in reality, however, the same evening.

‘People often affect blindness; and it might appear very simple to ascertain the truth by examination of the eye, or by placing the individual in circumstances of danger. Mahon records the case of a conscript who baffled every attempt to find him out. He was even placed on the margin of a river, and desired to go forward, which he did, and fell into the stream. Boats, however, were provided to pick him up, and no doubt he was aware of this. He afterwards acknowledged the imposture, upon receiving his discharge.

‘Of the deaf and dumb I have already spoken; but sometimes either the one state only is feigned, or the other. In the former case, a little ingenuity alone may detect the imposture—such as making matters that interest the individual strongly, the subject of conversation, and watching its effect on the countenance or on the pulse. As to willful mutes, who are not deaf, we know that the power of articulation seldom leaves a person without adequate or even manifest cause. We ought, perhaps, to be satisfied with the want of a tongue; yet cases are on record where persons did very well without that organ—although the muscles belonging to it were in all probability present. One is very satisfactorily reported by Jussieu the botanist, of a Portuguese girl, aged fifteen, who had been born without a tongue.’

In a note to this part of the subject, Mr. Smith relates a most singular instance of deception of a different kind: ‘In the ward of a general hospital where I was doing duty myself at the time, and which ward was an open church, containing about one hundred and twenty beds, a soldier, really confined between the sheets, with some surgical complaint that did not much affect his general health, contrived to coin part of his pewter utensil into counterfeit Spanish dollars—which were passed in the town by an accomplice!’

Our last extract shall be on the subject of personal identity:—

‘Not a few important events have turned upon the question whether a person be really the individual he pretends or is supposed to be. Some impostures of the greatest consequence have been maintained on the foundation of personal resemblance to the pretended individual, and which for a time have confounded the best informed and most judicious. Persons have also been arraigned for crimes, and have pleaded that they were not the individuals in question, while witnesses have maintained the contrary, on the ground of personal appearance. Some years ago, a man named John Hoag was indicted for bigamy at New York. He denied the charge, and said his name was Thomas Parker. Mrs. Hoag, however, and several of her friends, all credible witnesses, insisted that he was John Hoag—the woman positively swearing he was her husband. An equal number of witnesses of like credibility swore, on the other hand, that he was Thomas Parker—and Mrs. P. came forward to claim him as her husband. Several points as to his person were alluded to, which coincided with that of the prisoner, even to a particular scar on the forehead. At last, Mrs. Hoag stated that her husband had a particular mark on the sole of his foot, which Mrs. Parker allowed that her husband had not. Recourse was had to the foot, and although there was no mark, the ladies were still unsatisfied; when a justice, from the place where the prisoner had been apprehended, came into the court and identified him as Thomas Parker, whom he had known for many years.—But by what secret, unknown to the man’s wife, a magistrate contrived to identify him, we are left to imagine.

In January, 1817, the body of a woman was found tied to a boat, near Greenwich Hospital, and an inquest was accordingly held; but adjourned on account of vague evidence. At the second sitting an old man declared the deceased to be his daughter, who had been the wife of an out-pensioner, and between whom and her husband a fight had taken place, with sharp instruments, in his presence, which he had with difficulty quelled. Soon afterwards both the parties left his house, and he had not heard of them since. Other witnesses supported the statement that it was the body of the old man’s daughter.

‘A second adjournment took place; the constables, in the mean time, had sought in vain for the husband, though they had found the wife alive and hearty, who was produced accordingly. The coroner reprimanded the witnesses, though the strong likeness between the living and the dead woman was allowed to be sufficient to impose on better judges.’

We will not lengthen this review either by further extracts or remarks; for we think the specimen we have given will show the author’s talents, while the subject itself is one which demands general attention.

The Garden of Florence and other Poems. By John Hamilton. 12mo. pp. 175. London, 1821.

A genuine Grub Street dedication chunts us into ‘The Garden of Florence,’ where we are introduced to Simoniida, a beautiful girl, sitting in innocence, and spinning at her wheel before her father’s cottage. Pasquino, a handsome Florentine youth, supplies her with wool; after great attentions and much silent admiration, they mutually exchange the pure passion of love in tones of artless devotion, when, at evening, her father returns from his daily employment in the woods, and she prepares his supper,—

‘And many a sweet smile ead
Upon her lover, as she simply stored
The fruit and homely viands on the board.
Night hurried on; but ere Pasquino went—

He agreed to meet her at an appointed place, and—

‘She press’d his hand, and closed
The door upon her lover,—and reposed.’

To-morrow came; and, by her father’s leave, after she had paid her Sabbath duties to Saint Guallo, she met Pasquino ‘and kissed a welcome’ and they wandered in pure rapture through the paths of flowery delight—‘A bed of sage was near them as they went: Pasquino, stooping, pluck’d a leaf and play’d’

With an old saying, that ‘the sage-leaf whitens teeth,’ he bit it, which proved fatal to his life. Simoniida shrieks for his death drew two other lovers to the spot, who supposing she might have murdered him, make it known to the Potestate of Florence. Hence she is led away in a state of excessive and pathetic grief, to the palace for trial. The Florentines conceive her guilty and request her immediate punishment, but the Potestate feeling extraordinary compassion for her, commands them to silence, and to take her to the body, which is just as she had left it; the sight of which recalls her mind to recollection, and she remembers the place and leaf that he had eaten in their delicious hour; she explains the circumstance of his death, and then plucks a leaf and eats it also, which producing similar effects, she in a short time becomes a corpse:—

‘In dark amazement, the terror-stricken crowd Stood—let the judge speak, wood’ing, and
But remem’r seemeth in that bed of sage

To dwell and do death-work;
—and let it be dug up that it may be
Bur’d for our Florentines’ security.

This being done,

'—a huge and gloomy tomb
Sat in earth's dark and venomous shade;
Nay, none, might dare

To touch the bright-eyed reptile—but each brought Branches of scatter'd wood, and o'er him wrought

A funeral pile; the roots of sage were thrown Into a heap, and all was burned down.
The loam, side by side, were gently laid
In the golden of Florence,—and the tenderest shade

Growing trees lull'd their pleasant tomy,
And wrapp'd it in a green and placid gloom."

It is something of the outline of Mr. Hamilton's Florentine Garden, which belongs to Boreaccio. There are sweet and delicate flowers in it, equal to the choicest exotics of most of our modern poets. 'The Romance of Youth' is the next in order, and thence the length of the 'Garden of Florence'; it is the first canto of a boy, who loves solitude, though to his mother's sorrow, rather than unite in the circles of cheerful companions; it sometimes partakes of the feeling of Beattie's Minstrel; but Mr. H. tells us he is not conscious of the likeness. However, be this as it may, no lovers of fancy and elegant imagery will deny the beauty of almost every stanza.—This youth—

'Left his home, array'd in pilgrim weed,
As he were bound for holy Palestine;
With staff and sandal—should he cross'd the mead
That lay before his cottage door,—the knee
Were at their evening meal, and the decline
Of the setting sun was beautiful to see:
He turn'd for one last look—the egantine—
The cot—the trees—the sunshine met his eye,
And not without a tear might that last parting
be.'

The remaining 'other poems' consist of songs, sonnets, epistles, and the 'Ladye of Provence.' Her ladyship will not be admired by many, because Guiglielmo Gardastagno and similar hard names are impediments to boarding-school readers.

The great error of Mr. Hamilton, or rather of the author, who, we understand, owns another name, is a redundancy of expression, and a most wanton and profuse application of certain favourite words, which meander through his verse in all the mazes of metaphorical absurdity: for instance, we have white—"lily white," "white as shining ivory," and "ghostly white;" the words "beautiful" and "golden," and a few other favourite adjectives, are also largely drawn upon. But we pass over these defects, to cull a few favourable specimens from the author's miscellaneous poems, which we do without further remark:—

STANZA.

FROM 'THE ROMANCE OF YOUTH.'

'How is it that the minds of mortals jar,
In what should be their music and their joy?
The spirit, which might make itself a star,
Doth wrap itself in clouds,—and all destroy
The innocent and jolly heart, and toy
With idle questionings of serious things?
Is it that men were made themselves to annoy
With dreams of ill and mystic ponderings,
And doubts of old Religion and the bliss she brings?'

FROM 'DEVON.'

'I will be with thee!
My heart shall haunt the spots it loved the best,
Borne on by that strange voyager, the mind.
Though caged in cities, still my thoughts are free

To visit the green fields and beautiful woods,
And rivulets, that chaunt a lonely ditty
to the sleepy ear of Summer,—and the sea,
That talks for ever to the quiet sands.'

FROM 'LINES TO A VALLEY.'

'I had an hour of that calm time
We read of in the first rhyme
Of pastoral poet. The sweet air
Hav'd round me like Apollo's hair,—
Rich, soft, and full of melody;
The bird sang late upon the tree
Its lonely song; the hush of night
Was born before its time; the light
Seem'd left unusually alone
In the wide heavens; and the tone
Of our own voices was endur'd
With the mellowness of solitude.'

FROM AN 'EPISTLE TO —'

'I thought of HIM—the deathless, the inspir'd—
Whose light my very earliest boyhood found,
And of his rich creations: have we not sorrow'd at high Macbeth's distorted lot,
Sigh'd ever Hamlet's sweet and wilder'd heart,
And when we came upon that piteous part
Of Love's romance, where, long before 'twas
day,
The Lady of the moonlight pined away,—
Have we not lov'd young Juliet? and the wail
Of Lear swoon'd round the heart,—and still the tear
Wrung from sweet Desdemona, by the austere
And darkling madness of her Moorish lord,—
Was dear to us; and many a conquering word
Of tender pity chupp'd at the wild fate
Of one so young and so disconsolate!'

FROM 'FANNY.'

'Fare thee well! may youth be slow
To pass from thee, who near'st it so;
For years are but the links of care
To one so innocent and fair!
Around thee joy, within thee truth,
Thou'rt worthy of perpetual youth,—
Worthy of that delight, which lies Within thy blue and pleasant eyes,—
Worthy thy mother's fond caressing.
I owe thee, Fanny, many a blessing
For pranks of kindness and glee,
And words of childish charity;
For pleasures generous, light, and many,
And therefore do I bless thee, Fanny.'

SONG.

'By the river—by the river,
The round moon is rising;
Like the water she glideth,
In silence and light!
The tree-shadow faileth
In tremulous beauty,
And the swan yet abideth
The wane of the night.'

By the river—by the river,
At evening, in summer,
We have seen the moon rising,—
The same tender moon!
But we never—we never,
In summer, at evening,
Shall again sleep our eyes in
The balm of her boon.'

FROM 'VERSES WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM.'

'When I am gone—oh! wear
Sweet smiles; thy dwelling
Choose where the flowers feed the air,
And the sea is swelling;
And near where some rivulet lingers
In the grass, like an infant's fingers
In its mother's hair.'

The Art of invigorating and prolonging Life by Food, Clothes, Air, Exercise, Wine, Sleep, &c.; and Pæpæ Precepts, pointing out agreeable and effectual Methods to prevent and relieve Indigestion, and to regulate and strengthen the Action of the Stomach and Bowels. By the Author of 'The Cook's Oracle,' &c. &c. Second Edition, 12mo. pp. 276. London, 1821.

If the title of this work is not sufficiently explanatory of its nature and object, we may, for the further information of our readers, inform them that it is especially dedicated to the 'nervous and bilious;' and that the art of managing those temperaments is, in the title-page, stated to be 'easier in modo, sed fortiter in re.'

Dr. Kitchener, the author of this work, is well known to the public as the author of the 'Cook's Oracle'; and a work on Telescopes, in which he discovered himself to be an excellent optician; he is also known to his friends as a musical amateur, an advocate for good living at the least possible expense, for indulging in all the luxuries of epicurism, with due care to avoid its injurious effects. The work is the avowed result of experience; its author had, originally, an extremely delicate constitution, and, at an early period, devoted himself to the study of physic with the hope of learning how to make the most of his small stock of health. The system he adopted succeeded, and he is arrived at his forty-third year in tolerable good health; and this without any uncomfortable abstinence:—his regimen has ever been, 'dum vicimus, vicemus.'

Our author, without avowing himself one of the 'fancy,' is a great advocate for training, the principal rules for which are, 'to go to bed early—to rise early—to take as much exercise as you can in the open air, without fatigue, to eat and drink moderately of plain nourishing food—and especially to keep the mind diverted, and in as easy and cheerful a state as possible." But we shall not dwell on the training system, as few of our readers, we are persuaded, are ambitious to be Tom Cribbs or Captain Barclays. The art of invigorating and prolonging life, after being generally noticed in an introductory article, is treated of more distinctly under the heads,—sleep—siesta—clothes—fire—air—exercise,—and wine,—with the addition of the peptic precepts. We shall not, however, attempt to give a full analysis of a subject embracing so many points, but, after quoting a few passages to show our author's style and manner, shall refer the more inquisitive reader to the work itself, which, we are happy to say, is published at a price which places it within the reach of almost all classes of readers. Sleep is a subject on which our author acknowledges his feelings are tremblingly alive; he is fond of a 'forty-winks' nap in an horizontal posture,' as the best preparative for any extraordinary exertion, either of body or mind. He is a great enemy to thin party walls, particularly if they only separate you from 'fashionable neighbours who turn night into day,' or 'such as delight in the sublimely-economy of cinder-saving or cob-weave catching.' Dogs, parrots, piano-fortes, and 'Little sweep, ho!' are all actionable nuisances to this lover of a good sound sleep, and as inimical as heavy suppers or curtain and tester to the bed in summer.

The 'Siesta' is strongly vindicated by our author, who recommends it warmly to all debilitated persons; half an hour's sleep being as refreshing as half a pint of wine.' The article of clothes we shall pass over very slightly, only observing that the doctor is an enemy to tight stays and braces, and recommends elastic worsted stocking stuff, as the best material for breeches. On the subject of fire we quote one passage, which we recommend to all the 'molidustas' and 'maids of all work' who steal a peep at their masters' copy of The Literary Chronicle:—

'The following plan of lighting and managing a fire, has been attended with great comfort and convenience to myself, (particularly at the beginning and the end of winter, when a very small fire is sufficient), and I think considerable saving of coals.

'Fill your grate with fresh coals, quite up to the upper bar but one, then lay in your faggot of wood in the usual manner, rather collected in a mass than scattered, that a body of concentrated heat may be produced as soon as possible; over the faggot place the cinders of the preceding day, piled up as high as the grate will admit, and placed loosely in rather large fragments, in order that the draft may be free; a bit or two of fresh coal may be added to the cinders when once they are lighted, but no small coal must be thrown on at first, for the reason above stated. When all is prepared, light the wood, when the cinders becoming in a short time thoroughly ignited, the gas rising from the coals below, which will now be effected by the heat, will take fire as it passes through them, leaving a very small portion of smoke to go up the chimney.'

As to exercise, we are told,—

'The more luxuriously you live, the more exercise you require; the bon vivant may depend upon the truth of the advice which Sir Charles Scarborough gave to the Duchess of Portsmouth,—"You must eat less, or take more exercise, or take physic, or be sick."

'Exercise is the grand power to promote the circulation through the capillary vessels, by which the constitution is preserved from obstructions, appetite increased, and digestion improved in all its stages; the due distribution of nourishment invigorates the nervous system, gives firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and strength to every part of the system.

'Exercise, to have its full effect, must be continued till we feel a sensible degree of perspiration, (which is the panacea for the prevention of corpulence, and should, at least one a-day, proceed to the borders of fatigue, but never pass them, or we shall be weakened instead of strengthened.

'Health depends upon perpetual secretion and absorption, and exercise only can produce this.

'After exercise, take care to get cool gradually; when your head perspires, rub it and your face, &c. dry with a cloth:—this is better for the hair than the best 'bear's grease,' and will beautify the complexion beyond "la cosmetique royale," or all the red and white Olympian Dew that was ever imported.

'One of the most important precepts for the preservation of health, is to take care of the skin.

In winter, the surface of the body, the feet, &c. should be washed twice or thrice a-week, with water of the temperature of about 98, and wiped every day with a wet towel; a tepid bath of the like temperature once a fortnight will also conduce much to both health and comfort. Some advise that the surface of the body be wiped every morning with a wet sponge, and rubbed dry after, with not too fine a cloth.'

On the subject of wine, we confess ourselves rather at issue with the doctor, both as to quantity and quality, for we would neither wish to drink it when quite fresh from the cask, nor to limit ourselves to four ordinary wine glasses; we will, however, give his own plan for taking liquid food after dinner:

'When he cannot get good beer, he has two wine glasses of sherry, or one of whiskey or brandy, and three-fourths of a pint of good toast and water, (which, when dyspeptic, he has warmed to about summer heat, i. e. 75 of Fahrenheit), and puts a wine-glass of sherry, or half a glass of whiskey, &c. into half a pint of the water, and the other glass of sherry, or half glass of whiskey, &c. into the remaining quarter pint, thus increasing the strength of the liquid towards the conclusion of dinner; after which he drinks from two to four glasses of port or sherry, as instinct suggests the state of the circulation requires: If it be very languid, a liqueur glass of Johnson's White Curacao is occasionally recommended as a renouvant bonne bouche. About a quarter of an hour after dinner, he lies down on a sofa, and sleeps for about half an hour; this has been his custom for the last twenty years; half an hour's horizontal posture is more restorative to him than if he had sat up and drank three or four more glasses of wine.'

We now pass on to 'Peptic precepts,' a portion of our author's book worthy the perusal of all who think health worth preserving or regaining. We quote an extract almost at random:—

'Be content with one dish;—from want of submission to this salutary rule of temperance, as many men dig their grave with their teeth as with the tankard; Drunkenness is deplorably destructive, but her demurer sister, gluttony, destroys an hundred to her one.

'Instinct speaks pretty plainly to those whose instruments of digestion are in a delicate state, and is an infinitely surer guide than any dietetic rules that can be contrived.

'That the food which we fancy most generally sits easiest on the stomach, is a fact which the experience of almost every individual can confirm.

'The functions of digestion go on merrily when exercised by aliment which the stomach asks for; they often labour in vain when we eat merely because it is the usual hour of dining, or out of necessity, to amuse the gastric juices, and "kill the grinding stomach's hungry rage."

'To affirm that any thing is wholesome or unwholesome, without considering the subject in all the circumstances to which it bears relation, and the unaccountable peculiarities of different constitutions, is, with submission, talking nonsense.

'Let every man consult his stomach; to eat and drink such things, and in such quantities, as agree with that perfectly well, is wholesome for him, whilst they continue to do so; that which satisfies and refreshes us, and causes no uneasiness after, may safely be taken in moderation, whenever the appetite is keen, whether it be at dinner or supper.

'What we have been longest used to is most likely to agree with us best.

'The wholesomeness, &c. of all food depends very much on the quality of it, and the way in which it is cooked.

'Those who are poor in health must live as they can; certainly, the less stimulus any of us use the better, provided it be sufficient to properly carry on the circulation: I sometimes hold it lawful to excite appetite when it is feeble by age or debilitated by indispotion.

'Those stimuli which excite the circulation at the least expense of nervous irritation, and afford the greatest quantity of nutriment, must be most acceptable to the stomach, when it demands restorative diet.

'A healthful impetus may be given to the system by a well-seasoned soup or a restorative ragout, at half the expense to the machinery of life, than by the use of those spirituous stimuli, which fan a feverish fire, exciting action without supplying the expenditure of the principle producing it, and merely quicken the circulation for a few minutes, without contributing any material to feed the lamp of life; which, if it be originally or organically defective, or is impaired by line or disease, will sometimes not burn brightly, unless it be supplied with the best oil, and trimmed in the most skilful manner.'

We shall conclude with an amusing extract relating to the difference in the ours of the meals now and formerly, is well as the quality of the food:

'The stately dames of Edward the fourth's court rose with the lark, deparched their dinner at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and, shortly after eight, were vrant in slumber. How would these reasonable people (reasonable, at least, in this respect) be astonished could they not be witnesses to the present distribution of time among the Children of Fashion!—Would they not call the perverse conduct of those who rise at one or two, line at eight, and retire to bed when the morning is unfolding all its glories, and ature putting on her most pleasing aspect—absolute insanity!!'

'What a contrast there is between the materials of the morning meal, A. D. 1550, when Queen Elizabeth's maids of honour began the day with a round of beef or a cold herring and a flaggon of ale, and in 1821, when the sportsman, and even the day-labourer, breakfasts on what cooks all "Chinese soup," i. e. tea.

'Swift has jocosely observed, such is the extent of modern epicurism, that the world must be encompassed before a wash-woman can sit down to breakfast! i. e. a voyage to the east for tea and to the east for sugar.

'In the Northumberland Household book for 1512, we are informed that—"a thousand pounds was the sum annually expended in housekeeping; this maintained 166 persons, and the wheat was then 5s. 8d. per quarter.

"The family rose at six in the morning; my lord and my lady had set on their table for breakfast, at seven o'clock in the morning.—

A quart of beer,
A quart of wine,
Two pieces of salt fish,
Half a dozen red herrings,
Four white ones, and
A dish of sprats!!'

"They dined at ten, supped at four in the afternoon, the gates were all shut at nine, and no further ingress or egress permitted."

'But now,—

'The gentleman who dines the latest
Is, in our street, esteemed the greatest;
But surely greater than them all,
Is he who never dines at all.'

We must now quit Dr. Kitchener and his book, so far at least as our critical labours are concerned; but we shall frequently turn to it in our closet, and though we may not regulate our mode of living exactly according to his precepts, yet we have sufficient faith in him to believe that he is as disinterested as he is sincere, and we doubt not, generally, as correct as he is disinterested. To the valetudinarian his work must be acceptable, and we feel persuaded that there are few persons, either in sickness or in health, who will not profit by its perusal.

Sketches of Upper Canada, &c.

By John Howison, Esq.

MA. Howison describes minutely, and, we doubt not, accurately, the progress of emigration to Upper Canada, the expenses of the voyage, the plans to be adopted on arriving there, the different modes of settling, the expense of labour, the price of land and its produce, &c. He concludes by strongly recommending Upper Canada to emigrants, and particularly to poor people; as the expense of the voyage is not much, and the encouragement given to labour considerable. The people in Upper Canada live much better than persons of a similar class in Britain. It is not merely to the poor and necessitous that Canada affords a delightful asylum:—

'The second class of emigrants, viz. men of small income and increasing family, will find Upper Canada, in many respects, an advantageous place of residence. When I say this, I of course include those persons only who do not derive their incomes from the exercise of any profession, and who have no obvious means of improving their circumstances. Half-pay officers, annuitants,

&c. are in this situation. An individual of this class may do well in Upper Canada, if he possesses a farm, and raises enough of all kinds of produce to supply his own wants. With £250 a-year, and fifty or sixty acres of land, he might, by proper management, support a large family in comfort and abundance; but he would not augment his income by farming extensively, unless he engaged in the business practically, and were assisted by his children: the price of labour being so high, and that of produce so low, that the agriculturist cannot derive much profit from the returns made by the soil, if he employs hired men to work it. Respectable families suffer a good deal of inconvenience from a difficulty of obtaining household servants, most of whom are both negligent and unprincipled, and conceive themselves insulted, if the person who proposes to hire them makes any inquiry about their characters. Some will not engage themselves, unless they are allowed to sit at table with the master and mistress of the house. Emigrants sometimes bring servants from Britain; but such seldom remain long with them after their arrival in Canada, their ideas and prospects being directed into new channels, by the system of independence and equality which prevails in the country. The women are soon married, and the men become landholders. Some people bind their domestics by indentures, to continue with them for a certain time; but this plan seldom answers well, as persons so articulated are apt to grow insolent and troublesome, whenever their bondage becomes disagreeable to them. The chief objection which men with large families will have to Upper Canada is, that it does not afford them the means of educating their children. Schools, at which the essential branches are taught, exist in the most secluded parts of the province; but there is no seminary on a liberal scale, except at York and Kingston. However, the generosity which the Provincial government displays in the endowment of schools, and the encouragement which the inhabitants give to respectable teachers, will soon render the means of education as accessible in Upper Canada as they are in the country parts of Great Britain.

'To the man of capital, Upper Canada, I am sorry to say, offers few inducements. The province indeed requires the presence of such persons, and the circulation of their capital, more than any thing else; but the benefit of a country will, of course, always be a secondary consideration with every one, when individual interest is concerned, and, therefore, it cannot be expected that persons of wealth should as yet emigrate to Upper Canada. There are a good many ways of employing capital, but few which will ensure such a speedy return, as would in general be considered necessary. The mercantile business is already overdone. Merchants swarm in every part of the province, and have, in a great measure, been the means of reducing public credit to its present low ebb. Farming is not profitable, for the reasons already stated, and, likewise, because there is, at present, no steady market for agricultural produce. Those who could afford to wait many years for the interest of money laid out, might speculate advantageously in lands. Large and excellent tracts may, at present, be purchased for half the sum they are really worth. These belong to individuals who are neither resident in the province nor at all connected with it, and who would gladly sell possessions in which they take no interest, and of which they do not know the value. Some people may suppose, that if such properties were in the market, the Canadians would buy them up, but they are prevented from doing so by a want of capital. The man who bought eight or ten thousand pounds' worth of land, would derive no revenue from it, for perhaps as many years. The persons to whom he sold it out in small portions, at a very advanced rate, probably would not be able to pay any part of the price until they had cleared and frequently cropped it, and thus gained something by their labours; but the speculator would secure himself all the time, by not granting a deed to any settler until he had paid the amount of his purchase. When money did begin to flow in, he would receive a return not only equal to the interest of the capital he had laid out, but triple or quadruple the amount of the capital itself. The man who buys lands at two or three shillings an acre, and sells it again at ten or fifteen, makes a fortunate speculation, although twenty years should intervene between the date of his making the purchase and that of his receiving the profits it has produced.'

The latter part of Mr. Howison's work consists of 'Recollections of the United States,' in which he sketches currente calamo, the peculiar manners and customs which he observed in a tour through this part of America, in 1820. As this is a subject on which our journal has lately contained much information, we shall be brief in our extracts from Mr. H.'s account.—Speaking of New York, he says,—

'The principal hotels are situated in Broadway; and, as they differ entirely from British hotels, it is worth while to say something about them. The City Hotel is the best and most fashionable place of resort for travellers. It is a large brick building, four stories high, containing a splendid dining saloon and a magnificent drawing-room, each 85 feet in length, a billiard room, several suites of apartments for private families, and more than a hundred bed-chambers. Upwards of eighty people breakfast and dine there every day, at the public table, during the summer months; and the charge for board and lodging is ten dollars a-week, for which four meals a-day are furnished in the best possible style. At the City Hotel, a traveller neither has it in his power to dine alone nor to have private apartments, but must take his seat at the ordinary, at the established hours. Travelling parties, consisting of ladies and gentlemen, cannot even obtain separate sitting apartments, but must either remain in the bed-chambers or mingle together in a drawing-room allotted for their reception. They are all expected to dine at the same table and at the same hour; or, if any party chooses to deviate from this plan, the charge is more than double what it would otherwise be. Washington-hall, Franklin-house, Mechanics'-hall, Wall-street-house, and nearly all the other public establishments for travellers, are conducted in this style; which is evidently but little adapted to the taste of Europeans, who generally choose privacy when they reside at a hotel. The Americans, however, are not so fastidious; and many of them would be at a loss to conceive why a man should wish to take his meals alone, when he might command a greater variety of dishes by sitting down among the multitude.

'The persons who encircle these table d'hôte are, for the most part, genteel in their appearance, and polite in their manners. Many of them are permanent residents in New York, and merely board at an hotel for convenience. The conversation never becomes general; as no one addresses those who sit round him, unless he has been particularly introduced to them. When any person wants part of a dish, he sends the waiter for the whole of it, as no one troubles himself with carving for another. Every thing that is drank is charged extra to the individual that calls for it; but most of the guests take nothing but water, and the moment they have dined, they start up and hurry away. The Americans are not at all addicted to the pleasures of the table, being no judges of good cookery, and dining usually at two or three in the afternoon. Men of business hasten to their counting-houses or offices immediately after dinner, leaving good wine and convivial friends without the least regret. Should they feel inclined to drink a little in the course of the evening, they engage a few acquaintances, and carry them to their homes or boarding-houses; where, having called for some wine, the whole party drink it off as fast as possible, without either sitting down or taking off their hats. This is called a flying glass. However, people of wealth and fashion live much in the same way as respectable merchants in England, and have fewer standing toasts than their inferiors.

The number of private boarding-houses in New York is very great. Few young men have a house and domestic establishment of their own till they are married, and some not even then. The people who keep these boarding-houses are usually widow ladies, who have been left in destitute circumstances; but most of them are quite superior in manners and respectability, to the same class of persons in Britain. They do not receive any one into their houses, unless he is recommended by a mutual acquaintance. He is then treated as a friend, and enjoys an easy intercourse with the daughters, sisters, or other members of the family, if he feels inclined; and is allowed to walk out with them, or escort them to public places. A young man will sometimes find a boarding-house rather dangerous, if there are agreeable females in it. Many widows procure husbands for their orphaned daughters by keeping one, though I do not mean to say that they ever have this object in view when they receive lodgers. The New York boarding-houses are not agreeable in general; for the social intercourse that takes place in them creates a restraint, which would not exist were there no communication at all between the parties.'

Though the fine arts are not deficient in patronage, the United States have made but little progress in them:

'The native painter most highly esteemed among them at present is Col. Trumbull. Government has engaged that gentleman to execute a series of national pictures for the decoration of the Hall of Congress, for every one of which he is to receive the sum of four thousand dollars. Last summer he had finished two, the subjects of which are the Declaration of Independence and the Surrender of Lord Cornwallis,—the last I saw while in New York; but was greatly disappointed in finding its merits much inferior to what I had anticipated. Colonel Trumbull is the most lady-like painter in the world; his colours appear to be laid on with the utmost timidity; he shows as much aversion to strong shadows as the Chinese do; and his faces have an expression of red-cheeked stupidity about them, which denotes a corresponding want of soul in the artist. However, in justice to Colonel Trumbull, it ought to be stated that his subject is an unfortunate one. The picture represents the French and American armies drawn out in lines opposite to each other, and surveying the British, who march between them, deprived of the honours of war; and surely no object can be farther from ideal beauty than soldiers standing stiff in their ranks, and dressed in pipe-clayed breeches, white belts, and black gaiters. Had the colonel put a row of poplar trees (which, by the bye, the Americans admire very much,) parallel to each of the armies, the composition and expression of his picture would have been complete.'

Another notice on the subject of the arts occurs in the account of Philadelphia, which we quote:—

'Next morning I went to see the celebrated picture of Christ healing in the temple, which Mr. West painted, and sent as a donation to the Pennsylvania hospital. It is impossible to survey this magnificent performance without a feeling of awe, which the mere recollection of its beauties and expression never fails to revive. It is kept for public exhibition, in a small building erected expressly for the purpose, according to a plan given by Mr. West, who seems to have been fully aware of the value of his gift, or which he several times refused seven thousand guineas. He gave instructions that no other picture should be hung in the apartment, and that no visitor should be allowed to take a sketch of his painting. Some time ago, the directors of the hospital engaged a Philadelphian artist to make a drawing of the picture, that they might be able to publish a print, and promised him four hundred dollars for his trouble; but, after toiling three weeks, he found that his work was not half completed, and he accordingly abandoned the design, and lost both his labour and he expected remuneration. The painting contains fifty-four heads, twenty-one of which have full-length and half-length figures attached to them; and the variety of expression and intricacy of grouping in the representation of so many persons, sufficiently account for the difficulty which the American artist experienced in endeavouring to sketch them. The exhibition of West's painting yielded eight thousand dollars the first year, and five thousand the second; and it is supposed, that it will hereafter afford to the hospital an annual revenue of five hundred pounds sterling.

Although we spoke very favourably of Mr. Howison's work in our first notice, yet we confess it has still improved in acquaintance; and we hesitate not to pronounce it one of the most interesting and most entertaining works we have seen on the subject of America.

The First, Second, and Third Reports of the Society for the Suppression of Mendicity: established in London, 1818. 8vo. London, 1818-21.

EVERY person who has had occasion to perambulate the streets of this great metropolis during the last half dozen years, must have experienced the dreadful annoyance and importunities of turfy beggars; and must also have noticed that they are now less numerous and less insistent than they were three years ago. This important change has been effected by the Mendicity Society, which was established for the purpose of inquiring into the state of mendicity in the metropolis, affording relief to distressed and deserving individuals, and for punishing 'incorrigible rogues and vagabonds.' The Society, in one of their Reports, express a somewhat decided opinion against the poor law. These, however, they cannot reform, and have been compelled to act in accordance with the spirit of them; but speaking of the nature of the Mendicity Society, they say—

'Whenever it shall be enabled to induce parishes to adopt a better system in regard to vagrants, a very important step will be taken towards the end it has in view. If the entire Suppression of Mendicity be at all attainable, it will probably be effected by slow degrees, and will depend upon an infinity of circumstances; but its advance has been already arrested, and its most resolving features are receding. The managers can look back with unmixed satisfaction, and forward with the most pleasing anticipations—taking the laws of the country for its guide, so far as their enforcement is consistent with the best principles of political economy—adopting a middle course between the advocates of, and the opponents to, the present system of parochial relief—seeking to combine the advantages of both, without the mischiefs of either; the society may not be improperly considered as operating to mitigate the partial evils which result from general laws, and, by so doing, to augment the amount of human happiness.'

It appears that, during the last year, 4546 cases were investigated by the Committee; in 1696 of which, the causes of distress were very apparent, and in 2350, want of employment, real or pretended, was the alleged excuse for begging; 542 were ascertained to be impostors and confirmed vagrants, and ordered to be prosecuted; a quantity of clothing was distributed to the really necessitous, and 46,417 meals given to applicants with mendicity tickets, the general use of which would soon suppress the professional beggar. Among the artifices by which mendicants levy contributions on the humane and credulous, the system of 'begging letters' is a favorite one, and the Committee have detected several cases of fraud of this nature:—

'In one case, the applicant acted upon a systematic plan, having an agent to collect donations, who was paid by a poundage on their amount. Although the residence of this man was stated to be in London, the Committee discovered that he had country lodgings, for which he paid 40l. a-year; that although supported solely by writing begging letters, he passed there for a person of respectable property; his apartments were occasionally ornamented with wax lights, and he appeared to enjoy not merely the comforts, but many of the elegances of life.

'The Committee are confident that there are many other individuals living by the same description of fraud; it is their custom to write under different names to a large circle of persons at the same time, a deception which the subsequent transmission of all the letters to one office will immediately detect; and there is no doubt, that the limited investigation, commenced by the committee, has already considerably checked the practice altogether.'

It is not our intention to enter into a lengthened detail of the benefits of this institution or the zeal of its members. 'By their fruits shall ye know them,' and the Committee need do nothing more than to refer to the good they have done, and to the evils they have prevented, to recommend the Society strongly to public support, and to the co-operation of magistrates, parish officers, and 'all who are in authority under them.' We select a few cases which have been investigated by the Committee:—

'J. A. was apprehended by the society's officers while begging, and, on being brought to the office, was recognized as an old applicant, but in a different name. His statements not agreeing, the sitting managers directed him to be taken to Marlborough-street; the magistrate ordered him to be committed for seven days, and passed. This man was, however, caught a second time in Mount-street, when he made great resistance. On being again brought before the magistrate, he was imprisoned fourteen days, and the order to pass him repeated. Even this confinement had not the desired effect upon this determined vagrant, for he was a third time detected soliciting alms in St. Pancras, when he was conveyed to Marlborough-street; and, on its being stated to the magistrate that he had been there twice before, he committed him to be tried at the Sessions, when the society prosecuted. On the trial, it appeared he possessed an income of 70l. per annum. The court sentenced him to be imprisoned six months. It should not be omitted to state, that on one of the above occasions, he offered 5l., and on another 10l., if the officers would let him go. This case presents an instance of imposition and depravity seldom equalled.'

'E. H. aged 36, a native of Cork, who, through the hope of getting a livelihood in London, came over on the death of her husband (a master taylor), who left her with five children. On her arrival, she endeavoured to get into some way of providing for her family; but after repeated attempts, the only one left her to embrace, was selling fruit, which she continued, till poverty compelled her to give up even that occupation, for want of the means wherewith to go to market. Thus reduced to the last stage of human misery, she applied to the overseers of the parish wherein she slept; but they would not relieve her unless she was willing to be passed home.

'Enquiry was made into this woman's statement, when it appeared, that in a most wretched room in Whitechapel, these six human beings were dragging on a miserable existence, totally destitute of food—not a bed to lie on, nor covering to protect them from the cold—their complete nudity only prevented by a solitary garment for each; and one of the boys severely ruptured. This was the scene which presented itself to the manager visiting this abode of wretchedness! He advised her to be passed to Ireland—she consented—a letter was written to the overseers, requesting their assistance for that purpose, which was afforded; and the society advanced a moiety for their journey—redeemed clothes to a considerable amount—gave the boy a truss—equipped the family—and procured the payment of a certain sum on their reaching Dublin. A letter has since been received, acknowledging their safe arrival, with the receipt of the money remitted.

'J. H. only twelve years of age, was taken by the officers, while asking alms from shop to shop in Piccadilly. He said he was a native of Shrewsbury; but on being taken before a magistrate, it came out that his friends were doing extremely well, in the vicinity of Leicester-square; but the boy, from some motive, had taken up the destructive habit of begging. The father was accordingly summoned, who stated, that his son had both breakfasted and dined at home on the day in question. After receiving an admonition from the magistrate, he promised to take more care of him in future. This case is confirmatory of the benefits arising from the society sending out officers, for had not this young delinquent been stopped in his career, in all probability, time would have hardened him into, at least, an inflexible vagrant, and perhaps into a more criminal character. His natural guardian likewise received a salutary warning of the consequences arising from his neglect. In several instances has this institution had the gratification of restoring runaway apprentices and children to their masters and families, whom they had left, from supposed injuries received, or in consequence of necessary correction for their faults.'

Travels in Palestine.

By J. S. Buckingham.

(Concluded from p. 722.)

On the 23th of January, Mr. Buckingham, dressed as a Syrian Arab, accompanied by Mr. Bankes in the garb of a Turkish soldier, and his Albanian interpreter, left Jerusalem for Jericho, and the following day passed the Jordan. Mr. B. says,—

'The stream appeared to us to be little more than twenty-five yards in breadth, and was so shallow in this part as to be easily fordable by our horses. The banks were thickly lined with tall rush or oleanders, and a few willows; the stream was exceedingly rapid; the water tolerably clear, from its flowing over a bed of pebbles; and, as we drank of the stream while our horses were watering, we found it pure and sweet to the taste.

'From the distance which we had come from Jericho northward, it seemed probable that we had crossed the river pretty nearly at the same ford as that which was passed over by the Israelites on their first entering the promised land.

'The place of Christ's baptism by John, is but a little to the southward of this, as fixed on by the Catholics; but the Greeks assign a spot three or four miles still more southerly than that assumed by the former as the scene of this event.

'Ascending on the east side of the Jordan, we met large flocks of camels, mostly of a whitish colour, and all of them young and never yet burdened, as our guides assured us, though the whole number of those we saw could not have fallen short of a thousand. These were being driven down to the Jordan to drink, chiefly under the care of young men and dromedars. Among them many of the young ones were clothed around their bodies with coverings of hair-text-cloth, while the elder females had their udders bound up in bags, tied by cords crossing over the loins; and the males walking with two of the legs tied.'

'Of the ancient Geraza, now called Jerash, Mr. B. gives a very minute account. He says,—

'The city occupied nearly a square of somewhat less than two English miles in circumference, and the greatest length, from the ruined arched building on the south of the first entrance to the small temple on the north side of the opposite one, is about five thousand feet, as measured by paces, or nearly an English mile. The general direction of this square is, with its sides, nearly towards the four cardinal points; but none of these sides are perfectly straight, probably from the inequality of the ground along which they run.

'The city stood on the facing slopes of two opposite hills, with a narrow, but not a deep valley between them, through which ran a clear stream of water springing from fountains near the centre of the town, and bending its way thence to the southward.

'The eastern hill, though rather more extensive in its surface than the western one, rises with a steeper slope, and is consequently not so well fitted for building on. We found it covered with shapeless heaps of rubbish, evidently the wreck of houses, as the walls of some of them were still visible; but as neither columns nor other vestiges of ornamental buildings were to be seen among these, we concluded that this portion of the city was chiefly inhabited by the lower orders of the people.

'The whole surface of the western hill is covered with temples, theatres, colonnades, and ornamental architecture, and was, no doubt, occupied by the more dignified and noble of the citizens. The general plan of the whole was evidently the work of one founder, and must have been sketched out before the Roman city, as we now see it in ruins, began to be built. The walls of the city were as nearly equal in length, and faced as nearly to the four cardinal points, as the nature of the ground would admit.

'The eastern portion was chosen for the residence of the great mass of the people; first, from its being of more extensive surface, and next, from its being adapted to the erection of fine buildings, or the production of architectural effect. The western portion was devoted purely to the grandeur of display and decoration, and the regularity of its arrangement is no less striking than the number of splendid edifices crowded together in so small a space.

'One straight and spacious street extends through the whole length of the city from north to south, ending at the gates of these respective quarters, their being only these two now remaining; nor are there indeed any confusive appearances of there ever having been any other than these two entrances into the city.

'This main street is intersected at nearly equal distances of one-fourth of its length from each gate, by two other streets which cross it at right angles, and extend through the whole breadth of this western portion of the city, the point of intersection in each being ornamented with a public square.

'From each of these intersections to their respectively nearest gate, the order of architecture that prevailed was Ionic; but in the central space between these intersections, and including a length equal to half that of the whole city, the predominant order was Corinthian.

'In the centre, or nearly so, of the central space, was a noble palace, probably the residence of the governor, with a beautiful Corinthian temple in front, and another more ruined one behind in right-lines with it, and the semi-circular remains of a still more highly-finished temple beside it. In a line with these edifices, and on the east of them, was a bridge crossing the small stream in the valley. In a line with the first or southern street of intersection was another bridge; and nearly in a line with the northern street, and also on the east of it, was a very extensive bath.

'Just within the southern gate of entrance was a peripteral temple, a circular colonnade, and a theatre; and just within the northern gate of entrance was also a theatre, a temple, and a military guard-house. Both the principal streets extending the whole length of the city, and those which crossed its road through its breadth, were lined by avenues of columns, extending in one unbroken range on each side, and ascended to by steps.

'There were also other edifices scattered in different parts of the city, which will be seen in examining the plan; but the whole was remarkable for the regularity city and taste of its design no less than for its able and perfect execution.

Mr. B. afterwards examined the ruins of the ancient Gamala, now called Oorn Kais. The city forms nearly a square; its greatest length, from east to west, measuring 1670 paces, of about two feet each, and its breadth one fourth less:—

The upper part of the city stood on a level spot on the summit of the hill, and appears to have been walled all around the acclivities of that hill, being on all sides exceedingly steep, and having appearances of ruined buildings, even on their steepest parts. The eastern gate of entrance has its portals still remaining, and was near the northern wall. From hence a noble street ran through the whole length of the city, extending the number of paces mentioned, as it was along this that the measurement was taken. This street was fifteen paces, or about thirty feet in breadth, from pillar to pillar; as it had a colonnade of the Ionic and Corinthian orders, at intervals, lining it in avenues on each side, as at the ruins of Geraza. The street was paved throughout with fine squared blocks of the black volcanic stone, and this pavement was still so perfect that the ruts of carriage wheels were to be seen in it of different breadths, and about an inch in depth, as at the ruins of Pompeii in Italy.

The first edifice which presented itself, on entering at the eastern gate, was a theatre on the left, the scene and front of which was entirely destroyed, but its benches were still remaining, and it faced towards the north. Still farther on were appearances of an Ionic temple, the colonnade of the street being continued; and at about the centre of its length, a range of Corinthian columns on pedestals marked the site of a grand edifice on the left; not a column now remained erect, but the plan could be distinctly traced. This apparent temple was a hundred paces in depth from north to south, or from the street inward, and its façade, which fronted the street and came in a line with the colonnade before described, was about seventy paces in breadth. The chief peculiarity of this edifice was, that it was built on a range of fine arches, so that the foundations were higher than the general level of the street, by which it must have been rendered most conspicuous.

At the southern end of this edifice was a second theatre, open to the west and fronting the central cross-street, which were intersected the city from north to south, at right-angles with the larger one, running from east to west. This second theatre had only a small portion of its front preserved, but its benches and doors of entrance, the pavement of its stage, and part of its scene, were as perfect as either of those at Geraza, to which it was nearly equal in size, and nearly similar in design; but it was in less perfect preservation, and on the whole inferior in taste and execution of its details to either of them.

Before we departed we were taken to see one of the ancient Roman tombs, now used as a carpenter's shop, the occupier being employed in constructing a rude plough, and in fixing the irons to one of those long Syrian goads, which serve to spur the animal with one end and clear the plough of clods with the other. On examining the size and weight of this iron at the foot, Maundrell's conjecture struck me as a very judicious one, that it might have been with such a weapon that Shamgar made the prodigious slaughter related of him in the Book of Judges.

From this tomb we went to a still more perfect one, which was entirely cleared, and now used as a private dwelling. Though the females of the family were within, we were allowed to enter, and descended by a flight of three steps, there being either a cistern or a deep sepulchre on the right of this descent. The portals and architrave were here perfectly exposed; the ornaments of the latter were a wreath and open flowers; the door also was divided by a studded bar and pannelled, and the ring of the knocker remained, though the knocker itself had been broken off. The door, which was of the same size and thickness as those described, traversed easily on its hinges, and we were permitted to open and close it at pleasure. On examining it closely, all that has before been said on the mode of fixing and of fastening it was confirmed, as we could here see every part of the construction more perfectly.

The tomb was about eight feet in height on the inside, as there was a descent of a steep step from the stone threshold to the floor. Its size was about twelve paces square, but no light was received into it except by the door; we could not see whether there was any inner chamber, as in some of the others. A perfect sarcophagus still remained within, and this was now used by the family as a chest for corn and other provisions, so that this violated sepulchre of the dead had thus become a secure, a cool, and a convenient retreat to the living of a different race.

Mr. B. afterwards visited Nazareth, Tiberias, Jeneen, Sanhoor, Neapolis, Gerazim, the well of Samaria, &c. At Sanhoor, he was introduced to the chief Hadjee Ahmed Gerar:—

Our conversation of the evening," says Mr. B., "was chiefly on the state of Europe, on the countries I had visited, and those I hoped to see. As the chief had himself been twice to Mecca, making the journey from Damascus, I learned from him also some interesting particulars on that route, and we talked a great deal about those parts of Arabia which we had both seen, namely, the ports of the Hedjaz. An excellent bed was prepared for me in a separate room, with clean sheets and cushions covered with silk, and every arrangement was made for my comfort that I could possibly desire.

Among the party assembled round the fire in the court was an old amateur of muskets and pistols, called Sheikh Ibrahim, who asked me a thousand questions about the names of the celebrated makers in the different capitals of Europe, and brought me at least twenty different pieces to examine. His passion for arms was so strong that he had brought up his son as a gunsmith, though he himself had been self taught; and among some locks which were shown me as the work of the son, in imitation of English ones, with the name of Wilson upon them, there were several that would not have disgraced an European artist. When we talked of the perfection to which this manufactory was brought in England, and the improved methods used in working the metals there, as far as I was myself imperfectly acquainted with them, the old man swore by his beard, that if I would take him to that country only for a few months, that he might witness those wonders, as he called them, he would serve me in the capacity of servant, or soldier, or groom, or anything; in short, that I might command during the whole of the way.

Mr. Buckingham's work, which we consider as one of the most valuable of its class, and furnishing the best illustrations that Scripture has received from modern travellers, contains several good maps and other interesting engravings.

The Wit's Red Book, or Calendar of Gaiety, for the year 1822. A Collection of original Anecdotes, Facetiae, Epigrams, &c. By Ross Rosso, pp. 168. London, 1821.

Mr. Ross Rosso, Facetiarius Doctor, though not quite so witty as he would have us believe, is an amusing fellow, and his book is a good antidote for the blue devils, for half an hour at least, any day. He is strongly addicted to what is called the vice of punning; and as this species of wit is only to be practised when it is either very good or ingeniously bad, Mr. Rosso, whose puns are of a mediocre character, somewhat like those of Lord Norbury, is not entitled to much praise in this branch of his profession. He has, however, formed an entertaining olio, which may be consulted with advantage when the reader has dozed over the silly tales, sonnets, and epigrams, of those other annual publications, called—Pocket Books. But we will let Mr. Rosso speak for himself, and that to the best advantage:—

Agreeable Annotation.—"The late benignant and worthy Mr. Pleasants, of Dublin, who founded the Stove Tenter-House in that city, and has thereby been the means of saving thousands of his countrymen from the wretchedness to which they were before exposed, was not only benevolent, but facetious and pleasant withal. Happening one day to hear a sermon with which he was much delighted, he sent to the preacher, requesting that he would permit him to peruse the discourse which had afforded him so much pleasure. His desire was immediately complied with, and next day he returned the manuscript with a letter of thanks, in which he said that he had taken the liberty to add to add a note to a passage which had particularly struck him. The clergyman, anxious to ascertain whether the passage in question contained any thing that required elucidation, or called for animadversion, immediately looked through his sermon; but what was his pleasure and surprise on discovering that the amiable annotator had inserted a bank-note of considerable value."

An illegal solicitor.—"An attorney, who was much molested by a fellow importuning him to bestow him something, threatened to have him taken up as a common beggar. "A beggar! (exclaimed the man) I would have you to know that I am of the same profession as yourself; are we not both solicitors?" "That may be, friend; yet there is this difference—you are not a legal one, which I am."

A Pun.—"The following excellent and witty pun, was uttered by a student at Cambridge at the time that the late bishop of Bristol, (Dr. Mansel, master of Trinity College), disapproving of the large Cossack trousers, which he thought favoured more of a martial than clerical air, forbade them to be worn by the young men of his college, who were ordered to appear in tight breeches. "The good bishop (observed one) does not approve of our present loose habits." "True (replied another, who perhaps would have been as pleased to have uttered the pun himself); true, and surely he behaves very inconsistently." "How so?"—"Why, you cannot but allow that it is both inconsistent and indecorous in him to contract the loose habits of the university!"

Titles.—"It is impossible (observed Joseph the Second to Madame Casanova), to entertain the least regard for those persons who purchase their nobility." "Certainly, sire, nor is it less difficult to esteem those who sell it."

Degeneracy of the present age.—"Mr. Harris, the learned author of Hermes, informs us, that on reading the following passage to a friend, "In our time it may be spoken more truly than of old, that virtue is gone, the church is under foot, the clergy is in error, the devil reigneth," the latter interrupted him, and said with a sigh, "Alas! how true a picture of the times!" "Of what times?" inquired Mr. Harris. "Of what times! why can you suppose that I mean any other than the present: when were there ever any half so bad, or to which such an observation as that you have just quoted is applicable?" "Forgive me for interrupting you, but the times I am reading of are older than you imagine; the sentiment was delivered about four hundred years ago, and its author was Sir John Mandeville, who died in 1371."

Nautical Knowledge.—"In the warmth of argument, a Jack-tar said to a landsman, "Shiver my timbers, mate, what can you know about a ship?—you, who never yet saw either a drop of salt water or a ship in your whole life?" "There you are much mistaken, I can assure you; for I have seen a great many of the latter in the course of my life." "You!" exclaimed the tar in a tone expressive of surprise and incredulity, "Yes, friend, much to my sorrow—since, to confess the truth, they have been all hard-ships."

Reading.—"A Negro, who had learnt to read, wishing to give some of his countrymen, who had never seen a book, an idea of it, said, "reading is the power of hearing with the eyes instead of the ears."

The advantage of having a vote.—"An honest John Bull, travelling through Germany, on arriving at the gate of a city was requested to describe himself; not knowing exactly what designation to apply to himself, he answered that he was "an elector of Middlesex." As an Elect in Germany is rather a more important personage than those who bear that honourable title in England, the Germans immediately threw open their gates, and the guard turned out, and did military honours to the English Elector."

The Meditator,

AN OCCASIONAL PAPER,
No. III.

"He had been long taw'dra mathematics,
Optics, philosophy, and statistics,
Magic, horoscopy, astrology,
And was old dog at phisiology."—Ilusdibras.

Tax delineation I alluded to in my last paper, as having been given in my first, was, as the reader might guess, without either Elijah's mantle or a cloven foot, that of the features and proportions of my real, carnal, and personal body; I was going to add—but for the duplicate and unconcourous interruption of my reader, the first imprecative and blasphemous, the other insinuating and uncharitable—that I had done thus after the example of my great archetype, the Spectator, to whom I conform in the genius and manner of my writings, as much as in the shape of my face.

I make no doubt of the great and paramount interest with which that description will be read by this curious nation, who find such intolerable gratification in every thing extraordinary and out of the common stile of growth—exotics to the natural temperature and condition of their wholesome glebe, every paradoxical plant which springs in rank, weedy, and over-heated soil—receiving more pleasure from the view of monsters, prodigies, and unsightly births, generated in the warlike mounds of Nature, when she plays the jade with' blind Chance, and slacks her nightly fires in the arms of that misbegotten king of Chaos, than from her most perfect creations, bearing their divine origin in their all-adapted symmetry and the glory of their presence, and by this very similitude proving their legitimacy. Nature best pleases us when she is unnatural. A dog with two heads has been known to fill a hospital with zoologists.—

Indeed, for the satisfaction of this very philosophical spirit of inquiry, forming an essential and most intellectual attribute of British constitutions, from the spindle-bodied dilettanti, who admire, through glass corrective of the erring humours of his sight, his own animalculous counterparts in the cases at Montague-house, where—

Stop!—don't breathe the tenth part of a pulse—emit not an elementary globe of atmosphere, to carry irretrievable destruction to my splendid march of ideas—that thought should buter for Elysium, and yet leave me wherewithal to purchase fibres to crack for company in that doleful place of eternal blessedness and joy—I wouldn't lose that thought for a world of perfect chrysolith—

I have it! I have it! I shall pull straws with Solomon for the longest wit—I shall rap Archimedes o'er the knuckles, like a most tyrannical pedagogue and superlative master of deduction—I shall dichotomize Newton's philosophical coronet, and put one half in my pocket—I shall make mouths at the whole synagogue of wits, ancient and modern, from my seat of future exaltation.—

Yes! I have hit upon the solution of that great problem, which has puzzled the most learned doctors of the community—the true answer to that inexplicable riddle. Eureka! Make out my diploma, ye societies and colleges, for your different and egregious honours! Ye who breathe not in the eternal mill of science, but equipped in monkish trammels, and winks to keep you from deviating into day-light, sweating, pushing, shouldering, puffing, basting your indomitable sides, you grind, grind; operarius mortals! you grind—grains of learned wisdom into dust—and covered with this pulverulentous—no farther—who ever went beyond six syllables but a lexicographer?

Though I have made many discoveries in my time, in the mathematics, physics, metaphysics, and all those other fanciful sciences, yet the solution of this problem surpasses them all. O well done! well done, thou brain of the best consistency! thou one and dissimilar gland! whereon the mind perches like a sparrow, and casting a hawk's eye o'er her crowded and imaginary levee, assembled in her presence-chamber, the sensorium, selects and separates, divides and distinguishes, disparts and dislocates, the mixed and heterogeneous multitude, who are all pining, and scraping, and flattering, and elbowing for precedence—I say, well done! thou Pope of a new communion! where the images worship the rope, instead of the pope the images—how hast it, invisible king of the castle! thou hast it, as sure as God's in gloster!

What?

What would crack the scull of a phynx to imagine in her very most himerical fancies—what would put an Edipus to inevitable nonplus in determining its meaning, if the monster had nagined it—what would make Solon hide his head in his mistress's lap, or very shame and scandal—what could craze a Linnaeus or a Buffon to distinguish head from tail—what could puzzle Omnipotence to decide here he should allot it, dignified neither for deity or devil—in short, what could braid the ciucture of a grey rat's hip-collar—what would meet an fallible come-through if it were tossed in a cobweb—what would bow down a oak if 'twere hanged in its topmast, at oak being grown of a Lilliputian orn—in a word, what would break e back of any simile to illustrate. An inconceivable chimera—an unrallable riddle—a witless puzzle-wit—indescrivable natural—a subject future annihilation—a free agent thout a soul—an animal without a dy—a bloodless, boneless, mindless, dyless, descriptionless—subject of our vereign lord, the king of Great Bri-

[1] despatch.—The reader, peradventure, hath seen an ape—'but that's not it'—or a root of a mandrake—'but that's not it'—or, if a female, hath, perhaps, bought a gingerbread husband—'but that's not it'—no—

Heaven and earth! what is it then?

Gentle reader, why exclaimest thou so hastily? Still the clamorous and be-deafening shout of thy climbing and pre-arrogate impatience.—Ev'n thus the zenith-washing billows of rude Ocean, hng in the clouds within the moon's dominion, whilst vexed imponderable volumes roar beneath.—Did Job live for nothing? Are there no dispositions of asses vendible i' the city? Does the Stoic philosophy sell for a plun? Go to—put that latter admirable simile of mine, about clouds and moons and volumes and so forth, into blank verse, as a task and penance—so:

The strange creature lately seen in England and the adjacent countries.

This affair,—for we are cautious of attributing to it any name, specific or generic, which hath lately made its appearance even in the streets of the metropolis, and frightened many young gentlemen out of their proper growth, is a thing bearing some remote resemblance to a splackmuck, not very unlike the spawn of a luminau frog, and is by many conceived to be the incarnation of the alphabetical letter Y, turned upside down. It very much resembles a calf in the hardness of its scull, and an ass in having flowery ears. It hath the port and gait of a goose, and somewhat of its gabble, being unnaturally large in the breast, walking with a constrained motion on account of the weight of its brains, and intelligible only to pure greek. Though it hath eyes, it cannot see an inch beyond its own body; though it hath ears, it cannot hear that every one is laughing at it; and though it hath brains, of quantity and quality to make a pudding for an ogre, it cannot spell its own name, tell for what purpose it came here, or if God made it. It hath the grin and chatter, but not the wit of an ape: walks generally upon two, with a pert, smirking, self-sufficient air, which might seem to indicate that it hath, at least, one idea,—namely, vanity.

Indeed, from other circumstances, we are pretty confident that it is not a vegetable; for it curses and swears, and talks politics, and poetry, &c. &c. which are not the functions of any vegetable that we know of, except a marrow-pudding, which grows upon two stalks in and about Guildhall very abundantly—it is not an alderman.

N. B. Some rare specimens may be seen, between the hours of three and five, in Fleet Street and the Strand. Exhibited gratis.

Now, the origin and the quo modo of this nameless something, I propose to furnish the public; not that I pretend to reduce it to any class of animal or sentient existence;—it defies all the polytup ramifications of modern nomenclature, and that, let me tell you, 's a bold word; for, in the present rage of breaking down old languages, and patching up crazy sentences with the fractions, giving us Greek bats joined by a random blockhead, for a continuous parallel pipedon of English brick, weighty and homogeneous; and when we would examine the ruidity of the juncture, throwing the dust of antiquity into our eyes, and breknig our jaws when we endeavour to use them:—in this system every word is a constable, and it is very hard for any thing, however insignificant or obscure, to escape cuffing and pinioning in one sponge-house or another, though it should have as little business in that fraternity as the Pope in a dram-shop at Wapping.

But, though I cannot give the Onomatotomy of this non-descript, I can give its etionomy—and this it was which fired the tail of the third paragraph—this is what will get me lands in Hevelius's moon—and this is what the reader shall have before a rump could turn cavalier by the twitch of a God's anointed harlequin. Listen deeply and learn deeply.

Every one knows that the co-operation of the sexes is by no means necessary for generation: thus the hippomanes is the effect of a mare's impregnation by the gust of her own violent intension; a sooterkin is the product of a stove and a Dutch-woman; a moon-calf is the expatriated efflux of our virgin satellite.

Now, all these unnatural births owe their existence to nothing but an overheated imagination—and hence my argument.

Every one may remember the great rush of fenules, about the beginning of the present century, to visit the new assortment of insects, which the proprietor of a celebrated museum in this town had opened for inspection. We may also recollect how the imaginations of our inquisitive country-women were possessed by these creatures, so as to have them eternally in their mouths

—well, what is an insect?—head and tail, but no body—

And this is a clear account of the matter.

NEW THEORY OF THE DELUGE.

[Mr. Augustus Mayerbach has sent us some 'Observations on the Disposition of the waters at the creation, at the time of the universal deluge, and at present.' The article is too long for insertion entire, but the substance of this gentleman's theory will be found in the following extracts.—Ed.]

'In attempting to suggest any mode by which this flood might have been caused, let it not be supposed for one instant that I am doubting the possibility of its being produced by a miracle, without the intervention of means intelligible to man. The Omnipotent, who had said, "Let there be light," and light was, had but to speak the word, "Let there be a universe of water," and the dry land would at once have vanished.

'Dr. Burnet's theory was in a measure similar to that which I am inclined to adopt, for he supposed "that the centre of the earth contained a great abyss of water,—that by sinking in many places, and rising in others, in consequence of shocks and earthquakes, a passage was opened for the internal waters, which issued impetuously from the centre, where they had been enclosed, and spread over all the earth."

'But Dr. Burnet makes it a feature of his theory, that the earth must have originally been smooth, round, and even, (although the Bible affirms that there were mountains then,) and that, previously to the flood, there could have been neither seas, nor rain, nor rainbow. The latter, indeed, he had some authority for assuming to have been seen only since the flood, because the Bible states it to have been so.

'My own supposition is, that the firmament, or shell, which divided the waters from the waters, was, at the time of the deluge, broken only at two places, and that those places are the North and South Magnetic Poles.

'That the shell having been broken at those two particular spots, the waters, which had been till then confined in the bowels of the earth, escaped from the abyss, mixed themselves with the oceans and seas, which overflowed their former boundaries, and gradually covered the whole earth.

'By the eruption of the waters from the abysses from a limited space only, a gradual inundation would be accomplished, which corresponds with the account given by Moses. By a general breaking up of such shell an immediate deluge, if any, would have taken place; and this is against the authority of my Bible, which tells me that the flood went on increasing for forty days.

'The disappearance of the waters was as gradual as their eruption. And, if the great body of them had to return into the bowels of the earth by the same two cavities through which they had issued from the abyss, the withdrawing of the water must, of necessity, have been equally gradual.

'Rain, falling from natural causes, could not have caused a universal deluge; rain not being an additional supply of water to the earth which has not been on it before, but the mere alteration of the position of water previously upon the surface.

'Two objections of apparently potent weight will be made to this supposition. The one, that although the shell, which I am imagining to be broken in two particular places, so as to be capable of emitting the fluid through the opening, should be thus partially destroyed, still the equal pressure of the air upon all parts of the globe would prevent the water from bursting through its bounds; the other, that the law of central gravitation would equally prevent its leaving its position. In contemplating a miracle I do not require the assistance of Mr. Whiston's comet "descending in the plane of the ecliptic toward its perihelion," to enable me to believe in its existence. The deluge did exist—it did arise from the windows of heaven being opened, and the rains descending; and from the fountains of the great deep being broken up, and the waters issuing from their hitherto internal confinement.

'If the admitted doctrine of the tides be true, and they are caused by the attraction and influence of the moon and sun, such doctrine will receive, as it seems to me, confirmation from the proposed theory; as it will give a greater body of water for this attraction to act upon, and a depository for supplying the additional quantity of fluid of which the high tides apparently evidence the presence.

'As this attraction ceases, a portion of the waters may retire again to the chasm from which they have issued.

'So that, instead of the moon by its power of attraction merely altering the position of the water, in causing the tides, it may be considered as actually drawing forth, by its influence, a larger quantity of water to be diffused upon the surface of the earth from its interior recesses.

'The north magnetic pole is, according to Captain Parry's last voyage of discovery, above fifteen degrees distant from the north pole of the earth.

'The south magnetic pole may be considered as at an equal distance from the south pole of the earth.

'The mere rotatory motion of the earth round its axis may cause in certain positions (for instance, when either of the chasms is directly towards the sun, and the pressure of the atmosphere consequently lessened from the greater rarity of the air,) a natural tendency in the water of the internal abysses of the earth gradually to escape to the surface.

'In magnetism the attracting power has always been considered by the best writers upon the subject, to be placed within the earth; and by late experiments it has been ascertained that electricity and magnetism are most intimately connected.

'Water is one of the great conductors of the electric fluid; and, if, within the abysses of the earth, is contained a great body of water which has constant communication with other waters on the surface, and to which the latter may be continually conducting the electric streams gathered in their exposure to the atmosphere, why may not this account for some of the phenomena of magnetism, so long an object of scientific but unsatisfied enquiry.

'Whether magnetic attraction is caused by a fluid, or by a mass of lodestone within the earth, I have made for you a hole in the shell at the magnetic poles, which will give an easier communication with the needle.

'The summary of the theory is, first,—That the internal parts of the earth are filled with water, originally separated from the superficial waters by a shell or crust.

'That, at the time of the flood, this shell or crust was broken in two places; and that the chasms, from whence the waters issued, still exist at the north magnetic poles and the south magnetic pole.

'That the flood arose from this breaking forth of the internal waters, caused either by a suspension of the rotatory motion of the earth round its own axis, while the chasm was turned towards the sun; or by a diagonal inclination of the axis of the earth, in its annual orbit round the sun; or by the immediate command of the Almighty, in the same way as when the sun stood still in the Valley of Ajalon.

'That the rotatory motion of the earth being resumed, the waters again retired into the abyss, but with the communication between the superficial and internal waters left free.

'That by means of this communication between the upper and lower waters, and in conjunction with the influence of the moon and sun, the tides are produced, and—

'That this is also the cause of the poles of the magnet.

'That objections may be urged to this system as to that which attempts to explain any phenomenon in nature, there can be no doubt; but I put it forth for the scientific to try their skill upon, and to build truth upon my errors, if even they should prove to be:

'I should not dare to suggest the theory for a moment, if I thought one word of it inconsistent with the Bible, or the goodness of the great, universal, and benevolent Creator."

'AUGUSTUS MAYERBACH.'

THE LADIES.

THE critics of the fair sex tell us, they are vain, frivolous, ignorant, coquetish, capricious, and what not. Unjust that we are, it is the fable of the lion and the man; but since the ladies have become authors, they can take their revenge, were they not too generous for such a passion. Though they have learnt to paint, their sketches of man are gentle and kind.

But if the ladies were that surly misanthropes call them, who is to blame?—Is it not we who spoil—who corrupt—who seduce them?

Is it surprising that a pretty woman should be vain when we daily praise to surface her charms, her taste, and her wit? Can we blame her vanity when we tell her, that nothing can resist her attractions—that there is nothing so barbarous which she cannot soften—nothing so elevated that she cannot abdue; when we tell her that her eyes are brighter than day, that her form is fairer than summer—more refreshing than spring; that her lips are emilion; that her skin combines the biteness of the lily, with the incarnation of the rose?

Do we censure a fine woman as frivolous, when we uncensurably tell her at no other study becomes her but at of varying her pleasures; that she requires no talent but for the arrangement of new parties; no noisens beyond the might of the afternoon's amusement? Do we blame her frivolity when we tell her, that her hands were not made to touch the needle, or to soil their iteness in domestic employments? Do we blame her frivolity when we tell her, that the look of seriousness issues from her face the dimple, in which the loves and the graces wanton; that reflection clouds her brow with care, and that she who thinks, sacrifices the smile that makes beauty charming, and the gaiety that renders wit attractive?

How can a pretty woman fail to be ignorant, when the first lesson she is taught is, that beauty supercedes and senses with every other quality, that she needs to know is, that she is pretty; that to be intelligent, is to be antic, and to be more learned than her neighbour is to incur the reproach of absurdity and affectation?

Shall we blame her for being a coquette, when the indiscriminate flattery of every man teaches her, that the homage of one is as good as that of another? It is the same darts, the same flames, the same beaux, the same coxcombs. The man of sense, when he attempts to compliment, recommends the art of the beau, since he condescends to do with awkwardness what a monkey can do with grace. With all she is a goddess, and to her all men are equally mortals. How can she prefer when there is no merit, or be constant when there is no superiority?

Is she capricious? Can she be otherwise when she hears that the universe must be proud to wait her commands; that the utmost of a lover's hopes is to be the humblest of her slaves; that to fulfil the least of her commands is the highest ambition of her adorers?

And are men so unjust as to censure the idols made by their own hands? Let us be just; let us begin the work of reformation. When men cease to flatter, women will cease to deceive; when men are wise, women will be wise to please.

The ladies do not force the taste of the men; they only adapt themselves to it; they may corrupt, and be corrupted; they may improve, and be improved.

ABSTINENCE.

THE following ancient testimonies respecting abstinence, may afford our readers some amusement. Pliny says, a person may live seven days without any food whatever,—and that many people have continued more than eleven days without either food or drink. Petrus de Albano says, there was in his time in Normandy, a woman thirty years of age, who had lived without food for eighteen years. Alexander Benedictus mentions a person at Venice, who lived for six days without food. Jubertus relates, that a woman lived in good health three years without either food or drink; and that he saw another who had lived to her tenth year, without food or drink; and that, when she arrived at a proper age, she was married, and lived like other people in respect to diet, and had children. Clausius mentions, that some of the more rigid Bannians in India abstain from food, frequently, for twenty days together. Albertus Krantz says, that a hermit in the mountains in the canton of Schwitz lived twenty years without food. Guaguinus says, that Louis the Pious, Emperor of France, who died in 840, existed the last forty days of his life without either food or drink. Citois gives the history of a girl at Confulens, in Portou, who lived three years without food. Albertus Magnus says, he saw a woman at Coligno, who often lived twenty and sometimes thirty days without food; and that he saw a hypochondriacal man, who lived without food for seven weeks, drinking only a draught of water every other day. Hildanus relates the case of a girl who lived many years without food or drink. Sylvius says, there was a young woman in Spain, aged twenty-two years, who never ate any food, but lived entirely on water; and that there was a girl in Narbonne, and another in Germany, who lived three years in good health, without any kind of food or drink. It is said, that Democritus lived to the age of 109 years, and that, in the latter part of his life, he subsisted almost entirely, for forty days at one time, (according to some writers) on smelling honey and bread.

ARABIAN LITERATURE.

ARABIAN literature decayed at Bagdad with the decay of the Khaliphate; and though it was transplanted thence into Egypt, and fostered at Cairo, with every attention, by the Fathemite Khaliphs and Mamluc Sultans, it could never be brought to flourish with vigour; on the appearance of the Turks, it was irrecoverably blighted.

Since that time, Arabic has ceased to be spoken at the courts of princes, and has yielded its place in matters of business and literature to the Turkish or Persian; but from the many valuable works which were composed in it during the existence of the Khaliphate, the Arabian tongue still continues to be considered throughout the East as the vehicle of science, and, so long as Mohammedanism subsists, must always be studied as the language of religion.

As no examples taken from any epic or dramatic poems are found among the specimens here selected, it may be supposed that the Arabians were unacquainted with the two most noble exertions of the poet's art; and should we confine our ideas of these to the common notion, viz. 'A relation in verse of some action, either given by the author himself, or by personages introduced upon the stage for that purpose,' such a conclusion might not be erroneous; but if our definition of these kinds of poetry be not so strictly limited, we shall meet with many Arabian productions, which may justly claim to be ranked amongst epic or dramatic poems.

The Arabian writer, who attempted either of the above-mentioned species of composition, did not consider it necessary that his work should be constructed entirely in verse; the descriptions, the similitudes, the reflections, and many of the speeches he expressed in numbers; but the narrative part he was satisfied with delivering in simple prose.

Several of the tales of the Thousand and one Nights are written in this mixed manner, and their effects upon the passions of the reader, even under the mutilated form in which they appear to us, is pretty generally acknowledged.

Original Poetry.

SONG.

Au! that I but a moss-rose were,
To grace thy bosom, sweet,
And thou, my love, a lily fair,
Blushing, thy charms I'd greet,
And on that fleecy bosom lay—
My cares and fears at rest;
Nor should one thought be found to stray
The halcyon of thy breast!

Ah! were but I some fragrant flow'r,
That accents the evening breeze;
And thou a leaf in shady bowers,
I'd court the waving tress,
And on that silk white bosom, love,
With lightsome heart I'd play,
Nor envy then the peaceful dove,
That wing'd to heaven its way.

Ah! were but you the graceful vine,
And I the tendril true,
Around thy lovely form I'd twine,
And fondly cling to you;
And there, beyond expression blest,
I'd banquet on thy charms,
And thou, a joy beyond that rest,
Should wish when in my arms!

HATT.

TO LILIA.

O lady, there's a fairy spell
In thy rich beauty's azure eye;
Whose lucid charm demands too well,
The tribute of the tear and sigh.

And there's a magic in thy smile,
The ravish'd soul in vain would shun,
That yields a sweet enchantment, while
It binds the heart thine eyes have won.

I'm sure those sylphs of love and light,
That o'er the minstrel's vision fly,
And all their forms of fancy bring
And blissful beauty, blend in thee.

O think not, lady, all I own,
Is poetry's imagin'd theme,
Or falsely deem my love's alone
The fleeting wish of passion's dream;

But O! believe 'tis like yon star,
That shines for ever bright above thee;
Pure as its beams my feelings are,
And lasting as its light, I'll love thee.

C. LOCKHART.

THE BARREN WISH.

O could I mingle with the sky,
And see and hear the dwellers there!—
With what transported mind I'd fly
To that serene purer air.

As the young eagle leaves his bed,
To travel with the glowing sun—
Unchang'd, untir'd, with wing outspread,
And eye apace, he passes on—

So I would leave the world for thee,
Thy temple of the soul's abode!
Unchang'd, untir'd in flight to see
Th' effulgent image of my God!

In vain! the barriers of the grave,
Lies, dark and silent, far between!
No mortal arm may stem the wave
That wafts us to the world unseen!

Yet, viewless, fancy oft, at eve,
Delights the blissful haunts to rove,
A happy dream of youth to weave,
When all was ecstasy and love.

There shall my long-lost Mary meet
Her lover, as in days of old;
Together at our Saviour's feet,
Eternity will us enfold!

THE GIRL HE ADORES.

When the anchor is weigh'd, and the ship under sail,
O'er the mild breast of ocean impell'd by the gale,
With eye firmly fix'd on the fast fading shores,
The tar heaves a sigh for the girl he adores.

When midnight's dark mantle envelopes the deep,
And sound in the hammocks his mates are asleep,
On fancy's warm pinion his thought swiftly soars
To the cottage where dwells the sweet girl he adores.

When the wings of the tempest bang dark in the sky,
And swift o'er the ocean the blue lightnings fly,
He heeds not their glare,—'tis in vain the storm roars,
His bosom still throbs for the girl he adores.

And when, homeward sailing, the land meets his gaze,
What joyful expression each feature displays;
The torrent of bliss thro' each artery pours,
To be prest to the heart of the girl he adores.

SAN SPIRITSAIL.

STANZAS.

AUTUMN'S echoes o'er the vales
Tell our fancies' dying tales;
Leaves, that wander to the earth,
Teach how much is beauty worth;
And the sun, that shortens day,
Shades ten thousand lives away.

Yet, how sweet to hear the wave
Drink those sounds the deep wind gave,
And to see those leaves protect
The graves of genius and neglect,—
To think the sun will all restore,
And bring to life ten thousand more.

MARIA.

I'VE NEVER HAD AN OFFER YET.

The most fastidious wights complain,
I'm not yet caught in Hymen's chain;
They whisper, as to church I go,
'Miss Polly's still without a beau;
An old maid sure she's doom'd to be,— Heaven grant her prayers and keep her free.'

The truth, Sir, is, with much regret,
I've never had an offer yet!

If I but sigh, the men, so vain,
Think I am deeply cast in pain;
If affable with prudent grace,
They cry, 'my smiles are out of place,
My step is studied, like my glass,
My healthy hues for paint will pass,
That age is stealing off my hair,
And time transforming me to care.'

Though in the census twenty-one,
An age they rarely ladies shun.
Sir, I confess, 'tis with regret,
I've never had an offer yet!

The wicked rogues may laugh and joke
About the matrimonial yoke,
But chiefly, Sir, the fault is theirs,
That single ladies lose their hairs;
A woman must be courted,—not
The forward prattler to be caught;
Or better she an old maid live
Than fops unsanction'd freedom give.
But as for men,—I hate the set,
I've never had an offer yet!

The Drama.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Mr. Kean has repeated his favourite characters of Gloster and Othello with their accustomed effect: and he is now actively studying Joanna Baillie's tragedy of De Montfort, which is to be produced next week. This play, which contains some powerful scenes, has undergone the revision of its authoress, who has re-written the last act. The appearance of Kean in any new character never fails to excite considerable interest, which is, in the present instance, not a little increased from the circumstance of Mrs. Baillie's popularity. We shall be happy to see the tragedy succeed; but Kean's task is one of no ordinary difficulty, for, with the exception of Mr. Cooper, he has not a single individual, on that stage, worthy of appearing in the same scene with him, in any thing of a tragic nature. Surely our country theatres are not well scrutinized, or they would yield us something more promising than what we now possess.

What has become of Lost Life? It has even vanished from the play-bill, which are the very last to relinquish their friends. Lost Life has, we believe, gone to the 'tomb of all the Compuets,' unless, indeed, it should be revived, as we hinted in our last, in the shape of a farce, beyond which it should not have presumed.

Miss Blake, the lady who played Captain Macheath so successfully at the Haymarket Theatre, sustained her part of Don Giovanni at this house a few nights ago; and, although she undertook the character at a very late notice, and had to follow no less a favourite than Madame Vestris, yet she elicited much applause, and, what is much better, she deserved it, by the very spirited manner in which she acted. The airs of this successful burlesque are very pretty, and Miss Blake gave them with good effect.

COVENT GARDEN.—A lady, who is said to have selected the stage for a profession from her strong attachment to its ideal beauty, made her first appearance a few nights ago, in the part of Mrs. Haller. This lady, whose name is Miss Bakewell, has a good person, genteel manners, and seems to have been well educated. On her first appearing, she was very strongly affected, and seemed to suffer acutely by the novelty of her situation, though she met with every indulgence and sympathy from the audience. It is always difficult to speak decisively of a first appearance, and particularly of one so embarrassing to the fair debutante as his; we must, however, observe, that we suspect Mrs. Haller is not the character best suited to her powers. Her voice does not seem very capable of expressing passion or emotion, but her countenance is better adapted for exhibiting deep tragic woe, than the silent sorrow which racks the bosom of Mrs. Haller. Miss Bakewell always gave the dialogue correctly, and in some instances she was very impressive. The part of the Stranger, by Young, and Peter, by Mr. Meadows, and indeed all the other characters, were admirably sustained.

At the fall of the curtain, Mr. Egerton announced the Exile for the following evening, but a call was suddenly made, and we must add, partially made for the Stranger. Mr. Egerton retired; a call was continued, which created opposition, and as usual, opposition heightened the enthusiasm of the original disturbers. Mr. Fawcett at length appeared, and in his cautious gentlemanlike way, he said:—

“Ladies and Gentlemen, I present myself to you to know your wishes.” Some half dozen voices exclaimed “The ranger.” Mr. Fawcett proceeded. It is not usual for an audience to surround a play, but if it be your assurance to command the Stranger—were he interrupted by shouts of “no!” In this dilemma he hardly seemed to know how to act, and he very diciously made a kind of bow, which might be supposed favourable to the wishes of either party. The after-piece commenced; but the noise was still continued; the first scene of Figaro passed in dumb show, and the malcontents persevered so obstinately, that the manager was obliged to come forward again. “It is always my wish,” said he, “as it is my duty, to obey the commands of the audience, and if it be your desire, the Stranger shall be repeated.” This address was applauded, and he withdrew. The first scene of the opera was acted over again, and every thing went on smoothly.

As the spectacular play of the Exile has had its day, or nearly so, the performances become more varied, though as yet the theatre has not produced any novelty. The tragedy of Hamlet has been twice performed during the week. There is not, perhaps, a performer on the stage so well able to enact the royal Dane as Mr. Young. His person, voice, and powers of declamation are here all put in requisition, and are all exerted to the best advantage. Miss M. Tree is a very interesting Ophelia, and the other characters of the play are well fitted.

SURREY THEATRE.—One of the most popular plays ever performed on any stage, Pizarro, was produced at this theatre on Monday night, under the title of the Death of Rolla, for the purpose of introducing Miss Macaulay to this stage, in the character of Elvira. Of this lady’s tragic talents we have more than once had occasion to speak, and we confess we have seldom seen them to more advantage. Rolla had a spirited representative in Mr. Bengough; Cora was very prettily played by Mrs. W. Fearnan; and Gourey was excellent in Alonzo. The piece was received with abundance of applause by a crowded audience.

The popular melodrama of Tekeli followed, and rendered the evening’s entertainment very attractive.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—Miss S. Booth made her first appearance at this theatre on Monday, in a new piece called Zoraida, or Scenes in Fashionable Life; this burletta, as it is termed, is composed of scenes from some of our best dramas, made into a connected story of considerable interest by the ingenuity of the dramatist, and was well received. The great strength of the dramatic company at this very little theatre forms a striking contrast to the poor inefficient corps at the capacious theatres royal, and the mind naturally wonders how the receipts of so small a house can compensate the exertions of so much talent.

Life in London continues very attractive, and is certainly a very laughable ex parte picture of the follies of the metropolis.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—The popular burletta of Loeers of all Sorts was very well played at this house on Monday night, with one or two exceptions, and went off with much eclat.—Mr. Walbourn had announced, vauntingly enough, to elicit new wonders in the art of dancing, which he attempted by being lifted up by wires fastened to his back, to assist his jumping; the corps de ballet is sufficiently strong here to need no such extraordinary assistance, and Mr. Walbourn’s ridiculous attempt was deservedly condemned.

The Married Bachelor continues to give great satisfaction to crowded houses, notwithstanding much of its wit is of a cast that must be offensive to delicate ears.

Literature and Science.

Sir Walter Scott is said to be engaged in editing an edition of the works of Pope, with a biographical memoir, and an estimate of the poetical merits of this favourite author.

A Mr. Green, of Alexandria (America), has discovered a machine for breaking ice of the thickness of six inches, at the rate of three or four miles an hour. The machine promises to be of advantage in opening a passage for ships frozen, or in clearing canals.

We learn that Dr. Grauville has undertaken to edit the London Medical and Physical Journal, lately so ably conducted by Dr. Hutchinson.

The Plague.—A writer in one of the daily journals gives the following, as an effectual cure for the plague:—

1st. When the disease makes its first appearance in any place, or it is feared that it will do so, large fires should be lit, and fumigations of gunpowder, &c. made in the streets and public places.

2nd. In order to preserve oneself from the disease, an oil skin silk dress should be worn next the skin, with the head and ears covered, as well as the whole body, and a mask worn strongly impregnated with garlic; five or six wine glasses of Madeira and bark should be taken daily.

3d. If a person is attacked by the disease, he should, on feeling the first symptoms, immediately drink a large glassfull of pure lemon juice, and then have his arms, legs, and thighs rubbed with cantharides, till large blisters are formed, and the water runs from them freely. He must also drink eight, nine, or ten times a-day (according to his constitution) a large glass of hot Bourdeaux wine (if that is not to be procured, the red wine nearest in quality), mixed with an equal quantity of lemon juice, in order to excite and keep up a profuse perspiration; and continue this regimen till his convalescence.

LUCRETIVS.

Village Sign Board.—The following is literally copied from a board upon the window of a Huxter in a village, upon the St. Albans road:—

'Isaac Beeby, shoe maker, Higler and dealer in hold cloase sells hall sorts of grocery and wooden ware Bakun, sand &c. Goes to Lunnun and Sant Talbands twice a week; brings boys-ter and hall sorts of fish by land carriage.

'Hold hats made as good as new, as well as every bother heart-tickle in the cloas trade.

'Farmers Servants and Wenches hope to places at any other time but fare time upon happlication here.—They may enquire for Karacters they they like it.'

King James 1st.—Soon after that Solomon of his age came to the throne of England, he took it in his head one day to go and hear causes in Westminster hall to shew his learning and wisdom, of which he had no mean opinion. Accordingly, being seated on that bench a cause come on, which the counsel learned in the law, set forth to such advantage on the part of the plaintiff, that the sagacity of the Royal Judge soon saw the justice of it so clearly that he frequently cried out 'I've ken the matter unco weel! The gude man is i' the right! The gude man is i' the right! He mun ha it! he mun ha it!' And when the counsel had concluded, took it as a high affront, that the judges of the court should presume to remonstrate to him, that it was the rule audire alteram partem, before they gave judgment. Curiosity to know what could be said in so clear a case, rather than any respect to their rules, made him defer his decision; but the defendant's counsel had scarcely begun to open their cause, when his sacred Majesty appeared greatly discomposed, and was so puzzled as they proceeded, that he had no patience to hear them out, but starting up in a passion cried, 'I've hear na mair! ye are a' knaves aleek! Ye gi' each other the lee, and neither's i' the right!'

Shakespeare's tragedy of Hamlet.—This play is founded on the story of Amleth, in the Danish history of Saxo Germanicus. It is to be found in Mrs. Lenox's Shakespeare illustrated. The story has a very romantic air, abounds with improbabilities, and is such altogether as would scarce have struck any imagination but Shakespeare's. Amleth, we are told, put on the guise of folly, rolled on the ground, covered his face with filth, raked the embers with his hands &c. How finely has our immortal bard availed himself of this hint! and what a dignified mind he has presented to us in his hero! The Ghost is entirely the invention of the author, and how nobly has he managed it. Every sentiment respecting this imaginary personage is fully in character with the feelings of the hero.

In the original story the catastrophe is full of terrors. Amleth, having made the nobility drunk, sets fire to the palace, and during the confusion goes to the usurper's apartment, and tells him Amleth was then to revenge his father's murder; upon which the King, jumping out of bed, is instantly put to death, and Amleth, proclaimed King.

Had Shakespeare adhered to this circumstance, he would, perhaps, have given the finest scenes of terror in the last act that ever have been imagined; and then a subject that opens so nobly would have been grand also in its close.—London Chronicle. 1757.

Broad boards made out of vines.—The great door of the cathedral at Ravenna is made of rough boards without any ornaments; but the most remarkable thing is, that these boards are sawed out of vines, and some of them are 12ft. in length and two spars in breadth. Pliny asserts that the temples of the ancients were often built of this wood 'the image of Jupiter in the city of Populonia cut out of a single vine, we see undecayed for so many ages, as likewise the dish at Marseilles.' The pillars of the temple of Juno at Metapantum were of vine tree, and even the steps to the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, are said to be made of the Cyprian vine; but I take them to be made of the wild vine.

George Abbott, archbishop of Canterbury, having accidentally killed Lord Zouch's keeper with an arrow, ever after kept a monthly fast on Tuesday, the day on which this fatal mischance happened, and settled an annuity of 20l. on the widow; he died in 1633.

In the time of Queen Elizabeth, ten pounds would purchase as complete a law library as can now be had for fifteen hundred pounds!

Fish.—The smell; the name of this fish is derived from its peculiar scent, i. e. smell it. There is no fish dies so soon as the herring when taken out of the water, whence arises the proverb, 'as dead as a herring.' Herring-silver is money formerly paid in lieu of a certain quantity of herrings for a religious house.

Conscience.—Mr. Pinkney, of Maryland, in his answer to the citizens of Baltimore, declining to deliver the 4th of July oration, on account of professional engagements, proceeds to declare his devotion to the people, without the slightest circumlocution, as follows: 'I am authorised, as I persuade myself to feel assured, that it will never be believed by any body, that I can be indifferent to the wishes of the people.'

The Scottish Proverb.—'It is well said; but who will bell the cat?' was occasioned by the following circumstance. The nobility of Scotland entered into a combination against one Spence, the favourite of King James III. It was proposed to go in a body to Sterling, seize Spence, and hang him; then to offer their service to the King, as his natural counsellors; upon which the Lord Grey observed, 'It is well said, but who will bell the cat?' alluding to the fable of the mice, who proposed to put a bell about the cat's neck, that they might be apprized of her coming. The Earl of Angus replied, that he would 'bell the cat,' which he accordingly executed, and was ever afterwards called 'Archibald Bell Cat.'

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

Guinepino, reviewed and praised by our contemporary as either 'Lord Byron's or the Devil's,' is not by the noble poet, but we cannot speak so decisively as to the authorship of the other illustrious personage.

We must apologise to our Correspondents this week for not noticing their communications, to all of which we will pay due attention in our next.

Review of New Books.

Adonais, an Elegy on the Death of John Keats, Author of Endymion, Hyperion, &c. By Percy B. Shelley. 4to, pp. 25. Pisa, 1821.

THROUGH the kindness of a friend, we have been favoured with the latest production of a gentleman of no ordinary genius, Mr. Bysshe Shelley. It is an elegy on the death of a youthful poet of considerable promise, Mr. Keats, and was printed at Pisa. As the copy now before us, perhaps, the only one that has reached England, and the subject is one that will excite much interest, we shall print the whole of it.

It has been often said, and Mr. Shelley repeats the assertion, that Mr. Keats felt a victim to his too great susceptibility of a severe criticism on one of his poems. How far this may have been the case we know not. Cumberbund used to say, that authors should not be thin skinned, but shelled like his rhinoceros; but poor Keats was of so gentle a disposition for severity, and to a mind of such exquisite sensibility, we do not wonder that he felt keenly the harsh and ungenerous attack that was made upon him. Besides, we are not without instances of the effects of criticism on some minds.—Jawkesworth died of criticism; when he published his account of the voyages in the South Seas, for which he received £6000, an innumerable host of enemies attacked it in the newspapers and magazines; some pointed out blunders in matters of science, and some exercised their wit in poetical translations and epigrams. It was, says Dr. Kippis, a fatal undertaking, and which, in its consequences, deprived him of presence of mind and of life itself.

Tasso was driven mad by criticism; his susceptibility and tenderness of feeling were so great, that when his sublime work, "Jerusalem Delivered," met with unexpected opposition, the fortitude of the poet was not proof against the keenness of disappointment. He twice attempted to please his ignorant and malignant critics, by recomposing his poem; and, during the hurry, the anguish, and the irritation attending these efforts, the vigour of a great mind was entirely exhausted, and, in two years after the publication of his work, the unhappy bard became an object of pity and of terror.

Even the mild Newton, with all his philosophy, was so sensible to critical remarks, that Whiston tells us he lost his favour, which he had enjoyed for twenty years, for contradicting Newton in his old age; for, says he, no man was of 'a more fearful temper.' Whiston declares that he would never have thought proper to have published his work against Newton's Chronology during the life of the great philosopher, 'because,' says he, 'I knew his temper so well, that I should have expected it would have killed him.'

We have never been among the very enthusiastic admirers of Mr. Keats's poetry, though we allow that he possessed considerable genius; but we are decidedly averse to that species of literary condemnation, which is often practised by men of wit and arrogance, without feeling and without discrimination.

Mr. Shelley is an ardent admirer of Keats; and though he declares his repugnance to the principles of taste on which several of his earlier compositions were modelled, he says that he considers 'the fragment of Hyperion as second to nothing that was ever produced by a writer of the same years.' Mr. Shelley, in the preface, gives some details respecting the poet:—

'John Keats died at Rome, of a consumption, in his twenty-fourth year, on the — of —, 1821: and was buried in the romantic and lonely cemetery of the protestants in that city, under the pyramid which is the tomb of Cestius, and the massy walls and towers, now mouldering and desolate, which formed the circuit of ancient Rome. The cemetery is an open space among the ruins covered in winter with violets and daisies. It might make one in love with death, to think that one should be buried in so sweet a place.'

'The genius of the lamented person to whose memory I have dedicated these unworthy verses, was not more delicate, and fragile than it was beautiful, and where cancer worms abound, what wonder if its young flower was blighted in the bud?' The savage criticism on his 'Endymion,' which appeared in the Quarterly Review, produced the most violent effects on his susceptible mind; the agitation thus originated ended in the rupture of a blood vessel in the lungs; a rapid consumption ensued, and the succeeding acknowledgments from more candid critics, of the true greatness of his powers, were ineffectual to heal the wound thus wantonly inflicted.

'It may be well said, that these wretched men know not what they do. They scatter their insults and their slanders without heed as to whether the poisoned shafts light on a heart made callous by many blows, or one, like Keats's, composed of more penetrable stuff. One of their associates is, to my knowledge, a most base and unprincipled calumniator. As to Endymion, was it a poem, whatever might be its defects, to be treated contemptuously by those who had celebrated with various degrees of complacency and panegyric, "Paris," and "Woman," and a "Syrian Tale," and Mrs. Lefanu, and Mr. Barrett, and Mr. Howard Payne, and a long list of the illustrious obscure? Are these the men who, in their venal good-nature, presumed to draw a parallel between the Rev. Mr. Milman and Lord Byron? What goat did they strain at here, after having swallowed all those camels? Against what woman, taken in adultery, dares the foremost of these literary prostitutes to cast his opprobrious stone? Miserable man! you, one of the meanest, have wantonly defaced one of the noblest specimens of the workmanship of God. Nor shall it be your excuse, that, murderer as you are, you have spoken daggers but used none.'

'The circumstance of the closing scene of poor Keats's life were not made known to me until the elegy was ready for the press. I am given to understand that the wound which his sensitive spirit had received from the criticism of Endymion, was exasperated by the bitter sense of unrequited benefits; the poor fellow seems to have been hastened from the stage of life, no less by those on whom he had wasted the promise of his genius,* than those on whom he had lavished his fortune and his care. He was accompanied to Rome, and attended in his last illness, by Mr. Severn, a young artist of the highest promise, who, I have been informed, almost risked his own life, and sacrificed every prospect to unwearied attendance upon his friend. Had I known these circumstances before the completion of my poem, I should have been tempted to add my feeble tribute of applause to the more solid recompense which the virtuous man finds in the recollection of his own motives. Mr. Severn can dispense with a reward from "such stuff as dreams are made of." His noble conduct is a golden augury of the success of his future career:—may the unextinguished spirit of his illustrious friend animate the creations of his pencil, and plead against oblivion for his name!

* We do not know to whom Mr. Shelley alludes; but we believe we may say that the city of London does not boast a bookseller more honourable in his dealings, or more liberal in rising genius or indigent merit than the publishers of Mr. Keats's poems.—Ed.

Of the beauty of Mr. Shelley's elegy we shall not speak; to every poetic mind, its transcendent merits must be apparent.

ADONAIS.

I weep for Adonais—he is dead!
O, weep for Adonais! though our tears
Thaw not the frost which binds so dear a head!
And thou, and hour, selected from all years,
To mourn our loss, rouse thy obscure competitors,
And teach them thine own sorrow, say with me

Died Adonais; till the future darts
Forget the past, his fate and fame shall be
An echo and a light into eternity.

Where wert thou, mighty mother, when he lay,
When thy son lay, pierced by the shaft which flies

In darkness? where was born Urania
When Adonais died? With veiled eyes,
Mid listening echoes, in her paradise
She sate, while one, with soft enamoured breath,

Re-kindled all the fading melodies,
With which, like flowers that mock the cone beneath,
He had adorned and hid the coming bulk of death.

O, weep for Adonais—he is dead!
Wake, melancholy mother, weep and weep!
Yet wherefore? Quench within their burning bed

Thy fiery tears, and let thy loud heart keep
Like his, a mute and uncomplaining sleep;
For he is gone, where all things wise and fair
Descend—oh, dream not that the amorous deep
Will yet restore him to the vital air;
Death feeds on his mute voice, and laughs at our despair.

Most musical of mourners, weep again;
Lament a new Urania!—He died,
Who was the sire of an immortal strain,
Blind, old, and lovely, when his country's pride,

The priest, the slave, and the libertine,
Trampled and mocked with many a wounded rite
Of lust and blood; he went unterrified
Into the gulf of death; but his clear spirit
Yet reigns o'er death: the third among the sons of light.

Most musical of mourners, weep anew!
Not all to that bright station dare to climb;

And happier they their happiness who knew,
Whose tapers yet burn through that night of time

In which suns perished; others more sublime,
Struck by the envious wrath of man or God,
Have sunk, extinct in their refulgent prime;
And some yet live, treading the thorny road
Which leads, through toil and hate, to fame's serene abode.

But now thy youngest, dearest one has perished,
The numbing of thy widowhood, who grew,
Like a pale flower by some sad maiden cherished,

And fed with true love tears, instead of dew;
Most musical of mourners, weep anew!
Thy extreme hope, the loveliest and the last,
The bloom, whose petals nipt before they blew
Died on the promise of the fruit, is waste;
The broken lily lies—the storm is over, past.

To that high capital, where kindly death
Keeps his pale court in beauty and decay,
He came; and bought, with price of purest
breath,

A grave among the eternal.—Come away!
Haste, while the vault of blue Italian day
Is yet its fitting charnel-roof: while still
He lies, as if in dewy sleep he lay;
Awake him not! surely he takes his fill
Of deep and liquid rest, forgetful of all ill.

He will awake no more, oh, never more!
Within the twilight chamber spreads apace,
The shadow of white death, and at the door
Invisible corruption waits to trace

His extreme way to her dim dwelling place;
The eternal Hunger sits, but pity and awe
Soothe her pale rage nor dares die to deface
So fair a prey, till darkness, and the law
Of mortal change, shall fill the grave which is her man.

O, weep for Adonais!—The quick dreams,
The passion-winged ministers of thought,
Who were his flocks, whom near the living
stream

Of his young spirit he fed, and whom he taught

The love which was its music, wander not,— Wander no more, from kindling brain to brain,
But droop there, whence they sprung; and mourn their lot

Round the cold heart, where, after their secret
pain,

They ne'er will gather strength, or find a home
again.

And one with trembling hands clasps his cold
head,

And fans him with her moonlight wings, and cries;
"Our love, our hope, our sorrow, is not dead;
See, on the silken fringe of his faint eyes,
Like dew upon a springing flower, there lies
A tear some dream has loosened from his brain."

Lost angel of a ruined paradise!
She knew not 'twas her own; as with no stain
She faded, like a cloud which had outworn its rain.

One from a lucid urn of starry dew
Washed his light limbs as if embalming them;
Another clasp her profuse locks, and threw
The wreath upon him, like an anadem,
Which frozen tears instead of pearls beget;
Another in her wilful grief would break
Her bow and winged reeds, as if to stem
A greater loss with one which was more weak;
And dull the barbed fire against his frozen cheek.
Another splendour on his mouth alit,

That mouth, whence it was wont to draw the breath

Which gave it strength to pierce the guarded wall,

And pass into the panting heart beneath
With lightning and with music: the damp
death

Quenched its carress upon his icy lips;
And, as a dying meteor, stains a wreath
Of moonlight vapour, which the cold night clasp,
It flamed through his pale limbs, and past to its eclipse.

And others came—Desires and Adorations,
Winged Persuasions and veiled Destinies,
Splendour and Glooms, and glimmering Tuar-nations,

Of hopes and fears, and twilight Phantasies;
And Sorrow, with her family of Sighs,
And Pleasure, blind with tears, led by the gleam
Of her own dying smile instead of eyes, Came in slow pomp;—the moving group might seem

Like pagentry of mist on an autumnal stream.

All he had loved, and moulded into thought,
From shape, and hue, and odour, and seed sown

Lamented Adonais. Morning sought
Her eastern watch tower, and her hair unbound, Wet with the tears which should adorn the ground,

Dimmed the aerial eyes that kinde day;
Afar the melancholy thunder moaned,
Tale Ocean in unquiet slumber lay,
And the wild winds flew round, sobbing in their destiny.

Lost Echo sits amid the voiceless mountains,
And feeds her grief with his remembered lay,
And will no more reply to winds or fountains,
Or amorous birds, perched on the young green sprays.

Or her human's horn, or bell at closing day;
Since she can mimic not his lips, more dear
Than those for whose disdain she pined away
Into shadow of all sounds:—a drar Murmur, between their songs, is all the woe men hear.

Grief made the young Spring wild, and she threw down

Her kindling buds, as if she Autumn were,
Or they dead leaves: since her delight is down,
For whom should she have waked the autumn year?

To Phœbus was not Hyacinth so dear
Nor to himself Narcissus, as to both

Thou, Adonais; wan they stand and sere
Amid the drooping comrades of thy youth,
With dew all turned to tears, colour to sighing
ruth.

Thy spirit's sister, the lone nightingale,
Mourns not her mate with such melodious pain:
Not so the eagle, who like thee could scale
Heaven, and could nourish in the sun's death
Her mighty youth with mourning, doth complain,

Soaring and screaming round her empty nest,
As Albion wails for thee: the curse of Cain Light on his head who pierced thy innocent
breast,

And scared the angel soul that was its birth-guest!

Ah, woe is me! Winter is come and gone,
But grief remains with the revolving year:

The airs and streams renew their joyous war:
The ants, the bees, the swallows re-align;
Fresh leaves and flowers deck the dead be-sons' bier;
The amorous birds now pair in spring again.

And build their mossy homes in field and brake;
And the green lizard, and the golden snake,
Like unimpaired flames, out of their trance awake.

In the death chamber for a moment, Death
Shamed by the presence of that living Might Blushed to annihilation, and the breath
Reverted those lips, and life's pale light Flashed through those limbs, so late her dear delight.

'Leave me not wild and drear and comfortless,
As silent lightning leaves the starless night!
Leave me not!' cried Urania: her distress Iclouded Death: Death rose and smiled, and met her vain caresses.

'Stay yet awhile! speak to me once again;
Kiss me, so long but as a kiss may live;
And in my heartless breast and burning brain
That word, that kiss shall all thoughts else survive,

With food of saddest memory kept alive,
Now thou art dead, as if it were a part Of thee, my Adonais! I would give
All that I am to be as thou now art!
But I am chained to time, and cannot thence depart!

'O gentle child, beautiful as thou wert,
Why didst thou leave the trodden paths of men
Too soon, and with weak hands though mighty art

Dare the unspurred dragon in his den?
Defences as thou wert, oh where was then?
Wisdom the mirrored shield, or scorn the spear?
Or hadst thou waited the full cycle, when Thy spirit should have filled its crescent sphere,
The monsters of life's waste had died from thee like deer.

'The herded wolves, bold only to pursue;
The obscene ravens, clamorous o'er the dead;
The vultures to the conqueror's banner true,
Who feed where Desolation first has fed,
And whose wings rain contagion;—how they
fled,

When, like Apollo, from his golden bow,
The Pythian of the age one arrow sped
And smited!—The spoilers tempt no second
blow,

They fawn on the proud feet that spurn them
as they go.

'The sun comes forth, and many reptiles spawn;
He sets, and each ephemeral insect then;
Is gathered into death without a dawn,
And the immortal stars awake again:
So is it in the world of living men:

A godlike mind soars forth, in its delight Making earth and sea and veiling heaven, and when

It sinks, the swarm that dimmed or shared its light
Leave to its kindred lamps the spirit's awful night.'

Thus ceased she: and the mountain shepherds came,

Their garments ere, their magic mantles rent;
The Pilgrim of Eternity, whose fame
O'er his living head like Heaven is bent,
Xen early but enduring monument,
Xene, veiling all the lightnings of his song in sorrow, from her wilds lone sent
The sweetest lymd of her saddest wrong, and love taught grief to fall like music from his tongue.

Widest others of less note, came one frail form, phantom among men; companionless
as the faint cloud of an expiring storm, whose thunder is its knell; or, as I guess,
ad grazed on Nature's naked loveliness,

Actæon-like, and now he fled astray
With feeble steps o'er the world's wilderness,
And his own thoughts, along that rugged way Pursued, like raging hounds, their father and their prey.

A pardlike spirit, beautiful and swift,—
A love in desolation mask'd;—a power
Girt round with weakness;—it can scarce uplift

The weight of the superincumbent hour;
It is a dying lamp, a falling shower,
A breaking bellow;—even whilst we speak
Is it not broken? On the withering flower
The killing sun smiles brightly: on a cheek
The life can turn in blood, even while the heart may break.

His head was bound 't' his panicles overblown,
And faded violets, white, and pæd, and blue;
And a light spear topped with a cypress cone,
Round whose rude shaft dark ivy tresses grew
Yet dripping with the forest's noonday dew,
Vibrated, as the ever-beating heart
Shook the weak hand that grasped it; of that crew

He came the last, neglected and apart;
A herd-abandoned deer struck by the hunter's dart.

All stood aloof, and at his partial moan Smiled through their tears; well knew that gentle hand
Who in another's fate now wept his own;
And in the accents of an unknown land,
He sung new sorrow; and Urania scanned
The stranger's mien, and murmured—'who art thou?'

He answered not, but with a sudden hand
Made bare his branded and ensanguined brow,
Which was like Cain's or Christ's—'Oh! that it should be so!

What softer voice is hushed above the dead!
Althwart that brow is that dark mantle thrown?
What form leans sadly o'er the white death-bed,
In mockery of monumental stone?
The heavy heart heaving without a moan?
If it be he, who, gentler of the wise,
Taught, soothed, loved, honoured the departed
one,

Let me not vex, with inluminous sighs,
The silence of that heart's accepted sacrifice.

Our Adonais has drunk poison—oh!
What deaf and viperous murderer could crown
Life's early cup with such a draught of woe?
The nameless woe would now itself disown:
It felt, yet could escape the magic tone,
Whose prelude held all envy, hate, and wrong;
But what was howling in one breast alone,
Silent with expectation of the song,
Whose master's hand is cold, whose silver lyre
unstrung.

Live thou, whose infamy is not thy fame!
Live! fear no heavier chastisement from me,
Thou nameless blot on a remembered name!
But be thyself, and know thyself to be!
And ever at thy season be though free
To spill the venom when thy fangs o'erflow:
Renown and self contempt shall cling to thee;
Not shame shall burn upon thy secret brow,
And like a beaten hound tremble thou shalt—as now.

Nor let us weep that our delight is fled
Far from these carion kites that scream below;
He wakes or sleeps with the enduring dead;
Thou canst not soar where he is sitting now.—
Dust to the dust! but the pure spirit shall flow
Back to the burning fountain whence it came,
A portion of the Eternal, which must glow

Through time and ad change, unquenchably the
same,
Whilst thy cold embers choke the sordid hearth of shame.

Peace, peace! he is not dead, he doth not sleep—
He hath awakened from the dream of life—
'Tis we, who lost in stormy visions, keep
With phantasms an unprofitable strife.
In mind and trance, strike with our spirit's knife
Invulnerable nothing;—'tis the plea;
He cypreses in a claustral; fear and grief
Consume us and consume us day by day,
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay.

He has outlasted the shadow of our night;
Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which man miscall delight,
Can touch him not and torture not again;
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure, and now can never mourn
A heart grown cold, a head grown grey in vain;
Nor, when the spirit's self has ceased to burn,
With sparkless ashes load an unlamented urn.

He lives,—he wakes,—'tis Death is dead, not he;
Mourn not for Adonais. Thou young Dawn
Turn all thy dew to splendour, for from thee
The spirit thou lamentest is not gone;
Ye caverns and ye forests, cease to moan!
Cease ye faint flowers and fountains, and thou
air

Which like a mourning veil thy scarf hadst thrown
O'er the abandoned earth, now leave it bare Even to the joyous stars which smile on its despair!

He is made one with nature: there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moon
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself wherever that power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to his own;
Which wields the world with never weakened
love,

Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.
He is a portion of the loveliness
Which once he made more lovely: he doth
bear

His part, while the one spirit's plastic stress Sweeps through the dull dense world, compen-ding there

All new successions to the forms they wear;
Torturing th' unwilling dross that checks its flight
To its own likeness, as each mass may bear;
And bursting in its beauty and its might
From trees and beasts and men into the heaven's light.

The splendours of the firmament of time
May be eclipsed, but are extinguished not;
Like stars to their appointed height they climb,
And death is a low mist which cannot blot
The brightness it may veil. When lofty thought
Lifts a young heart above its mortal heir,
And love and life contend in it, for what shall be its earthly doom,—the dead live there And move like winds of light on dark and stormy air.

The inheritors of unfulfilled renown
Rose from their thrones, built beyond mortal
thought,
Far in the unapparent Chatterton
Rose pale, his solemn agony had not Yet faded from him; Sidney, as he fought
And as he fell, and as he lived and loved
Sublimely mild, a spirit without spot,

Arose; and Lúcan, by his death approved:
Olivion, as they rose, shrank like a thing re-proved.

And many more, whose names on earth are dark,
But whose transmitted effluence cannot die
So long as fire outlives the parent spark,
Rose, robed in dazzling immortality.
'Thou art become as one of us,' they cry,
'It was for thee yon kingless sphere has long
Swung blind in unascended majesty;
Silent alone amid an Heaven of song:
Assume thy winged throne, thou Vesper of our throne!'

Who mourns for Adonias? oh come forth Fond wretch! and know thyself and him aright.

Clasp with thy panting soul the pendulous earth;

As from a centre, dart thy spirit's light
Beyond all worlds, until its spacious might Satiates the void circumference: then shrink
Even to a point within our day and night,
And keep thy heart light, lest it make thee sink
When hope has kindled hope, and lured thee to the brink.

Or go to Rome, which is the sepulchre,
O, not of him, but of our joy: 'tis naught
That ages, empires, and religions there
Lie buried in the ravage they have wrought;
For such as he can lend,—they borrow not Glory from those who made the world their prey;

And he is gathered to the kings of thought,
Who waged contention with their time's decay,

And of the past are all that cannot pass away.
Go thou to Rome,—at once the paradise,
The grave, the city, and the wilderness;
And where its wrecks like shattered mountains
rise,

And flowering weeds, and fragrant copes dress
The bones of desolation's nakedness;
Pass, till the spirit of the spot shall lend
Thy footstep to a slope of green access,
Where, like an infant's smile over the dead,
A light of laughing flowers along the grass is spread.

And gray walls moulder round, on which dull time

Feeds, like slow fire upon a hoary brand;
And one keen pyramid, with wedge sublime,
Pavilioning the dust of him who planned
This refuge for his memory, doth stand
Like flame transformed to marble; and beneath
A field is spread, on which a never band
Have pitched in Heaven's smile their camp of death.

Welcoming him we lose with scarce extinguished breath.

Here pause: these graves are all too young as yet

To have out-grown the sorrow which consigned its charge to each; and if the seal is set
Here, on one fountain of a mourning mind,
Break it not thou! too surely shalt thou find
Thine own well fill, if thou returnest home,
Of tears and gall. From the world's bitter wind
Seek shelter in the shadow of the tomb—
What Adonias is, why fear we to become?

The One remains, the many change and pass;
Heaven's light forever shines, earth's shadows
pass;

Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of eternity,
Until Death tramples it to fragments.—Die,
If thou wouldst be with that which thou dost
seek!

Follow where all is fled!—Rome's azure sky,
Flowers, ruins, statues, music, words, are weak,
The glory they transfuse with fitting truth to speak.

Why linger, why turn back, why shrink, my heart?

Thy hopes are gone before: from all things here

They have departed; thou shouldst now depart!

A light is past from the revolving year,
And man, and woman; and what still is dear
Attracts to crush, repels to make thee wither.
The soft sky smiles,—the low wind whispers near;

'Tis Adonias calls! oh, hasten thither,
No more let Life divide what Death can join together.

That light whose smile kindles the universe,
That beauty in which all things work and move,

That benediction which the eclipsing curse
Of birth can quench not, that sustaining love
Which through the web of being blindly wove
By man and beast and earth and air and sea,
Burns bright or dim, as each are mirrors of
The fire for which all thirst, now beams on me,
Consuming the last clouds of cold mortality.

The breath whose might I have invoked in
song
Descends on me; my spirit's bark is driven,
Far from the shore, far from the trembling throng

Whose sails were never to the tempest given;
The massy earth and sphered skies are niven!
I am borne darkly, fearfully, afar,
Whilst burning through the inmost veil of
heaven,

The soul of Adonias, like a star,
Beacons from the abode where the eternal are.

The Tour of Africa: containing a concise Account of all the Countries in that Quarter of the Globe hitherto visited by Europeans; with the Manners and Customs of the Inhabitants, selected from the best Authors, and arranged— By Catherine Hutton. Vol. III. 8vo. pp. 536. London, 1821.

WHILE new voyages and travels continue to present themselves to public attention, in such massive and expensive tomes as to be beyond the purchase of ordinary readers, we are glad to see a person of Miss Hutton's talents engaged in condensing the labours of others, and presenting in three octavo volumes the spirit and interest of a whole library. In a work which does not present claims to originality, great industry, good taste, and sound discrimination, are the essential qualifications; and these the fair author of the Tour of Africa certainly possesses.

The first two volumes of this work, which have been some time before the public, are replete with interest; and the one now before us, which completes the whole, is of equal merit. While it contains all the most interesting facts related by the most distinguished travellers, stripped of useless detail and personal feeling, it possesses a consecutiveness which it is difficult to preserve amidst such a variety of objects. With declaring our decided approval of the plan and execution of this work, we proceed to our extracts:—

The Boa Constrictor.—'The boa constrictor of the countries watered by the river of Sierra Leone is sometimes thirty feet in length, or, as the Negroes say, forty, and four feet in circumference: they also say that he swallows an ox or a buffalo entire. They give the following account of this prodigious serpent.

'He hides himself near some spring or pool of water, where he remains perfectly still, convolved in three spiral rows. While an animal is quenching its thirst, he springs upon it, twines himself round its body, compresses it with great force, and suffocates it. When he is convinced that it is dead, he untwists himself, and quits it. He then attacks it with his teeth, which he drives deeply into every part of its body. After this, he again winds himself round his prey, and by rapid motions, powerful contractions, and repeated efforts, he crushes every bone to powder. When this operation is completed, he moistens the body all over with a kind of thick saliva, which he discharges in great abundance, and stretches it out at full length by creeping along it on both sides. All things being now ready for swallowing his victim, he places himself opposite to it. He opens his mouth, approaches it in an erect posture, snaps in the head or muzzle of his prey, and swallows the whole, by degrees, without letting it go.

'But before this monstrous reptile devours any large animal, he carefully inspects all the surrounding places, to be assured that no enemy is near; for, after such a repast, he is so horribly full, that he is incapable of the least motion or resistance. During this state of absolute helplessness, the Negroes kill him, and regale themselves at once with his flesh and that of the prey he has swallowed. In this state of lethargy he is also attacked by the ants, which penetrate into his body by millions, through his ears, nose, and mouth, devour in less than twenty-four hours both the serpent and his prey, and leave nothing but the empty skin.'

The Bijagos.—'The Bissagos are called by the natives the Bijagos, and so they call themselves. They are the most uncivilized of all the Negroes, and are distinguished by the others by the appellation of wild men. They are muscular, bony, well proportioned, and active.—Their noses are more elevated, and their lips not so thick as those of their neighbours. Their hair is woolly, and shaven into every fanciful form that can be imagined; the part that remains is generally dressed with red ochre and palm oil.

Every Bijago is a warrior; his dress is war, his amusement is the chase. Except a few days in the year, when he is employed in the cultivation of rice, war and the chase are his sole occupations. The Bijagos do not weave; the men wear only a goat or deer skin, the women only a large thick fringe of palm leaves hanging down from the waist. In their arms they are more splendid. A long buccavenger gun, kept in the most perfect order, is carried in the right hand; a sword about four feet in length, and sharp as a razor, not figuratively speaking, for it is sometimes used as one, is slung on the left shoulder, the hilt coming close under the arm. In the left hand is held a round convex shield, formed of withies, interlaced, and covered with a buffalo's hide; he same hand grasps a hasagay. The Bijagos are never without their arms, and so people understand the use of them better. With their gun they seldom miss their object; with their hasagay I have seen them strike a reed about ten inches long, and not thicker than a tobacco-pipe, at the distance of twenty yards; and in the use of the broad sword they are most expert and active. They consider the world as their own, and what it contains they have a right to plunder.

Punishment of Adultery.—During my stay at Teesee, Tigitty Segó held a palace on an accusation of adultery. The debates on both sides displayed much ingenuity; the fact was clearly proved, and the offender was sentenced to be sold as slave, or to find two slaves for his redemption, at the option of the complainant. The injured husband was unwilling to proceed to extremity against a man who had been his friend, and who was, besides, a very devout Muhammedan priest, & desired rather to have him publicly degraded, which was accordingly done; the number of stripes he received was precisely that enjoined by the Mosaic law, forty, save one.

Arabs of the Desert.—The Arabs of the Desert resemble in their complexion; mulattoes of the West Indies, but their physiognomy is very different. They are at an advantage over the Negroes by their knowledge of letters, and are the most modest and most intolerant people upon the earth.

An Arab can either fast or eat three meals in one. Those of Ludamar live chiefly on the flesh of their cattle. They chase their corn and their cotton garments in exchange for salt, which they bring from pits in the Sahara.

A woman of moderate pretensions to utility must be one who cannot walk about being supported under each arm by a slave; and a perfect beauty is a load to a camel. In order to become handsome, many of the girls are compelled their mothers to devour a large quantity of kouskous, and drink a large bowl of camels' milk, every morning. Their appetite demand it or not, these they swallow; and I have seen a girl sit crying, with the bowl at her lips, for more than an hour, and the mother watching over her with a stick in her hand, which she used from time to time, without mercy, to enforce obedience to her commands. Strange as it may appear, this super-abundant quantity of food, instead of producing indigestion, soon covers the young lady's person with the degree of corpulence which constitutes beauty in the eyes of an Arab.

The women in general wear a cotton cloth wrapped round the waist, and hanging down like a petticoat; to the upper part of this are sewed two square pieces, one before and the other behind, which are fastened together on the shoulders. The head dress is a bandage of cotton cloth, with a broader part to draw over the eyes when they walk in the sun. The better sort, however, when they go out, are veiled from head to foot.

The dress of the men differs but little from that of the Negroes, except that they universally wear a turban of white cotton cloth. Their hair is always black, and commonly short and bushy. Such as have long beards display them with great pride.

Gold Mines.—The next day, being nearly in the parallel of Bamboouk, and but little, as I apprehend, to the southward of that kingdom, I requested permission of the chief of a village called Shorondo, to visit the gold mines in its vicinity; and having obtained it, I engaged a gold-washer to go with me. About half a mile west of the town, we came to a meadow of four or five acres in size, in which were several excavations resembling wells. Near the mouth of each was a wash-pit, and between this and the well was a heap of gravel.

The woman took up about half a pound of gravel with one hand, and having put it into a large calabash, she covered it with water about the depth of an inch. She then rubbed and divided the gravel between her hands, and threw away the large pebbles. She now gave the contents of the calabash a rotary motion, making a part of the sand and water fly over the brim; then put in a little fresh water, and continued to agitate the whole. I now observed a quantity of a black substance resembling gunpowder, which she told me was gold rust; and she immediately pointed to a yellow speck, and said, "See the gold." I took it out of the calabash, and found it to be a portion of pure gold, which would have weighed about a grain. The whole time of washing did not exceed two minutes. The woman then put in her calabash about two pounds of gravel, which, after having gone through the same process, produced twenty-three particles of gold, some of them very small. I remarked, in both instances, that the quantity of gold rust was at least forty-times greater than that of the gold. The woman assured me that pieces of gold were sometimes found as large as her fist. The pits are two feet wide, and twelve feet deep; the sides are cut in notches, which serve as steps to descend by. The gold is found in a stratum of ferruginous pebbles, and yellow and rusty coloured sand and earth, about two feet in thickness, and ten below the surface of the ground.

The dress of the Jalofs consists of two pieces of cotton cloth; one worn round the waist, and descending below the calf of the leg; the other thrown over one shoulder, and leaving the other un-covered.

The chiefs, in addition to these garments, wear wide drawers, and a shirt. The women are covered only from the bosom to the knees. The ornaments of the wealthy are necklaces and bracelets of gold and silver; but, whether wives or slaves, they all labour for their common master.

Dancing is the predominant amusement of the Jalofs. The coolness of the night restores that vigour which the intense heat of the sun takes away, and they dance by moonlight till the break of day.

The Jalofs are kind to their slaves, and provide for their children as for their own. They seldom strike their slaves, and never impose tasks beyond their strength. If a free man violate a female slave, she is free, and the offender must give the price of a slave to her owner.

Every grave is covered with thorny shrubs, to protect it from wild beasts. These form impenetrable thickets, and under their shade trees spring up from seeds. The Jalofs, like the neighbouring people, have a contempt for weavers, blacksmiths, shoemakers, and musicians. Even a slave will not marry a woman whose family has been engaged in any of these occupations. The musicians are not buried among the Jalofs, but are laid in hollow trees. They say that the crop of millet would fail, if the body of a musician were laid in the earth.

The huts in Cayor are constructed with rushes, and the door is of straw. In general they are so compact as to keep out rain, but persons may converse through the walls; they are circular, and, at a distance, resemble bee-hives. Every man has at least two. These pliant habitations withstand storms, by yielding to their fury. Without the boundaries of the villages, are large rush baskets, raised on stakes, which are the depositaries of the grain, and these stores are never robbed.

Foota Toro.—In Foota Toro there exists a fraternity resembling the Purra of Sherbro, but not possessing such frightful power. The candidate for admission is shut up eight days in a hut; he is allowed to eat but once a day, and he sees no one, except the slave who takes him his food. At the end of this time, a number of men, in masks, employ all possible means to put his courage to the proof, and if he acquit himself with honour, he is admitted into the society. Boukari told me that he was once in a canoe with one of these men, when the rain fell in torrents all around them, and they remained dry. He asked his companion to reveal his secret; but he replied, "If I do so, my brethren will destroy me." The society is called Al Mousseri, and its members perform the part of conjurers.

*The Posas believe that Foota Toro is the first country in the world, and that they are superior to every other people: the Arabs they rank next to themselves. Their huts are circular, with conical roofs, and are constructed with earth, and the dung of their cattle; but they are well built. Their cloths are woven with care, and curiously ornamented with figures, and they manufacture a kind of coarse muslin. They make sandals of a brilliant red Morocco leather; and their stirrups, ear-rings, silver bells, and other trinkets, display some ingenuity. Every village has its weavers, shoemakers, and blacksmiths; but these artisans, as well as the makers of songs, are not allowed to marry with the other Posas.

*The Posas wear wide drawers, and the long frock with wide sleeves, with a small cotton cap on the head. The women braid their long hair round their heads, which they load with amber and coral; their necks are covered with gold, and glass beads. They wear the cloth, the invariable garment of the females of Negro countries, fastened round the waist, but they throw a muslin veil over the head, and some have jackets with sleeves. They are not so slavishly obedient to their husbands as the negro women. If they are ill-treated, they lodge a complaint before the chief, and peace is not concluded without the husband presenting his wife with an ox, or a slave.

*When a rich young man designs to marry, he tells his father, who repairs to the father of the girl of his choice, and acquaints him with his son's intention. The young man kills a bullock, and sends it, and if the intended father-in-law eat of it, it denotes his consent to the match. From this time, the lover does not see either his mistress or her mother; if he meet them by chance, he avoids them. After some time he sends another bullock; and on the day of marriage, he presents three slaves to the bride, and to the father, mother, and all their other children, a bullock each. The parents of the bride give her three slaves, ten bullocks, and forty cloths, for herself, and four frocks and four pair of drawers, for her husband. In case of a divorce, the woman receives back her dowry, and, at her death, it goes to her children. A man who cannot afford to pay for a wife must labour for her father, as Jacob did for Laban.

Lectures on Architecture: comprising the History of the Art, from the earliest times to the present day. By James Elmes, Architect. 8vo. pp. 431. London, 1821.

This work consists of the substance of a series of popular lectures delivered by Mr. Elmes at the Surrey and Russell Institutions in London, and at Birmingham; at all which places they were received with much approbation. Mr. Elmes takes an able and comprehensive view of the subject; tracing the history and progress of architecture among the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans, explaining their different styles and pointing out their advantages and disadvantages, their beauties and defects.

Our author is particularly happy in describing the architectural antiquities of Ireland; from this part of his work we make an extract:—

'A very singular specimen of ancient Irish architecture, which is certainly one of the most curious fabrics in these kingdoms, must be noticed,—the stone-roofed chapel of the ancient king Cormac, at Cashel, who was, after the patriarchal mode, both king and bishop, and flourished about the year 908. It is supposed to have been erected about the year 1134, and dedicated to that celebrated royal priest; and yet Ware, in his Antiquities, says, that when Roderick O'Connor, King of Connaught, in the year 1161, built a stone castle at Tuam, it was considered such an extraordinary work that the natives called it the Wonderful Castle. The aforesaid chapel of St. Cormac, at Cashel, is a regular ecclesiastical edifice, divided into a nave and choir, the latter narrowing in breadth, and separated from the nave by a wide arch. Under the altar tradition reports the remains of St. Cormac to be deposited. There is a striking resemblance between this chapel and the church of St. Peter, at Oxford, with Grimbold's crypt beneath it.'

We now proceed to English architecture, of which we shall quote a rapid sketch:—

'Roman or Italian architecture was brought into England under Inigo Jones, who was born in 1572, and whose distinguished works at Greenwich, Whitehall, and Covent Garden, will ever secure him a place among names of the highest reputation.

'Sir Christopher Wren, an eminent mathematician and philosopher, as well as architect, executed many of the finest buildings in London and other parts of England, in the modern style. St. Paul's Cathedral, inferior to none but St. Peter's in point of magnitude, and undoubtedly superior even to that both in skillful construction and design, will perpetuate his name to the latest posterity. The exterior cupola of St. Paul's is constructed of oak timber, and is sustained by a cone of eighteen-inch brick-work, which has a course of stone, the whole thickness, every five-feet; and the intermediate parts are two bricks in length in thickness. This cupola was turned upon a centre, which supported itself without any standard from below. From the inclined position of its supporting walls, it has little or no transverse pressure; yet, for greater security, it is hooped with iron at the bottom.

'Of the great English masters who flourished during this period, Jones was grand but unequal, as may be seen in his celebrated work, the chapel at Whitehall, the conception of which, as a part, and but a small part, of an immense palace, is certainly noble; its primary divisions few and simple, its openings large and handsome, but it is unequal in composition and in style. The play of light and shade produced by the breaks over each column, is in a minute taste, the very opposite to grand. The Ionic specimen is one of the worst and most impure he could have chosen; the modifications do not belong to the order, and approach too nearly to those of the Corinthian. If one order upon another be admissible, at all events the Corinthian should not have been excluded for the purpose of introducing the Composite.

'Wren was more equal and consistent than Jones; was possessed of more mathematical and general knowledge; was a man of a more expanded mind; but less of an architect by education, and had, generally speaking, less taste. Perhaps nothing of Wren's is equal in taste to Jones's water-gate at York buildings, and nothing of Jones's equals in scientific construction any thing of Wren's. Jones's Gothic, as shown in Lincoln's Inn Hall and Chapel, is decidedly bad; Wren's in St. Mary Aldemary, Bow-lane, is bold, if not pure; in the tower and pinnacles of St. Michael's, Cornhill, still better; and in the spire of St. Dunstan's in the East, unexceptionably fine; perhaps this is the best thing of its kind in Europe. St. Stephen's, Walbrook, has, I think, been beyond all its merits; although novel in principle, it is faulty both in construction and taste. His spire of Bow would alone immortalize any man; so beautiful is it in form, so novel in design, and so dexterous in construction.

'The works of Vanbrugh are solid and judicious; but he neglected the lighter graces of his art, and is, with all his picturesque beauties, cumbersome and inelegant in detail. Swift's epigram on the artist is pretty generally known:—

'Lie heavy on him, earth! for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.'

Yet Castle Howard and Blenheim will keep alive the name and memory of Vanbrugh among those of our greatest architects.

'Wyatt, who belongs more to our times, and will be spoken of in my concluding Lecture, was richer and more learned in his art than either Jones, Wren, or Vanbrugh. Equally inventive, and with as fine a taste as Jones; less scientific, perhaps, than Wren, but more admirable in his details than any preceding English architect; he is at the head of our school, from which has emanated all the finest works of the present day.

Speaking of the commencement of the reign of George III. Mr. Elmes says:—

"Kent, Gibbs, and Burlington were gone, and left no disciples; so was Hawksmoor, (the pupil of Wren,) who erected those monstrous churches near the Post Office, in Lombard Street, Limehouse, and St. George's in the East; and Archer, the groom-porter, as Walpole justly calls him, who built that of St. John's, Westminster, which looks like the four clumsy ill-carved legs of a butcher's block, or an elephant on his back. The elder Dance, whose mansion-house, in the city, was preferred to a design of Palladio's, from a motive of encouragement to native talent, was a man of some taste, as is proved by his Shoreditch Church, the spire of which is a free and not unhand-some imitation of Bow. He was not a regularly-educated architect, but the best and nearly the only one of his day.

"Butty Langley, it is true, had a school or academy, but his disciples were all carpenters; a few of them, calling themselves surveyors and builders, and practising carpentry and box-making, were alive in my remembrance;—bating the "new-fangled Doric," as they termed it, without a base, as much as they did a shirt without ruffles, or a wig without two good portly curls over each ear and half a yard of tail behind; scorning its simple flutes without fillets, which they compared to ribbed stockings; and sincere in their admiration of the swelling shaft, the rusticated and twisted columns of Butty Langley. The schools at Oxford and the Royal Exchange were their schools; they lamented the shocking innovations of Wyatt and Soane, the more dreadful importations of Stuart, and were nearly going into a fever when the portico of Covent Garden Theatre was opened. Is it not dreadful, said one of these worthies to me, to see young men going back to the old Grecians, upon whom the Romans had so much improved? Had the poor man but lived to have seen his master's taste revived, it might have added a year or two to his existence. Although the taste of Butty Langley has been deservedly censured, he yet formed a class of clever workmen in a certain humble line of the art.

"Such was the state of architecture when our late monarch ascended the throne; and it was fortunate for the arts that he was endowed with a love for, as well as a considerable acquaintance with, them all. In his grandfather's reign, when he was Prince of Wales, he studied architecture, and was taught to delineate its proportions from the rules of Palladio, by the late Sir William Chambers, who was then naval officer, fond of the art, and who had availed. His Majesty also studied perspective under the late Mr. Kirby; and drawings, some of which I have seen, were correct, and, for their day and style of art, tasteful and elegant.

"Chambers became the royal architect, but threw no new lights on the profession. In its practice, and in the more scientific part of construction, his knowledge was very limited, and his taste impure; yet his works have a chastened correctness of detail in the best style of Italian art.

"In the course of his travels Chambers had visited parts of China, and published a treatise on the gardening and architecture of that strange people; and to him we owe the introduction of their fantastic and inelegant style. We do not observe this out of disrespect to the memory of Sir William; but the existence of these whimsical demands reprobation from such as have a sense of the importance of a pure taste to the fame of our country; which feeling is of the more consequence in our noble art than in any other, it being more durable, and thus perpetuating the fame or disgrace of a good or a bad taste in a greater degree. The public expected much from one whose official situation rendered him a sort of leader in art; who, as the successor of Wren and Wyatt, should have elevated architectural taste; for if the fountain-head be pure, so will be the streams which flow from it. The beauty of the Parthenon and the Poikile, of the temple of Theseus and the Erechtheum, gave birth to the unequalled sculptures of the one and the pictures of the other, in the same style of high art, producing fruit after their kind; for the pure, the divine taste of the architect and his patron refined that of the painter and of the sculptor. Can we expect such fruit from the style which is now unhappily reviving?

If Mr. Elmes's work should be so fortunate as to infuse, what it is well calculated to do, a better taste among our modern architects, or to promote its study, he will have rendered a valuable service to the arts; and if not, we thank him for the endeavour.

The Union of the Roses, a Tale of the Fifteenth Century. In six Cantos, with Notes. 8vo. pp. 180. London, 1821.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the title of this poem refers to the union of the Houses of York and Lancaster, and that historical events connected with that period form its materials; these, though used with a poet's license, are converted into a tale of considerable interest. The poem contains many pretty passages, and it is not deficient either in vigour of sentiment or expression. The description of the battle of Bosworth Field is told with great spirit, and we select it as a fair specimen of the poem:—

On Bosworth's plain the valiant bed
Of noble Richmond made a stand:

In close array they firmly stood,
Fix'd as the mountain 'gainst the flood,
And fearless eyed the dazzling gleam
Of warriors, posted on Arme Beam.
There Richard's forces, vast and strong,
Like mountain torrents roll along;
And five to one, his powerful host,
Made him of victory proudly boast.

"The little army on the plain Excited but the king's disdain!
"Cowards and vagabonds!" he said,
"A rebel Welshman at their head;
O'er ranks by such a leader train'd,
An easy victory were obtain'd."
Richmond now rode from wing to wing,
From rank to rank, and view'd the king,
Who 'midst his host distinguish'd shone;
His brow was girt with England's crown.
The earl, undaunted with the view,
To charge the squadrons forward flew:
"God and St. George! be ours!" he said;
"The people's rights rest on my blade!
This heart is as bold, this arm as strong,
As his who shines amid you throng;
Soldiers, we fight for freedom's laws,
And heaven will aid the rightful cause!"

"Now trumpet's blast aloud was heard,
And every spark of valour stir'd.
Brave Oxford led our vanguard on,
And soon the work of death began;
Barb'd arrows flew like hail around,
And ranks of foe-men strew'd the ground:
Long doubtful hung the dreadful fray,—
The king seem'd gaining fast the day,
When, through a cloud of smoke and flame,
To join our banners Stanley came,
Who long had held a centre post,
Ready to side with either host.
The tyrant fear'd this earl might change,
And hostage kept the young Lord Strange.
Soon as he saw the father's choice,
His mandate rang in thundering voice:
"What, ho!—behind Lord Stanley's soul;
Let Catesby see the deed is done!"
Had Catesby heard, no more the boy
Had fill'd his father's heart with joy;
No more had hail'd the rosy dawn,
Or felt the cheering breeze of morn:
Nature against the mandate heard,
And kindly bosoms interfered,
The unoffending youth to save,
A victim from an early grave!

"While ranks with ranks began to close,
And foe to foe their arms oppose,—
Nice was the judgment that could know
Where stood a friend, and where a foe:
True English valour warn'd each breast,
As fiercely to the fight they press'd;
Like courage in their bosoms glow,
One language speaks both friend and foe;
Perhaps the hand which wings the dart
Might speed it to a brother's heart!
And the deep groans, which stunn'd the ear,
Be those of friend or kindred dear!
So thought I, as the murky air
Rung with the sounds of keen despair,
With shrieks and agonising groans,
Or death's more faint, yet deeper moans:
Rayless, and set in darkest night,
The eye—which late shone fierce and bright;
The eye, which spoke the daring heart,
Which glanced along, like fiery dart,
From rank to rank, scanning them o'er,
Now closed in death to ope no more!

"Pale was the cheek, late flush'd with ire,
Glowing with youthful vigorous fire;
And still the heart, which beat so high,

With hopes of fame and victory ;
Here stretch'd in death the vigorous form
Which brav'd, so late, the impending storm ;

Thus, numbers of our foemen lay.
The King distracted, saw the day
Was well nigh lost—frantic with rage
He sought Earl Richmond to engage :
Breaking through thousands, near he drew,
Where Richmond's blood-stain'd banner flew ;

There be the gallant Brandon slew ;
Who, rather than the standard yield,
Bravely met death on Bosworth's field.
Fierce as ten thousand furies, he
Had brought brave Cheyney on his knee,
When Richmond saw the desperate King,
And rush'd through numbers, rank, and ring.

His course to check ; and hand to hand
They'd fought, had not a num'rous band
Th' intent oppos'd ; yet braver when
The danger most, to cheer his men
He strove but such attempts proved vain ;
Gasping they strew'd th' ensanguin'd plain.
Numbers in haste had fled the field,
And Richard's host were forced to yield !
Seeing all lost, with furious yell,
Amongst his foes he rush'd and fell.

* Thus bravely died, a man whose life
Had all been spent in fraud and strife ;
Who, from the cradle to the grave,
No virtue had, save being brave !
'Midst heaps of slain his corse was found,
Mingled with many a gaping wound :
Ghastly his visage ; black despair,
Revenge, and envy, settled there ;
The starting eyes, with frantic stare,
Still seem'd to roll in horrid glare :
All the base passions might be seen
Concenter'd in his livid mien.

That bauble crown, for which to gain
He scrupled not his soul to stain
With crimes of darkest dye, was found ;
And there the conqueror's brow it bound :
While shouts through both the armies ring,
Of—'Long live Henry !—England's King—'

The Meditator,

AN OCCASIONAL PAPER,
No. IV.

Ridiculum, acri

Fortius et melius, magnas plerumque vocat res.
HORACE.

For ridicule shall frequently prevail,
And cut the knot, where graver reasons fail.

FRANCIS.

THE solution of that knotty problem which I gave in my last number, may seem to those who have not made logic their particular study, as somewhat irrelevant to my professed intention of dedicating this work to myself. But, as country wisdom says, which sees as far into cause and effect as an ass into a bundle of hay, viz. as far as the end of its nose,—

Now, if you'd reap,
Blind, if you'd keep,
Look, if you'd leap,
Stead not, if you'd sleep,
But read, if you'd peep
Into other men's brains,

And ensconce for your pains,
What will make you be taken
For Merlin or Bacon.

If the reader had profited as much by Aristotle as I have—if by vaporizing of cotton wrapped in molten cylinders, or by burning blessed daylight down to the socket of twilight, he had extracted as much wisdom from the art of reasoning, as would teach a duckling how to dabble, or a nurse to know a creek from a promontory—he would see that the apparent want of connection was owing to nothing more than the deficiency of middle terms ; and if he had the mother wit of a barnacle, he would have found that middle term in the name of my paper.

I should be but a sorry kind of a Meditator, if my thoughts were to follow each other like the stitches of knit hose, from one end to the other without dropping or breaking the thread of continuity. I might as well christen myself, The Poet, and then begin to write common sense. No—by jumping from one end of the extension of human imagination to the other, without a link of thought between—by making a wry face here, and then laughing at its phantom from the opposite point in the circle of conception—by changing the horizon of my wit to that of its antipodes, in the scintillation of a thunderbolt—in fact, by doing the very opposite to what I should—I am all the time letting the reader into my character—I am telling him what I wish him to know of my disposition, as plainly as a patriot that he wants a pension by declaiming against secret service-money, or a gospel-trumpeter, from a tub or a stool, that he wants a fat goose or a plum-pudding or an endowed pulpit-cushion to rest his miraculous elbows, when he preaches to you about laying up treasures in heaven.

To put this into a logical form. I engage in a delineation of my person—well—and being a Meditator, if I would do grace to my profession, I must think, not in train—but disjunctively, not in rea-on—but in paradox ; ergo,—

And, by the bye, I have always thought, that this immediate contact of our thoughts,—whereby the ideas, rubbing one against the other, triturate and pulverize themselves, so that at length they become like nothing else upon the face of God's earth, but the impossible globules of electricity,—having neither the substance, weight, or solidity of the most elementary material particles—must be a chief cause why the glib and fluent imagery of modern compositions, in which the ideas are worn so as to become wholly invisible, I suppose by the aforementioned attrition arising from their number and closeness, kicks the beam when a sentence from Shakespeare or Milton is thrown into the opposite scale. Beside, this doctrine of a consecutive necessity in our ideas, each springing from the relics of the last, like resurrectionary phoenixes, hath a direct tendency to confirm an opinion which is daily making great strides to universality, and gaining almost as many proselytes as pork, in these mighty wise times of noles noles salivationists, who are so generous as to lend God a helping hand to fulfil his own purpose of Jewish redemption—a doctrine which I would give the reverend payment of the national debt to see knocked on the head—namely, that abominable and provoking attempt at demonstrating the identity of the biped which chatters vacant syllables at my lady's elbow, and that which grins fraternally at him from her other shoulder, with a chain round its hips, to prevent it ousting him from his station and office, for —Change places, and handy-dandy ! Which is the monkey ? Which is the man !

You will say, how can this assist in proving a man and a monkey to differ both in education and posterior ? I answer—from the consideration of the pretensions put forth by the latter to be the first inventors of pendulums—the glory of which hath been falsely attributed to Huygens. Let us consider the foundation of these pretensions, and then calmly and dispassionately form our conclusion. The following fact, which is mentioned in several well-authenticated histories compiled by the reclaimed part of the species, is that chiefly relied upon by the other, in furtherance of their claims. A synagogue is proclaimed in the wilderness, and, after a due number of dissertations on the politics, poetry, laws, finances, &c. of the monkey-weal, accompanied—like the meetings of the heterodox part of the species—with various shrugs, grimaces, scandals, backbiting, squabbles, and mischievous tricks,—from which analogy, by the bye, they draw a strong argument in their own favour—and set forth, by divers exhibitions of oratory, jugglery, chentery, preaching, mumping, walking upright when they should be down on all-fours, po-ting straws across their mouths and calling them pens, clapping birds' nests upon their heads, after having killed the owners and sucked the eggs, and with a pumpkin in one hand, a bull-rush in the other, calling themselves kings and emperors and autocrats; or having worked themselves into a perspiration, by shouting and capering and gesticulating on some rostral bough till they're frightened the woodlice out of their wits, calling themselves patriots and reformers—ranting, chattering, piping, squalling, their eloquence, their wisdom, their philosophy—they then proceed to the practical business of the state. The first mounts as high as he can go upon a lofty tree, and wraps me his queer round a horizontal branch, a good way out from the stem, and letting his body swing like a thief hung by the heels, affords short rope of descent for the second, who has followed him up the tree. 'his gentleman claps me his tail in the first gentleman's mouth, and swings at his turn, thus making a second link; and so on, each squire gives the hip-end of him to his posterior neighbour, till they form a pendulum of onkeys down to the ground. This clearly Huygens's principle, only a little more ingeniously set forth; for though I have not heard that they have applied it to correcting the motion of a sun, or furnishing the brotherhood with a clearer notion of time or eternity, yet it is manifestly superior in this, that it hath the principle of motion within itself; and if it regulates the clock, 'tis only because there is no clock to regulate, which is none of its alt, and, therefore, the objection is soundless. At all events, it is plain, at the wits of the wilderness of monies jumped with Huygens's, in the vention of this instrument, and he made use of it first, that's all! as Puffin. Hence we see, they have a well-defined notion of consecutive associations of bodies—but, as Mr. Hume has indubitably proved, bodies (and, therefore, monkeys) are nothing but modes of ideas—hence, having a notion of consecutive bodies, and bodies having ideas, it follows that they have a notion of consecutive ideas, i.e. they have consecutive ideas. Q. E. D. This people adduce many other proofs of their consanguinity, but none of them, I think, so clearly decisive as above. For, it does not prove really that we agree in the common property of having consecutive ideas—ch, I doubt, would go near proving a monkey to be an angel as well as a man—but, moreover, that their intelligence is of the same kind as our's, existing itself upon such little mechanical contrivances as I have mentioned. Now all these similarities between the two bipedal sects, together with their close agreement in external form, afford a body of evidence too cogent to be dismissed, as it usually is with us, with the little consideration philosophers have given to the subject.

I may now go on with my logical form. Being a Mediator, which means,—not exactly a madman—but one who thinks in a style no person of common sense would conceive, the very opposite to what his last thoughts would lead him—this being the case, it follows, that having described a man, I hope, in my own person, my thoughts should then fly off to the very opposite of every thing human—and if this be not the affair which I described so categorically in my last number, why clap me in an oyster-shell, and sell me with a dozen, to fat an alderman or stuff a crammed turkey poult—I will be content to transfigure into the generation of a soprano-singer or a Spanish mule, if this make not the flesh and blood and spirit and life of the subject of the above-mentioned problem.

'EDWARD'S SHOVEL-BOARDS.'

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Slender.—Ay, by these gloves did he (or I might never come in mine own great chamber again else) of seven groats in mill-sixpences, and two Edward Shovel-boards, that cost me two shillings and two pence a-piece of yead miller by these gloves.

Merry Wives of Windsor.

Sir,—Douce, Farmer, Malone, and other commentators, have noticed this expression. Stevens says, that one of these pieces of metal is mentioned in Middleton's comedy of The Roaring Girl, 1611:—

—'Away slid I, my man, like a shovel-board shilling, &c.

which seems to imply that he did not consider them as a current coin. But Farmer asserts, that the Edward shovel-boards were the broad shillings of Edward VI.; and that Taylor, in his note to his Travel of Twelvemonth, tells us, that 'Edward's shillings, for the most part, are used at shove-board.' Malone and Douce concur in the same opinion, but their notes are too long for me to quote.

Now, Farmer, (whom Malone, I think, extracts,) bears out Stevens in his supposition, that these pieces were not of silver; for he talks of having seen them of the weight of half-an-ounce and an ounce,—certes, an ounce of silver could not have been a saleable commodity at two shillings and two-pence of our friend Slender's money.

I happen to have one of the broad shillings of Edw. VI. The size of it equals one of our present half-crown pieces, but it is very thin, and has no milling nor raised edge to protect the impression from injury, and, consequently, a great part of it is obliterated, particularly on the reverse. Its weight, I take it, is about equal to that of the current shilling.

I should like to have a game of 'shove-board.'—I wish some of your readers would acquaint you with it for me. Your's, &c. L. L. D.

'AS SURE AS GOD'S IN GLOUCESTERSHIRE.'

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Sir,—Mr. Wildernessee having mentioned 'as sure as God's in Gloucester,' in your last number, I have sent you an explanation given in the British Apollo as its origin, and remain, Sir, your well-wisher and constant reader.

ANTIQ.

'When the Romish faith was universally received in England, Gloucestershire was, more than all the other counties, filled with convents, nunnies, and such like houses, dedicated to God's service; who, because his influence shone more brightly there than elsewhere, was imagined, by the common people, more immediately conversant with the men of Gloucestershire than other people.'

MISERIES OF AN AUTHOR.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

Oh, MR. EDITOR, MR. EDITOR!—Didst thou but know how many times we have essayed to procure a snug corner in one of the columns of thy most excellent periodical,—how many scraps, both of verse and prose, we have forwarded to thee,—how many sheets of paper we have used,—or, what is much worse, how many two-pences we have paid for the postage thereof;—I say, if thou didst know all these things, and hadst any bowels of compassion, thou wouldst take pity on us. How often have we seated ourselves in our arm-chair, by a fire almost as dull as our own pericranium, to imagine, digest, and commit to paper some excellent and valuable article for The Literary Chronicle; oft have we twined our most respected nose, for no other earthly reason than to secure ourselves from the somniferous effects of our epistle; but when some bright idea has flashed in upon our soul, how our eyes have sparkled, we have rubbed our hands with delight, and—continued. When we had finished, with what a paternal fondness did we peruse what we had written; and, when we came to any happy expression or well-turned period, what a smile of self-complacency did illumine our visage. Having satiated ourself with its numerous beauties, we carefully folded it up, and putting our hand into our breeches' pocket, where we keep our share of the copper coin of the realm, we drew therefrom two pence, which we gave with the letter to our little maid Jenny, to take to the Post Office. How anxiously did we long for Saturday, and when it arrived and we received our Chronicle, with a palpitation of heart and with great emotion did we open each separate and individual page; but in vain did our eyes wander up and down,—we could not find our unfortunate communication! At this disappointment, the corners of our mouth did verily sink downwards at least an inch, and a long-winded sigh did issue from the very bottom of our lungs. We then turned to the part inscribed 'to readers and correspondents.' But even there we could find nothing that concerned us. This was certainly very vexatious, and, had it happened but once, we should have consoled ourself with the supposition that the postman had lost it, or that Jenny had pocketed the money and sent the letter to the—no matter where; but as the occurrence has been so frequent, we are compelled to conclude that our letters have formed a much closer connexion with thy fireplace than we had intended, and thus, like many other of our plans, ended in smoke, or that the precious offspring of our brain will find its way home as the envelope of a three-farthing rush-light or a quarter of a pound of cheese, which would undoubtedly be a severe shock to the feelings of thy already disconsolate humble servant.

THE INQUISITION AT LISBON.

The most hateful of all tribunals, the Inquisition, was introduced into Spain in the year 1478, and established in Portugal, at the pressing solicitation of King John III., about the year 1536. From this time until the recent revolution in Portugal, its power has been unchecked, and the details of its proceedings, even such as have transpired, chill us with horror. With what delight then must every friend to humanity hail that act of the Cortes, in Portugal, by which this infernal tribunal is abolished.

In a recent sitting of the Cortes, it was resolved that the dungeons of the Inquisition should be thrown open. An Englishman, at Lisbon, who had the opportunity of examining them, gives the following description of this horrible place—horrible from its very plan and construction, but a thousand times more horrible from its having been the scene of so many murders, committed in the abused name of religion. The letter, from which we make the following extract, is dated Lisbon, October 20, 1821:

'I send you a description of the Inquisition at this place, which I have been to visit. At the sitting of the Cortes, on the 10th inst., Senor Figueras presented a letter from the keeper of the Inquisition, stating, that on the building being opened for public inspection, the people had behaved in a very disorderly manner, breaking open doors and carrying away papers, &c. and that several persons had actually cried out that the building should be burned, whilst they held lighted candles in their hands, as if about to put their threats into execution; which, he stated, they would have done but for the interposition of the guards. The keeper therefore prayed that measures should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such scenes. Senor Bascos said, that if any such disorders, as had been described, had occurred, it was owing to the refusal of the keepers to shew the instruments of torture and the lower cells of the prison to the visitants. In his opinion, these gentlemen (the keepers) cherished a religious respect for the tribunal, of which they spoke with apparent veneration. As it was apprehended the people might set fire to the place, it would be better to suspend lamps in various parts, and not allow the visitants to carry lights.—Senor Fernando Thomas proposed that an inscription, of which the following is a translation, should be fixed on every place occupied by the Inquisition in Portugal:

"May eternal malediction follow every Portuguese who does not hold for ever in abhorrence an invention so infernal."

"On the 8th of October, the Inquisition at Lisbon was thrown open for public inspection, and, for the first four days, the concourse of people of all descriptions that crowded to view it was so great, that the pressure at the entrance made it an enterprise of some risk. The building is a large oblong, with a garden in the centre; there are three floors, with a number of vaulted passages, along the sides of which are cells of different sizes, from six to eleven feet to eight by nine feet. Each cell has two doors; the inner one of iron, the outer of oak, very strong. As there are no windows in the cells on the ground and middle floors, no light is admitted when the doors are shut. The cells on the upper floor are larger than the others, and each has an aperture like a chimney, through which the sky is visible. These were appropriated to the use of those who, it was supposed, might be liberated. In the roof of each cell (for they are all raised) is a small aperture of about an inch in diameter, and a private passage runs over each range; so that the persons employed by the Holy Office could at any time observe the conduct of the prisoners unseen, and, if two persons were confined in one cell, hear their conversation. There are seats in these private passages so contrived, that a person sitting might inspect two of the cells at the same time, as, by a turn of the head, he could fix his eye upon the hole over either cell at pleasure; or he could hear what was said in either. The persons appointed to listen to the discourse of the prisoners wore cloth shoes; so that their footsteps could not be heard.

"Frequently a familiar of the Holy Office was put into the cell of a prisoner, as a person arrested, in order to entrap the unfortunate inmate of this horrible place into admissions that might afterwards be used against him. I saw, in several of the cells, human skulls and bones; most of them appeared to have lain there for many years, as I broke some of them easily with my fingers; others were bird and fresh. In a number of the cells the names of the unhappy inmates were written on the walls; some had strokes apparently marking the number of days or weeks the victims of this horrid tyranny had been confined. On the wall of one cell I counted upwards of 500 of these marks. On the wall of another of the cells was written, "Francisco Jose Curvalho, entered here the last day of March, 1809, and remained as many days as there are strokes in the wall." On the wall of another cell there was written "John Laycock;" the name had been covered with white-wash, which had scaled off. There were a number of strokes under the name, and the figures 18 were easily made out; the others were obliterated. Some of the cells, which had not been used for several years, were locked up, but the visitants soon broke them open. Human bones were found in many of these. In one was found part of a friar's habit, with a waist girdle of rope and some bones. The apertures, like chimneys, in some of the cells were closed; and I have been informed that it was a common mode of putting prisoners to death, to place them in these apertures, which were then walled up, and quick lime being poured in from the top, a speedy end was put to their sufferings. The furniture is very old; the chairs in the halls are covered with leather, studded all round with very large brass nails. I send you a piece of leather with one of these nails, taken from one of the best chairs. The large tables in the halls had drawers for papers; these the visitants broke open, every one being desirous of obtaining some relic of the once terrible Inquisition. In several of the cells there were mattresses, some of them old, others nearly new; which proves that the Inquisition was no bugbear up to a very recent date. Besides the three floors which I have described, there are a number of cells underground, which have not yet been opened.

"These, it is supposed, contain the apparatus for inflicting the torture, &c.—It is understood that these will shortly be thrown open to the public; when they are, I shall not fail to visit them, and shall send you a description. The spot on which the Inquisition stands was covered with houses in 1755, when the great earthquake happened, by which they were laid in ruins; so that the present building has not been erected more than sixty years, and all the victims that were immolated in it must have been sacrificed within that period."

For an account of the origin of the Inquisition, and a statement of the number of its victims, see The Literary Chronicle, Nos. 47, and 54.—Ed.

ORIGIN OF THE PRIDE OF RANK.

By the REV. G. TOWNSHEND.

I know that I shall indeed be deemed fanciful, if I merely hint at the possible origin of a strange peculiarity in the history of the human race,—the origin of pride of rank. The tables of pedigree were carefully preserved among the Jews, that the line in which the Messiah was to descend might be kept distinct; and the genealogy of the priests be recorded, to prevent the intrusion of improper persons into the sacred office. The tables of pedigree were handed down from the beginning, and, either in tradition or in letters, must have been preserved among the Patriarchs. The first beginnings of idolatry were, an attempt to set aside the acknowledged line of the future Messiah. Nimrod assumed the title of 'the Son;' assuming, most probably, as Mr. Faber with much ingenuity has attempted to prove, the name and office of their expected Messiah. To effect this, he must have been able to make out some title from his descent, which was from Ham, the eldest son of Noah; who, according to the usual customs of the Patriarchs, would have inherited the birth-right; one of the privileges of which was, to be the progenitor of the branch from which one parent of the Messiah was to descend. The Patriarchs esteemed that line of descent to be the most noble, from which the Messiah was to be born: the excluded tribes would not easily resign their claims; they too, therefore, would preserve their line of descent, and the ambition of being supposed to have descended from some celebrated ancestor would have become universal. Ishmael, for instance, as the first-born of Abraham, is said, by the best commentators, to have derided Isaac, because he claimed the inheritance and the birth-right, which were allotted to Isaac. The Arabians still commemorate the immediate descendants of Ishmael, and boast of their lofty descent; and there is much traditional evidence on record to show that it is not improbable that they remembered and asserted in those early times the claims of their progenitor. The Edomites undoubtedly opposed Israel on this account; and we know that this family were so tenacious of their pedigree, that it has even been inserted by Moses in the sacred canon; as if to prove to the surrounding nations at the time when the Pentateuch was written, by the miracles which he wrought, that the line of Esau was rejected, and that of Jacob approved. The people of Edom must have known that the ancestors enumerated in their tables, had apostatised from the worship of Jehovah, and could bring no proof that they were entitled to the birth-right, except the sole circumstance, that their father had been the elder born of Isaac. In opposition to this claim, he relates, minutely, the sale of his birth-right by Esau; the subsequent blessing of Isaac; the perseverance of Jacob and his family in the true religion; the uninterrupted pedigree of Jacob; and the evident proofs of a miraculous nature, by which God confirmed the right of the second brother to the forfeited inheritance of the elder. Though it is true that men wish to be renowned, as partaking in some measure of the honour of their fathers, yet when these tables of pedigree were first formed, little or no temptation of this kind existed. They were compiled for political and religious purposes; and were, therefore, entirely independent of any of those feelings which are the offspring of a more advanced stage of society. All this, however, is a theory which may be rejected at pleasure. The fact is certainly curious, that in the very earliest ages men should be so anxious to preserve the respective tables of descent, and identify themselves with the names of their fathers. Classical Journal, No. XLVII.

STANZAS.

The following stanzas were written to describe the feelings of an early acquaintance of the author's, who married a female in circumstances much beneath his own: he raised her from a state of poverty to comparative affluence, and treated her with the utmost kindness.—But what avails kindness when the heart is vicious? She left him, to mourn, too late, his weakness and the inconstancy of woman.

'Tis done, and thou hast left the heart

That beat for thee alone,

And I have lost my better part,

And now am sad and lone;

A friendless being 'mid the group—

Who compass me around,—

A wither'd tree condemn'd to drop

Beneath a careless wound.

It was not kind, it was not well

To fill my breast with care;

Thou'dst think'st, couldst thou view the hell

The crime has planted there.

I thought thy beauty firm'd to bless,

Nor deem'd thee what thou art;

I snatch'd thee from a wilderness,

And placed thee in my heart.

When wild ideas fly apace,

Along my aching brain,

I took thee as an antidote,
But thou hast prov'd my bane.

I might have cull'd full many a flower
Of fairer tint than thee;
I might have known a happier hour,
But now it ne'er can be.

Thou wert my heav'n's, my life, my love,—
All others I despis'd;
My place on earth, my hopes above
For thee I've sacrificed.

I laid my head at night to rest
In confidence by thine,
Nor deem'd there dwelt within thy breast
A thought to injure mine.

And thus hast thou my love repaid,
Thus perfected thy vow;
And thus hast thou my bosom made
The soulless thing 'tis now.

There heaves no heart in this wide world
Will feel one throb for me;
None from so lov'd a throne is hurl'd
As that I found in thee.

Yet would I not that throne regain,
Tho' deep the pangs I feel;—
I grant ye, it might ease my pain,
But never could it heal.

'Tis fixt within me far too deep,—
It dwells upon my breath;
Naught can remove it but that sleep,
Mismam'd by many death.

That slumber were more welcome now
Than any I have known
Before or since the time when thou
First saidst thou wast my own.

I need not tell thee what I felt
When came that lovely night,
And on each look, each word I dwelt,
In rapturous delight.

E'en now I feel it thrilling sweet
Along each glowing vein;—
Away the thought—I cannot meet
That look, that smile again.

Imagine all the breast can feel
In chains of rapture bound;
Perhaps that vision may reveal
A feeling yet unfound.

Imagine all the soul can know
Before its Maker's shrine,
When he forgives its deeds below—
And 'twill not equal mine.

Then smile not that I'm wretched now,
Nor sneer at what I bear,
Nor raise thy once angelic brow
In scorn of my despair.

When I am low, perhaps thou wilt
Remember me with grief,
And mourn thy deed, so cloth'd in guilt
It mocks at all relief.

O woman! woman! lovely thing,
Who prizes thee too much
Will find thou bear'st the viper's sting,—
There's ruin in thy touch.

Thy smile is but the deadly smile
The face of ocean wears;
Thy glance the unweakening wine
The tyger's eye-ball bears.

O, shun her smiles, as you would shun
The fiend that works your ill,
And you will find, as I have done,
Yourself a victor still.

For fatal is the pleasing thrill
She causes o'er the mind;

Take of her joys whate'er you will
There's bitterness behind.

I found it such,—ye 'll find it so,—
Ye 'll feel as I have felt;
The icy column of your woe
No sun of joy shall melt.

But thou, false woman, if thou e'er
Shalt know one hour of thought,
Oh! pause amid thy wild career,
And sorrow as thou ought.

I would not wish thee wretched, tho'
My peace thou hast destroy'd,
Nor would I that thy breast should know
In mine the dreary void.

There are but few—there breathe but few
Who grieve at my distress,
And fewer still are they who know
Or felt its bitterness.

And fewer still are they who feel
The agony it brings;
And fewer yet, who wish to heal
Or rid it of its stings.

The time has been—the time is now,
When I must feel it more,
Nor knows my aching bosom how
It bore it so before.

Then come what will, or come what may,
That bosom shall not shrink;—
Some tell me of a better day—
Of that I dare not think.

That day has past, and I am thrown Upon the restless sea:
Alas! so desolate and lone
I never thought to be.

There was a time when fortune's dart
Hath no remembrance left;
But what avails it now,—the heart
Of every joy bereft.

But tell me, tell me not of joy,—
Away, away the thought;
To me 'twas but a foolish toy,
Alas! too dearly bought.

With it I busy'd my spirits up,
Nor thought upon the past,
I quaff'd the sweet, the poisonous cup—
Oh, would it were the last!

Far, far away my footsteps roam,
In wild and hostile climes;
But these are better than the home
Polluted by thy crimes.

Farewell, for ever—oh, farewell,
Once dear and lovely!—Yet
I would, but cannot wish thee well!
Thought dares me to forget.

Fine Arts.

Assassination of L. S. Dentatus, painted by B. R. Haydon, drawn on Wood and engraved by his pupil, WILLIAM HARVEY.

It has been too much the fashion to speak very slightly of wood engravings. Mr. Harvey will, however, by this single performance, redeem that branch of the Fine Arts from neglect: for it is not only one of the largest, but is, on the whole, the finest wood engraving we ever saw.

The art of wood engraving, which is now beginning to be duly cultivated, and will be more so, when it is seen from this picture of how much it is capable, is much older than copper-plate engraving. The first engraving on wood, of which we have any record in Europe, is that of 'The Actions of Alexander,' by the two Cunio, which was executed about the year 1285. These were eight in number, of a good size, being about nine inches by six. In a frontispiece, decorated with fanciful ornaments, there is an inscription which states these engravings to have been by 'Alessandro Alberico Cunio Cavaliere and Isabella Cunio, twin brother and sister,' and that they were 'first executed in relief with a small knife, on blocks of wood made even and polished by this learned and dear sister; continued and finished by us together at Ravenna, from the eight pictures of our invention, painted at times larger than here represented; engraved, explained by verses, and thus marked upon the paper to perpetuate the number of them, and to enable us to present them to our relations and friends in testimony of gratitude, friendship, and affection. All this was done and finished by us when only sixteen years of age.'

Such was the origin of wood engraving; the art, thus early discovered, owed its greatest improvements to the Germans. Albert Durer, Scharschellen, Burgman, and other able masters of the German school drew the designs upon the blocks, and left the cutting to the ordinary engravers. The engravers of the present day seldom draw themselves, but get the designs executed upon the wood by some other artist. It was not so, however, with Mr. Harvey, who, we believe, was a pupil of the celebrated Bonick, of Newcastle—a name dear to the Fine Arts, and which is intimately connected with the history of wood engraving.

The original picture, one of the best painted by Mr. Haydon, is so well known and the subject so familiar to every reader, that we need not revert either to history or the merit of the painting. The drawing, from which the engraving has been executed, was made by Mr. Harvey himself, and we recollect it as one of the most exquisite we ever witnessed. All the spirit of the drawing, and, we had almost said, all the beauty of the original picture, have been transferred to the wood block, at least as closely as we conceive engraving of any kind can approach painting. The expression and anatomy are so excellent, and every varied texture, whether of flesh, air, fur, or metal, is so distinctly marked, that we are quite astonished at the art which approaches so near to reality.

This engraving, which places Mr. Harvey in the first rank of British artists, also places the British school of wood engraving above every other in the world.

Statue to the Memory of the Duke of Kent.

It will be recollected that soon after the death of that amiable member of our royal family, the Duke of Kent, a subscription was opened for the purpose of erecting a statue to his memory. This subscription amounted to 1300*l.*, and a committee was appointed to carry the object into execution. Several models were submitted to the committee, (for it was open to competition, and not the job of an artist,) and that by Sebastian Gabagan being most approved of, it was adopted. The statue is now nearly ready for public inspection. The duke appears in an erect posture, standing in his robes, underneath which the uniform of a field marshal is conspicuously blended. His Royal Highness leans on a pedestal. The right arm reclines on the Bible; the left supports the flowing drapery, underneath which appear the arms of the House of Guelf. The pedestal is composed of a pure block of Aberdeen granite. There is in the countenance a mingled expression of august dignity, pious awe, and chastened ecstacy, which gives an air of sublimity to the whole. No place is yet fixed upon for its erection; but it is supposed, that the crescent, at the top of Portland-place, will be the spot selected.

The Ladies' Monument to commemorate the Victories of the British Arms in the Peninsula.

* Who would fill a coward's grave when heroes are so distinguished that even ladies express their admiration, not merely as Desdemona did of the exploits of Othello, but in erecting splendid monuments to perpetuate their well-earned glories. It is now, we believe, about six or seven years since a very liberal subscription was raised by the ladies of Great Britain for this purpose; and the stupendous and magnificent work of art for which they contributed is now completed, and will shortly occupy the place of the 'Regent's Bomb' in St. James's Park.

The monument is a colossal statue, eighteen feet high, and is cast from cannon taken during the war. The original of the figure is on the Monte Cavallo; it is naked and in an attitude of defiance not unlike the gladiator. In the right hand is a Roman sword, and on the left arm an orbicular shield. A massive fold of drapery falls over the left arm; and behind the body of the statue on the right side is placed the cuirass and armour, about seven feet high, which is introduced for the purpose of balancing the height of the figure. The figure is not so muscular as the Hercules of Praxiteles, but it has the fulness and energy of youth. The statue weighs three tons, and has been executed by Mr. Richard Westmacott, R. A.

Such is the description (stripped of a few embellishments) given in some of the papers of the 'Ladies Monument.' Of its merits as a work of art we will not speak until we have seen it, which, we confess, we have not; but we shall make a few remarks on the propriety of habiting a British hero or a statue to commemorate British victories in a Roman costume. We admire the prowess and military talents of the Romans, but is there any thing more glorious in their whole history, in this respect, than Wellington and the band of heroes who fought with him in the Peninsula exhibited? Did Fabius evince more caution, or Caesar and Scipio overcome greater difficulties, or gain more glorious triumphs than the hero of Waterloo? Why, then, shall we erect a Roman statue to perpetuate a British triumph? The Greeks and Romans did better: the statues they erected in honour of their heroes portrayed not only the countenance but the national costume; and what was a laudable custom in ancient Greece and Rome, that of perpetuating their manners and their customs, is not unworthy of our imitation.

The antiquary, when searching the ruins of Herculaneum, of Pompeii, of Palmyra, of Athens, or of the splendid monuments of antiquity in Egypt, values every relic he finds, not so much for the mere stone or marble, or even for its age, but that it enables him to form a more correct opinion of the Romans, the Greeks, or the Egyptians;—the form it wears being some contribution towards illustrating the manners and customs of the people, the great object of his researches. Let us, by anticipation, transport ourselves to the year 2821, a thousand years hence. Every thing at present breathing in the world will then have returned to its primitive dust, and scarcely an existing establishment will rear its head. Let us picture to our imagination the curious (of God knows what people) searching in the dust for some relics, and, meeting with those of the present generation, they find the 'Ladies' Monument' to perpetuate British victories, mutilated sadly no doubt: What will be their opinion of our taste and their disappointment, when they find a British hero, not in the dress of his time—not in the dress of his country, but in the inappropriate habit of a Roman. The inscription may, perhaps, assure them for what it was intended, but they must condemn it as a strange instance of perverted taste, and rank us very differently from what we rank ourselves.

* They order these matters better in France.' The celebrated piece of sculpture, erected to the memory of General Desaix, who fell at Marengo, combines all the grace and expression of the Greek school, but in strict union with the French costume. We there see the brave Desaix as it were in the agonies of death, habited as he really died, and surrounded with the genuine emblems of his profession, and which, in future ages, will be doubly valuable for their fidelity. With us the case is different: in our public monument 'the voice [inscription] is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau.'

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Kean appeared in a new character, a circumstance which always attracts considerable interest among the lovers of the drama. It was that of De Montfort, in Mrs. Joanna Baillie's tragedy of that name. It is generally known that, many years ago, this lady wrote a series of dramas, not intended for the stage, entitled 'Plays on the Passions,' in which it was attempted to construct each play on some particular passion of the mind. That of De Montfort was founded on hatred, one of the most repulsive of all the passions. It is now, we believe, twenty-one years since this tragedy was tried on the stage, when the principal characters were sustained by Mr. Kemble and Mrs. Siddons; their talents carried it through a few nights; since which time De Montfort has been read and admired in the closet. It has now been re-modelled by the fair author herself, and produced a second time: of the policy of this we say little, though it might have suggested itself, that what failed in the hands of Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, was not likely to be very successful with Mr. Kean and Mrs. Egerton. It must, however, be admitted, that the character of De Montfort was not suited to the talents of Kemble; for although he was the 'noblest Roman of them all,' he was incapable of expressing sullen hate or undignified revenge, and such are the pictures of De Montfort's character. As it is long since the tragedy appeared, we shall give an outline of the story:—

The temper of De Montfort, which was naturally amiable, has been clouded and his health injured by an unaccountable hatred which he conceives against the Marquis Rezenvelt, (Mr. Cooper), a nobleman resident in the neighbourhood. Lady Jane, (Mrs. Egerton), De Montfort's sister, observed the dejected and changed character of her brother, without knowing the cause; but her affectionate kindness keeps his feelings under some restraint. De Montfort and Rezenvelt quarrel,—a duel ensues,—the former is disarmed by Rezenvelt, who, however, gives him his life, and afterwards they meet at a splendid fete given by Count Freberg, (Mr. Barnard.) Here Lady Jane mingles with the company, disguised under a veil. De Montfort not recognizing her, pays her particular attention, but afterwards discovers she is his sister, and confesses to her his hatred of Rezenvelt; a temporary reconciliation is effected; but De Montfort suspecting an attachment between his sister and Rezenvelt, his hatred revives with double force, and he secretly waylays and murders him, in the recesses of the forest. The murderer is seized and taken to a neighbouring convent, where Lady Jane and Freberg arrive, and witness his remorse and disgrace. The agony of De Montfort at last becomes too great for nature to sustain, and he expires by the side of his victim's corpse.

Although there is much vigorous and elegant language in this tragedy, yet we think its construction decidedly objectionable. In perceiving the diminutive seeds of hatred swelling till they extend to a base, foul, and unnatural murder, we seek for the cause; and what do we find? Why that Rezenvelt, a generous, gay, and amiable fellow, offended De Montfort when a school-boy; that in after life he became richer and more beloved; and that lastly, he twice gave this fiendish hero of a tragic tale, that life of which he had twice sought to derive his unoffending friend. There is now another reason for De Montfort's hate alluded to in the renovated tragedy, that of Rezenvelt having thwarted him in love, but this is merely glanced at; and for the first three acts of the play we consider him a pitiable maniac, in the two last an atrocious monster. Mrs. Inchbald has said, that the author's talents 'invest with dignity this cowardly assassin, and he inspires a sublime horror to the last moment of his existence.' We differ, however, with this excellent critic, and think the horrors terrific but not sublime. The acting of Mr. Kean in this character will add another ray to that glory with which his 'brows are crowned.' There were scenes in which he gave such an appalling picture of those baneful passions, hatred and revenge, that we feared to look upon him, and almost instinctively shrank with horror from the frightful spectacle. In the scene in which he sees his sister walking with Rezenvelt, and watches all his attentions towards her until he takes her hand, his passion works him into an absolute phrenzy; and when, burning with rage, he rushes on his victim and is disarmed by him, the mortified disappointment which he felt was depicted in a style which we thought beyond the reach of art; and was only equalled by the expression of fixed despair, remorse, and anguish, which he exhibited in the convent when left alone with the cold corpse of his murdered victim.

The character of Jane de Montfort, which is as amiable as that of her brother is repulsive, was played with much judgment by Mrs. Egerton. We have seen Cooper to more advantage than in Rezenvelt, for which he has scarcely sufficient buoyancy. The other characters were well sustained, and the play was extremely well received by a crowded audience; the acting of Kean during the performance being frequently interrupted by the loudest plaudits. The tragedy was repeated on Wednesday and Thursday with increased effect.

COVENT GARDEN.—Mr. Macready made his first appearance for the season at this theatre on Tuesday night, in Mr. Knowles' tragedy of Virginia. The return of this gentleman to the metropolis at a time when it is by no means rich in talent, is a subject of congratulation to the frequenters of the theatre; and he was welcomed, on his entry, with overwhelming applause.

The part of Virginius is one peculiarly suited to the powers of Mr. Macready; and, perhaps, he seldom exerted those powers more happily than on this evening. His pleadings before the consular throne, when urging his claims as the father of Virginia, were very energetic; and when Illicius, doubting that he would have the hardihood to stand the test of his claim to call Virginia daughter, exclaims, 'Sure he will not swear!' the tone and manner of the distracted father's reply—'To be sure he will!' electrified the house, and called down the most enthusiastic approbation. In the absence of Mr. Charles Kemble, who, we believe, has quitted this theatre for the Haymarket, Mr. Abbott assumed the part of Illicius, and, though certainly much inferior to his predecessor, exerted himself considerably, and, we had almost said, successfully; at all events, it would have been difficult to get a better representative of the character in the present company.—Mr. Young, who cannot play second, excepted, Mr. Foote was lovely as ever in Virginius, which is a character in which it always delights to see her.

The Two Gentlemen of Verona, converted into a sort of opera, like the Comedy of Errors, was produced at this theatre on Thursday evening, in a style of uncommon splendour. It is too late in the week for us to enter into details; but we may remark that the songs introduced are principally from the works of Shakespeare, and that the execution of them was entrusted to Miss M. Tree and Miss Hallande, who sustained the characters of Julia and Sylvia, and were warmly encored in several of the airs. John's Valentine was excellent, and Luston's Launce amusing but coarse. We had the aid of a large Newfoundland dog, 'Crab,' who played his part as well as the best of them. In the fourth act there is a great deal of rich and gorgeous scenery, representing the Carmina, the emblematical procession of the Seasons and the Elements, with Thetis and Cleopatra's galley, and the new Cydnus, and "all that." As a spectacle it was certainly excellent (it might have been a good substitute for a Christmas pantomime); but it was Mr. Farley's, and not Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona; it was, however, quite successful.

SURREY THEATRE.—On Wednesday night Miss Macaulay had a beautiful success at this house, which, owing to the nature of the evening, was not as well attended as her merits deserved. The play was George Barnwell, in which she supported the character of the infamous Millwood with great talent. Le petit Sotier, a melange which Miss Macauley has given with great success in other parts of the metropolis followed; and seemed to afford much gratification to the Surrey visitors.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—A new piece, from the pen of Mr. Mouchieff, was produced at this house, on Monday night, on a scale of magnificence which is seldom witnessed in a minor theatre. It is entitled Tom and Jerry, and is founded on Pierce Egan's Life in London, a work in high favour with 'the fancy.' The object of this piece is to represent, faithfully, the varied scenes which the metropolis presents; and this is done in twenty excellent scenes, exhibiting life in all its varieties, and 'showing the very age and ho of the time, its form and pressure.' The story is that of a young country gentleman, Squire Hawthorn, coming to London to see 'Life,' where his friends, Corinthian Tom and Bob Logic, take him to every place at which 'life' is to be seen, from Almack's down to the Noah's Ark in the Holy Land. The last scene presented a group of beggars, as well dressed for the purpose of exciting pity and operating on the feelings of the humane, as the Mendicity Society itself could collect: even the costume and the names of some of the most notorious of the London mendicants were preserved in this fac simile of a Beggar's Opera in St. Giles's. The scenery was excellent, and the performers exerted themselves with much spirit, particularly Wrench, Burroughs, and Wilkinson, the heroes of the piece; and Mrs. Baker and Mrs. Waylett, and Mrs. Hammersley, the heroines, assumed a variety of characters which they enacted very appropriately. Mr. Callaghan sustained, we believe, nine different characters, which, though extremely varied, he portrayed very happily. The house was crowded to excess before the rising of the curtain, and the piece is likely to prove a great favourite.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—A new melodrama of extravagant but powerful interest, was produced at this theatre on Monday night: it is called Le Solitaire, or The Recluse of the Alps, and is adapted from a French piece now performing at Paris with great success; it is indebted for its English dress to Mr. Planché. The following is an outline of the story:—

Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, struck with remorse for the crime of murder, of which he had been guilty, determines to retire altogether from society, and, by a life of solitude and repentance, to endeavour to atone for his misdeeds; and he suddenly leaves his court, and takes up his abode in a lonely cottage on the summit of a portion of the Alps, called the Desert Mountain. Here he assumes the garb and habits of a recluse, but occasionally visits the poor inhabitants of the valley, alleviating their distresses and dispensing good to all, always, however, appearing closely disguised, and seldom exchanging a word with them. In this valley is situate the Priory of Underlach, the seat of D'Hertall, with whom is residing his niece, Eloise, the orphan child of St. Maur, who had been murdered by the Solitary. The fame of the Solitary has reached the priory, and his many acts of benevolence have already excited a strong interest in the mind of the fair Eloise; and he, having had opportunities of seeing her in her walks, is inspired with the strongest passion, but, conscious that his crimes preclude the possibility of a union, he resolves to watch over and protect her with the solicitude of a guardian angel. At this time, the Count de Palzo, an ambitious intriguing libertine, sees Eloise, becomes enamoured of her, and having obtained permission of the baron to rest a day or two at the priory, he employs his confidant, Michelli, and others of his vassals, to carry her off. The plan, however, is thwarted by the Solitary, who rescues her from the ruffians, and drives Michelli to the Desert Mountain, where he extorts from him all the villainous secrets of his master, with which he acquaints Eloise. De Palzo then asks Eloise in marriage, but she rejects him, and in an interview in the gardens of the priory, she discloses her knowledge of his secrets, at which he becomes furious, and is about to stab her, when she is again preserved by the intervention of the Solitary, who declares his passion to Eloise, and obtains an acknowledgment that it is reciprocal. Still the dreadful obstacles which his crimes present, rush upon his mind, and, after a powerful struggle, he resolves to leave her for ever, now that he has secured her from danger; and he accordingly returns to the mountain. De Palzo, meanwhile, attacks and fires the priory, and D'Hertall and Eloise escape to the Desert Mountain, where the Solitary ventures to solicit her in marriage; D'Hertall demands as a preliminary, that the Solitary should disclose his name and quality; the latter raises his vizor, and the Baron with horror discovers in the sutor of his niece, the seducer of his own child and the murderer of his brother. The Duke solicits forgiveness, but in vain: the Baron imprecates the heaviest curses upon his head. The discovery is too much for the tender-hearted Eloise; a death-chill comes over her, and she dies in the arms of the Duke.

From this sketch it will be seen that the piece abounds with striking situations, and with incidents of a powerfully interesting nature. Mr. H. Johnston, who made his first appearance at this theatre in the character of the Recluse, portrayed the conflicting passions which agitate the soul of Charles the Bold with great feeling, and Miss S. Booth made a powerful impression on the sympathies of the audience in her delineation of the feelings and emotions of the amiable and interesting, but ill-fated Eloise. Mr. Power was excellent in the Baron, particularly in the last scene.

The scenery deserves much praise, particularly the Summit of the Desert Mountain by moonlight, and a Mountainous Pass, with a distant View of the Devil's Bridge.

Singular Proof of the Efficacy of Soot in the Preservation of Animal Matter.—A short time since, on the removal of a board in the interior of a chimney in a gentleman's drawing-room in York, a pigeon was found that had been missing nearly five months. Its body had become quite hard, and the feathers so firmly attached to it, that, with the addition of a pair of glass eyes, it would have equalled almost any preservation in the finest collection of the feathered tribe.

Galvanic Phenomena.—The body of George Thom, who was executed at Aberdeen, last week, having, agreeably to his sentence, been given for dissection to Drs. Skene and Ewing, was subjected to a series of galvanic experiments, of which, with their results, we subjoin the following brief account:

The body was brought into the dissecting-room, about an hour after suspension, and still retained nearly its natural heat. The upper part of the spinal cord and the sciatic nerve were immediately laid bare, and a galvanic arc was then established, by applying the positive wire to the spine, and the negative to the Sciatic nerve when a general convulsive starting of the body was produced. Another communication was then made between the spine and the ulnar nerve, and considerable contractions took place in the arm and fore-arm. When the circle was formed with the spine and radial nerve, both at the elbow and wrist successively, powerful contractions of the muscles of the whole arm and hand were produced. The hand was closed with such violence, as to resist the exertions of one of the assistants to keep it open. When a connexion was established between the radial nerve and the supra and infra orbital nerves, strong contractions of the muscles of the brow, face, and mouth were produced, so as to affect the under jaw, and to distort the countenance in a very singular manner. The eye-lids were strongly contracted; and when the wire was applied directly to the ball of the eye, the iris contracted and dilated very sensibly. A galvanic circle being formed, first between the par vagum and diaphragm, and then between that muscle and the great sympathetic, little obvious effect was produced. After applying galvanism directly to the nerves above-mentioned, the skin of the face was moistened with water, and, upon running the wire over different parts of it, similar effects were produced in the muscles of the face, as by direct communication made with the nerves. The tongue also moved in all directions, by touching the surface with the galvanic wire. The whole experiments were performed in about an hour and a quarter, when the heat of the body was considerably diminished. A powerful galvanic apparatus (consisting of about 300 pair of plates) was used; but, from not being insulated, a considerable quantity of the galvanism escaped, so that every metallic substance about the table was highly charged.

LUCRETIVS.

Specimen of the pun annoying:—Oxbery, in life in London, gets a box-o'-the-ear, upon which he exclaims—'Now am I a pickled donkey; I am ass-salted.'

One of his Majesty's frigates, I forget her name, being at anchor on a winter's night in a tremendous gale of wind, the ground broke and she began to drive. The lieutenant of the watch ran down to the captain, awoke him from his sleep, and told him the anchor had come home;—'Well,' cried the captain, rubbing his eyes, 'I think our anchor is perfectly right, for who the devil would stay out in such a night as this.'—Sam Spritsail.

Thesaurus relates, in his history, that at the siege of Groningen, in 1594, at the moment when the besiegers were ready to fire a cannon, and had applied the match, a ball fired from the garrison entered the mouth of the cannon, and, without doing any mischief, was re-discharged from the cannon which it had entered!

In the 7th year of the reign of William the Third, there was a tax of 30l. upon the birth of a duke, and two shillings upon that of a common person; for the burial of a duke 50l.—a common person four shillings.

French Modesty.—It is related by a Latin historian, (says the editor of a Paris paper) that in every one of the great exploits which added to the lustre of the Roman arms, a Gaul has always been present. In spite of the partizans who would degrade this race, it is evident that we have not degenerated.—We can with pride affirm, that Frenchmen have been found in all places where dangers were to be encountered, or glory gained. It is to French refugees that the inhabitants of New Orleans attribute the honour of the victory which they gained over the English. They were Frenchmen who assisted in gaining the battle that insured the independence of Chili.—There was also a Frenchman in that glorious and sacred battalion which was exterminated by the Turks, after it had made them purchase their shameful victory at so dear a rate. His name was Bordinier, and he died on the field of battle, after performing prodigies of valour. At that time fortune was not favourable to the ranks which contained a child of France. But men, who so often conquer, are worthy of dying at Thermopylae.

Carolina Criminal Code.—At a sessions in Charlston, J. Hutton, for killing a Negro, was fined 50l. and G. Burrows and R. Welch, for Negro stealing, were sentenced to be hanged!

Anecdote.—In the hard frost in the year 1740, the Company of Vintners bought a large ox in Smithfield, to be roasted on the ice, on the river Thames. Mr. Hodgeson, a butcher in Saint James's Market, claimed the privilege of knocking down the beast, as a right inherent in his family, his father having knocked down the ox roasted on the river in the great frost 1684, and as he himself did that roasted in 1715, near Hungerford Stairs. The beast was fixed to a stake in the open market, and Mr. Hodgeson was dressed in a rich laced cambric apron, a silver steel, and a hat and feather, to perform his office!

At a sale of farming stock in Gloucestershire, the auctioneer gave the following poetical and extempore description of a beautiful cow:—

Long in her sides,—bright in her eyes,
Short in her legs,—thin in her thighs,
Big in her ribs,—wide in her ribs;
Full in her bosom,—small in her skin;
Long in her face,—fine in her tail,—
And never deficient in filling the pail.

Review of New Books.

Illustrations of Biblical Literature; exhibiting the History and Fate of the Sacred Writings, from the earliest Period to the present Century; including Biographical Notices of Translators and other Eminent Biblical Scholars. By the Rev. James Townley, Author of Biblical Anecdotes. 3 vols. 8vo. pp. 1606. London, 1821.

NUMEROUS as the bibliographical and historical works are, in which the different versions of the Scriptures, their multiplied editions, and general history have been expressly considered or incidentally noticed, yet we do not recollect any that embraces so extensive, or we might add, so able a view of the subject as the work now before us. Though Mr. Townley is a clever investigator of biblical antiquities, and displays a research, deep, patient, and acute, yet his work is not merely a dry collection of facts, fit only for the studious, but it possesses a general interest, likely to rivet the attention of the desultory reader.

Mr. Townley, who was already favourably known to the public by his 'Biblical Anecdotes,' has, in the present work, given a connected view of the history of biblical translations, and of the state of sacred literature from the earliest date to the commencement of the present century, with such occasional sketches of the manners and superstitions of the earlier ages, as serve to illustrate the advantages derivable from a more general dissemination of the Sacred Writings.

In the first part of the work, which contains the history of biblical literature 'from the giving of the law to the birth of Christ,' we have a most erudite and interesting account of the origin of writing, and the materials used at various periods and in different countries for that purpose. Mr. Townley does not think letters of merely human invention, but that Moses was instructed in the knowledge of alphabetical characters by divine revelation. He thinks that the Hebrew, the Samaritan, the Syriac, and the Greek alphabets, have had but one author, and that the Samaritan is the oldest, its ancient characters being those originally in use among the Hebrews. In this character he supposes the Decalogue to have been inscribed on the tables of stone, and that it was continued in use among the Jews until the time of Ezra, when the Chaldee or present Hebrew characters was adopted. After noticing the engraving of the Decalogue on stone, by the order of Moses, and similar species of record since adopted,—as the celebrated laws of the Twelve Tables among the Romans, the engraving of laws on tables of brass, by the Greeks, &c. Mr. Townley thus traces the progress of writing:—

'According to Pliny, one of the most ancient methods of writing was upon the leaves of the palm tree, and afterwards upon the inner bark of trees. This mode of writing is still common in the east. In Tanjore and other parts of India, the Palmyra leaf is used, on which they engrave with an iron style or pen; and so expert are the natives, that they can write fluently what is spoken deliberately. They do not look much at their ollas, or leaves, while writing, the fibre of the leaf serving to guide the pen. The aptitude of the Christian Hindoos to copy the sermons they hear, is particularly noticed by the Rev. Dr. C. Buchanan, in his Christian Researches, p. 66, where he observes, that "whilst the Rev. Dr. John delivered an animated discourse in the Tamul tongue, many persons had their ollas in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamul shorthand." Dr. Francis Buchanan, in a valuable essay "on the religion and literature of the Burmas," informs us, that "in their more elegant books, the Burmas write on sheets of ivory, or on very fine white palmyra leaves. The ivory is stained black, and the margins are ornamented with gilding, while the characters are enamelled or gilded. On the palmyra leaves the characters are in general of black enamel, and the ends of the leaves and margins are painted with flowers in various bright colours. In their more common books, the Burmas, with an iron style, engrave their writing on palmyra leaves. A hole through both ends of each leaf serves to connect the whole into a volume, by means of two strings, which also pass through the two wooden boards that serve for binding. In the finer binding of these kinds of books, the boards are lacquered, the edges of the leaves cut smooth and gilded, and the title is written on the upper board; the two cords are, by a knot or jewel, secured at a little distance from the boards, so as to prevent the book from falling to pieces, but sufficiently distant to admit of the upper leaves being turned back, while the lower ones are read. The more elegant books are in general wrapped up in silk cloth, and bound round by a garter, in which the Burmas have the art to weave the title of the book."

'A beautifully written Indian manuscript now lies before me. The characters are minute and neatly executed. They have been written or engraved so as to enter into the substance of the leaf. The ink is black. The whole is composed of seven distinct portions of leaf, each portion being 10½ inches in length and 1½ inch in breadth, the lines running parallel to each other from end to end of the leaf. Two holes are made in each leaf about six inches asunder. A string passed through the holes at each end, secures the whole; but the leaves being written on both sides, must be untied before they can be read.

'The Ceylonese sometimes make use of the palm-leaf, and sometimes of a kind of paper, made of bark, but most generally employ the leaf of the Talipot-tree. From these leaves, which are of immense size, they cut out slips, from a foot to a foot and a half long, and about a couple of inches broad. These slips are smoothed, and all excrescences paired off with a knife, and are then, without any other preparation, ready to be used. A fine pointed steel pencil, like a bodkin, and set in a wooden or ivory handle, is employed to write or rather to engrave their letters on these talipot slips, which are very thick and tough; and in order to render the writing distinct and permanent, they rub them over with oil mixed with pulverized charcoal. They afterwards string several slips together, by a piece of twine passed through them, and attach them to a board in the same way as we file newspapers. In those letters or dispatches which were sent by the King of Candy to the Dutch government, the writing was inclosed in leaves of beaten gold, in the shape of a cocoa-tree leaf. This was rolled up in a cover richly ornament, and almost hid in a profusion of pearls and other precious stones. The whole was inclosed in a box of silver or ivory, which was sealed with the king's great seal.

Diogenes Siculus affirms, that the Persians of old wrote all their records on skins; and Herodotus, who flourished more than five hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, informs us, that sheep skins and goat skins were made use of in writing by the ancient Ionians. Mr. Yeates even thinks it exceedingly probable, that the very autograph of the Law written by the hand of Moses, was upon prepared skins. In Exodus xxvi. 14. we read that rams' skins, dyed red, made part of the covering for the tabernacle; and it is a singular circumstance, that in the year 1806, Dr. Claudius Buchanan obtained from one of the synagogues of the black Jews, in the interior of Malaya, in India, a very ancient manuscript roll, containing the major part of the Hebrew Scriptures, written upon goats' skin, mostly dyed red; and the Cabul Jews, who travel annually into the interior of China, remarked that, in some synagogues, the Law is still found written on a roll of leather, not on vellum, but on a soft flexible leather made of goats' skins, and dyed red. Of the six synagogue copies of the Pentateuch in rolls, which are all at present known in England, exclusive of those in the possession of the Jews, five are upon skins or leather, and the other upon vellum. One of these is in the Collegiate Library at Manchester, and has never been collated. It is written upon baal, or brown African skins, and measures in length one hundred and six feet, and is about twenty inches in breadth. The letters are black and well preserved, and the whole text is without points, accents, or marginal additions.

The skins of fishes were also sometimes employed for writing upon; and Zonaras relates, that the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer were written upon the intestines of a serpent, in characters of gold, forming a roll one hundred feet in length. This singular work is said to have been consumed in the dreadful fire which happened at Constantinople in the fifth century, and destroyed nearly the whole city, together with the library, containing twenty thousand volumes.

From Job xix. 24, it appears to have been usual in his day, to write or engrave upon plates of lead, which might easily be done with a pen or graver or style of iron, or other hard metal. Montfaucon assures us, that in 1699, he bought, at Rome, a book entirely of lead, about four inches long by three inches wide. Not only the two pieces which formed the cover, but also all the leaves, in number six, the stick inserted into the rings which held the leaves together, the hinges, and the nails, were all of lead, without exception. It contained Egyptian Gnostic figures and unintelligible writing.

The Works and Days of Hesiod are also said to have been inscribed on a lead table, carefully preserved in the Temple of the Muses, which, when shewn to Pausanias, was almost entirely corroded through age. According to Pliny, the public documents were written in leaden volumes after the use of the puggillares, or wooden tablets, had been laid aside. Thin plates of lead, reduced to a very great degree of tenacity by the mallet, were occasionally used, particularly for epistolary correspondence. Enes Poliorceticus tells us, that they were beaten with a hammer until they were rendered very thin and pliable; that they were sometimes sewed up between the soles of the shoes; that even the messenger who carried them was ignorant of the circumstance; and that while he slept, the correspondent to whom they were addressed unsewed the shoes, read the letters, replaced others, and thus carried on a secret intercourse without suspicion.

It was also an ancient practice to write upon thin smooth planks, or tables of wood. Pliny says that table-books of wood were in use before the time of Homer. The Chinese, before the invention of paper, engraved with an iron tool upon thin boards, or upon bamboo; and in the Sloanian Library at Oxford, are six specimens of Kufic, or ancient Arabic writing, on boards about two feet in length and six inches in depth.

The original manner of writing among the ancient Britons was by cutting the letters with a knife upon sticks, which were most commonly squared, and sometimes formed into three sides; consequently, a single stick contained either four or three lines. (See Ezek. xxxvii. 16.) Several sticks, with writing upon them, were put together, forming a kind of frame, which was called Peithyen, or Elucidator, and was so constructed that each stick might be turned for the facility of reading, the end of each running out alternately on both sides of the frame. A continuation of this mode of writing may be found in the Runic, or Log Almanacks of the Northern States of Europe, in which the engraving on square pieces of wood has been continued to the present time. A late writer informs us, the Boors of Æsel, an island of the Baltic Sea, at the entrance of the Gulph of Livonia, continue the practice of making these rude calendars for themselves; and that they are in use likewise in the Isles of Ruhn and Mohn. Two curious specimens of the Runic Almanacks are in the Collegiate Library at Manchester.

Bishop Nicholson, in his English Historical Library, remarks,—“The Danes (as all other ancient people of the world) registered their more considerable transactions upon rocks, or on parts of them hewn into various shapes and figures. On these they engraved such inscriptions as were proper for their heathen altars, triumphal arches, sepulchral monuments, and genealogical histories of their ancestors. Their writings of less concern, as letters, almanacks, &c. were engraved upon wood; and because Berch was not plentiful in Denmark, (though Fir and Oak he so in Norway and Sweden) and most commonly employed in these services, from the word bog, which, in their language, is the name of that sort of wood; they and all other northern nations have the name of book. The poorer sort used bark, and the horns of rein-deer and elk were often finely polished, and shaped into books of several leaves. Many of their old calendars are likewise upon bones of beasts and fishes; but the inscriptions on tapestry, bells, parchment, and paper, are of later use.”

A singular custom still prevails at Pamber, near Basingstoke, in Hampshire. The court-leet holden annually for that manor, is opened rud die, in a small piece of ground called Lady-Mead, which belongs to the tithingman for the year. Thence an adjournment is made to a neighbouring public-house. The proceedings of the court are recorded on a piece of wood, called a tally, about three feet long, and an inch and a half square, furnished every year by the steward. One of these singular records, was some time ago produced in evidence in a law-suit at Winchester. The mode of keeping accounts by tallies, or clef pieces of wood, in which the notches are cut on one piece conformably to the other, one part being kept by the creditor, the other by the debtor, is still practised in many parts of England, in particular cases. A tally continues to be given by the Exchequer, to those who pay money there upon loans; hence the origin of the teller, or tally-writer of the Exchequer; and also of the phrase—to tally, to fit, to suit, or answer exactly.

The Scythians also conveyed their ideas by marking or cutting certain figures and a variety of lines upon splinters or billets of wood; and amongst the Lacedæmonians, the scytale lacemonia, which they made use of to write their secret letters. In the Apocrypha, (2 *Esdra*s, xiv. 24, 31, 44) we read of a considerable number, i. e. two hundred and four books being made of box-wood, and written upon in the official by certain swift writers. Aulus Gellius (lib. ii. c. 12) says, that the ancient laws of Solon, preserved at Athens, were cut in tablets of wood, and denominated axones. These were quadrangular, and so contrived as to turn on axes, and to present their contents on all sides to the eyes of the passers. The laws on those wooden tables, as well as those on stone, were inscribed after the manner called boustrophædon; that is, the first line beginning from right to left, or from left to right, and the second in an opposite direction, as ploughmen trace their furrows.

A similar mode of writing was in use among the ancient Irish, by which it was called Cionn-fa-dia. [From disused by the Greeks about four hundred and fifty-seven years before the Christian era, but the Irish retained it to a much later period. Mr. Townley is of opinion, that several of the prophets wrote upon tablets of wood:—

"In the year 483, during the reign of the Emperor Zeno, the remains of St. Barnabas are said to have been found near Salamis, with a copy of the Gospel of St. Matthew, in Hebrew, laid upon his breast, written with his own hand, upon leaves of thyme-wood, a kind of wood particularly odoriferous and valuable. (Suid. Lex. v. Θύμιν) Tablets of this kind were generally covered with wax, sometimes also with chalk or plaster; and written upon with styles or bodkins. In epistolary correspondence, they were tied together with thread, and the seal put upon the knot. These tablets, when collected and fastened together, composed a book called codex or caudex, i. e. a trunk, from its resemblance to the trunk of a tree, sawed into planks; but when they consisted of only two leaves, they were termed libri diptychi.

"Waxen tablets continued to be occasionally used till a very late period. Du Cange cites the following lines from a French Medieval Romance, written about A. D. 1376:—

"Les uns se prennent à écrire,
Des gressés en tables de cire;
Les autres suivent la coutume
De former lettres à la plume.

Some with the antiquated style;
On waxen tablets promptly write;
Others, with finer pen, the while Form letters lovelier to the sight."

"There are many ample and authentic records of the royal household of France, of the 13th and 14th centuries, still preserved, written on waxen tablets. In the religious houses in France, they were constantly kept for temporary notation, and for registering the capitular acts of the monasteries. Specimens of wooden tables, filled up with wax, and constructed in the fourteenth century, were formerly preserved in several of the monastic libraries. Some of these contained the household expenses of the sovereigns, &c. and consisted of as many as twenty pages, formed into a book by means of parchment bands glued to the backs of the leaves. One remaining in the Abbey of St. Germaine Des-prés, at Paris, recorded the expenses of Philip le Bel, during a journey that he made in the year 1307, on a visit to Pope Clement V: a single leaf of this table-book is exhibited in the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 468. Amongst the monks of St. Victor, of Paris, where the rule of silence was rigorously observed, certain signs were enjoined, to prevent the necessity of speaking; Du Cange, (v. Signa.) notices many of them, and among others, those by which they asked for the style and tablet. In an account-roll of Winchester College, for the year 1395, there is an article of disbursement, for a tablet covered with green wax, to be kept in the chapel for noting down with a style, the respective courses of duty alternately assigned to the officers of the choir. Shakespeare alludes to this mode of writing, in his "Timon of Athens:—

"— My free drift
Hails not particularly, but moves itself
In a wide sea of wax."

"Even so late as A. D. 1718, several of the collegiate bodies in France, especially the chapter of the Cathedral of Rouen, retained these tablets, for the purpose of marking the successive rotation of the ministers of the choir.

"Tables, or table-books, were sometimes made of state, in the form of a small portable book, with leaves and clasps. Such a one is engraved in Gesner's treatise De Rerum Fossilibus Figuris, &c. Tigur, 1565, 12mo. and copied by Douce, in his illustrations of Shakespeare, vol. ii. p. 227. The learned author thus describes it:—"Pugillaris è laminis saxi nigri fissilibus, cum stylo ex eodem. A table-book made of thin plates of black stone, with a style of the same material."

"By a law among the Romans, the edits of the senate were directed to be written on tablets of ivory, thence denominated libri elephanti. And Pliny, (lib. viii. ch. iii.) says, that from want of the teeth of the elephant, which are alone of ivory, they had lately begun to saw the bones of that animal.

"Dr. Shaw, (Travels, p. 194.) informs us, that in Barbary, the children who are sent to school write on a smooth thin board, slightly daubed over with whitening, which may be wiped off or renewed at pleasure, and thus learn to read, to write, and get their lessons by heart, all at the same time. The Copts, who are employed by the great men of Egypt, in keeping their accounts, &c. make use of a sort of pasteboard for that purpose, from which the writing is occasionally wiped off with a wet sponge. References to a similar mode of writing are frequent in Scripture: see particularly Numbers, v. 23; Nehemiah, xiii. 14. et al. In India, it has been the practice from time immemorial, to teach children to read by writing in sand; and from thence are derived some parts of the present Madras and Lancasterian systems of instruction, practised by the Rev. Dr. Bell and Mr. Lancaster."

"When the ancient Egyptians designed their writings to last, they used linen rags; several specimens of which are preserved in the British Museum, and other depositories of antiquities:—

"The bark of trees is another material which has been employed in every age and quarter of the globe; and was called Xylocharton, by the Greeks. Before the use of the papyrus became general, the bark of the phylira, a species of the linden tree, was frequently made use of for writing upon; and books written on it existed in the third century. The bark of oak was also used for the same purpose. Hence the Latins called a book liber, which signifies the inner bark of a tree; and the Greeks used the word Φλοιός (Phloios), which also means bark.

"The use of bark for this purpose still prevails in some parts of Asia; thus the sacred books of the Burmans are sometimes composed of thin stripes of bamboo, delicately plaited, and varnished over in such a manner as to form a smooth and hard surface upon a leaf of any dimensions: this surface is afterwards gilt, and the sacred letters are traced upon it in black and shining japan; the margin is illuminated by wreaths and figures of gold on a red, green, or black ground. The Battas also, one of the nations who inhabit the island of Sumatra, form their books of the inner bark of a certain tree; one of which, in the Batta character, is in the Sloanian Library, (No. 4726.) written in perpendicular columns, on a long piece of bark, folded up so as to represent a book.

"Of the several kinds of PAPER, used at different periods, and manufactured from various materials, the Egyptian is unquestionably the most ancient. The exact date of its discovery is unknown; and even the place where it was first made is matter of dispute. According to Isidore, it was first made at Memphis; and, according to others, in Seide, or Upper Egypt. It was manufactured from the inner films of the papyrus or biblos, a sort of flag or bulrush, growing in the marshes of Egypt. The outer skin being taken off, there are next several films or inner skins, one within another. These, when separated from the stalk, were laid on a table, and moistened with the glutinous waters of the Nile. They were afterwards pressed together, and dried in the sun.

From this papyrus it is, that what we now make use of to write upon hath also the name of papyrus, or paper; though of quite another nature from the ancient papyrus. Bruce, the well-known Abyssinian traveller, had in his possession a large and very perfect manuscript on papyrus, which had been dug up at Thebes, and which he believed to be the only perfect one known. "The boards," or covers for binding the leaves, "are," says he, "of papyrus root, covered first with the coarse pieces of the paper; and then with leather, in the same manner as it would be done now. It is a book one would call a small folio, rather than by any other name. The letters are strong, deep, black, and apparently written with a reed, as is practised by the Egyptians and Abyssinians still. It is written on both sides. I gave Dr. Woide leave to translate it, at Lord North's request; it is a Gnostic book, full of their dreams." The form of the book, in Mr. Bruce's possession, appears to be different from that in general use among the ancient Egyptians, for Pliny (Lib. xiii. ch. xxiii.) affirms, that the books made of papyrus were usually rolled up; and that every such roll consisted of an indefinite number of sheets, which were fastened together by glue, care being taken always to place the best sheet of papyrus first, that which was next in superiority second, and so in gradation to the last, which was the worst sheet in the roll. This practice is confirmed by an ancient Egyptian MS. taken from a mummy at Thebes, and preserved in the British Museum, which, before it was expanded in the manner in which it is now seen, was closely rolled up; and which, if held up to the light, will be perceived to have the first sheet composed of a much finer piece of papyrus, than any of the succeeding sheets. Manuscripts of this kind are by far the most ancient manuscripts which have reached our times. The few which have been found have been observed to lie close to the embalmed figure, underneath the resin and bandages, which have been employed to envelope the body. The mummies of distinguished persons, are said to be seldom without one of these rolls; and no mummy has been known to contain more than two.

Many manuscripts, written upon papyrus, have been found in the ruins of Herculaneum, which was destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, A. D. 79. The manuscripts thus obtained are completely calcined, though by incredible labour and patience, fragments of some of them have been unrolled and copied.

Paper made of bark, is said to have been anciently used for the Imperial Protocols, in order to render the forging of false diplomas more difficult. Montfaucon notices a diploma, or charter, written on bark, in the Longobardic character, about the beginning of the eighth century, preserved in the library of Antony Capello, a Senator of Florence. It is a judgment given at Reate, about Guardianship. The parties contending are either Goths, or, as is more likely, Lombards; the judges are Romans. It is remarkable, that the date was originally inserted in it; but has been defaced by a mouse gnawing it, as it lay rolled up: it is, however, one of the first charters in which the Christian computation has been used. The Chinese generally make their paper from the bark of the bamboo and other trees; but occasionally manufacture it from other substances, as hemp, wheat, or rice straw, the cocoons of silk-worms, and even old paper. The Rev. Robert Morrison, an English Protestant Missionary in China, sent out by the London Missionary Society in 1810, has translated into the Chinese language several portions of the Old and New Testament, some of which, beautifully printed on paper of Chinese manufacture, have been transmitted to England.

The Japanese make an exceedingly strong paper from the morus papyrifera sativa, or true paper-tree, by the Japanese called kaadui. Several other eastern nations employ bark also, in the manufacture of paper.

A kind of paper has also been lately made of the shavings of leather. A sheet of it now lies before me, of a reddish yellow or orange colour; it is exceedingly tough, and will bear ink, but is rather greasy to the pen.

According to Montfaucon, charta bombycina or cotton-paper, was discovered towards the end of the ninth, or early in the tenth century. Casiri states paper to have been first manufactured in Bucharra; and that the Arabs ascribe its invention to Joseph Amru, in the year of the Hegira 88, of Christ 706. Other learned men have thought, that we are indebted for it to the Chinese, from whom it passed successively to the Indians, Persians, and Arabs; and by the latter was communicated to the western nations. The manufacture of cotton-paper is said to be still carried on to a considerable extent in the Levant.

Paper, fabricated from linen rags, is now used throughout Europe, and almost every part of the world whither Europeans have penetrated; and is a much more valuable material for writing upon than the cotton-paper. We are ignorant both of the inventor and of the date of this important discovery. Dr. Prideaux delivers it as his opinion, that linen-paper was brought from the east, because many of the oriental manuscripts are written upon it. Mabillon believes its invention to have been in the twelfth century. One of the earliest specimens of paper from linen rags, which has yet been discovered, is that in the possession of Pestel, Professor in the University of Rinteln, in Germany. It is a document, with the seal preserved, dated A. D. 1239; and signed by Adolphus, Count of Schaumburg. But Casiri positively affirms, that there are many MSS. in the Escorial, both upon cotton and linen-paper, written prior to the thirteenth century. This invention appears to have been very early introduced into England; for Dr. Prideaux assures us, he has seen a register of some acts of John Cranden, Prior of Ely, made on linen paper, which bears date in the fourteenth year of King Edward II. A. D. 1320; and in the Cottonian Library are said to be several writings on this kind of paper, as early as the year 1335. The first paper-mill erected in this kingdom is said to have been at Dartford, in 1588, by M. Spilman, a German. Shakespeare, however, refers it to the reign of Henry VI. and makes Jack Cade (Henry VI. pt. ii.) say, in accusation of Lord Sandys, "whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used, and contrary to the king, his crown, and dignity, thou hast built a paper-mill." During the same reign, the head of the Duke of York, with a paper crown upon it, was placed on the walls of the city of York.

But, although paper made from linen-rags, is preferable to most other materials for writing upon, it is, nevertheless, inferior to parchment or vellum.

We now proceed to the other materials used in writing, enumerated by Mr. Townley:—

Our Saxon ancestors appear to have sometimes used the Style without ink, when writing upon parchment or vellum, but for writing with ink or coloured liquids, reeds or canes, and afterwards quills, were employed, and sometimes pencils made of hair.

The most beautiful reeds for this purpose grew formerly in Egypt, near Crocodus, a city and district in the province of Caria, in Asia Minor, and likewise in Armenia and Italy. Chardin speaks of reeds which grow in the marshes of Persia, and are much sought after in the Levant.—"Their writing pens," says he, "are made of reeds or small hard canes, of the size of the largest swan quills, which they cut and slit in the same manner as we do ours, but they give them a much longer nib." The Tartars and Indians still write with small reeds, bearing the hand exceeding lightly.

Pencils made of hair are used by the Chinese for their writings; they first dip their ink, and then dip their pencils into it. The curious large capital letters used in Italy, in the decline of the Roman empire, and until the sixteenth century, were made with hair pencils. After the invention of printing, they were drawn by the illuminators.

Quills of geese, swans, pelicans, peacocks, crows, and other birds, have been long used in these western parts, but the exact date of their introduction is uncertain. St. Jafidore of Seville, who died in 636, describes a pen as in use in his time. "The instruments necessary for a scribe are the reed and the pen." In the same century, Aldhelm wrote a short poem on a writing pen. In the eighth century, writing pens are mentioned by Alcuin, after which period, proofs of their use occur so frequently as to place the matter beyond all doubt. Mabillon saw a MS. of the Gospel, which had been written in letters of gold, in the ninth century, in which the four Evangelists were represented with quills in their hands. In the twelfth century, Peter de Clugery, who, by scholastic writers, is called the Feu-able, and who died in 1157, wrote to a friend, exhorting him to use the pen instead of the plough, and transcribe the Scriptures instead of tilling land.

The use of inks or coloured liquids was early known among the ancients. Jeremiah, who flourished about five centuries before the Christian era, speaks of writing with ink, which then, as now, was black, though afterwards coloured inks have been occasionally used.

Notwithstanding the length to which our extracts have been extended, Mr. Townley's work contains so much that is valuable, we shall resume it next week.

The Author of Junius discovered, in the Person of the celebrated Earl of Chesterfield. 8vo. pp. 124. London, 1821.

As to who was the author of Junius's Letters, we suspect the public is now almost 'weary of conjecture,' especially such portion of it as have read the various pretensions that have been set up in behalf of Charles Lloyd, Samuel Dyer, John Roberts, William Gerard Hamilton, Mr. Burke, Dr. Butler, (late Bishop of Hereford,) the Rev. Philip Rozenhagen, John Wilkes, General Lee, Dunning Lord Ashburton, the Earl of Chatham, Henry Flood, Hugh Boyd, Lord George Sackville, Glover, (the author of Leonidas), the Earl of Shelburne, (afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne,) the late Duke of Portland, Horne Tooke, De Lolme, Dr. Wilmot, Sir Philip Francis, and several others.

The claims of all these lords and gentlemen, with the exception of the last seven, (which have since been preferred,) have been very satisfactorily set at rest by Mr. Woodfall, the son of the faithful publisher of these extraordinary letters, with the exception of that of the Earl of Chatham, against whom the evidence is not so decisive. As to Horne Tooke, the principal reason for supposing him the author is, that Junius, who triumphed over every other antagonist, left Tooke in possession of the field. To believe that these truly English letters were the production of a Frenchman, is a species of insanity of which we should not even have suspected the champion of De Lolme. The claim of Dr. Wilmot rests on very questionable authority, the vox et preterea nihil of Mrs. Oliver Wilmot Serres, alias the soi-disant Princess of Cumberland.

As to Sir Philip Francis, we confess that such a claim of circumstantial evidence was adduced, as would render it extremely difficult to believe that he was not the author of 'Junius's Letters,' had it not been met by a denial from himself, which we cannot consider equivocal, as well as the improbability that if he really was the author, there could now be any motive for concealing it.

The new claimant for the vacant honour of being one of the ablest political writers that ever wielded the pen, is the celebrated Earl of Chesterfield. To us it appears a most unhappy one, for few persons differed more either in character or style than the Earl of Chesterfield and Junius, and notwithstanding the comparison of dates, some trivial coincidences, and forced illustration by parallel passages, we see no better reason for supposing the Earl of Chesterfield to have been the author of 'Junius's Letters,' than that he was living at the time they were written,—and, therefore, why might not he have written them as well as any other person? The whole of the circumstantial evidence is feeble and inconclusive, or rather, we would say, conclusive against the very point attempted to be proved. The author, however, discovers some ingenuity, and we suspect it was merely to exercise it that he undertook to prove what his good sense must have told him he was not able to establish. With this conviction, we dismiss the last pamphlet on this hitherto impenetrable secret, and shall only quote two passages brought forward by the writer in proof of the identity of the authors. The one is a speech by Lord Chesterfield, and the other part of a letter written upwards of thirty years afterwards:—

'Junius:—The bravest and freest nations have sometimes submitted to a temporary surrender of their liberties, in order to establish them for ever. At a crisis of public calamity or danger, the prudence of the state placed a confidence in the virtue of some distinguished citizen, and gave him power sufficient to preserve or to oppress his country. Such was the Roman dictator; and while his office was confined to a short period, and only applied as a remedy to the disasters of an unsuccessful war, it was usually attended with the most important advantages, and left no dangerous precedent behind. The dictator finding employment for all his activity in repulsing a foreign invasion, had but little time to contrive the ruin of his own country, and his ambition was nobly satisfied by the honour of a triumph, and the applause of his fellow-citizens. But as soon as this wise institution was corrupted, when that unlimited trust of power which should have been reserved for conjectures of more than ordinary difficulty and hazard, was without necessity committed to one man's uncertain moderation, what consequence could be expected, but that the people should pay the dearest price for their simplicity; nor ever resume those rights which they could vainly imagine were more secure in the hands of a single man, than where the laws and constitution had placed them.—Miscellaneous Letters, No. 1, vol. 2, p. 431, 432.'

'Chesterfield:—The dictatorial power was a part of the Roman constitution even from the beginning of their republic. But while they preserved their virtue—while they preserved their liberty, this power was never granted but upon the most important, the most urgent occasions, and was never granted for a longer term than six months.—When the virtue and public spirit of that once brave people began to decay, this power indeed was often granted upon trifling occasions. It then began to be granted for a longer term, and was soon after granted for life. With this last grant, they gave away the liberties of their country for ever. The dictator might die, but the power was handed down immediately to another—the tyranny became perpetual. The power now asked for is, in some measure, a dictatorial power; it has but of late years crept into our constitution; it was never yet granted but on the most urgent occasions; but if once we begin to grant it for a time indefinite, and on such suppositions as may-be, we can easily foresee what it will be. It will at last, nay, it will soon either be granted or taken for life, and then adieu for ever to the liberties of Great Britain.—Speech on the King's Message to the House of Lords, 1734, for a power to augment his forces, if necessary, during the want of Parliament.'

The Tour of Africa. By Catherine Hutton. Vol. III.
(Concluded from p. 756.)

HAVING already expressed our opinion of this well-digested work, and given a few extracts, and having also another work on Africa before us, we shall conclude with an excellent description of the city of Marracco, compiled from the works of Chenier, Lempriere, Ali Bey, and Jackson:—

'The city of Morocco is in latitude 31° 37' north, in longitude about 7° 35' west, and is about ninety miles to the eastward of Mogador, and 350 to the southward of Tangier. It is situated in a beautiful plain, which is bounded on the east and south by the Atlas. It is enclosed by remarkably strong walls, which are flanked by square towers, and surrounded by a wide and deep ditch; the walls are about eight miles in circumference, but a great part of the space they inclose is covered with ruins or with gardens. The city has a number of entrances, large double porches, in the Gothic style; the gates are shut every night at a certain hour.

'A stranger, passing through Marracco, would regard it as a miserable city; but behold here conceals itself, and a house furnished with all the luxuries of the east may be hidden by the half-ruined wall of its court yard. The streets are very unequal, and the same street is in some parts broad and in others narrow. The entries to houses of consequence are furnished by lanes so narrow and crooked that a horse can with difficulty pass. Half a dozen men may defend one of these lanes, and the house becomes a castle. The houses, like all the others in the empire, consist of rooms built on every side of a square court, each with a door opening to the court, but having no window. The principal houses have two or more of these courts; very few have windows towards the street. The roofs are of terraces, to appearance flat, but having an insensible declivity, which conducts the rain water, through pipes, into the subterranean cistern. The moveables within consist chiefly of mats, carpets, a chest, a low table, and a bed, which runs along one end of the room, and is concealed by a curtain.

Every house in the city of Morocco has a serpent, or will retain one when it approaches, and food is left at night for it, by which it is gradually domesticated. These serpents are said to be very sagacious and susceptible of kindness, and their presence is considered as a token of good fortune. They are not often visible; but they are sometimes seen crawling along the beams of the roof of an apartment, and they have been known to suck the breasts of women while asleep. The feet of the bedsteads are frequently set in tubs of water, to avoid bugs and scorpions.

The Jews' quarter is about a mile in circumference. The Jews live in great filth; and the dung-hills and ruins are, in some places, as high as the houses. The city of Marokko, or Morocco, which once contained about 700,000 inhabitants, was said, in 1795, to contain only 270,000; and, in 1803, the numbers were said to be reduced, by war and pestilence, to 30,000.

The Kassinia is a part of the town where stufts and other valuable articles are exposed to sale. It is composed of a number of small shops, foined in the walls of the houses, about a yard from the ground, and of such a height within as just to admit of a man's sitting cross-legged. The goods and drawers are so arranged, that he reaches every article without moving, and serves his customers as they stand in the street. These shops, which are found in all other towns of the empire, afford a striking example of the indolence of the Moors. Here people resort, as to an exchange in Europe, to transact business and hear news; and independent gentlemen often hire one of these shops, and pass their mornings in it for their amusement.

A market is held at Morocco every Thursday, at which are sold prodigious numbers of horses, camels, and cattle, and great quantities of grain, fruit, and other articles. To these may be added slaves. The crier conducts these through the market, crying, occasionally,—"Fifty dollars on the increase!" When he finds no farther advance in the price offered, he reports it to the owner, who either accepts it or takes the chance of another market day, as he pleases.

In Morocco is a tower with three golden balls on its top, weighing, together, 1205 pounds, avoirdu-poise. Several emperors, when in want of money, have endeavoured to take them down, but without success, as they are firmly and artfully fixed. It is said that they are guarded by a spirit, and it is probable that nothing less than the belief of supernatural guardianship could have defeated human attempts to send them to the mint. Another tower in this city is seven stories high, and has walls four feet thick. The ascent is not by stairs, but by a winding road of hard cement, by which it is said that a horse may mount to the top. From the lantern at the top may be seen Cape Cantin, distant about one hundred and twenty miles.

The minarets of the mosques are square, as broad at the top as at the base. On these are erected a smaller square, with a flag-staff, from which is suspended, every day at noon, a flag, the signal of preparation for prayers. Some of the mosques are paved with black and white marble, in alternate squares; some with glazed tiles, about two inches square, of blue, green, and white; and others are covered with terraces, which is composed of lime and small stones, beaten down with wooden mallets. The mosques have no ornaments. The place where the Fakier reads prayers is covered with mats or carpets; the rest of the floor, on which the people prostrate themselves, is bare, except that some individuals have the skins of lions or leopards, finely dressed. On entering the mosque, every man takes off his slippers.

The Imams, who regulate the prayers, and the Mueddins, who give notice of the hours for their observance, work and pay taxes; and if one of these happen to be absent from the mosque, any other person may officiate for him. The Muhamedans believe the divine mission of Noah, Abraham, and Christ, and acknowledge Christ to be the Spirit of God and the Son of a Virgin; but they deny his death, as, according to the Koran, he ascended into Heaven without dying. A Jew cannot be admitted into the corps of the Faithful without professing his belief in Jesus Christ. The Muhamedans believe that the Arabic is the most eloquent language in the world, and that it is the one which will be spoken at the day of judgment.

On Friday a discourse is preached similar to our sermons. The Moors do not shut their shops wholly on this day, but they work less than on the others; and they will not work for Christians at all, unless they are extraordinarily or clandestinely paid, when they will condescend to do almost any thing.

In all Muhamedan countries in Africa, the gates of the towns are shut on a Friday during service in the mosques, as they believe, according to ancient tradition, that their country will, at this time, be attacked by Christians, and taken from them by surprise.

Total immersion is practised by the rich; washing the head, arms, hands, and feet, by the poor. Dog and hog are synonymous terms of contempt and detestation. If either of these animals have drank from a cup, a Musselman will not use it till it has been washed seven times, nor will he sit where a dog has been, nor wear its skin, though made into leather.

The palace of the sultan is composed of a group of vast buildings. Within its walls are apartments for the sovereign, for his sons, for a legion of women belonging to each, and for the different offices of the court. There are two mosques, three gardens, and three immense courts, in which the sultan gives his public audiences. The whole has the appearance of a town, and is about three miles in circumference. On entering, we first pass through the courts of audience; then a fourth court, in which is the guard-house; then we arrive at a fifth court, in the centre of which is a small square room, elevated some feet from the ground, where the great officers wait the orders of the sultan. This court leads into an antichamber filled with pages and guards, and the chamber opens into a garden planted with oranges, grapes, and other fruits, and containing a pavilion, about forty feet square, covered with a pyramidal roof of glazed tiles of various colours. The inside is painted and gilt in the Arabesque style, and ornamented with passages from the Koran, in square compartments. The furniture is simple, consisting only of two sofas, a clock, some china, a water-pot, carpets to kneel upon in prayer, and a few arms, which are hung round the walls. Here the emperor takes coffee or tea, transacts business with his officers, and admits foreign merchants to their audience of ceremony. In the interior of the palace are some very handsome apartments, with large windows looking to the garden. The second garden resembles the first. The third, which is called the garden of the Neel, from its containing the fruits and flowers of Timbuctoo and other parts of Sudan, is smaller, and is entered by a private door. The flowers are extremely odoriferous; the scent of the roses, which are the roses of Taiselt, is unequalled. From this flower is distilled the celebrated attar of roses; one rose is sufficient to perfume a large apartment; and matresses for great men to recline upon are filled with the dried leaves.

Muley Soliman, the present Emperor of Morocco, is a fakier, or doctor of the law. He passes the greater part of the day in prayers, disdains every kind of luxury, is generally clad in a coarse tunic, and endeavours to inspire his subjects with the same devotional austerity. Notwithstanding his contempt for splendour, his household is expensive, on account of the number of his women and children. He repudiates his wives, and takes new ones, as often as he pleases, and sends the discarded ladies to Taiselt, where they subsist on pensions. The inhabitants of Morocco often present him with their daughters, who are at first admitted into the harem as servants, and, if they please him, they are raised to the rank of concubines or wives, to be dismissed in time

'No government can be more absolute than that of Morocco. It has no invariable principle which may restrain the will of the monarch, who makes, breaks, and changes the laws according to his convenience or caprice. Throughout the empire, the subject cannot say of any thing, "It is mine;" not even of his existence, for he is deprived of all at the will of the despot.

'The Emperor of Morocco intrusts no one with the administration of his affairs. He would suppose his power were mutilated, if he were to delegate a portion of it to one of his slaves; and assuredly it would lead to his becoming the slave of his substitute, as may have been seen in the governments of many of the negro kings. All persons in the service of the Emperor of Morocco have only one duty to fulfil, which is to execute his commands, however variable or contradictory they be. "Des't thou take me for an infidel?" said an Emperor of Morocco to a stranger, "that I must be the slave of my word! Is it not in my power to say and unsay, whenever I please?"

'Muley Abd Allah was raised to the imperial dignity in 1729; Muley Ali, in 1734; and the deposed Abd Allah again in 1736. All these barbarians made murder their pastime.

'An Alcaid, in the reign of Arsheed, returning from a journey, boasted of the security of the roads, and said that he had seen a sack of walnuts, undisturbed, on the highway. "And how didst thou know they were walnuts?" demanded the emperor. "I touched the sack with my foot," replied the alcaid. "Sever that foot from his body," commanded Muley Arsheed, "as a punishment for his curiosity."

'Ismael, wholly regardless of the lives of men, made it his amusement to destroy them with his own hand. The days set apart for prayer were distinguished by these massacres, and he estimated his devotions by the number of murders he committed. Ismael was fond of building, and all his workmen were either fined, or they received some chastisement peculiar to their profession. If the bricks were too small, they were broken on the head of the brick-maker.

'Dehebbay was frequently in a state of helpless intoxication; and he was so cruel when sober, that his wives and attendants had no other means of safety than by making him drunk.

'Muley Abd Allah, on being remonstrated with by his mother, on his cruelty, said, "My subjects have no other right to their lives than that which I think proper to leave them; and I have no pleasure so great as that of killing them myself." Not a week passed in which he did not immolate some victim to his anger or caprice.

'Abdallah one day presented a favourite domestic with two thousand sequins, and bade him quit him wholly; lest he should, at one time or other, kill him in a passion. The servant's attachment to his master prevailed; he refused to leave him; and, in one of his savage fits, Abdallah actually shot him, reproaching him, at the same time, with his folly, in disregarding his advice. Another time, in fording a river, Abdallah was in danger of being drowned, and was rescued by one of his negroes. The slave congratulated himself upon having saved his master; the emperor drew his sword and cleft him down, exclaiming, "What an infidel, to suppose that he had saved me! As if God stood in need of his intervention to save a sheereff!"

'Abdallah was five times deposed, and as often replaced on the throne. Faction might replace him there; but one would almost renounce kindred with his subjects, as men, if they had submitted quietly to his authority.

'One of these imperial savages, in a fit of inebriety, ordered all the teeth of one of his wives to be drawn. A week after, he desired to see her, and was told she was ill. On inquiry, he found it was in consequence of the cruel operation she had undergone. He had no recollection of the order he had given; and, to make some reparation to the injured lady, he ordered all the teeth of the operator to be drawn, and sent to her in a box.

'Seedy Muhamed, who succeeded Abdallah, in 1757, was of a milder character. It may here be observed, that an Emperor of Morocco, whose name is Muhamed, is called seedy, inaster, if he have any other name, he is called muley, prince.

'An ambassador was sent from Great Britain to Seedy Muhamed, and when he appeared at court, he was told by the master of the audience, that it was customary for all persons to take off their shoes before they appeared before the emperor, and to prostrate themselves in his presence. To these ceremonies the ambassador objected, saying, that he wore his shoes before the king, his master, and stood erect. On this being reported to the emperor, he seemed to think the ambassador rather presumptuous in placing a Christian king on an equal footing with a Muselman sultan; but he ordered him to be dismissed, and to attend on the following day. He then directed the master of the audience to inquire how the Christians conducted themselves in prayer; and when he was informed that they prayed standing, and uncovered only the head, he said, "Let the ambassador be presented to me in the same manner; for I cannot require more respect from a man than he pays to Almighty God."

'In whatever part of the empire the monarch happens to be, he gives public audience, sometimes four times, and always twice a week, for the dispensation of justice. He sits on horseback, under an umbrella, which is held by one of his grooms. Here none but the sultan, his sons, and brothers, dare make use of an umbrella. All his subjects, without exception, who have any complaint or remonstrance to make, have liberty to come to the public audience, and no one retires unheard. The meanest may boldly tell his tale. Indeed, if he hesitate or appear diffident, his cause is weakened in proportion. Each is expected to accompany his complaint with a present, according to his condition; and it is invariably accepted, if it be only eggs, fruit, or flowers. Judgment is always prompt, decisive, plausible, and generally correct.

'Punishments are always inflicted in the presence of the emperor, but not, as formerly, by his own hand; he having resigned the respectable office of executioner to one of his soldiers. One of the emperor's sons having promised to speak to him in favour of an European, excused himself for not having yet done so, by saying, "When I saw my father, he was engaged in putting some persons to death."

'A sovereign should no more be an executioner, than a butcher should be a jurymen.

'The Emperor of Morocco is never seen on foot but in his palace, at his devotions, and, on some few occasions, in his gardens. He eats alone, and the officers who attend him are afterwards served from his table. Cuscusee is the principal dish, in the palace of the emperor as in the hovel of the subject; and it is dressed in such quantities in the former, that the vessel which contains it is sometimes carried by poles, like a sedan-chair. The emperor is served by slaves, who receive no emolument but the perquisites arising from the business they transact. They are clothed once a year. The tailors of the city, who are mostly Jews, are obliged to perform their work without reward, except so far as they can indemnify themselves by filching the materials.

'The word death is not to be mentioned in the presence of the emperor. If a person have to inform his majesty of the death of a Muselman, he says, "he has completed his destiny," and the answer is, "God be merciful to him." If the death of a Jew were to be reported to any great man, it would be said, "he is dead, sir; pardon me for mentioning in your presence a name so contemptible" (as that of a Jew.) If the deceased were a Christian, the expression would be,—"the infidel," or "the cuckold," or "the son of a cuckold is dead."

'In places remote from the emperor's court, the petty officers learn, by their spies, when any person is possessed of considerable property, and an excuse is never wanting to deprive him of it. But it happens, also, that the emperor has his spies, and that he obliges his substitutes to transfer their ill-acquired wealth to the imperial treasury. This system of depre-dation renders each man afraid of his neighbour, and all are careful to make no display which might awaken the avidity of their governors. "Thou must need'st be very rich," said a sheriff to a Moor who, to preserve his garden-walls, had them white-washed. The Moors wear no jewels, and few of them have even a ring or a watch.

Power and weakness, rank and meanness, opulence and indigence, are equally dependent and equally uncertain in Morocco. There are instances of a sultan elevating, at one stroke, a private soldier to the rank of a bashaw, or making him a confidential friend, and, at another, reducing him again to the situation of a common soldier, of sending him to prison; of a governor deposed by the sovereign, and condemned to sweep the streets of the town he had governed. Yet, with such examples before them, when these people have attained a high station, they seldom fail to afford their sovereign a plea for punishing them, by abusing their trust. Once stripped of his effects, however, the governor may be re-instated in his former dignity, the sinner being absolved by rendering up his riches.

Near the north-west point of the walls of Morocco is a village of lepers. They are obliged to wear a straw hat, with a brim about nine inches broad, as their badge of separation from persons who are clean; but they are allowed to beg by the highway side, where they hold a wooden bowl before them, and exclaim, as people pass, "Bestow upon me the property of God! All belongs to God!" I rode through their village, and saw many of them collected at their doors. In general, no external disfigurement was apparent, but their complexion was sallow, and some young women, who would otherwise have been very handsome, had either scanty eyebrows or none at all.

If the reader will be so good as to reckon back as many ideas as will bring him to where he accompanied me in the eulogium I passed upon that philosophical spirit of inquisitiveness which less than this sapient nation by the nose into so many foolish predicaments, he will find that I was about making a proposition of some kind or other; but, by a sudden impulse on the organ of meditation, I bounded from my purpose, like a dishevelled coquet, when struck by the air-drawn shuttle of omnipotence, from one end of the inauguration to the opposite. At that point of disjuncture, I was about acquainting my reader with a design my brain hath long been great with, which, when duly brought forth into actual existence, I reckon will occasion such an inordinate confluence of the sexes—such rival exertions between breeches and petticoat in crowding to behold it, as hath not occurred since the days of King Romulus, of rapturous memory. My design is this: to enter into an agreement with the proprietor of some exhibition, for the hiring of a cage or stall, wherein to exhibit myself to the inspection of the curious public. Indeed, I had already gone so far as to take the dimensions of a cage in Exeter Change, which I thought would about suit my person; but, upon my getting into it for trial, I was so pestered by the neighbouring monkeys thrusting out their paws to shake hands with me upon this new addition to their society, and perpetually endeavouring to scrape an acquaintance, some of them passing their jokes on my total want of spiral appendage,—others challenging me to a trial of skill in tumbling and grimacing, while not a few attempted to sound my opinion on—the real essences of animal species—the distinguishing attribute between men and animals,—with the like sort of questions, all of which were so many intrusions on my love of taciturnity, that I was forced to relinquish the attempt in a hurry. I have now cast my eye on Mr. Bullock, and from his known liberality in providing a succession of monsters, prodigies, extraordinary sights, and such other objects as may hit the delicate taste of the public, I dare say we shall soon come upon terms.

Besides this my intention of satisfying the epidemic desire for ocular knowledge, I wish particularly to afford all the assistance in my power to the professors and disciples of all those egregiously sensible sciences, to wit, Physiognomy and Craniognomy, by furnishing them with a living and unimpeachable standard whereby to regulate the cut and fashion of a true genius; and by a reference to the form and mould of my features and cranium, to pass an infallible judgment on the faculties and dispositions of every soul they meet with. For I have ever looked upon the above theories, and a few others, such as—palmistry, botany, zoology, chemistry, &c. as having performed a wonderful service to the cause of true philosophy, over and above whatever increase they may have brought to our stock of knowledge. In the first place, I think it is to those studies that we are indebted for our present laudable ignorance of the ancient classics, and the utter extirpation of those nefarious syllable-hunters, usually denominated commentators or philologists, who, by interpolations, conjectural emendations, obliterations, and false interpretations, wrasted the originals to their own particular fancies, and permuted the same text into as many different forms, as the letters in it were capable of different combinations; so that it was nothing extraordinary to find a sentence which, in one editor, told you of—the innate nobility in kings and patricians,—by a trifling alteration of the letters, and affixing a mark of interrogation, in another, ask you,—which, a grub or a gnat, was the better meat to fatten a sparrow with? Hence it is, that a man of great classical acquirements has now come to be considered in the light of an incubus on the body of literature; and a philologist is now another and a shorter name for a mighty dull fellow. No, sir; if you would be called a great genius by the men, and the cleverest creature in the world by the women, take a friend's advice, and though you don't understand the meaning of the term, set up for a philosopher. This is now the universal practice; so that I believe it would not be going beyond the truth, were I to assert, that in all our seminaries, societies, and universities, the number of philosophers far exceeds the number of learned men. By the by, a word or two about universities.

It is on all hands agreed, that one of the strongest incentives to learning is the reverence which is paid to it. This principle is fully understood, and most incontinently acted upon, by our two great universities—Cambridge and Oxford. In both these seminaries, the reverence paid to one author is so great, that to it may be traced their present notorious superiority, in point of science, to their neighbours on the continent. Newton is a god, not a poetical god—not a god by the figure hyperbole, but a god infallible; and what is more, omnipotent, though he could not work a problem, which a chit of the French Polytechnic School, in the present age, would reckon upon his fingers. This, it must be allowed, is a little extraordinary, and yet, however extraordinary, it is nevertheless perfectly true. Our universities do not consider Sir Isaac Newton as a man who, by the most stupendous faculties ever granted to mortal, and by sagacity, indeed, little less than divine, managed, somehow or other, to drag the secrets of nature into open daylight, from the profound darkness in which they were concealed; they will not allow that he did this but partially and imperfectly; though, at the same time, wonderfully, when we recollect the difficulties he had to struggle with, the infancy of the science in which he had engaged, and the unwieldiness of the instruments he wrought with; no—their reverence goes much farther. In some, it partakes so largely of the nature of fear, that they never open his book, through excess of respect. In others, it is so much akin to amazement, that their intellects are quite lost in their admiration, and though they peradventure do prevail upon themselves to open his book, they do not understand a syllable from the beginning to the end. Most of the professors, especially in the latter university, are so enraptured of the first seventeen propositions of the Principia, that they never go beyond them; but after having muddled and dabbled there, till their beards change from down to grizzled, they die contented and full of glory, in having found out a new quip or deducible, which is of about as much use and importance to the cause of science, as a globule of ether to the weight and magnitude of the earth, in preserving the balance of the solar system or universe. The most adventurous, who have sufficient feignity to read the whole book, stop there; arguing, very plausibly, on the uselessness of knowing too much, and the facility of knowing so little. They pore, in an ecstasy of blind and stupid admiration, over old Sir Isaac's long-winded proofs and eternal compounded and dividends, while, as a maxim of intellectual exertion, they venture on a few applications of the doctrine of limits and ultimate ratios. Ponderous geometries, and a few puling ricks played over and over again in that frightful science, fluxions, form the ne plus ultra of British mathematical knowledge. The French have invented a quite contrary method. What is the consequence? Why, ignorant are they, that they actually laugh at Sir Isaac's unwieldy and impotent theorems, while they look upon their brothers at Cambridge with the profoundest contempt, and have the impudence to call the best of that university, (God shield us!) ignorant blockheads. Some waggish philosophers among them, such as La Place, La Grange, and others, pretend to have given solutions which baffled even Newton's astronomical calculations to effect, by a new method of investigation peculiar to themselves; but that this is all gasconade, appears manifestly from these solutions being utterly unintelligible to the Cambridge and Oxford men of wisdom. A Cambridge philosopher, at a lecture in a French mathematical academy, would be like an ass at a concert of music. At first he does not know what the devil to make of it—his head is all confusion and zigzaggery: he shakes his ears, looks wise, and endeavours to catch the harmony,—but, at length, finding it totally incomprehensible, the creature becomes nervous and impatient,—so getting upon one of the benches,—pointing his throat and extending his tail, he summons up the man within him, and begins to bray at the musicians, till he has drowned all their notes in the roar of his own vocabulary;—then, presenting them his posteriors, and playing a number of awkward gambols, to show his learning, he scampers off to his own herd, who set up an assinine shout on the prowess and triumph of their doughty companion.

* The differential and integral calculus. Nothing can show the miserable and truly infantile state of science in this country, better than a comparison of the French calculus with English fluxions. These are the same study in theory, but in practice—they are as the works of omniscience to the tricks of a mountebank. Whilst the former is employed in investigating the lunar motions or the phenomena of the tides, the latter is at its wit's end to find the centre of a sugar-loaf or the superficial content of an egg-shell.

† It would astonish the learned universities to hear that the advanced French mathematics are read and understood by the under graduates of their silent sister, the Dublin University; and that a little work, published at the university press, by a Mr. Lardner, who has but just graduated in that college, contains more than half Job's Examples, in thirty pages octavo. The professor of mathematics (Dr. Lloyd), and the late provost (Dr. Elrington, Bishop of Limerick) by the introduction of these studies, have set an enlightened example to the other universities of the empire, well worthy of imitation, and deserving the unequalled thanks of their country, for raising it to that rank in the scale of science, which had been so long denied by the ignorance and superstition of their predecessors. As a proof of the wide dissemination of knowledge among the students of the

THE VISION OF PETER PINDEGRASS.
(FOR THE LITERARY CHRONICLE.)

Diluculo surgere, which, but that I abhor a pun, I should call the amputation of a night's rest, is a good maxim it cannot be denied; but then it should be observed, according to the reading of Sir Toby Belch: 'For not to be in bed at midnight is to be up betimes;—well construed Sir Toby, most caustical knight!

Poor Thomson lay in bed because he had no motive for getting up. Now I have so many motives for getting up that I lie in bed long after every one else in the house has risen, purely to consider which motive has the best right to rouse me; and sometimes it unfortunately happens that before I have arrived at a conclusion on this head, I fall into another sleep, and am obliged at last to yield to the most unbefitting and least philosophical of all, namely the wrath of Mrs. P. who dashes into my chamber and rattles a storm in my ears, signifying that she has been waiting breakfast for me nearly an hour, and is come to the very extremity of her patience. Yet though on such occasions, I rise instantaneously protesting my great sorrow, making an hundred apologies, and avowing both internally and externally that I will forthwith adopt a better system, I must confess that I am not improving in this particular. For ah! how sweet is the supplementary hour to a good night's sleep! how well worth the preceding eight or nine! To 'lie in dead oblivion'; to 'steep the senses in forgetfulness'; during the first long sleep after getting into bed, is nothing. There is no sensation allied to this state. It is for the time, a total cessation of existence: 'it is death's counterfeit.' But after being awakened from this state, to feel still drowsy enough to wish to close the eyes again; to yield to the soft desire; to go off with a consciousness of the value of the time so devoted; to indulge in so costly a luxury; ah! what a pleasure! how delicious is every wink!

This preamble introduces the narration of a very strange occurrence, which attended a stolen nap a few mornings ago. Mrs. P. had called me once, and, by way of inducing me to rise immediately, had reminded me that it was the first day of the month, and that my magazines had come in on the preceding evening. Before I obeyed the summons however, I turned myself round and began to speculate on the probable contents of the present numbers, and rambling on from subject to subject in a kind of half doze, I went off to sleep again, my mind still occupied with the same speculations. Suddenly, I thought that my door was opened with great violence, and Betty rushing into my chamber with looks of astonishment and alarm, begged me to get up, for God's sake, for that there was a most unaccountable uproar in my study. I forthwith sprang out of bed, (so my dream was) and hastily slipping on my small clothes, stockings, slippers, and camblet gown, proceeded directly to my study, where, indeed, I found matters as Betty had represented them. The noise, which was a strange confusion of voices, as of people at a distance quarrelling, seemed to issue from that part of my library where I deposit my Magazines and Reviews, and upon looking up to the shelf, I found, to my great surprise, that no longer a set of books, but figures in human shape, though not larger than the books themselves, occupied the place; the figure of each most admirably corresponding with the spirit of its respective publication. My presence imposed silence among them; taking advantage of which, 'Gentlemen,' said I, 'pray what am I to understand by this? How is it that you do not agree together? What has happened that you fall out and make such a disturbance in a place sacred to peace and good understanding? Let me hear your complaints—let each make his grievance known to me, and if any thing in your situations shall seem to require redress it shall be promptly prepared. Come down to me here, one by one; come quietly and orderly, and let me hear how this quarrel originated and what is the object of it.' So saying, I took my seat in my large elbow-chair, and drew up my footstool with a majestic air, while forth from the crowd came an old man-book, with very white locks, and a certain air of antiquity in his gait. [gate.] He was dressed in the costume of Sir Charles Grandison; that is, he wore a cocked hat, long coat with stiff skirts, waistcoat with embroidered flaps, black satin breeches, white silk stockings, and buckled shoes. He had, like Shout the bellows mender, a little lime and rough cast about him, and smelt strongly of tombs and charnel-houses. His face was puckered with wrinkles, his complexion was cadaverous, and his voice tremulous, and, like his type, somewhat indistinct. His eyes were assisted by glasses of great power, with which he pored over the inscriptions upon old tomb-stones, and his finger ends were soiled with venerable green rust from old coins and curiosities. I easily recognized him, and with great respect gave ear to his complaint, which he began as follows:—'Shall I, who am the most ancient and the most respectable of magazines, the father of the race, in whose pages, among the contributions of all the wits who have appeared within the last century, the lucubrations of the playful Goldsmith, the learned Johnson, and the satirical Savage, have pleased, astonished, and electrified the town; whose information is on points of great and general utility,—whose contents, in short, are deep, solid, and important; shall I be jostled from my station by ephemeral upstarts, the beings of a day, who have nothing but their wit and fine clothes to recommend them? Am I to be elbowed by a pair of hot-headed jack-an-apes, who quarrel and call names, and go to pistols with each other, without decency or remorse? and are those two soaring reviews for ever to disturb the repose of this literary repository? Ah! if these new works are a fair specimen of the taste of the age, times are sadly altered since Johnson and Savage used to meet under St. John's Gate. Here we have new conceits, new principles, new fashions, and new types. Their subjects are neither historical nor scientific, but merely speculative and jocular. Their style in prose is flimsy and bare, compared with the richness and rotundity of the Johnsonian period; and their poetry wants harmony and flow, being altogether vain and conceited; and far beneath the majesty of that which gave to my younger days the name of the Augustan age of English literature.'

He would have proceeded farther,

but was checked by a violent fit of coughing which his wrath had brought on, and I availed myself of the opportunity to put in my reply. 'Most reverend Mr. Urban,' said I, 'I respect your years and your place. You are a very patriarch of magazines, a father Abraham, or, more properly, a venerable Nestor among periodical publications. To you is assigned the very first station in this compartment of my library; and due deference is paid to you, whether your mood happen to be felicitous or melancholy, sober or frolicsome. I have an esteem for your character; your industry is commendable, and your gravity and patience deserve the exercise of mine. You settle small questions in topography with admirable skill, have much merit as a chronologer, are pretty deeply learned in ecclesiastical architecture, and well read in old tomb-stones. Your obituary is copious, and your biographical memoirs, if not generally interesting, are flattering and valuable in particular circles. But do not, dear Mr. Urban, wholly despise your younger brethren. Perhaps it may as deeply concern posterity to know what pleasant things were written by Elia, and what smart pieces of table-talk by T., as whether an old church, fit only to harbour owls and bats, was built in the thirteenth or fourteenth century; hereafter it may be as eagerly inquired, what was the state of our morals as displayed in the popular literature of the age, as whether an old pot was made in the reign of 'Tiberius or Galba, or whether John Jones died in January or July.'

I could see that my harangue was heard with great impatience by a short fat man-book, in black clothes and canonicals, and with a very florid countenance, somewhat rubicund, which, issuing from a large full freshly-powdered wig, resembled a cornelian brooch on a lock of white cotton. Having, therefore, disposed of the old gentleman, with a promise to attend to his accommodation, I was immediately attacked by this petulant personage, who poured forth his complaints with so much rage and volatility, that I could scarcely understand them so as to make a suitable reply. Blasphemy, infidelity, modern philosophy, jacobinism, trash, loyalty, and religion, were the only words which I could for some time distinctly catch, but for sense I could collect nothing but a kind of furious and indignant railing at a noble poet, and equally indiscriminate praise of some learned divines, particularly the Bishop of Peterborough. Having exhausted his breath sooner than his choler, he stopped short in the midst of his vituperation, and I took occasion to ask him the substance of his complaint, and to promise him redress, if needful. Understanding that he felt aggrieved at being stationed in what he was pleased to call the company of reprobates, I thought it right to give him a calm reproof. 'Reverend Mr. Critic,' said I, 'it does appear somewhat unreasonable that you should expect, in the library of a gentleman of moderate income, a distinct space for your special occupation. I am surprised, too, that a book of your character, a learned and professedly pious, almost exclusively Christian publication, should be so very quarrelsome a neighbour. The books at which you are so very indignant are peaceable and well-behaved, as far as I can discover, and really you profit very little by the example of those sober volumes which stand just below you. See you not old Tillotson in company with Noland and Tindal? Not far from them are Marvell and Butler, almost near enough to pull each other's noses, if they were not more rational than to submit to the impulse of such unworthy passions. Behold Milton there. By some accident he has got stuck in between Salmasius and Johnson; yet the venerable politician and bard observes the utmost propriety in his demeanour, and not an angry word has escaped from either him, his antagonist, or his libeller. If Rousseau and Voltaire, Pope and Addison, Macpherson and Johnson, Newton and Whiston, Barrow and Gibbon, Godwin and Malthus, can refrain, though in each other's presence, from disturbing good order upon my shelves;—but here I was interrupted by my revered colloquist, who burst into such a torrent of foul language, as it would have been very difficult for me to oppose, had not some horrible twinges of the gout come, most fortunately, to my relief, and altered both the nature and tone of his complaint.

The next application came from a lady-book, of a soft and delicate figure, somewhat lax in her gait, and bending like an osier, with her head reclined in a kind of perpetual languishment. She sighed out her grievances in a plaintive Della Cruscan kind of tone, and called on me to rescue her from the rude jostlings of certain insolent boy-books. 'Look, sir,' she exclaimed, 'at my lace tucker, of the newest pattern, I assure you, rumpled to death by that unceremonious fellow, who ought to understand good breeding better, as he comes from the vicinity of Bond Street. Gallantry and deference to the softer sex are no parts of the education of modern beaux, or that smart young citizen, from St. Paul's, would not have pressed so rudely by me, to the infinite detriment of my dress, planned, sir, I declare, expressly for my embellishment, and intended to be the model for all ladies of taste and refinement for the present month.' Before I could reply to this pitiful damsel, my notice was attracted by the fury of two enraged disputants, of thrice the bulk of those which I had hitherto given ear to. One of them was dressed in a blue coat and buff waistcoat, and wore a large old wig on his head, which seemed to have undergone several alterations to suit the prevailing fashion. He spoke English, but with a strong Scottish accent, and appeared to be, in the language of his country, a paukie auld earl. The other had on a suit of drab colour, and, by his rapid enunciation, extreme violence of gesture, and ferocious aspect, formed a striking contrast to the deliberate and supercilious Scot. But the joke to the by-standers was that, though differing thus conspicuously in externals, they were continually changing ground with each other in dispute, and although it was manifest to every one else, that their opinions, on many points entirely coincided, yet between themselves they could come to no other agreement than that of never agreeing. I knew how to reduce these gentlemen to order, without giving myself the trouble of performing the office of mediator, on such an hopeless occasion, and accordingly placed between them a volume of Cobbett's Register, upon which they instantly relinquished their dispute with each other, and, with the most perfect harmony, commenced a joint attack upon the sturdy radical. This suggested to my mind, with a suitable alteration, the simile of Lord Grizzle:—

 'So when two dogs are snarling in the street,
 With a third dog the savage puppies meet;
 With angry tooth they bite him to the bone,
 And this dog snarls for what those dogs had done.

Tranquillity between the critics being thus restored, I was called on to observe the conduct of another northern man-book, who was fighting up his way to a place on the shelf, over the backs and through the sides of several very peaceable volumes that happened to stand in his way; and, like a scavenger in a throng, succeeded by the mere force of the stench, and filth which he flung around him. He resembled the fellow described in Hudibras as forming part of the procession, made in honour of the triumphant scold:—

Next one upon a pair of plumes,
 Full fraught with that, which for good manners
 Shall here be nameless, mix'd with grime,
 Which he dispens'd among the syrens,
 And busily upon the crowd,
 At random round about bestowed.

As he passed 'Rimini,' I observed him give it a most savage kick, and instantly run off to conceal himself; and having made good his retreat to a spot where he could not be discovered, he continued to throw dirt on every volume which happened to displease him. 'Cenci' and 'the Revolt of Islam,' were almost covered with his filth. Not choosing to harbour such a pestilent rogue as this, I took him down, and without deigning to expostulate with him, crammed him at once into the basket, for the service of the house-maid. This act of justice performed, I returned to my shelves, in order to pacify some other malcontents; for there was still a sort of wrangling going on amongst a few. It was now no difficult matter to effect this, except with one corpulent periodical, who was exceedingly wrath with a relation that had the misfortune of having been christened after him. It was easy to see, however, that the contest was not likely to produce serious consequences; for the younger of the two, though too strong for his opponent if he had chosen to engage, absolutely declined the contest, and treated his angry assailant with the most mortifying indifference. I was just congratulating myself on the return of peace and good order, when a noise, like that of thunder, burst upon my ears. I turned suddenly round; opened my eyes;—the scene was changed from my library to my bed chamber; the door stood open, and Mrs. P. was at my bed side, exclaiming, in the usual interrogatory tone—'Mrs. P., Mr. P., how much longer am I to wait?'

PETER PENDEGRASS.

RIDING THE STANG.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—I lately saw an account, in some of the daily papers, of a 'procession extraordinary,' along the Strand. It was that of a coal-heaver, seated on a ladder, slung on the shoulders of two coal-heavers. It appeared this man had been guilty of an intrigue with the wife of a fellow labourer; and the circumstance being made known to the rest of the men, the male offender was paraded as above described for a considerable time, and instead of finishing by giving him a ducking or a castigation at the cart's tail, they adjourned to a public-house, where oceans of gin were eagerly inhaled by himself and comrades to a late hour.

Until I saw the last part of the paragraph, I was led to consider this as one of those summary modes of punishment which the vulgar, in various parts of the country, exercise illegally, it is true, but not without advantage.

In some of the villages in Kent, when a man is known to have beaten his wife, it is usual to strew chaff before his door, when the joke runs through the town that such a man was thrashing last night, as the chaff was seen in front of his house. Such notoriety is said to be a more wholesome restraint on bad husbands than any legal enactment.

But there is a still more curious mode of punishment adopted by what are termed the 'lower orders,' but who, on the subject of morals, may boldly challenge those who are considered their betters. I believe the custom is peculiar to the North Riding of Yorkshire; at least, though I have travelled through most parts of the united kingdom, I have not met with it elsewhere. It is called 'Riding the Stang,' and is generally adopted in cases of criminal, or where a man has been brutal enough frequently to quarrel with his wife and use personal violence towards her. It was a case of the last description which I witnessed, about fifteen years ago, at a little village on the north road in Yorkshire.

When it becomes public that a man is often beating his wife, the mechanics and apprentices determine on punishing him by riding stang; for this purpose, a small cart is prepared in the evening, into which the best orator of the troop mounts, while the rest draw him through the streets. The procession stops at various places, but most particularly in front of the residence of the offending party. At all these places, proclamation is made of the offence in uncouth rhymes, the commencement of which is as follows:—

Hey tinkle, hey tinkle, hey tinkle tang.
It is not for my cause that I ride the stang,
But it is for [mentioning the name] his wife who did tang.

The orator then relates, in the best doggerel the village wits have been previously able to indite, the peculiar circumstances attending the event they are publicly exposing. Each proclamation terminates with three cheers.

In cases of peculiar atrocity, the offending party is burnt in effigy, either on the village green or in front of his own house.

Perhaps some of your readers can give me some information as to the origin of this singular custom, or at least of the name 'riding the stang,' with which, I confess, I am unacquainted, but I pledge myself to the fact.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,
EPHRAIM WOOD.

BET, OR BE SILENT.

This is an argument which, in England, puts an end to many a discussion. If the argument is not such as would be allowed by the soundest logic, it is, however, one which is consecrated by custom, and admitted as infallible, and which is not without its advantages. It reduces to silence, by the fear of loss, those whose obstinacy is elsewhere encouraged by the impunity of erroneous opinions or false assertions. Unfortunately, however, it also interrupts those whose only error in disputation is the inability to bet; and it is much easier for most men, and disputants especially, to produce crowns from their pockets than reasons from their crowns. We shall only adopt the maxim of Bet or be Silent, when clever men shall have as much money as fools; but both seem determined to prevent the arrival of this new era. A volume might be filled with the extravagant bets which are laid and taken in England in the course of one year. There is a taste, a furor, a rage for it; and the most amusing thing of all is the religious respect with which those who are not concerned in the bet indelict whatever might prevent it from being carried through. We shall cite one for example, which is worth a thousand. A man fell into the Thames—he struggled and endeavoured to swim, but he swam badly. Will he reach the bank? Will he be drowned? Here was at once a wager. Twenty guineas were laid that he would save himself; this was taken; the bet was increased and multiplied, and, in two minutes, considerable sums were depending on the head of the poor swimmer. He was, however, perceived by some watermen, who rowed towards him with the intention of saving him.—There is a bet, there is a bet,' was bawled out from every quarter. At these magical words the boatman stopped, the unfortunate man was drowned, and the bet was gained!—Paris Paper.

THE GREEKS.

The revolt of the Greeks against the Ottoman government affords one instance among the many recorded in history, of the certain and dreadful consequences which flow from the exercise of despotic power. No people on earth appear to have been so much the sport of their rulers as the Greeks. Viewed in the light of infidels by their oppressors, they have been treated worse than dogs, and a Muselman, arrayed in 'a little brief authority,' could not more effectually recommend himself to his superiors than by loading the Greeks with taxes to an extent which left them scarcely the means of subsistence. Pachas of three tails—Pachas of two tails, subordinate to the other, who are accountable, in their turn, to a superior, who also is answerable to the government, are established in every province, to see that the cadis exact with fidelity the contributions of the state. Under the cadis there is a class, called Agas, who, like farmers of the revenue, purchase of the Pachas the privilege of exacting all the money they can squeeze out of the natives. As this class pay pretty high to obtain the situation, and are invested with the authority of lords, they take special care to indemnify themselves as quickly as possible, well aware that if they are merely suspected of being tardy in the execution of their powers, nothing more is wanting to insure their disgrace or occasion the forfeiture of their lives.

An aga has a right to demand a seventh of the produce of the land. He is sole proprietor of the mills, to which every one is bound to carry his oil, and to pay another seventh of all the oil extracted, besides an indemnity to the labourers and for the horses and machinery used in pressing the olives. The police of the village belongs to the aga; for this purpose he appoints a deputy—a Muselman like himself—a subaltern tyrant, always more greedy and more untractable than his master. This wretch incessantly occupies himself in exciting disturbance among the Greeks, of which the aga has

how to take advantage to fill his coffers. Frequent attempts have been made to conciliate the Greeks by allowing them to have a captain or primat to adjust their differences; but this appointment only served to aggravate their misfortunes as the primat or captain never failed to second the views of the aga, by whose influence alone he secures the office.

No Greek can marry without the permission of the aga,—a permission which he must purchase by a present. If the fair one please the tyrant, he frequently keeps her for himself, without any one daring to whisper that he does wrong. Any complaint to the Pacha or the Porte would occasion the loss of the complainant's head. Not unfrequently, after having kept this woman two or three years, he turns her off for another, and marries her to some Greek inhabitant of the village, who dares not refuse her. Married men are not permitted to leave the islands, unless they are seamen or merchants. Bachelors obtain the privilege by paying a tax. If a murder happens in the village, and the culprit is not known, the aga must pay a sum of money to the Pacha, which he levies upon the inhabitants, besides a large additional premium for his own use. If it be a Muselman who is murdered, there are no bounds to the rapacity of these tyrants. The sum demanded is exorbitant, because, say they, 'religion has been outraged in one of its members. Such an assassination, besides, is almost always followed by the death of several Greeks; the relations of the deceased thinking it their duty, and as a step in which their honor is concerned, to assassinate, in their turn, the first of the inhabitants they chance to meet. When a Greek is accused of any other offence, which is the same thing as being guilty, it is impossible for him to escape, unless he has the means of bribing the aga to deliver him up to the pacha, who is only pacified by a similar bribe. He who has nothing, pays with his head.

It is thus that a people, who so long prospered under the laws of a Minos, have been for ages governed; that the inhabitants of a country where liberty had its birth, have been bent under the yoke of the most shameful slavery.—Who that has a spark of independent feeling in his breast, does not wish that their present efforts to emancipate themselves from this horrid thralldom may ultimately prove successful.

Biography.

THOMAS WHATELY, Esq.
LATE MEMBER OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.

HOWEVER painful the bereavement, the biographer feels no comparative reluctance while employed in tracing the map of a good man's warfare through the labyrinth of society, to his calm and long home,—the grave. The victory of an immortality, at once glorious and memorable, is viewed with a hope that cherishes us, to press for our exalted privilege, and gives us faith to endure the storm, in the belief of our becoming finally the possessors of benignant reality and eternal love.

Thomas Whately, Esq., whom this brief and perishable memorial records, was the son of a clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Whately, of Derby, who had filled the civic chair of the corporation three successive years with characteristic dignity, urbanity, and lasting reputation. Born of a good family and highly respectable parents, Thomas, the subject of this notice, had received a liberal education; after which, suitably with his inclination, he was apprenticed to the medical profession, and became fellow apprentice with the celebrated author of the 'Botanic Garden,'—Dr. Darwin. Naturally, though young, attached to studious habits and the pursuits of anatomical and literary information, Master Whately, very different to many young men, cultivated every opportunity for his mental improvement, examined his principles by the nicest scrutiny, and formed his judgment upon the foundation of ocular truth. As he advanced to manhood, so he progressively enriched his mind, which, as a physiological student, he considered of the first importance to his present and future interests, so zealously, indeed, that his intense application induced a nervous headache, which continued, in modified degree, to the last moment of his life. Perseverance, the bright herald of success in all undertakings or occupations, led him into the world endowed with a great store of valuable knowledge. As a botanist, he was particularly distinguished, and he never ranged external nature for specimens, to dissect their genius, classification, and variety, without rendering their infinite Creator that praise which discovers the sensibility of a refined understanding and grateful heart.

About this time, he invented an improved plan for the better management and more durable preservation of plants in sand and paper, which met with the cordial approval of the most eminent votaries of the verdant and blossoming shrine of Linnaeus; and testimonies of its utility are recorded in the best and later works on botany and horticulture.

Free from the versatile and pre-disposing influence of hospital associates, he passed the several examinations of the colleges, societies, and critical ordeals in Scotland and England with so much advantage, that he gained the countenance and friendship of men of letters and medical fame. Thus honoured, he was encouraged to persevere yet more diligently, and he gleaned the scattered fragments of science like a wise husbandman. London, which has the strongest claims for practice and experience, now began to invite Mr. Whately to exercise his talents in pharmacy and the more scientific branches of physical operations. This apostrophe in his life gave him further chance of acquiring celebrity, and brought his surgical skill into deep and forcible action. Theory is a guide to practice, and serves its benevolent purpose in the study; but it is practice that strengthens ability, inspires courage, patience, or intrepidity, so essential to the operator and prescriber. The quickness, ease, and certainty of Mr. Whately's performances on his patients, in the most difficult cases, decided his choice of confining himself wholly to surgery. Hence his fame spread widely and justly among the afflicted, and his elevation as a surgeon became maturely and honourably established in the highest circles. As a writer, he was signalized by the several works which issued from his pen, and which are consulted by students on account of their character for practical and experimental utility. They are principally—a work on 'Ulcers'—the 'Tibia'—'Strictures'—'Polypus,' with improved forceps—'Necrosis,'—and some other tracts and papers, periodically inserted in medical publications. Mr. Whately and Sir Everard Home carried on a paper controversy, which ended by proving that his method of treating strictures caused less pain to the sufferer, and was equally felicitous, perhaps more, in performing speedy and permanent cure than the right worthy baron's.

Mr. W. was a great and constant friend to the poor and afflicted, both with his advice gratuitously and his benefactions. He was the friend of Christianity, and acted up to its dictates by his uniform example and daily walk. He was formerly on the most intimate terms of friendship with the reverend and venerable Mr. Newton, with whom he corresponded for many years. He was thrice married, and his seven children and young and amiable widow, who have survived him, were his habitual and indulgent pride.

Fond of domestic retirement and the study of phytology, in the cloisters of leaves and beautiful flowers, he avoided the ostentatious glare of fashionable life, and resigned his spirit with serene prospects of felicity, in the seventieth year of his age, at Isleworth, into the hands and keeping of that eternal Being, who never leaves nor forsakes those who put their trust in Him.

Original Poetry.

HUMANITY.

O, dear Humanity! reside with me;
Of all my stars, the brightest thou shalt be!
Rather would I, with unsuspecting heart,
Relieve the one whose feelings do not smart,
Than send a fellow creature from my door
Without a pittance from my trifling store.
How many a one, array'd in decent vest,
With peaceful face, is sadden'd at the breast!
How many a painful throb and sickly care
Steal to the grave those forms which loveliest are!
Come, then, and light the gloom where wretches
pine,
Since thou, of all my stars, shalt brightest shine.

P.

STANZAS.

Tao' sadly changed is my lot
To that when first we met,
Yet think not all that I have felt
Can cause me one regret.

Oh, no! tho' mirth, with laughing eye,
Thou canst not find in me,
There still shall be a soothing smile
For ever kept for thee.

There's many a one I thought sincere
Too soon has prov'd unkind,
Yet never cease I found to doubt
Thy gen'rous noble mind.

And tho' at times I sigh to think
Of those I left for thee,
Dearer than home and kindred too
Is thy true love to me.

ELIZA.

SONG.

Thy cheek of my love is bright as the rose,
With softest blushes beaming;
And her skin will vie with the lily's hue,
In purest whiteness streaming.

Her voice is sweet as the evening breeze
O'er beds of violets straying,
And soft as the harp of Eolus sounds
When summer winds are playing.

But there's still a charm beyond the rest,
To me the most endearing—
Tis the modest glance of her sweet blue eye,
So gentle like appearing.

ELIZA.

LIKE A RAY OF THE MOON.

Like a ray of the moon is my love,
And serene as its beam is her breast;
She's as pure as the spirits above,
That dwell in the realms of the blest!
As bright as the stars are her eyes,
Her breath is as soft and as sweet
As the scent of the rose, as it flies
The sportive young zephyr to meet.

Her soul is as pure as the dew,
That drops on the pale lily's bud,
And her sense is to virtue as true
As the fishes are true to the flood.
To Hymen's blest altar I soon
Shall hie with this beauty so bright,—
I'll be constant as night to the moon,
And as she as the moon to the night.

Tho' the stillness of joy will we rove,
By the light which affection shall shed,
Till, bound by the firm bonds of Love,
We fly to the realms of the dead.
On one breeze shall our spirits then soar,
By one seraph be wafted to heav'n,
And one angel shed purity o'er
Our souls, as our sins are forgiven.

COLIN AND ALICE.

Young Colin was courting fair Alice at eve,
Where the gate, when it shut, them divided;
He had told her his heart, that could never deceive.

But she laugh'd and his innocence chided:
'O, I fear love's a dangerous passion,' she
cried,

'That will visit affection with sorrow,
And we should not so early to care be allied;
Good night! I will tell thee to-morrow—'

A glance and a kiss, with a press of the palm,
Were tokens of sympathy's beating;
Their bosom was puls'd, but their parting was calm,

Though their love-stolen moments were fleet-
ing,
'O, I fear love's a dangerous passion!' she
cried,

'If we wed, that will fill us with sorrow:'
And all the consent he could gain for his bride,
Was,—'Good night! I will tell thee to-morrow!'

MARIA.

THE LILY AND THE ROSE.

FROM THE GAELIC.

UPON a day—a lovely day,
The day that June shook limbs with May,
A day when Nature's breath was balm,
A day of health-inspiring calm,
A day of sunshine and of showers,
A jubilee among the flowers;—
A lily of the vale,

Her snowy hue half changed to pale,
Thus sighing did her grails disclose

To a half-drooping neighbouring rose;
'When buds began to soo and sing,
And Hebe usher'd in the spring—
That spring, you'll understand, I mean,
When lovely Mary was sixteen—
I well remember you and I
That very spring, my love, we wed';
And, borne on a soft zephyr's sigh,
We went and made our bridal bed
Where revelled many a youthful grace
On Mary's love-inspiring face;
Upon her cheek, beneath thy glow,
I shone as pure as mountain snow,

* The Gaelic language places the rose in the masculine gender.

And when I flew to deck her breast—
A bosom then to pain unkind—
Her lips ambrosial joy impress'd,
And borrow'd fragrance not your own;
I, too, did from her breast poison
More than my native loveliness.

'But, ah! misfortune's shafts unkind
Too soon our seats of joy invade—
And when misfortune wrings the mind,
The lily and the rose soon fade—
The brother of her love his low—
We must be gone—ah, day of woe!
But time, perhaps, and Colin's love
May heal her deeply-wounded mind—
For these the sorrows can remove
That in naught else a balm could find—
Then, happy day, we may resume
Upon that lip and neck divine.'

She sighed amid her weight of woe—
Grief stopp'd what more she had to say.
Responsive sighed her spouse, the rose,
As young Hygeia pass'd that way,
And pointed to a waving willow,
Beneath whose shadow Mary lay—
A tuff of downy moss her pillow,
The zephyrs 'midst her locks at play,
And sealed in sleep those eyes of sparkling blue,

That lived in brightness with the morning dew—
Hygeia breathed upon the slumbering maid—
The rose and lily by enchantment flew—
Upon her cheek, her lip, her bosom sped,
Giving their beauties to the ravished rose,
She rose and sought her faithful Colin's side—
A cheerful, graceful, lovely, blooming bride.

AULD DORNEY.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—On Wednesday night, Mr. Kean appeared, for the first time this season, in the character of Brutus, in the tragedy of that name. There are few characters even in the extensive range which Mr. Kean's talents embrace, in which he appears to more advantage than in Brutus. The assumed idiocy under which he veils his indignation and resentment, until it bursts all restraint, and falls with tenfold fury on the head of Tarquin, though requiring great art and skill, was powerfully portrayed by Mr. Kean. In the judgment scene, where the principles of justice, and the love of country triumph over the feelings of a father, he was great; the sternness of the Roman and the affections of the parent were seen struggling with each other, in a manner which excited the pity and admiration of every one capable of the slightest feeling. Mrs. West, who we were happy to see restored to the theatre, played Tarquinia, and in those scenes which afforded any opportunity for her talents, she exerted them in much advantage.

The tragedy of Romeo and Juliet was performed on Tuesday evening, when Mr. Cooper resumed the character in which he first appeared on these boards—that of Romeo: he played it with much spirit and feeling, and Mrs. West was a most tender and loving Juliet; the scene in the garden was very excellent. The Coronation, which has been performed upwards of eighty times, continues to be repeated almost every other evening.

Mrs. Baillie's tragedy of De Montfort is withdrawn; the revival has been as unfortunate as its first trial.

On Thursday night, The Road to Ruin was performed: Old Dornton, by Mr. Munden; Silky, by Mr. Knight; Sulky, by Mr. Gattie; and Goldfinch, by Mr. Harley,—in point of merit, much in the order in which they are placed; but the novelty of the evening was Henry Dornton, for the first time, by Mr. Cooper, in which he excited but small interest, till he became fully sensible that his profligate conduct had brought ruin upon his indulgent father and upon his respected firm; then the strong emotions of affection and remorse, friendship and phrenzy, were forcibly depicted, and to the end of the piece were displayed in appropriate and masterly delineations. Miss Kelly's Sophia was an admirable piece of acting, and the Widow Warren was well sustained by Mrs. Harlowe.

COVENT GARDEN.—The operatized play of The Two Gentlemen of Verona, has been frequently represented during the week, and been as attractive as mere pageants, (for we no longer consider it a play of Shakespeare's, or go to see it as such,) generally are, when got up with the splendour for which this house is distinguished. It is difficult to speak in too high terms of the scenery in this piece. In the fourth act, a carnival is represented, among the entertainments of which are introduced several fancy scenes of such extraordinary lustre and richness as to set language nearly at defiance to describe them adequately. The first presents the square of Milan, with the superb public buildings illuminated. The procession of the Seasons and Elements crosses the stage, in all the profusion of illustrative embellishment which the arts have adapted to the personifying of them.—The buds spring out in blossom, the corn rushes up in ripeness, and the fruits grow suddenly mellow, as the different portions of the procession advance.

The machinery which represents Winter is a highly curious and beautiful specimen of dramatic engineering, but the most splendid and gorgeous of all the scenes exhibited, is Cleopatra's galley sailing down the Cydnus, which comprises all the luxury of description with which historians, poets, and painters have adorned it. It filled the whole frame of the stage, while thunders of admiring applause resounded, instead of the music of the orchestra, to the plying of the oars. The galley is of great size, and is framed on the model of that which Shakespeare has so beautifully described:—

'The barge she sat in, like a bargeah'd throne, Burn'd on the water; the poop was beaten
gold;

Purple the sails;—
—the oars were silver,
Which to the tune of notes kept stroke.

—On each side her
Stood pretty dimpled boys, like smiling cupids,
With divers colour'd fans.

—At the helm
A seeming mermaid steers.'

In consequence of the sudden indisposition of Miss Hallande, who played the character of Sylvia delightfully, it was undertaken, on Saturday evening, by Miss Boyle, a young lady from the Dublin stage, who made a very successful début in the part; and on the following evening she undertook the part of Zelinda, in the play of the Slave, a character about which Miss Stephens has thrown so matchless a charm, as to impose an arduous task on her successor. Miss Boyle, however, sang sweetly and acted prettily, giving considerable promise of future fame.

On Saturday evening, a new farce was produced, called The Two Pages of Frederick the Great. It is founded on the well-known anecdote of the King slipping a purse of gold into the pocket of a sleeping page, in consequence of his discovering that the boy kept himself impoverished by sending his money to relieve the wants of a needy and affectionate mother. In the farce, the distresses of the mother are developed at some length. It appears, that her late husband fell in Frederick's wars, and that she is seeking shelter in the capital from the rapacity of a local magistrate. She arrives at the house of a notable but generous inn-keeper, who, on learning her name and quality, shelters her gladly, and undertakes the responsibility of the pecuniary claim brought against her. The King happens to be in the street, and is made acquainted with the whole affair, just after he has deposited the money in the pocket of the page. The piece ends, of course, with a consummation of good fortune to all those whose conduct turns out to be properly laudable. There is besides this another page, who is a very dashing cavaliero sort of person, though with the warmest feelings of kindness for his fellows.

On Thursday evening, an unfortunate accident occurred at this theatre, during the representation of The Two Gentlemen of Verona. In the bandit scene, Mr. Abbot, who plays Proteus, received a very severe cut in the face, immediately under the eye, from the sword of one of the bandits. He shrieked out loudly, and was carried off the stage. It was thought that the wound was dangerous, but Mr. Egerton afterwards stated from the stage, that it was less severe than was at first thought, and that the eye, which it had been feared was injured, was untouched. The audience, with characteristic sympathy, feeling no wish to see a performance continued which had been attended with so painful a circumstance, called for the piece to be immediately terminated, and the curtain fell.

This is a lively and amusing trifle, without any thing very striking either in story, incident, or dialogue. The two pages, one of a sentimental and the other of a lively disposition, had charming representatives in Miss Foote and Mrs. Chatterley; and Farren, as Frederick, and Mrs. Fawcett, as a generous innkeeper, contributed to the success of the piece, which was decisive.

SURREY THEATRE.—This house terminated a brief autumnal season on Monday night. We understand arrangements are making for opening it with great clat at Christmas, for which the prolific pen of its present actor-manager, Mr. T. Dibdin, is in active employment.

Literature and Science.

A German traveller, of the name of Waldeck, has recently arrived in England, from India, and is preparing an account of his travels through Africa, from Egypt to the Cape of Good Hope. It appears, that at the foot of the mountains of the moon, he found an inscribed pillar, erected by a Roman Consul, about the period of the reign of Vespasian. On the top of these mountains he found a level, nearly four hundred miles broad, on which he discovered a temple of the highest antiquity, and in fine preservation. It is still used for religious purposes by the inhabitants. South of the level he passed a descent of fifty-two days' journey, and, when advanced about nine days, he found the skeleton of a man, with a telescope slung on his shoulder, marked with the name of Harris, and also a chronometer, made by Manchard. There were also two other skeletons, and it was supposed the persons must have perished for want of water.

The author of 'Calthorp' and 'The Mystery' has in the press a tale, intitled 'Lollardy,' founded on the persecutions of the fifteenth century.

Lady Jane Grey and Mary Queen of Scots have found new biographers in Mr. George Howard and Miss Benger.

Royal Society.—On Friday, the 30th ult., St. Andrew's Day, the Royal Society held their Annual Meeting at their apartments in Somerset House, when the President, Sir Humphry Davy, Bart. (after an appropriate address), presented, in the name of the Society, two gold medals (called Sir Godfrey Copley's), one to John Frederick William Herschel, Esq., for his mathematical and optical papers, printed in the Philosophical Transactions; the other to Captain Edward Sabine, for his observations on the magnetic needle and pendulum, made during the late voyage to the Arctic Seas, published in the same work. Afterwards the Society proceeded to the choice of a council and officers for the ensuing year; when, on examining the lists, it appeared that the following gentlemen were elected:—

Capital Punishment in Spain.—The species of capital punishment the proposed penal code recognizes, is the garrote. 'I was curious,' says a recent traveller, 'to see the death inflicted, and I confess that I had no notion it could be caused with so much humanity. A man should witness such a spectacle, as his opinion as to the best mode of its infliction may, one day or other, have an influence. The extinction of life seemed the affair of an instant. The victim occupies a seat which is attached to an upright post, an iron collar is placed round his neck, and strangulation is produced by turning half round a multiplying screw, which brings the collar close to the post. I observed no convulsion—no movement of agony. The garrote is as expeditious as the guillotine, and it sheds no blood. The power of society over human life has always appeared to me a very doubtful question—if life is to be taken, I can conceive no means more fit for its adoption.'

Coats of Arms.—Henry, surnamed the Fowler, Emperor of the West, who regulated the tournaments in Germany, was the first who introduced those marks of honour, armours or coats of arms. Before that time we find nothing upon ancient tombs, but crosses with gothic inscriptions and decorations of persons entombed. The tomb of Clement IV. who died A. D. 1268, is the first whereon we find any arms, nor do they appear struck upon any coins before the year 1336. Camden refers the origin of hereditary arms in England to the time of the first Norman kings.

Review of New Books.

A Voyage to Africa: including a Narrative of an Embassy to one of the interior Kingdoms, in the Year 1820; with Remarks on the Course and Termination of the Niger, &c. By William Hutton, late Acting Consul for Ashantee. Illustrated with Maps and Plates. 8vo. pp. 488. London, 1821.

MR. HUTTON, who has made four voyages to the Gold Coast, engaged himself as secretary to the unfortunate Major Peddie, who, with so many of our adventurous countrymen, perished in the attempt to explore the interior of Africa. The fate and particulars of this expedition are well known, and Mr. Hutton, speaking on the subject, says, 'experience has convinced me that such formidable missions will never succeed in exploring Africa, as the natives are too jealous and too much alarmed at such a force.' Owing to some misunderstanding between the parties, Mr. Hutton did not proceed with Major Peddie; but, in 1820, he formed one of an embassy to Ashantee, under the direction of Mr. Dupuis.

The last mission to Ashantee was in 1817, and was conducted by Mr. Bowdich, under the direction of the African Committee. The object was to conciliate and form a commercial treaty with the King of Ashantee, as well as to gain all the information possible respecting the extent and resources of this kingdom, and the interior of Africa in general. The results of this embassy have been detailed by Mr. Bowdich, in an interesting volume, and it was to strengthen and improve the intercourse thus opened, that the embassy of M. Dupuis and Mr. Hutton was undertaken; and perhaps few persons could have been selected better qualified for the task.

The work of Mr. Hutton may be considered as valuable; for, although much has been conjectured by former travellers, Mr. Hutton has given us the fruit of eleven years' actual observation of those mighty resources opened to us for civilization, 'colony and commerce.' Mr. Bowdich's mission, under the African Committee, pointed out and left much to be done by future embassies, and without wishing to detract from that gentleman's endeavours, we may observe, that the limited circumstances under which his mission was undertaken, deprived it of much of its importance; for it could hardly be expected that the wily monarch of Ashantee would place much faith in treaties entered into with the company's servants—with whom he was in continual squabbles; and, as might have been foreseen, treaties formed and held together by such a slender tenure, were rent by the first shock of a contested palaver. The king, in fact, declared that these treaties had not been properly explained to him by Mr. Bowdich, by whom he said he had been deceived. Mr. Hutton, speaking of an interview with the King of Ashantee, says,—

'In reply to an observation which was made by Mr. Dupuis, that the king had consigned over to the British Government the natives residing under the forts on the coast, his majesty produced the original treaties, and requested me to read them over, and explain the contents to him; which being done, he said that they had not before been properly explained to him, as he never had agreed to give up his power over those people, whom he declared were his subjects, from Apollonia on the west to Danish Accra on the east.'

Our author and his companions, therefore, found the treaties, if not altogether set aside, yet so little adhered to as to be of trifling value. New treaties, in consequence, became necessary, and it required all the address and perseverance of the embassy to place the alliance with the King of Ashantee on a foundation which should leave that powerful monarch no room to fear its infraction. Accordingly, we see, when our ambassadors spread before him the well selected presents sent by the British Government, and heard the proposals that were made, his sable majesty—

'Expressed great satisfaction that the King of England had been pleased to take so much notice of him, to appoint one of his own officers to reside at his capital; and this evidently made the most favourable impression upon all present.

'As soon as the commission was read, the linguists and captains rose, and each of them, in succession, taking one of the king's swords (which was about the size and shape of a bill, with the handle cast in gold, but the blade rusted in blood), flourished it about for two or three minutes, within an inch of Mr. Dupuis's nose. During this time, they made a solemn oath of allegiance and fidelity to his Britannic Majesty. The king rose last and took the same oath; after which, his majesty stated that he was sensible the King of England was a great king, greater than all the other kings in Europe; and that if he wanted ten thousand of the Ashantee troops at any time, they should be ready to march to any part of Africa, to forward the views of his Britannic Majesty. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm with which the king expressed himself upon this occasion in favour of Great Britain; and the delight and satisfaction which beamed on every countenance was most gratifying to our feelings.'

Upon this declaration, our ambassadors acted, and the treaties which are now entered into, rest upon a more durable foundation. Mr. Dupuis and any successor he might appoint as consul were to be recognized; the claim of one thousand six hundred ounces of gold, made on the Governor of Cape Coast, was relinquished; his sable majesty acknowledged allegiance to the King of England—putting to rest all differences and palavers, resolving to encourage mutual commerce, admitting the natives under British protection to be intitled to the protection of British laws, and to be amenable to them only in case of any act of aggression; and stipulating that the path between Cape Coast and Coomassie should, for the future, be kept in good order; half by the British authorities at Cape Coast, and half by the King of Ashantee.

From this, it will appear that the embassy has been conducted with very considerable address, through obstacles difficult to encounter—and through very dangerous and heart-pulling scenes. And too much praise cannot be bestowed on them, for having, in so short a time, accomplished such solid advantages.

Mr. Hutton's observations and suggestions as to the exploration of the noble rivers in the Bights of Benin and Biafra, are made in such feasible terms, that we doubt not but the Colonial Department will largely avail itself of his suggestions, and improve them to the benefit of our country.

We have hitherto only noticed Mr. Hutton's embassy in a political and commercial view; but we must observe that his work contains a good deal of information respecting the country through which he travelled; and, therefore, we shall make a few extracts. Of the haughty conduct of the sable King of Ashantee, we may judge from the following fact:—

'After the King of Ashantee had returned from the war with the Buntokoos, or Adinkiras, so called from their king's name, he sent (as is usual on such occasions) several jaw-bones to Cape Coast, Elmina, Commenda, and Accra, to convince the natives of those towns of his having conquered his enemy, Adinkira. At Commenda, a British settlement, about twenty miles from Cape Coast Castle, the pygmies, or chiefs, drove the king's messengers out of the town, without allowing them even a draught of water, and the boys hooted and pelted them with stones.

'The Ashantee messengers, on being driven from Commenda, proceeded to Cape Coast, where they complained of the ill-treatment they had experienced; but instead of receiving any redress, they were sent back to the King of Ashantee, without being shewn the common rights of hospitality. When his sable majesty became acquainted with it, he sent a messenger to the Governor of Cape Coast, and to the principal men of that town, demanding satisfaction for the insulting conduct of the Commendas, stating that they were under the protection of the Cape Coast natives; and, "therefore," says the king, "you shall give me satisfaction in the present case." He preferred making his demand on the town of Cape Coast, as he well knew the poverty of the Commendas rendered them incapable of paying the penalty; but this demand was refused by the governor-in-chief, principally on account of the message being couched in improper language, and accompanied with insulting advice to the governor, to build the castle-walls higher, and to prepare for the Ashantee army, which, it was intimated, would march to the sea-side in forty days, if the demand were refused. The governor answered, that the king might march his army down in twenty days if he thought proper, as in that time he should be prepared to receive him. This reply gave great offence to the king, who was then at war with the Buntokoos, and several months elapsed before any thing further transpired on this subject; but, at length, his sable majesty's displeasure was manifested by a prohibition of all trade with Cape Coast; and thus was our commercial intercourse interrupted, and the departure of the embassy for a considerable time delayed.'

The Ashantees, we are told, have great powers of oratory, and Mr. H. gives a curious account of a palaver:—

'The criers* of the court having called "silence," Endo began by stating the origin of the dispute, the ill-treatment of the king's messengers by the Commenda people,—the first message sent by the king to the governor, with the governor's answer,—and the king having accepted the present sent him by the governor, while he refused that which was sent by the pygmies of Cape Coast, which evinced his desire to be on friendly terms with the white men, while the contrary was manifest as regarded the natives under the fort, who had given him offence, and, therefore, he refused their present until they had given him satisfaction. Eukassu followed, and stated that no insulting message was sent to the governor, advising him to build the castle-walls higher, and that if the messenger had said so, he was in confinement, and would lose his head. He added, that the king being tired of sending messengers to the governor, had now sent down his nephew, Prince Adoom, with full powers to negotiate and settle the dispute; but that the king demanded one thousand six hundred ounces of gold from the natives of Cape Coast, and the same quantity from the governor, for having broken the treaty.

The substance of the two speeches having been interpreted to the governor and council by the linguist (De Graft), they made answer by desiring the linguist to ask Adoom, or any of his attendants, if ever they heard of a governor of a British fort paying a fine to the King of Ashantee, or to any black men whatever? The reply to this was a negative; when the governor said, "then tell them I am now going to begin."

Upon this spirited reply, a great uproar and confusion ensued, and the meeting broke up; but a second hearing took place some days after, when it was determined that the embassy should immediately depart for Ashantee, with an assurance from Prince Adoom, that Mr. Dupuis and his companions should be protected and allowed to return to Cape

* These criers have a singular appearance, wearing monkey-skin caps, with a gold plate in front, and long tails hanging down their backs; at the end of almost every sentence delivered by the linguist, or person speaking, they call out loudly, "tehawoom! tehawoom!" silence! silence! There are upwards of a hundred of these criers, who attend the linguists, and are all deformed.'

Coast, at any time they thought proper, in the event of the differences not being amicably settled. Accordingly, the day was fixed for our departure, and Prince Adoom agreed to supply three hundred Ashantees and two captains, to conduct the embassy to the capital, and to assist in carrying the presents to the king.'

In travelling to the capital of Ashantee, our author says,—

'Our hammock-men, after travelling eight miles, halted, and expressed a wish to rest until the morning under a large cotton-tree, which spread its lofty branches so as to protect us from the dews of the night. This, however, I was unwilling to listen to, from the impression that it would be better to proceed to the nearest village; but after it became dark, and as our difficulties increased, I registered our departure from the cotton tree; for we found the path so bad, that the hammock-men frequently fell down, and I would willingly have halted for the night if there had been any town at hand to enable us to do so, as we did not travel more than a mile and a half in an hour, and that in the greatest misery. At last we lost our way, when we halted, and after some difficulty in getting a light, we made two large fires in the woods, around which we all seated ourselves for nearly an hour. But as we were exposed to the heavy dew which always falls at night in this part of the world, as well as to the wild beasts which infest the forest, I did not conceive it prudent or safe to remain in this situation; and, notwithstanding the unwillingness of our people to leave the fire, and their intrigues to rest themselves until the morning, I ordered them to proceed, which, after some expressions of dissatisfaction, they complied with.

'Here we entered a miserable hut, and, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, we found several of the natives cutting up a bush hog. We requested them to direct us to the cabocceer's house; but this they were unwilling to do, and regarded us with so much apathy and indifference, not even offering us a draught of water or a seat to rest ourselves after our fatigue, that we felt not a little irritated at their inhospitality. We, therefore, told them that we were travelling to the king of Ashantee, and exposing ourselves, at that late hour of the night, for their benefit, to settle the palaver between the Ashantees and Cape Coast people, and once more requested them to shew us where the cabocceer lived. Reasoning, however, with these barbarians, had no effect, and finding them still immovable, I was so provoked by their conduct, that I drew my sabre, and told them, if they did not instantly lead the way to the cabocceer's house, I would cut their ears off. This threat (however puny it may appear to those who have no apprehension of losing their ears in such a barbarous manner) had the desired effect; for the man who was cutting up the bush hog

The next morning, at five o'clock, we mustered our hammock-men and baggage-bearers, and set off for Paintrey. Just as we were leaving the town, a messenger arrived from the caboccer, with his compliments, saying he would pay his respects to us; but this mark of distinction we declined, as we had got into our hammocks, and were anxious to proceed on our journey. We passed through several rooms, which had been deserted in consequence of disputes with the Ashantees. The path was chiefly through a wood, but occasionally led us into an open plain for a short distance, where the picturesque scenery and luxuriant foliage burst upon us with a pleasing effect, and the diversity of hill and dale was not wanting.

The high Guinea grass and bush were particularly unpleasant to our feet and legs, from the dews which had fallen in the night; and the hammock-men being fatigued, we got out and walked about two miles, to relieve them as well as ourselves, being tired from sitting so long in one posture.

As his majesty's government has taken the forts from the African Committee, Mr. H. recommends the cultivation and civilization of that part of Africa called Paintrey or Doonqua, which is nineteen miles beyond Cape Coast; not merely by sending missionaries, but by also teaching the Negroes the advantages of industry:—

The natives of Paintrey live chiefly upon plantains, yams, cankey, and dried sea-fish, which they get from the coast. The flesh of monkeys and deer, which are very abundant all over the country, they frequently make soups of. Soup is also made from the oil of the palm-nut, and is a common dish. The Europeans, indeed, are very fond of it, when made into what is called a black soup, which is frequently sent to table at relish (luncheon). A mess of it was once dished up in London, at the house of a gentleman who had been in Africa, and was considered a great treat. The nut, if roasted when young, is very pleasant to the taste, and when old, the oil is expressed from it, which is of a red colour, and very rich. They have besides plenty of poultry, sheep, and hogs, but do not commonly indulge in this sort of food, as it is too expensive, and they prefer reserving these articles to sell to any principal men, either in the town or to travellers.

During the day, the higher orders amuse themselves chiefly in sitting about in lazy postures, drinking palm-wine, and talking palavers, which they are very clever at, and seem never so happy as when they have a good subject to debate upon, which, indeed, they are seldom at a loss for. They have also a game called worree, or worra, with which they often amuse themselves, but I could not understand it. Bowditch says it is played in Syria, but gives no account of it, neither can I, further than that they have a small board, with fourteen holes cut in it, large enough to admit pebbles about the size of the marble, which boys in England play with, and these pebbles are tossed from one hole to the other by the persons at play. A great part of the morning is regularly devoted to washing themselves, from head to foot, which they do by sitting on a small stool in the middle of their court-yard, and sometimes in the open streets, as they do not pay much regard to privacy on these occasions. After washing, they grease their skins with a vegetable ointment, called Ashantee grease, which comes from the interior, and is very pure and useful, being extracted from a tree called tinkeka; it is frequently used for rheumatic pains, and as a salve for sores, &c. and much esteemed at Ashantee, as well as on the coast. It is supposed to be the shea butter mentioned by Park, and is known all over the coast. I met with it several years ago in the Gaboon river and other places.

Palm wine is the common beverage, not only at Paintrey, but all over the coast, as well as in the interior, but I never tasted any so good as at this place. The natives drink it occasionally during the day, as well as at meals, but after three o'clock in the afternoon it turns sour, and is not fit for use. It is brought from the tree every morning early, and is procured in the following manner: a hole is made in the thick part of the tree, and in this hole a small tube is inserted, through which the palm wine passes, and drops into a pot, which is placed underneath at night, so as to fill by the morning; but this it seldom does, as it distils very slowly. The tree yields wine for twenty or thirty days, and when perfectly drained, withers. As the country abounds with palm trees, there is seldom or ever any scarcity of wine. This tree, I have already mentioned, produces the palm-nut, as well as the palm wine, and is very valuable to the natives; it also produces the bamboo, which is used for rafters for the houses. The age of the palm tree, at its maturity, is about ten years. It seldom yields more than fifteen or twenty gallons of wine. The height of its trunk is about five feet, but the branches shoot out at least fifteen feet. We passed a great many of these trees on the path, some of which were in a decayed state, having the wine drawn off, and consequently deprived of all their nourishment.

The great value of the palm tree is, perhaps, felt as much by Europeans as the natives; for, besides the supply of beverage and soups made from the oil of the nut, (both of which they are almost as fond of as the natives themselves,) it is also used instead of yeast in making bread; and during the rainy season at Cape Coast, I have frequently been obliged to go without bread at my breakfast, in consequence of not being able to get any palm wine the day before.

I have already mentioned that wine I have drank here is better than I ever tasted on the coast, but this is to be accounted for by our getting it pure from the tree, as our house-master, Quarante Hoynesse, (who is exceedingly attentive and obliging,) sent one of his slaves to a-day to get it fresh; whereas at Cape Coast, the natives take good care to adulterate it with water, although, even in that state, it is very intoxicating. It is a sweet, pleasant, and wholesome beverage, if not taken in too large quantities. When it is drank to excess, it not only intoxicates, but it is said to create some pleasant effects upon the body. A gentleman, who was many years governor of Apollonia, informed me, that he particularly observed this among the natives at that place, where the palm wine is procured in great perfection, as well as at the settlements in the Ashanta country.

We shall now give an account of the reception of the embassy at Coomassie, the capital of Ashantee, to which we shall conclude for the present:—

On entering the capital, we were welcomed by thousands of people, men, women, children, crowding in all directions to us. The courtesie of people was so immense, I should suppose not less than fifty thousand, besides warriors. The principal streets, and the avenues leading from them, were completely crowded with all descriptions. The porticoes of the houses were crowded with the ladies of Coomassie, who were greeted by some women, and courteously handed their hands to us as we passed. The young girls, not more than thirteen or fourteen years of age, and dressed in the best clothes, followed us from our entrance into the capital, and kept close to our hammocks, smiling, and appearing, by their looks and gestures, to invite us to notice them. The shouts of the multitude, and the noise of the drums, horns, and flutes, made it impossible to hear the sound of our bugle, which our buglers kept almost constantly blowing before. Many thousands had flocked from various parts of the country, for at least thirty miles round the capital, to witness our entry.

In the first place, we were conducted by our Ashantee guide to the palace. Here we halted under some trees, at which the presents were deposited; we were almost immediately attended by a party of the king's body guard, in uniform, the same as is worn by our soldiers at the Cape. They were drawn up in a line on our right to keep us off, which we much required, as the heat was very oppressive. The spirit firmness which these men manifested on one or two occasions, in driving back the mob that pressed upon us too closely, convinced me of their good discipline. While we were thus amused in reflecting on the novelty and variety of objects which surrounded us, one of the Ashantee captains (Adoo Quamina) rode past on a fine white horse, but did not appear to notice us. After waiting about half an hour, we received a message from the king that his majesty was ready to receive us. This message was conveyed by the executioner, who was loaded with massy gold ornaments, and had a solid gold hatchet upon his breast. He was an amazing strong and powerful man, and wore a war-cap, with eagle's feathers (as represented in the plate of Adoo Quamina), and having his face painted, was altogether a terrific figure.

Proceeding a short distance, we were once more desired to halt, which we did for about ten minutes, when we again moved on slowly to the assembly of cabboceers and captains, who, with their warriors and attendants, were drawn up in a circle, leaving room sufficient for us to walk round and shake hands with every person of consequence.

We entered this circle a few minutes after four o'clock. Here a splendid spectacle presented itself: at least twenty thousand warriors, with bright muskets and long Danish guns, now appeared in view, and a hundred bands of music began to play at the same moment. The king and his captains, many of whom had been summoned to the capital upon this occasion from distant parts of the kingdom, were all dressed in cloths of the richest manufacture, and decorated with ornaments of the purest gold and aggré beads. Their banners and flags of different nations, English, Dutch, and Danish, and at least a hundred large umbrellas, were seen in every direction. The majestic appearance of the cabboceers and captains, the richness of their dresses, the glittering and costly gold ornaments which were seen every where, as far as the eye could reach, had a most imposing effect, and left us for a moment in doubt whether we were not then in the presence of the king; but our guide, Captain Adoo, who preceded us upon this occasion, with our linguist, to point out those men possessed of most power and influence, informed us that the chiefs we then saw were only some of the king's captains. We, therefore, shook hands with them and passed on. Mr. Dupuis going first, followed by myself and the other officers of the embassy. As Mr. Dupuis preceded me, I had the advantage of seeing that some of the inferior captains, with whom he did not shake hands, appeared to look sullen and displeased, and whenever I observed this, I made a point of conciliating them by shaking their hands as well as the superior chiefs. This I could perceive had a great effect, and produced an instantaneous smile, accompanied by expressions of their approbation of what they evidently appeared to consider a condescension.

We passed nearly the whole assembly of cabboceers before we reached the king. His majesty was seated in a low chair, the back of which was profusely studded with gold nails, and ornamented with small pieces of gold. His chair was elevated a little, and placed about a yard in the back-ground; a small avenue was formed by his attendants in front of him, so that we had to step out of the circle to approach the throne. His majesty and all his captains were screened from the sun, by large umbrellas or canopies, made of scarlet and other cloth, capable of covering thirty or forty people, crowned on the top with elephants, crescents, &c. of gold. The king appeared about forty-five years of age, and rather corpulent; his cloth was a rich green silk, and he wore a necklace of aggré beads and small pieces of gold. Saphires, rased in gold, were suspended over his shoulder, and he had a number of gold rings upon his fingers, and gold castanets on his finger and thumb. His wrists, knees, and ankles were richly adorned with bracelets and knee-bands of the finest gold and aggré beads; and his sandals were of white leather, curiously worked and neatly ornamented. His features were remarkably handsome, his head was entirely shaved, with the exception of a small part on the left of the crown, about the size of a guinea, and his beard (of which he is extremely proud) was at least three inches long.

On appearing in the royal presence, we all took off our hats, and each of us, in regular succession, advanced and shook hands with his majesty. We were received in the most condescending and affable manner, and his majestic and dignified deportment surprised and delighted us. He was evidently much pleased at the mark of distinction which we paid him in taking off our hats, although he did not appear the least surprised.

It has been justly observed, that—

"A king's face—
Should give grace;"

and it may be truly said of this African monarch that he possesses such a face; a mild and pleasing countenance—open, lively, and animated; and a quick and penetrating eye. Indeed, I never saw a more handsome or dignified black man.

The guards behind his majesty wore belts cased in gold; the royal stool was also cased in gold, and displayed, under a large umbrella, with drums, horns, &c. of the same metal; and the breasts of all his majesty's attendants were decorated with stars, crescents, &c. of the purest gold.

Apokoo, the chief general of Ashantee, made a grand display of gold ornaments, and I particularly observed that the king's scales and weights, the blow-pipe, and box, were of solid gold.

The chamberlain, the gold-blower, the captain for royal executions, and the other officers of the household, were severally pointed out by our guide, and were all adorned with massy gold ornaments. The cook displayed his majesty's plate, consisting of immense large bowls, salvers, tankards, tea and coffee-pots, some of which were of English, but the most of Portuguese manufacture.

As soon as we had passed the king and the officers of his household, we shook hands with Adosee and the other three principal linguists, who were seated on the right hand of his majesty, and were loaded with a profusion of ornaments of the purest gold; their gold caps were elevated before them.

It is impossible to describe correctly so much splendour and novelty as was upon this occasion displayed; but what has been said, will give some idea of the riches of Ashantee, and our reception at the capital.

Time's Telescope for 1833; or, a Complete Guide to the Almanack: containing an Explanation of Saint Days and Holidays, Contemporary Biography, Astronomical Occurrences in every Month, and the Naturalist's Diary. To which are prefixed, Outlines of Conchology, &c. &c. 12mo. pp. 314. London.

There is not an annual periodical, we had almost said a periodical of any description, which we greet with half the pleasure that we do the 'Time's Telescope'; for while almanacks, pocket-books, souvenirs, remembrances, &c. like dogs, have their day, (or rather their year,) 'Time's Telescope' is ever pleasing, ever new. It would, perhaps, be difficult to find so many estimable qualities concentrated in one individual, as the author of this delightful little annual displays—a strong moral feeling, an ardent love of nature, a fine taste, diligent research, and liberality of sentiment;—these breathe in almost every page of his work, and must make it respected and admired 'by saint, by sinner, and by sage.'

Presuming that the eight volumes of 'Time's Telescope' which have preceded the one before us, have made it pretty extensively known, we shall only observe, that it improves as it advances, and that its sires and grandsons to the seventh or eighth generation, need not blush for their distant offspring. Although no single extract can give an adequate idea of a work so various, yet we shall hazard one from the Introduction, which forms an admirable treatise on Conchology, &c.

fessing that it is probable our selection has rather been suggested by our supper, in this instance, than our judgment:—

'Ostrea, oyster and scallop; inhabitant, a Tethys.

'This shell-fish is widely distributed, being found in the seas of Europe, Asia, and Africa. But since the days of the Luxurious Romans, the oysters of Britain have been held in the highest estimation. They were noted in the time of Juvenal, when, satyrizing an epicure, says,—

'He, whether Circe's rock his oysters bore,
Or Lucrine lake, or distant Richborough's shore,
Knew at first taste.'

'The luxurious Romans were very fond of this fish, and had their lucres or stewers for oysters as we have at present. The ancients ate them raw, and sometimes roasted. They had also a custom of stewing them with mallows and docks, or with fish, and esteemed them very nourishing. Oysters are found on various parts of our coasts, from the southern shores of England to the sheltered bays among the Zetland Islands; but those chiefly celebrated for them are the coasts of Essex and Suffolk: here they are dredged up by means of a net, (with an iron scraper at the mouth,) which is dragged by a rope from a boat over the beds. As soon as taken from their native beds, they are stored in pits formed for the purpose, furnished with sluices; through which, at spring tides, the water is suffered to flow. This water, being stagnant, soon becomes green in warm weather, and in a few days afterwards oysters acquire the same tinge, which renders them of greater value in the market; but they do not acquire their full quality, and become fit for sale, till the end of six or eight weeks. The principal breeding-time of oysters is in the months of April and May, when they cast their spawn, or spats, as the fishermen call them, upon rocks, stones, shells, or any other hard substance that happens to be near the place where they lie, to which the spats immediately adhere. These, till they obtain their firm or crust, are somewhat like the drop of a candle, but are of a greenish hue. The substances to which they adhere, of whatever nature, are called cultch. From the spawning time until about the end of July, the oysters are said to be sick, but by the end of August they become perfectly recovered. During these months they are out of season, and are bad eating.

'The oyster fishery of our principal coasts is regulated by a court of admiralty. In the month of May, the fishermen are allowed to take the oysters, in order to separate the spawn from the cultch, the latter of which is thrown in again, for the purpose of preserving the bed for the future. After this month, it is felony to carry away the cultch, and otherwise punishable to take any oyster, between whose shells, when closed, a stirling will rattle. The reason of the heavy penalty on destroying the cultch is, that when this is taken away, the ouse will increase, and muscles and cockles will breed on the bed and destroy the oysters, by gradually occupying all the places on which the spawn should be cast. There is likewise some penalty for not treading on and killing, or throwing on shore, any star-fish that happen to be seen.

'The prickly star creeps on with full deceit,
To force the oyster from his close retreat.
When gaping lids their widened void display,
The watchful star thrusts in a pointed ray,
Of all its treasures spoils the ridged case,
And empty shells the sandy hillocks grace.'

'The common oyster (o. edulis) is contented to remain fixed to his first station, surrounded by an innumerable progeny, continually increasing with wonderful fecundity. His motions consist only in turning from one side to the other, which he accomplishes more by sagacity than any natural agility or inherent strength. He contrives to bolster up one side by a gradual deposition of soft mud, till he stands nearly upright; then, availing himself of the flowing or ebbing of the tide, he opens his shell, and is tumbled on by the pressure of the water. And as expedition is not his object, this mode may answer well. It has, however, been observed, that the young fry possess the power of swimming very swiftly by means of an undulatory motion of the branchiae. The poet of nature thus characterizes the oyster:—

'Condemned to dwell
For ever in his native shell;
Obedient to move when others please,
Not for his own content or ease;
But tossed and buffeted about,
Now in the water, and now out:

Yet in his grotto-work inclosed,
He nothing feels in that rough coat,
Save when the knife is at his throat;
Wherever driven by wind or tide,
Exempt from every ill beside.'—COWPER.

'Strong locomotive powers have been attributed to the scallop, which are, it is said, exerted in a most singular manner. A very rapid progress is effected by the sudden opening and closing of the shell. This is done with so much muscular force as to throw it four or five inches at a time. In the water, an equal dexterity is evinced by the animal, in raising himself to the surface, directing his course ad libitum, and suddenly, by the shutting of his valves, dropping to the bottom. The scallop was held in high estimation by the ancients, and is still sought after in Catholic countries. The pecten maximus is frequently used in England. It is found gregarious in moderately deep water, and is taken up by the dredge. It is pickled and barrelled for sale, and esteemed a great delicacy. The fishermen suppose that they are taken in the greatest quantity after a fall of snow. Another species, the pecten opercularis, is employed for culinary purposes in Cornwall, where it is known by the name of frills or queens. In the Frith of Forth, this species is frequently dredged up along with oyster, but it is thrown, by the Newhaven fishermen, to the dunghill, along with sea urchins and star-fish. The scallop was commonly worn by pilgrims on their hat or the cape of their coat, as a mark that they had crossed the sea in their way to the holy land; in commemoration of which this shell is still preserved in the armorial bearings of many families of distinction.'

Illustrations of Biblical Literature.

By the Rev. James Townley.

(Concluded from p. 770.)

MR. TOWNLEY takes such an able and comprehensive view of the history of biblical literature, that no analysis, confined to the limits we could allow it, would be in the least satisfactory to the inquisitive reader; we shall therefore confine our notice to a few extracts, and, first, of the ignorance and superstition of the tenth century:—

'The tenth century, which presents one of the darkest periods of the Christian era, was an age of the profoundest ignorance, and of the most degraded superstition. Some, who filled the highest situations in the church, could not so much as read, while others, who pretended to be better scholars and attempted to perform the public offices, committed the most egregious blunders. In Spain, books were become so scarce, that one and the same copy of the Bible, St. Jerome's Epistles, and some volumes of ecclesiastical offices and martyrologies, served several monasteries; and in the famous monastery of Iona, there seems to have been, in the ninth century, no other work, even of the fathers than one of the writings of Chrysostom. Germailus, a Spanish bishop, by his will, bearing date A. D. 953, bequeathed about sixteen volumes of books to certain religious houses, with the express condition that no abbot should be permitted to transfer them to any other place; but that they should be kept for the monks of the monasteries specified in the will, who should accommodate each other as much as possible in the use of them. The will is subscribed by the King and Queen, as well as by bishops and other persons of rank.

'Of the deplorable state of religion, and of the wretched superstition that reigned in this and several succeeding centuries, no other proof need be adduced than that of the FEAST OF THE ASS, celebrated in several churches in France, in commemoration of the Virgin Mary's flight into Egypt. This festival was celebrated at Beauvais, on the 14th of January. They chose a beautiful young woman, whom they richly attired, and placed a lovely infant in her arms. She then mounted an ass richly caparisoned, and rode in procession, followed by the bishop and clergy, from the Cath-dral to the church of St. Stephen, where she was placed near the altar, and high mass commenced. Instead, however, of the usual responses by the people, they were taught to imitate the braying of the ass; and at the conclusion of the service, the priest, instead of the usual words with which he dismissed the people, brayed three times, and the people brayed or uttered the imitative sounds Hinham! Hinham! Hinham! During the ceremony, the following ludicrous composition, half Latin, half French, was sung with great vociferation in praise of the ass:—

TRANSLATION.

‘From the country of the East
Came this strong and handsome beast,—
This able ass, beyond compare,
Heavy loads and packs to bear.

Now, Seigneur Ass, a noble Bray;
That beauteous mouth at large display;
Abundant food our hay-locks yield,
And oats abundant load the field.

True it is, his pace is slow,
Till he feel the quick’ning blow,—
Till he feel the urging god,
Ou his buttock well bestow’d.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

He was born on Shechem’s hill,
In Reuben’s vales he fed his fill!
He drank of Jordan’s sacred stream,
And gambled in Bethlehem.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

See that broad majestic ear!
Born he is the yoke to wear;
All his fellows he surpasses,—
He’s the very lord of asses!

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

In leaping he excels the fawn,
The deer, the colts upon the lawn;
Less swift the dromedaries ran,
Boasted of in Midian.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

Gold from Araby the blest,
Saba myrrh, of myrrh the blest,
To the church this ass did bring;
We his sturdy labours sing.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

While he draws the loaded wain
Or many a pack, he don’t complain;
With his jaws, a noble pair,
He doth crunch his homely fare.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

The bearded barley and its stem,
And thistles yield his fill of them;
He assists to separate,
When it’s a thresh’d, the chaff from wheat.

Now, Seigneur Ass, &c.

Amen! Bray, most honoured ass,
Sated now with grain and grass;
Amen repeat, Amen reply,
And disregard antiquity!

‘The final chorus, as given by Du Cange,’ is certainly an imitation of assine braying; and when performed by the whole congregation, must have produced a most unharmonious symphony.

- We give the translation only.—REV.
- † Here the ass is made to bend his knees.
- ‡ The final chorus is as follows:—
- ‘Hez va! hez va! hez va he!
- Biaix Sire Asses car aliez;
- Belle byeue car chapitre.’

‘M. Millin has published an account of this festival, as practised in the cathedral of Sens, in the thirteenth century. The details are taken from a manuscript missal of that church, now kept in the town library, originally composed by Pierre Corbeil, Archbishop of Sens, who died June, 1822. The MS. is said to be beautifully written, and the covers of it to be ornamented with representations of all the operations of vintage, and other analogous mythological subjects. At the time the missal was written, the ceremonies were become entirely bacchanalian and impious. The priests were besmeared with lees of wine, and entered the choir dancing and singing obscene songs; the deacons and sub-deacons prepared the altar by eating in the filthiest manner, and playing cards upon it, whilst the priest was celebrating mass; pieces of old shoes were put into the censor, and burnt instead of incense; and the deacons and their companions were afterwards carried through the streets in carts, practising various indecencies. For several days, the most disgusting and extravagant actions were continued, and riot, drunkenness, and wanton singing, universally prevailed, both among the clergy and laity.

‘Attempts were made at different periods to suppress these sordid superstitions, but, unfortunately, without success. Maurinus, Bishop of Paris, who died in 1196, laboured to abolish them, but the missal already noticed, which appears to have been drawn up ex officio, shews how completely he failed. In 1245, Odo, Bishop of Sens, prohibited the offensive disguises, and repressed some of the mummeries and licentiousness, which had become part of the festival, but did not remove the whole, for, in 1444, the Faculty of Theology, at the request of several bishops, wrote to all the prelates and chapters to abolish this custom. It is nevertheless evident, by the acts of the council held in 1400, that the grossnesses merely of this ceremony were retracted. The council forbids caricature habits, false and uncouth singing, and orders, that on the precentor of the fools, as he was called on this occasion, not more than three pails of water, at most, should be thrown, and on the other naked men, only one pail each, and that not within the church: the other ceremonies, if practised out of the church, were permitted. From so gentle a remonstrance, it could not be expected that the festival would be materially checked; and we are not surprised to learn that it was officially permitted by acts of the Chapter of Sens, in 1513 and 1517. Still later permissions are found, but with gradual prohibition of indecencies, till, at length, it ceased towards the end of the sixteenth century.

‘This ridiculous festival was not limited to France; Michaelis, who supposes that annual fairs originated in the conventions of the people for religious purposes, conjectures that one of the German annual fairs, denominated Mäusen, from the masses formerly said at those times, owed its rise to some ceremony of this kind. The fair is held on the Wednesday after Easter, near Querfurt, in the place called the Area Meadow. In England, Robert Grosseteste, or Greathead, Bishop of Lincoln, in the eleventh century, ordered his dean and chapter to abolish the Feast of Asses, which had been annually celebrated in Lincoln Cathedral on the feast of the Circumcision, on account of its licentiousness.

‘The festival itself probably derives its origin from that principle of accommodation to the manners and prejudices of the people, which led to the adoption of rites and ceremonies in imitation of the Pagans: the Coronation of the Ass was a part of the ceremony of the feast of Vesta, an honour conferred upon this quadruped because, according to the Pagan mythology, it had by its braying saved Vesta from being ravished by the Lampadon god.’

‘We shall now detach a few amusing anecdotes of the ignorance of the clergy at various periods, from the 14th to the 16th centuries inclusive. Wiclif said, that in his time there “were many unable curates that kunnen not the ten commandments, ne read ther Sauter, ne understood a verse of it;” and Edward III. complained to the Pope, “that the encouragements of religion were bestowed upon unqualified mercenary foreigners, who neither resided in the country nor understood its language.”

‘Lewis Beaumont, bishop of Durham, was one instance, among many, of the necessity of Edward’s remonstrance. He was a very lame and illiterate French nobleman, so incapable of reading and spelling, that he could not, although he had studied them, read over the bulls announced to the people at his consecration. At the word “metropolitane,” he paused, tried in vain to repeat it, and at last said, “Soit pour di,”—(suppose that said.) Then he came to—“In Enigmat:” this puzzled him again. “Par St. Louis,” said he, “il n’est pas courtois qui a écrit cette parole ici,”—(by St. Louis, it could be no gentleman who wrote this stuff.)

‘In the middle of the fifteenth century, the study of the Scriptures was far from being general, and the most profound ignorance reigned amongst the major part even of the clergy. Few of them, comparatively, were acquainted with the Latin, though constantly used in the offices of the church, whilst feasting and debauchery are declared to have been their ordinary occupations.’

‘In 1448, Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, on the presentation of Merton Priory, in Surrey, instituted a rector of the parish of Sherfield, in Hampshire. The rector, however, previously took an oath before the bishop, that, on account of his insufficiency in letters, and defects of knowledge in the superintendence of souls, he would learn Latin for the two following years; and that, at the end of the first year, he would submit himself to be examined by the bishop, concerning his progress in grammar, and that if, on a second examination, he should be found deficient, he would resign his benefice.'

Prior to the publication of the Greek Testament by Erasmus, not a copy could be procured in all Germany, and the original languages of the Scriptures were not only generally neglected but the study of them was despised:—

'Even Latin, the common language of their religious services, was so little understood by the monkish clergy, that the most ridiculous mistakes were made by them, both in the performance of their offices and in their writings; an instance is related of one, who, instead of the usual form in baptism, was accustomed to say, "Baptizo te in nomine Patrie et Filie, et Spiritus Sancti"; of another who when he had received letters of recommendation for orders, couched in these terms, "Otto Dei gratia, rogat vestram clementiam, ut velitis istum clericum conducere ad Vestrum Diaconum;" and was ordered to read the epistle, which was considerably abbreviated in the writing, was so totally ignorant of the Latin, as to form the abbreviations into the following unmeaning words. "Otto Dei gram, rogat vestram clam, ut velit istum clincum clancum, convertere in vivum Diabolum;" and of a third, who for "famus Dei," constantly repeated "mulus Dei."

'The grossest ignorance of the Scriptures prevailed, not only among the laity, but also among many of the clergy. Degrees in divinity were conferred upon those who had scarcely ever read the Bible; and numbers of divines were far advanced in life, before they had ever seen one! In the year 1510, the university of Wittenberg registered in its acts Andrew Carolstadt, afterwards one of the reformers, as being sufficientissimus, fully qualified for the degree of doctor, which he then received: though he afterwards acknowledged that he never began to read the Bible till eight years after he had received academical honours. Albert, Archbishop and Elector of Mentz having accidentally found a Bible lying on a table, in 1530, opened it, and having read some pages, exclaimed, "Indeed I know not what Book this is; but this I see, that every thing in it is against us." Gerard Listerius in his note on the Moria Encomium of Erasmus says, I have known many doctors in divinity, as they were called, who have candidly acknowledged that they were fifty years of age, before they had read the Epistles of St. Paul;" and Musculus affirms that, prior to the Reformation, "many priests and pastors had not so much as seen a Bible."

'Andrew Forman, Bishop of Murray and Papal Legate for Scotland, being obliged to say grace at an entertainment which he gave to the Pope and Cardinals in Rome, blundered so in his latinity, that his Holiness and their Eminences lost their gravity, which so disconcerted the Bishop that he concluded the blessing by giving "all the false carles to the devil, in nomine patrie, filii, et sancti spiritus;" to which the company not understanding his Scots-Latin, said Amen!'

We might much extend these extracts, but must close with observing that Mr. Townley's Biblical Literature is one of the most curious, interesting, and valuable works, that ever came under our critical notice.

LIVES OF EMINENT SCOTSMEN.

THE Fourth Part of this elegant little work contains the lives of Alexander Hume, John Bellenden, Mark Alexander Boyd, William Wilkie, Robert Fergusson, William Julius Mickle, Alexander Geddes, and James Grahame.

As we have already expressed our very favorable opinion of the literary merits and interest which this work possesses, we shall now only say, that the fourth part is written with all that spirit, liberality, and critical acumen, which distinguish its predecessors from the general mass of biographies. With the impression that many of our readers think as we do, we shall only give one short extract in support of our opinion. It is a critical estimate of the poetical talents of Grahame, the author of the 'Sabbath':—

'In proceeding to examine Mr. Grahame's pretensions as a poet, it is difficult to divest one's self entirely of the prejudice which his virtues are calculated to excite in favour of his muse. But, making every allowance on this ground, no ordinary share of praise must still be his due. The most important exception probably, which can be taken to his works, is, that they are almost all too exclusively religious to attract the attention of the general reader. Perhaps it would be no misrepresentation of the spirit of any age with which we are acquainted, if we except only the canting age of Cromwell, to say, that such topics rather repel than invite the curiosity which so much befriended a writer. A like devotional character distinguished one of Grahame's oldest precursors in descriptive writing—Hume, of Logie,—to whom, indeed, he bears a very striking resemblance. Both of them belonged originally to the profession of the law, and both abandoned it for the church; both cultivated poetry with a view to religious edification, and both have studiously refrained from all reference to that tenderness, though most selfish, of human passions, Love; lastly, both have fixed on subjects nearly alike as possible—the one celebrating the beauties of a Summer's Day, the other of the Sabbath, "the halcyon day." In the scale of merit, however, there is a great distance between the two. Although Grahame, like Hume, excels from his theme, he does not, him, omit to call up other strong emotions of the heart in its stead; altho' he looks on woman with no impassioned feeling, he does not banish her from view entirely. We have, in the Sabbath Day, no such meetings of lovers as with the utmost truth of painting described in the ballad of Logan Water.

"Awe mair at Leg in kirk will be Meet wi' mi, or when it's mirk,
Convoy me hame frae Logan Kirk."

'But we have, "at the close of living prayer," the affecting spectacle of youth and loveliness consigned to grave:—

"Again that kneel! The slow procession
The pall withdrawn, Death's altar, thine board"

With melancholy ornaments (the name),
The record of her blossoming age, appears
Unveiled; and on it dust to dust is thrust
The final rite. Oh! hark, that sullen song
Upon the lower'd bier the shovell'd clay Falls fast, and fills the void:—

'Nor, though averse to introduce us of love into the day consecrated to heaven, does Grahame appear to have shed any thing of a lover's feeling. For example, his description in the elegy, of two lovers, on an excessively thirty-first of December night:—

"To meeting lovers now no hill is steep
No river fordless, and no forest dark;
And when they meet, unheeded sweet
blust;

Unfelt the snow, as erst from summer's
Around them fell a shower of fading flowers
Shook by the sighing of the evening breeze

'Hume is simply pleasing; Grahame is impressive, often pathetic. The dwells on external objects alone, and other penetrates into the inmost recesses of our heart. Still, considering either merely as writers anxious to be popular by the shortest road, it may be acknowledged, that, on account of peculiarly religious character of their writings, they equally mistook their way.

'The next point to be noticed in manner in which Grahame has executed the design which he had conceived this will be better illustrated by a few quotations taken at random, than by a long and tedious analysis. If the following passages are not capable of affording some of the highest pleasures in the perusal, no of commentary can raise them to that distinction; if, on the other hand, the capability of delighting without such reference; it is, after all, the undertone of more ingenious than useful labour into the components of that enthusiasm, which, by one sweep of its hand has done the business already.

'The dawn of the Sabbath—its difference from the dawn of every other morn—is thus strikingly introduced.

'How still the morning of the hallow'd day!
Mute is the voice of rural labour,—hush'd
The ploughboy's whistle and the milkmaid's song.

The scythe lies glittering in the dew wreath
Of tided grass, mingle'd with fading flowers,
That yesternoon bloom'd waving in the breeze.
Sounds the most faint attract the ear,—the hum
Of early bee, the trickling of the dew,
The distant blessing midway up the hill.

Calanities sits thron'd on yon unmoving cloud.
To him who wanders o'er the upland leas,
The blackbird's note comes mellow from the dale;

And sweeter from the sky the gladsome lark
Warbles his heaven-tan'd song; the tolling brook

Murmurs more gently down the deep-worn glen,
While from yon lowly roof, whose curling smoke

O'mounts the mist, is heard at intervals
The voice of Psalms, the simple song of praise.'

'The burial of beauty has been already incidentally noticed, and the conclusion quoted; the preceding part of this episode is still more remarkable for the spirit and pathos of genuine poetry.

"But wood and wild, the mountain and the
dale,

The house of prayer itself—no place inspires
Emotions more accordant with the day,
Than does the field of graves, the land of rest:
Off, at the close of evening prayer, the toll,
The solemn funeral-toll, pausing, proclaims
The service of the tomb; the homeward crowds
Divide on either hand; the pomp draws near,
The choir to meet the dead go forth, and sing
'I am the Resurrection and the Life.'
Ah me! these youthful beavers, robed in white,
They tell a mournful tale: some blooming friend

Is gone,—dead in her prime of years;—'twas she,—

The poor man's friend, who, when she could not give,

With angel tongue, pleaded to those who could;
With angel tongue and mild beseeching eye,
That ne'er besought in vain, save when she pray'd

For longer life, with heart resign'd to die—
Rejoic'd to die, for happy visions bless'd
Her voyage's last days, and, hovering round,
Alighted on her soul, giving peace.

That heaven was nigh. O, what a burst
Of rapture from her eyes! what tears of joy
Her heavenward eyes suffus'd!—Those eyes are closed,

But all her loveliness is not yet flown.

She smil'd in death, and still her cold pale face
Retains that smile, as when a waveless lake,
In which the wintry stars all bright appear,
Is sheeted by a nightly frost, with ice,
Still it reflects the face of Heaven, unchanged,
Unmuffled by the breeze or sweeping blast."

ON THE ARCHITECTURE OF THE ANCIENT ROMANS.

The architecture of the ancient Romans, under their first kings, has been already shown to have been derived from that of the Etruscans. This people, a colony from Greece, were antecedent to all the

• From 'Elmes's Lectures on Architecture.'

rest of the Italian peninsula in cultivating the arts, which they had practised even before the reputed time of Cadmus.
All their arts were derived from Greece, by the migration of the Pelasgi. The architecture of Etruria should be considered more as a style, and as a school of art, than as a name given to the works of Etruscan artists. In its earliest period, that is before and about the time of Cadmus, it partook of the Egyptian and earliest Grecian styles; became afterwards refined through its connexion with Greece, and, finally, the immediate parent of the Roman.

Having, in my preceding lectures, extolled the architecture of the Greeks above that of the Romans, in a manner beyond what the admirers of the Roman style may approve, permit me to repeat, by way of explanation, that it was not in costliness or magnitude that the mighty genius of the Greeks developed itself, so much as in invention, in taste, in beauty, in refinement, and in leaving to posterity the best models for imitation. These qualities have given this gifted people their deserved pre-eminence over all their imitators or competitors.

* No remains of architecture or sculpture are to be found in Greece but what are canons of art, while Rome possesses more to corrupt the taste of the young architect than all its excellencies can counterbalance. It is, therefore, to the rules, the forms, the proportions, the taste of the former, that the attention of the student should be perpetually recalled:—

* Hear! how learn'd Greece her useful rules indites,

* When to repress and when indulge our flights.
POPE.

Greece, even in its state of decay, should attract the student during his travels through the elements of the art, as in the decline of literature and fine taste, a city in the Asiatic desert did Longinus, who retired thither as to an asylum whence he might contemplate the setting sun of Attic splendour.

The three essential and distinct qualities in architecture, are strength, grace, and richness. The three orders of the Greeks possess all these requisites, and the five anomalous orders of the Romans possess no more. The aforesaid qualities are the landmarks, the boundaries, the north and south poles of the art. The Doric displays the first-mentioned quality, of strength; the Ionic, the second,
of grace; and the Corinthian, the third,
of richness. The Corinthian is the maximum, uniting beautiful simplicity and flourid decoration; while the Doric possesses pure simplicity, plainness, and robust strength; and the Ionic is the connecting link between the two.

Yet in these three simple elements what an endless variety! We no more need a new order in our architecture than a new letter in our alphabet. The architect of talent will as little think of bewildering himself in the search of a new order, as the illustrious discoverer of the safety-lamp, who now, for the interests of science, presides over the Royal Society, would of searching after the far-famed philosopher's stone.

Every style of architecture, to be complete, must possess these three elementary principles, and no style requires more.
That affectively called by the 'graves' at the thrice picked bare bone of antiquity, the English, but which is better known by the untrue name of the Gothic, possesses them; and this style, I think, may easily be arranged, and a grammar formed of its romantic, but erratic elements, which,
under the hand of a scientific architect,
may arise into a pure and ordered system. Supposing, for instance, now I am upon the subject, (which I will endeavor to improve upon in its proper place,) supposing, I say, that under the first clan, or that of strength, we venture to put the Norman and the Saxon; under the second, or that of grace, the architecture of the period of Edward the Third, and in kind; and, under the third, or that of richness, we collect the styles called florid.

Not that I would, with that instance of bathos in architecture, Batty Langley, whose paragon of ugliness are of late revisiting in our metropolis, make the five orders of Gothic architecture complete, or attempt to speak of his Tuscan Gothic, (they are his own nomenclature,) his Doric-Gothic; his Ionic-Gothic; his Corinthian-Gothic; or, that acme of absurdity, his Composite-Gothic.

I have intruded this digression for the purpose of impressing more and more deeply upon the minds of the younger in-quirers into the beauties of architecture, the superiority of the Grecian arrangement, or system of the orders, over that of the Romans; for simplicity, ease of remembrance, utility, and for giving free scope to fancy, invention, and genius;
and also that it can be applied as a system to other styles.

From Egypt, as I have endeavored to prove in my former lectures, architecture, with the rest of the arts, visited Greece; and, after the decline of the renowned states of that empire, settled in ages in Rome;—'a city,' says the learned
De Goguet, in his Origine des Loix, 'which seems to have been destined to swallow up and absorb all the kingdoms of the universe. Her feeble beginnings presaged no such degree of power as she afterwards attained. It was by steady pi-lcey and unshaken courage that Rome triumphed over all the obstacles that appeared to oppose her enlargement.'

Greece, sunk into obscurity, and ridded by luxury and corruption, the daily dry-rot of national greatness, paralysed by indolence and submission to her inquerors, gave up, supinely, her rights, her arts, her artists, to a people armed with the rougher powers of industry and arms.

Far be it from me, however, to insinuate, by these observations, that the cultivation of the arts enervates a people; for history affords abundant proofs to the contrary, of which a very few instances will suffice.

When arts and literature were at their zenith in Athens, so were public virtue, strength of arms, and industry; all grew together and flourished abundantly side by side; they languished, they sickened, and they died together. So it was with other ancient nations, and so it will be with every people present and to come: and it is only inasmuch as literature and the fine arts are the seal, as it were, the crown the capital of greatness, that the error has sprung up.

Before the introduction of pure taste, and the importation of Grecian art and artists into Rome, we have the authority of all historians to show that its architecture was as rude as that of any other nation of antiquity. Their Etruscan neighbours led them to copy Greek originals, and one of their earliest kings, Tarquinius Priscus, was a native of Greece; hence the origin of the Roman style. Nor was it Grecian architecture alone that the Romans imitated; but their literature, their eloquence, their manners, and customs, were all borrowed from their illustrious predecessors. Vitruvius founded his code of architectural laws upon the Greeks; Virgil imitated Homer; Cicero, Demosthenes. The early Roman plays were translations from the Greek, and their latter ones imitations.

The natural tendency of the ancient Romans was to the grand and wonderful, the colossal, the showy, and even the prodigality of extravagance. Hence, the temporary theatre of Marcus Scaurus, erected while he was edile, which he adorned with three hundred and sixty marble columns, and three thousand bronze statues; and it was capable of containing eighty thousand persons. The shafts of the lower range of columns were thirty-eight feet long, and their weight was such, that Scaurus was obliged to give security for the reparation of the great sewers over which they were to pass, if they should be damaged by their conveyance; and this, be it remembered, was for an occasional temporary amusement.

Such also is character was the wooden edifice erected by Curio, for the celebration of the funeral games in honour of his father; which was so contrived as to form, according to the nature of the exhibition, either a theatre or an amphitheatre. When to be used in the former way, the circular backs were placed against each other, thus becoming two separate theatres, so that the declamations, music, and applauding acclamations of the one, were not heard in the other. After the theatrical performances were concluded, the two edifices, turning on pivots, were rolled round by machinery, with all the audience within them, and the circle or amphitheatre was completed;—the pits, cleared of the populace, formed the arena. These accounts, however improbable they may appear, are quoted on the authority of the elder Pliny.

A NOTHER advantage, for which we are indebted to the studies of metoposcopy, craniology, chrymancy, political economy, and others of that stamp, is the manifest saving in the tax of poor's rates, which accrues to the public by their means. Persons, who might otherwise have come under the cognizance of the Vagrant Act, or become chargeable to their several parishes as incapable, through defect of natural parts, of providing subsistence for themselves, as shoe-makers, tailors, musicians, or bear-leaders, have, in the pursuit of the above studies, an ostensible calling or mode of existence, and are enabled to set the parish-buckle at defiance, by picking the pockets of the community at large, who purchase their philosophy. Thus a man who is too proud or too indolent to apply himself to a handicraft trade for subsistence, has nothing to do but turn author and philosopher. Though he had not the wit to set a pen-stake or frighten a crow from a corn-field, he may yet have more than sufficient to write you a very learned treatise upon horticulture or agriculture. Though his invention might be unequal to the soldering a brass pan or the rivetting a hoop for a cracked jordan, yet he finds no difficulty in giving us a proof of his abilities in a new theory of the deluge, an infidel cosmogony, or a smart parody on the Scriptures. He who feels in comprehending why you can't tanzeze and exuvassite simultaneously, will nevertheless contrive to puzzle you with a dissertation on gases, while one who couldn't tot up the teeth in the jaw-bone of an ass or calculate the neat proceeds of an impost upon rational parrots, will dash you off an essay on the national debt in a twinkling. Thus we see, by making philosophy a kind of depot, or house of refuge, for those who can succeed in nothing else, we take so much dead weight off the shoulders of the industrious part of the community, and, beside, have philosophers, where, without the aid of above sciences, we would have none but plain fools.

Physiognomy is one of the professions among these. Can there be any more consonant to reason and sense, than the hypothesis upon which this theory sets out? namely, all dispositions of the mind follow the features of the face, or e converso; the features follow the dispositions. For, in the first case, by the different configurations of a man's nose, or head, or eyebrow, the mind, without anything but a subtle rafter, a particula auræ, within the cap, compressed or suffered to dilate itself, according as the said nose, head, or eyebrow, is short or long, or high, angular or curvilinear: the mind itself becomes consequently either narrow or expansive, shallow or profound, crooked or uniform. In the second case, viz. that of the features shaping themselves so as to conform to the internal disposition; hypothesis is scarcely less subtle. For the mind, being in its nature uniform, is inconsequently then elastic; ergo, by jutting, and pushing and driving, and shouldering, at the end of the nose, the inner angles of the cranium and the concavities of the eyebrow, if sufficiently potent, it will enlarge and otherwise proportionally conform those features to measures of its own dimension; weak and inexpensive, the features remain short, and snubbed, and, as it were, as they were when uniform in the womb.

As to craniognomy, the doctrine of telling a man's disposition and qualities from the prominences and roosties on his skull, is and ought to be upheld by every good father of a family: all over the world these do not only indicate the temper of a man's own disposition, but his wife's also. Let any fond benevolent British husband lay his hand upon his forehead, and deny this if he can. This theory, and the doctrine of trial heat, agree very well in this beside conforming rigorously to the Newtonian rules of philosophy which require the existence of the features brought to explain phenomena, first truly established, and its effects thereto demonstrated on rational principles, they also prove the eternal matter, to all appearance of a fact. For, our skulls and the earth, is nothing but the mother of a and a pottery of human bodies.

able to withstand the expansive and eternal pressure acting within them, must be endued with an affinity among their particles, proportionally cohesive and perpetual, i. e. are indivisible and eternal. Hence we have matter proved to be God, in one particular at least, that is to say, in its eternity; the next step is to shew it infinite, cogitative, and omnipotent, which we presume can be done with equal ease and satisfaction.

But of all these studies, none please me so much as that of comparative anatomy, whereby the several properties, dispositions, virtues, and energies of the human system are developed by comparing our physical organization with that of monkeys, cats, dogs, bears, owls, &c.

But there is another art, which, although not philosophical, strictly speaking, yet agrees so well with those I have mentioned, in affording an occupation in the last resort, that I cannot forbear taking this opportunity of giving it my humble subscription of praise. In fact, this branch of authorship does more in the way of thinning the manufactories, and depopulating the mechanical part of the community, to their very great benefit, than all the above studies of philosophy, taken together. It not only employs a great number of hands, but is of such easy attainment, that except for the impossibility of teaching a magpie the art of penmanship, a magpie might write very excellent poetry. Poetry! O Lord! sure you don't mean to assert that a magpie could write poetry? Be so good as to read my words over again, Mr. (P). If, by any dissimilarity, by the application of Spanish thumb-screws or other instruments of torsion, you can wrest my meaning into such an assertion, why build me up in bronze, and set me as a patron saint over perjurers, professed story-tellers, Abyssinian travellers, and breakers of the ninth commandment. No, so far from making such an impudent assertion, I venture to assert, that a magpie could not write poetry. Well—it's all one; you asserted, that if a magpie could write, he could become a poet. O—your humble servant; this is a different question: For the answer, give me leave to refer you to Prince Maurice's parrot*, and if the parrot does not satisfy you himself, it is vain for me to attempt it. Still you say: though we do suppose a parrot capable of extempore poetry, yet, after all, a parrot is but a parrot, turn him as you will, and not a magpie. Granted: but have you recollected to slit the magpie's tongue with sixpence-worth of a decapitated monarch? Yes. Well—now slit your own tongue, and see if you'll talk a bit the better. Can you expect a magpie to do more than you, a man? this is a step beyond me; if you have the face, after this, to accuse me of setting up a magpie to be a poet, recollect, you have made him yourself more than a man; so hide your head in your palms, and kiss the butt-end of humility, or I'll expose you to the genus irretabile, to be burnt as a special blasphemist.

But to return; I say it is incalculable, of what benefit the art of poetry is to the manufacturing and agricultural interests, by taking off a number of superfluous and unprofitable hands, and thereby leaving the needle, the awl, the raping-hook, and the scythe, to those who are able to wield these instruments without maiming themselves, through ignorance of the manner of using them, and utter incapability of ever attaining it. Poetry is also much more efficient in this way than philosophy; inasmuch as the latter requires you to know so much of language as not to call a government debenture a sheet of waste paper, a golden sovereign a brass farthing, a nose a mouth, a scull a humming-top, or a wild man of the woods a reasonable creature; whilst the essence of poetry lying in calling things by wrong names, and applying your words in new and strange significations, the less you understand of the true meaning of words, the more likely will you be to misapply and misuse them; which I take to be the natural province of a poet. Thus, craniognomy requires some little knackery or dexterous jugglery in its management, so as to impose with an appearance of argument, but reason or common sense of any kind would be highly detrimental to a poet. Only think of a drama attempting to fob us off with a faithful personification of passion, humor, or wit, in clear, obvious, and appropriate language! Why the author would deserve lower damnation than the worst devil, who prints rubric and placards legible at telegraph distance, for reptile and monkey showings. Have you written a poem, containing anything but love and gew-gaw words, and brittle images, bursting like bubbles, with puff! Your ear—take my advice, and kite it to the man in the moon, for it wouldn't be read by the gossips here, if it were written out on the broad heavens, in letters of stars.

If there be one entity in existence I despise more than an Atheist, it is a poet.

But that he might pick my pocket, I would much rather be in the room with a swindler. I can pity the prostitution of talents in the wily kurre; the dull unpretending simpleton is often amiable; even the witless pretender to philosophy, the alchemist, the physiognomist, the antiquary, are at least laughable; as for the dealer in namby-pamby and chit-chat, by the wood fire, I am his sworn brother in iniquity; but a poet has no earthly qualification but to make you ashamed of your species. It is something between an idiot and a goliath; the brainless corporeality of the one, with the finimness and nothingness of the other.

You go out to take a peaceful duh of tea with a female friend;—well—and you sit down in the simplicity of your heart to a little knee-neighboring chat with her; when, Mrs. Sachanoe comes up, and begs leave to introduce a protégé of her's, 'a young gentleman, who has a very pretty taste for poetry.' Now I'll be judged by St. Peter, if any one has a right to insult an unoffending gentleman, by putting such a trick upon him. I beg leave to acquaint my female acquaintance thus publicly, that if this is meant as an equivalent tax instead of card-money, (for I hate cards as much as poets,) thinking, perhaps, that I can better spare my ears to a poet, than my money to reimburse them for the cost of their tea and crumpets, I would rather give them the breeches off my person (and, God knows, I can ill spare them) than be thus delivered up to the pains of purgatory before my time.

It is true the thing will talk; yet, will use those distortions of feature which generally accompany mental energy, will utter such voluble gibbles, and words running over the tongue upon friction-wheels, will hop and hubble and take positions, cawing up the eye and making a leg, that, only it has not the wit to deny such a scheme; you would swear it had been paroled at St. Luke's. Nevertheless, I would rather be stoned by a bird-pie, with plucked jays and gurgulous chaffinches.—I swear, I swear!

RIDING THE STANG.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR.—Your correspondent, Mr. Ephraim Wood, who, in your last number, has favoured the public with an account of Riding the Stang, as practised in the north of Yorkshire, is mistaken in supposing that the custom is peculiar to that district; since it obtains also in the West Riding, and particularly in the market-town of Ripon, where I have, on more than one occasion, witnessed its performance; the principal actor being seated on a pole supported by two or more individuals with a numerous retinue. I am unable to trace the origin of this singular usage, but judging from the import of the term 'Stang,' which, according to Dr. Johnson, is a pure Saxon word, signifying a perch, and as to perch is to sit or roost as a bird, we can have no hesitation in concluding that the practice is derived to us from our Saxon ancestors. Its salutary effects may be inferred from the uniform sanction and approbation of ages.

Your obedient servant.

PARISH FEASTING.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR.—This is a reforming and retrenching age, and every one considers himself privileged to adopt systems of economy, and to suggest plans for the amelioration of the national burthens. Such exertions for the general benefit of mankind, have been as various in their objects, as they have been beneficial in their results. The Societies for the Suppression of Vice and Mendicity, have been active in removing from our public streets those gangs of nightly marauders and sturdy beggars, who so long infested every avenue of the metropolis; and bringing to the tribunal of justice those disciples of infidelity, whose pernicious maxims, if unchecked, would have demoralized the public mind, and by dissolving the ties of religion and loyalty, sapped the foundation of civil society.

Nor has the spirit of true patriotism stopped here; the public institutions of the metropolis, the hospitals, the schools, the alms-houses, and even the prisons have been visited, their internal economy examined, and their abuses reformed; but the Poor Houses of the several parishes have as yet remained unnoticed. Here is indeed an ample field for inquiry, for it is from the injudicious conduct of these important establishments the distresses of the lower classes in a great measure originate, and it is by the want of proper energy on the part of Parish Officers, that so many beggars and idle persons, are still found loitering in the streets, and infesting every approach to the metropolis. Were the present Poor Laws put in vigorous exercise, there can be little doubt but the sum of human misery would be considerably lessened, while the nuisance of vagrants, still so much complained of, would be effectually removed. In your Chronicle of the 24th of November, I was much struck with the following passage, quoted from the Reports of the Mendicity Society: 'Whoever it shall be enabled to induce parishes to adopt a better system, in regard to vagrants, a very important step will be taken towards the end in view. If the entire suppression of mendicity be at all attainable, it will probably be effected by slow degrees, and will depend upon an infinity of circumstances; but its advance has been already arrested, and its most revolting features are receding.' From this statement it is evident that a greater degree of activity and vigilance on the part of parish officers, would tend materially to assist the operations of the Society, and that, without this, their influence must be partial, and in many instances even nugatory. But what say parish officers in reply to this charge of negligence? Their plea is, that the parish funds are inadequate to the support of all the vagrants who might apply for relief, or the employment of proper persons throughout the bounds of a large parish, to take up such as come under the denomination of vagrants. But whence arises this poverty? Are not the poor rates regulated by the number of the objects soliciting relief of the parish, and may it not be reasonably supposed, that the sum will be sufficient to supply the demand? As the parish officers have, thus the power of levying the poor rates, and we may conclude that they will exercise this power to its necessary extent, we must look to some other cause for the poverty complained of, and this we shall find in a great measure to be the practice of parish feasting. It is true that there are few public institutions which conclude their annual meetings without a feast, which is partly paid, in most cases, out of the funds, but though this is a rule more honoured in the breach than the observance, yet it is only annual, and therefore limited; but parish feasting is both frequent and abundant, and every meeting for business is considered inceptive, useless concluded with the customary libation to Bacchus; thus the stream of benevolence, which should have refreshed the fainting child of Poverty, is diverted from its course, and poured in copious profusion into the capacious stomachs of churchwardens, overseers, and, as you remark, 'of all in authority under them.' Surely, sir, this is an abuse which requires reformation, and though I am a member and sincere friend of our established church, I am an enemy to the unnecessary glutony of its parish officers.

'The labourer is certainly worthy of his hire,' and I am aware that the transactions of parish business, particularly if the parish be large, occupies much time, during which refreshment is necessary; but regard should be had to the wants of others as well as our own, and no more should be expended, than will supply the wants of nature. This growing evil might be immediately remedied, were a public auditor appointed to each parish, who should regulate all the expenses attending the frequent meetings of the officers, and, in cases of long protracted business, allow a certain sum per head for necessary refreshment. By the general adoption of this plan, combined with vigilance in the parish police, the funds would be found commensurate with the demands, and the comfort of the poor proportionally increased, while the public security would be promoted. A LOVE TALE.

MANY of the Afghan songs and tales relate to love, and most of them speak of that passion in the most glowing and romantic language. A favourite poem, which tells the story of Audam and Doorkhaunee, is known to most men in the nation, and is read, repeated, and sung, through all parts of the country. Audam was the handsomest and bravest young man of his tribe, and Doorkhaunee the most beautiful and most amiable of the virgins; but a feud between their families long prevented their meeting. At last an accidental encounter took place, which ended in a mutual and violent passion. The quarrels of the families, however, still kept the lovers separate, and perhaps in ignorance of each other's sentiments, till Doorkhaunce was compelled by her relations to marry a neighbouring chief. The affliction of her lover may be imagined, and his lamentations, and the letters that passed between him and Doorkhaunce, fill a large part of the poem; till, at last, after overcoming numberless obstacles, Audam succeeded in prevailing on his mistress to see him. They had several meetings; but Doorkhaunce still preserved her purity, and rejected alike the importunities of her lover and her husband.

Audam's visits did not long escape the husband, who was filled with jealousy and desire of vengeance. He took the opportunity of his rival's next visit to way-lay him, at the head of several of his own relations: and, though his attack was bravely repelled, and his opponent escaped with a desperate wound, he resolved to try if Audam's suit was favoured, by observing the effect of a report of his death on Doorkhaunce.

Doorkhaunce's only pleasure, during the long intervals of her lover's visits, was to retire to a garden, and to cultivate two flowers; one of which she named after herself, and the other after the object of her affection. On the day of the ambuscade, she was watching her flowers, when she observed that of Audam languish from sympathy with his recent misfortune; and, before she recovered from her surprise, she was accosted by her husband, who approached her with a drawn sword, and boasted that it was wet with the blood of Audam. This trial was fatal to Doorkhaunce, who sunk to the ground, overwhelmed with grief and horror, and expired on the spot. The news was brought to Audam, who lay wounded near the scene of the ambuscade, and no sooner had he heard it, than he called on his mistress's name, and breathed his last. They were buried at a distance from each other; but their love prevailed even in death, and their bodies were found to have met in one grave. Two trees sprung from their remains, and mingled their branches over the tomb.—Elphinstone's Caubul.

Biography.

JAMES PERRY, ESQ.

ALTHOUGH we have little to add to the Memoir of this amiable and much respected individual, which has appeared in most of the public journals, and although we can pay no higher compliment to his talents and integrity, than his brother journalists of all parties have so unanimously done, yet we would not suffer a gentleman who has been so intimately connected with the press for nearly half a century, to pass to the tomb without some record of his worth in our pages.

Mr. James Perry was a native of Aberdeen. He was born on the 30th of October, 1756, and received the first rudiments of education at the Chapel of Garioch, of which parish the Rev. W. Farquhar, father of Sir Walter Farquhar, was minister. From this, Mr. Perry was removed to the High School of Aberdeen.

In the year 1771, he was entered of Marischal College, in the University of Aberdeen, and was afterwards placed under Dr. Arthur Dingwall Fordyce, advocate, to qualify him for the profession of the Scots law; but his father, who was an eminent builder, having engaged in some unsuccessful speculations in his business, young Perry left Aberdeen in 1774, and proceeded to Edinburgh, in the hope of obtaining a situation in some professional gentleman's chambers, where he might at once pursue his studies and obtain a livelihood. But, after long and ineffectual attempts to gain employment, he came to England, and was for two years engaged in Manchester, as clerk to Mr. Dentwiddie, a respectable manufacturer. In this situation he cultivated his mind by the study of the best authors, and gained the friendship and protection of the principal gentlemen of the town, by the talents he displayed in a society which was then established by them for philosophical and moral discussions, and by several literary essays, which obtained their approbation. In the beginning of 1777, he brought with him recommendations from all the principal manufacturers to their correspondents, but they all failed of procuring him any suitable introduction; it was, however, the accidental effect of one of them that threw him into the line of life, which, from that period, he persevered in with such invariable constancy.

There was at that time an opposition journal published under the title of 'The General Advertiser,' and being a new concern, it was the practice of the proprietors to exhibit the whole contents of it upon boards at different shop-windows and doors, in the same manner as we now see the theatrical placards displayed. Mr. Perry being unemployed, amused himself with writing essays and scraps of poetry for this paper, which he hung into the letter-box of the printing house, and which were always inserted. Calling one day at the shop of Messrs. Richardson and Urquhart, booksellers, to whom he had letters of recommendation, he found the latter busily engaged in reading, and apparently enjoying, an article in the 'General Advertiser.' After Mr. Urquhart had finished the perusal, he put the usual question to him, whether he had heard of any situation that would suit him? to which he replied in the negative—at the same time holding out the paper, he said—'If you could write such articles as this, I could give you immediate employment.' It happened to be a humorous essay, written by Mr. Perry himself. This he instantly intimated to Mr. Urquhart, and gave him another article in the same hand-writing, which he had proposed to drop into the letter-box.—Mr. Urquhart expressed great satisfaction at the discovery, and informed him that he was one of the principal proprietors of the paper; that they wanted just such a person, and as there was to be a meeting of the proprietors that same evening, he would propose Mr. Perry as a writer. He did so: and the next day he was engaged at a salary of one guinea per week, and an additional half-guinea for assistance to 'The London Evening Post,' then printed by the same person.

Such was the incident that threw Mr. Perry into the profession of a journalist. He was most assiduous in his exertions for 'The General Advertiser'; and, during the memorable trials of Admirals Keppel and Palmer, he, for six weeks together, by his individual efforts, sent up daily from Portsmouth eight columns of the trials, taken by him in court; which, from the interest they excited, raised the paper to a sale of several thousands per day. At this time Mr. Perry wrote and published several political pamphlets and poems; and, in 1782, he formed the plan, and was the first editor of the 'European Magazine,' upon the design of combining, in one monthly publication, the usual miscellaneous contents of such a work with a review of new books. He conducted it, however, only for the first twelve months, as, on the death of a Mr. Wall, he was chosen by the proprietors of 'The Gazetteer' to be the editor of that paper, the proprietors of which consisted of the principal booksellers of the city of London: Mr. Thomas Payne, Mr. White, Mr. Nicol, Mr. Lockyer Davies, Mr. Paul Vaillant, with Sir N. Conant, Mr. Elmsley, &c. Mr. Perry undertook the editorship of the paper at a salary of four guineas per week, on the express condition that he was to be left to the free exercise of his political opinions, which were those asserted by Mr. Fox—opinions which, from their liberality in the cause of freedom, justice, and humanity, had made, on his first entering the gallery of the House of Commons, an impression that could not be effaced from his mind.

On his commencing editor of 'The Gazetteer,' he suggested to the proprietors the plan of employing several reporters, to facilitate the publication of the debates in Parliament. Up to that time, each paper had but one reporter in each house of Parliament, and the predecessor of Mr. Perry in 'The Gazetteer' had been in the habit of spinning out the reports of debates for weeks, and even months, after the session had closed; while Mr. Woodfall, in the 'Morning Chronicle,' used to bring out his hasty sketch of the debate in the evening of the following day. Mr. Perry's plan was adopted, and, by a succession of reporters, 'The Gazetteer' published in the morning with as long a debate as Mr. Woodfall brought out in the evening, and sometimes at midnight.

It happened that, in the years 1780, 1781 and 1782, there were numerous debating societies in every part of the metropolis, where many persons that have since been conspicuous in Parliament, in the pulpit, and on the bench, distinguished themselves as public speakers. Mr. Perry was a speaker in these societies, and is mentioned with great praise in 'The History of the Westminster Forum.' Mr. Pitt used to attend these societies, although he never spoke at any of them; and it is not perhaps generally known, that the Lyceum was fitted up and received that title, expressly for a superior school of oratory, by John Sheridan, Esq. a barrister, with the view of enabling such young gentlemen as were designed for the senate and bar, to practise public speaking before a genteel auditory. It was opened for a few nights, at 5s. the price of admittance. Mr. Pitt and several of his friends frequented it, but the enterprise fell to the ground. It is positively stated that, afterwards, when Mr. Pitt came to be Chancellor of the Exchequer, having had frequent opportunities of witnessing Mr. Perry's talent in public speaking, and particularly in reply, he caused a proposal to be made to him of coming into Parliament, which would have probably led on to high fortune. Mr. Perry, however, thought proper to decline it, as he did afterwards an offer the same kind from the Earl of Shelburne.

Mr. Perry was for several years editor of 'Debrett's Parliamentary Debates,' to the exclusion of advertisements and other extraneous matter. This work had fallen into disrepute, and the proprietors set it up to public sale. In the meanwhile, Mr. Woodfall undertook another paper, under the title of the 'Diary,' and Mr. Perry bought the 'Morning Chronicle.' He announced himself, in conjunction with his friend, Mr. Gray, as joint proprietor and editor, and declared he would be responsible for its contents. From that time to the present day, it has continued to be the organ of genuine Whig principles, uniformly asserting the doctrines that placed the illustrious House of Brunswick upon the throne of the united kingdom, and equally deprecating all violent changes, whether attempted by Jacobins on one side, or Ultra Royalists on the other. The consequence was, that he was assailed and reviled by both extremes of party, while the great constitutional body of the Whigs, and of the friends of freedom, considered the 'Chronicle' as the true vehicle of sound constitutional doctrines. It is but justice here to remark, what is truly creditable to Mr. Perry, that he never suffered his paper to be degraded by private personalities or scandal, and that he never was suspected of venality. Twice, in the course of forty years, he was prosecuted by ex-officio informations, and was as often honourably acquitted. In the first instance, he was most ably defended by his noble friend, Lord Erskine, and in the second, he took his defence upon himself. In private life, Mr. Perry had the happiness to maintain his aged parents in comfort, and to bring up the orphan family of his sister by her first marriage. She was afterwards married, for the second time, to the celebrated Professor Porson, and died in 1796.

In 1798, Mr. Perry was married to Miss Anne Hall, a young lady of the most amiable accomplishments whom, for many years, he lived the most perfect state of connubial bliss. She brought him eight children, whom he died young; and the daughter, of the most prodigious talents, was carried off at the fourteen, by the rupture of a vessel, in the arms of her mother, and gave a shock to that lady's constitution which she never recovered from, and sunk into a decline, and too soon to Lisbon in hopes of restoration, milder climate; on her return, taken prisoner by an Algerian, and after suffering much in the ship sunk under her complaints, her she was landed at Bourdeaux.

The industry and talent of Mr. Perry, as a journalist, cannot be fully exemplified than by the admitted success which he enjoyed shortly after he took the 'Chronicle' and almost expiring paper, the 'Morning Chronicle,' into his hands, of Themistocles, the celebrated Athenian statesman, that, on approaching for his want of political principles, he made this true friend never touched the lute to play on the harp; but commit to my charge a Ciceronian secure and inconvertible, I find it great and flourishing.' By the exercise of judgment and attention, did the subject of memoirs raise an obscure journeyman of the most distinguished and respectable. It was looked only throughout the British, but all over the continent, for the talent it displayed, a form independence, consistency with which it admitted genuine principles of politics. Even those who differ from Perry's political opinions, acknowledged the sincerity with which he adopted, and the candour with which he maintained. But this was not all; in the of his journal he at all times high sense of moral propriety; he not only never according to the fashion of when he began his literary career, but he carefully excluded all as might hurt the feelings of individuals, even when censure of them could not have been to any legal process.

As the celebrated William Hall was the first who gave the nature of correctness to the Parliamentary Debates, so was Mr. Perry the first who contributed by his example to give a respectability to English newspapers, which they never possessed before; and in all the violent party conflicts in which he happened to be engaged, his adversaries were obliged to confess that his hostility was carried on with honour, as well as talent. He was beloved and respected by his numerous friends,—he was generous and liberal to all who stood in need of his bounty, while he exercised the greatest discrimination with regard to those who were worthy of it; and, while he took care that the duties belonging to his extensive establishment were punctually fulfilled, he had the rare quality of securing the attachment, as well as the esteem, of all those who were in his employ.

This much-respected individual died at his house at Brighton, on Tuesday, the 4th inst. in the 65th year of his age.

SURGEONS.

In the reign of King Henry VIII. as Gale informs us, there were very few worthy to be called surgeons. His account of those employed in the army is very humorous. 'I remember,' says he, 'when I was in the wars at Muttreil (Montreuil) in the time of that most famous prince, King Henry VIII. there was a great rabblement, that took on them to be surgeons; some were sow-gelders, and some horse-gelders, with tinkers and cobblers. This noble sect did such great cures, that they got themselves a perpetual name! for, like as Thessalus's sect were called Thessalions, so was this noble rabblement, for their notorious cures, called dog-leaches; for in two dressings they did commonly make their cures sound and whole for ever; so that they neither felt heat nor cold, nor no manner of pain after. But when the Duke of Norfolk, who was then general, understood how the people did die, and that of small wounds, he sent for me, and certain other surgeons, commanding us to make search how these men came to their death; whether it were by the grievousness of their wounds, or by the lack of knowledge of the surgeons; and we, according to our commandment, made search through all the camp; and found many of the same good fellows, which took upon them the names of surgeons; not only the names, but the wages also. We asking them whether they were surgeons or no, they said they were; we demanded with whom they were brought up? and they, with shameless faces, would answer either with one cunning man or another, which was dead. Then we demanded of them what chirurgery stuff they had to cure men withal; and they would show us a pot or a box, which they had in a budget; wherein was such trumpery as they did use to grease horses heels' withal, and laid upon scabbid horses' backs, with rowel, and such like. And others, that were cobblers and tinkers, they used shoemaker's wax, with the rust of old pans, and made therewithal a noble salve, as they did term it. But in the end, this worthy rabblement was committed to the Marshalsea, and threatened, by the duke's grace, to be hanged for their worthy deeds, except they would declare the truth what they were, and of what occupations; and in the end they did confess, as I have declared to you before.'

Original Poetry.

THE SHEPHERD'S WISH.

From the Greek of Moscos.

WHEN calm the wave, and hush'd the wind,
And smooth as glass the water blue,
The sea delights my changeful mind,
And then I bid the groves adieu.

When foaming white the hoary main,
With folding waves the sailor sees;
I turn my prow to land again,
And sit beneath the waving trees.

More sweet to me beneath the wood
To sit, than skim along the brine;
When tempests rave o'er ocean's flood,
They only whistle through the pine.

How dull the prisoned sailor's life,
When tossed along the rolling main;
By winds and waves, in constant strife—
But sweet to sleep beneath the plane.

The warbled music of the grove,
A little fountain murmuring near,
More than the billow's swell I love,
That tortures, not delights the ear.

SONG.

EVER sprightly, debonnaire,
Playful as the wanton air,—
Sporting thro' the waving trees,
Lightly as the passing breeze,—
See the charming Flora hies:
Now the mystic dance she tries;
Gaily to the tabor's sound,
Quick she prints the fairy ground.

Smiling like the vernal morn,
When its golden hues adorn,
The spotless lily of the grove,
Blooming forth in virgin love!

Or the new-born blushing rose,
When its dewy tint disclose
To the mind's enraptur'd eye
Beauty and variety.

HATT.

THE TON.

HAVE you the silly art acquired
Of tripping well? Have you achieved
Your broken phiz and foolish pace,
Which savour of the monkey race?
With waistcoat short, with blue sarinet,
Cravat of black, bright wrinkled bow,
Mustachios, whiskers, whirlpool hair,
The raving maniac's thoughtless stare?
If you have not these follies caught,
You will not of the ton be thought.

When from your toilette flourish'd out,
To mingle with the motley rout,
Or with a switch in glove-clad hand,
At the hotel to take your stand;
To bite your lips, your nails, and read
The news of pugilists and breed;
If you have never learnt to fling
The dice, the cue, the ball, the ring,
You must be felled, and pawn'd, and dull,
Before you in the ton are skill'd.

Sell your estates and take a suit
Of frocks, or mortgage and be mute;
Frequent the dashing circles, drink
Forever;—learn to leer and wink;
Consume your reason by degrees,
And fully will revive with ease;
Waste all your time and wealth in vice,
Think nothing good but high in price;
And then by real experience brought
Too late, you'll of the ton be thought.

TO LELIA.

THE warbling of the wave through moss
Wreath'd shell,
When all the spirits of the sea rejoice
And dance o'er ocean's surface, to the swell
Of its soft melody,—in like thy voice.
And lucid as that wave is thy blue eye,
And thy celestial brow is bright and fair
As those pure pearls that in that wreath'd shell
Lie,
Enshrin'd in hues of sweet carnation then,
And thy soft cheek excels that glowing Shrine—
And thy love lips are like the coral's arm,
That round the rocky shell exchanging warm,
Embosoming nature's beauty. All the charms
That heavenly nature lavishes on earth,
Are charms because like thee! O, lovely
One!
Thy soul of purity's seraphic worth
And form's divinity, that seem to shun
All trace of imperfection, are above
The hope of earthly heart! My soul adores
The radiance of thy beauty, and I love
As one who loves the seraphim that pour
In brilliancy eternal round the throne
Of bright Omnipotence! O, saint of light!
To thee I'll breathe my anxious sighs,
If you will be alone at twelve to-night!

THE DEPARTURE.

SWIFT from happy shores retiring,
Edward turned his sorrowing eye;
Love, his nearly soul inspiring,
Frequent drew a tender sigh.

Oh! yet happy shores, he sighs,
As they faded from his view,
As the last speck from him flutted,
Wish'd that I return to you!

Oh! what I've trod again
The land whereon I lately trod,
O'er all I sink within the sand,
Consigned to providence and God.

If 'tis so—oh! tender creature,
Tender Marianne, what art thou?
Some will distort each feature
That is sweet and beautiful now.
Oh! how blest didst thou but bear me
Utter loud my sinking groan;
Oh! how blest if thou wert near me,
When this fragile life has flown.

And yet, oh! thou would'st but feel
Anguish which you should not know;
But if death will your life steal,
Might we not together go.

How freely would thy spirit soar,
Yet why would I thy life destroy;
Thou' I never view thee more,
May'st thou live and life enjoy.

Thou hast sworn, and I'll believe thee,
Thou wilt watch the moon's bright rays,
And tho' so far I cannot see thee,
On the same thing we will gaze.

As I look, oh! I shall fancy
That my Marianne looketh too
On the little meteor, dancing
Round its splendid circuit blue.

Gaze, my fair, for now 'tis rising
From behind yon cloud-capt hill,—
See the vast space that lies in,
See how beautiful, clear, and still.

Oh! for ever shine so brightly,
Orb of beauty—solemn shade;
Ever on the waves play lightly,
Never, never, never fade. J. C. P.

The Drama.

THE two national theatres have produced nothing during the week to call for particular notice. At Drury Lane, Mr. Kean has played some of his favourite characters, with his usual talents and usual success; and although we are, never weary of seeing him, yet we suspect our readers would scarcely thank us for again repeating what we have often expressed—our high opinion of his superior talents. Mr. Elliston who, in consequence of indisposition, was compelled to transfer the honors of the coronation to Mr. Cooper, is recovered and played the character of Rover, in the comedy of Wild Oats, with much of the spirit that distinguished his admirable performance of the part many years ago. The Busy Body has also been performed, with a singular mixture of good and bad actors. The Six Francis Gripe of Munden was excellent, the Sir George Airy of Mr. Penley execrable. He looked like a well dressed waiter of a tavern, and doff'd the gentleman so completely, that no one could have been so far deceived as to mistake him for one. The Coronation still continues so attractive, that the new splendid spectacle of Giovanni in Ireland, announced for this evening (Thursday) is deferred, in order to afford a few thousands more, the opportunity of seeing the 'fac simile' of that interesting pageant, the coronation of George the Fourth. At Covent Garden Theatre, The Two Gentlemen of Verona and the Exile engross every evening—the lovers of novelty must consequently seek it elsewhere.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—The popular piece of Tom and Jerry continues to be played every evening to crowded houses. There is much good acting in the piece, which is of a bustling character, and exposes, with great fidelity, some of the most prominent day and night scenes in the British metropolis.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—A lively little piece, with some highly animating and amusing scenes of humorous dialogue and sprightly equivocation, was produced at this theatre on Monday night, intitled Arrivals, or Three Days at Long's. Among those who sustained parts in this burlesque, Miss Booth, Miss Healey, and Mr. Vale, are intitled to particular notice for their spirit and vivacity. It was completely successful. The thousand times repeated Thérèse has been produced at this theatre, in which Mr. H. Johnston was an excellent Carwin, and Miss Booth the interesting Thérèse, or Marietta. If we may judge by the audiences, the little Olympic, under the management of Mr. Oxberry, is quite a favourite.

Literature and Science.

AN artist, at Milan, of the name of Cutaneri, has obtained a patent from the Emperor of Austria for a new invention, by which one horse, with his mechanism, can draw any machine with more facility than a team of four horses would in the ordinary way.

Voyage of Discovery.—Accounts have been received at Plymouth by the ship Dick, lately arrived from India from His Majesty's brig Bathurst, Capt. King, employed in examining the unexplored coast of Australasia, dated off Goulbourn Island, on the north coast of New Holland, the 6th of July last, the ship Dick and brig St. Antonio then in company, which the Bathurst had piloted from Port Jackson on their way to India, through a most intricate and dangerous navigation, in which the latter lost two anchors. At the date of the latter, they had been out six weeks from Port Jackson, three weeks whereof they had been sailing among coral reefs of frightful appearance, and were obliged to anchor every night wherever they could find shelter, not daring to proceed after sun-set, having had many narrow escapes even in the day-light, but were, at the period before mentioned, entirely clear of that dreadful coast. They lost their two anchors and cables under Caring Cross Island, at eleven, p. m. on the 30th of June, and nothing but the tide, which, fortunately, set to seaward, kept them clear of the dangers which surrounded them on every side; and the weather being so exceedingly bad at the time, their escape was a miracle.

Mr. P. Baskerville, of Plymouth, a midshipman of the Bathurst, was sent on shore with a party on the easternmost island of Flinder's Group, for the purpose of picking up any part of the wreck of the ship Frederick, which had been lost there, when they were encountered by a large party of the natives, who commenced a horrible shout, which proved the signal to engage, and they commenced by throwing a shower of spears with great agility, by which two of the party were wounded. The Bathurst's people being unarmed, could make no other resistance than by defending themselves with stones, while a part of them were immediately dispatched in the boat, in order to procure fire-arms from the ship; the natives, seeing the transaction, took the opportunity, while the boat was absent, to attack those left on shore more violently, and Mr. Baskerville and his little party were surrounded and made prisoners. However, no attempt was made to take their lives after the capture, and, on the return of the boat, through artifice, they again joined their comrades, but shortly afterwards the natives came down in greater numbers, and again attacked the party, who being now armed, gave them a volley, that occasioned them to scamper off in all directions, leaving two on the ground wounded; but they soon after got up and escaped, and no others appeared while the Bathurst remained there.

A curious medal has lately been offered in Inverness, by a poor man, as a penny, the description of which may entertain some of our readers. It is about the size and thickness of a penny. On one side is the Pope's head, with the triple crown, which reversed displays that of the devil—motto—'Ecclesia peruersa tenet faciem Diaboli'; on the other side is a Cardinal's head, with hood and hat; reversed, this gives the head of a fool, with cap and bells—motto, 'stulti aliquando sapientes,' or 'Sapientes stulti aliquando', as the legend may be read.* The execution of the piece upon which the heads are stamped is ancient and uneven round the edges; but the heads are extremely well executed, in high and well rounded relief, and display in the sour faces of the Pope and Cardinal, and in the folly of the fool, much spirit of caricature. The piece is probably of the period of some religious ferment, such as the reformation or revolution; perhaps it is foreign, and it is certainly uncommon. Though corroded, and worn a little, it is in good preservation.—Innermost Journal.

Magnetism.—The Prussian State Gazette mentions a highly important discovery, which Dr. Seebeck had communicated to the Academy of Sciences, at Berlin, in three different sittings. It was 'on the magnetic properties inherent in all metals and many earths (and not in iron alone as was supposed), according to the difference of the degrees of heat.' This discovery, it is added, opens an entirely new field in this department of natural philosophy, which may lead to interesting results with respect to hot springs, connected with the observations made by the Inspector of Mines, M. Von Trebra and others, relative to the progressive increase of warmth in mines, in proportion to their depths. According to M. Von Trebra's observations, the heat, at the depth of 150 feet below the surface of the earth, is one degree; at 300 feet deep, two degrees; at 600 feet, four degrees, &c.

At Pavia, new trials have been made, which prove the efficacy of oxygenated muriatic acid in subduing the hydrophobia. Dr. Previsali had prescribed it with success where the symptoms were advanced, in a liquid form, from a drachm to a drachm and a half daily, in citron water or syrup of citron.

Perpetual Fire.—In the peninsula of Acheron, in the province of Schirwan, formerly belonging to Persia, but now to Russia, there is found a perpetual, or, as it is there called, an internal fire. It rises, or has risen from time immemorial, from an irregular orifice of about twelve feet in depth, with a constant flame. The flame rises to the height of from six to eight feet, and is unattended with smoke, and yields no smell. The aperture, which is about twenty feet in width,

* 'Sapientes stulti aliquando' is the reading, when the cardinal's head is on the top.—Stulti aliquando sapientes, when the fool's head is uppermost, which makes a double meaning, fit for both cases.

consists of a mass of rock, ever retaining the same solidity and the same depth. The finest turf grows about the borders, and, at the distance of two toises are two springs of water. The neighbouring inhabitants have a sort of veneration for this fire, and celebrate it with religious ceremonies.

DIETETICUS.

Lawless Court.—A court held on Kingshill, in Rochford, in Essex, every Wednesday morning after Michaelmas Day, at cock-crow, where they whisper, and have no candle, nor any pen and ink, but a coal; and he who owes suit and service there, and does not appear, forfeits double his rent for every hour he is missing.—Can any of our correspondents inform us if this court still holds its sittings, and when abolished?

Knighten Guild.—An old guild or company in London, founded by Edgar, consisting of nineteen knights. He gave them a vacant portion of ground, lying without the city, now called Portoken Ward.

Camberland, in his Memoirs, relates a very droll accident that occurred to the celebrated courtier, Lord Melcombe:—When he paid his court at St. James's to the Queen (Queen Charlotte) on her nuptials, he approached to kiss her hand, decked in an embroidered suit of silk, with lilac waistcoat and breeches; the latter of which, in the act of kneeling down, forgot their duty, and broke loose from their moorings in a very indecorous and unbecoming manner.—The fact is, braces not being used at that time, and Doddington being in person more like Falstaff than Slender, the duty of kneeling became a very perilous adventure. The Margravine of Barenth tells of a still more fearful affair that occurred to a lady on presentation-day. As she was going up to the throne, her foot slipped, and being singularly short and plump, she rolled over and over like a pumpkin, before she was recovered and set upon her legs by the grand chamberlain—an exhibition that put the gravity even of a German court to a hard trial.

Marriage Act.—Before the act for regulating marriages took place, a parson of the Fleet Prison, Mr. Gaynam, who died in 1797, married there above 30,000 couples! His fee used to be a dram and a shilling!

Review of New Books.

Sardanapalus, a Tragedy. The Two Foscari, a Tragedy. Cain, a Mystery. By Lord Byron. 8vo: pp. 430. London. 1821.

We never feel a stronger inclination to write than when one of the works of Lord Byron is the subject; but we have no sooner taken up the pen, than we reflect that every line of our's withholds from our readers so much of the brilliant effusions of his lordship's muse. As it is known that Lord Byron did not write his first tragedy of Mario Fazio for the stage, and was decidedly opposed to its being acted, he could not be expected to feel the usual modification of authors at its want of success; he has, therefore, in a few short months, produced three other dramas; for Caio is a drama, and is entitled a Mystery, in conformity with the ancient title annexed to dramas on scripture subjects, which were styled 'Mysteries or Moralities.' In the preface to the volume now before us, his lordship declares that the tragedies were not composed with the most remote view to the stage. He adds, alluding to the managers' dramatizing his former tragedy, 'with regard to my own feelings, as it seems that they are to stand for nothing, I say nothing.'

It is our intention, this week, to confine our notice to the tragedy of Sardanapalus; but, as the appendix to the second tragedy contains his lordship's defence against some illiberal and unfounded attacks, we shall make a few extracts from it. After handsomely noticing an expression which occurs in Lady Morgan's Italy and his own tragedy, as a curious coincidence, his lordship thus answers some of the charges of plagiarism, &c. He says,

"I am informed (for I have seen but few of the specimens, and those accidentally) that there has been lately brought against me charges of plagiarism. I have also had an anonymous sort of threatening intimation of the same kind, apparently with the intent of extorting money. To such charges I have no answer to make. One of them is ludicrous enough. I am reproached for having formed the description of a shipwreck in verse from the narratives of many actual shipwrecks in prose, selecting such materials as were most striking. Gibbon makes it a merit in Tasso "to have copied the minutest details of the Siege of Jerusalem from the Chronicles." In me it may be a demerit, I presume; let it remain so. Whilst I have been occupied in defending Pope's character, the lower orders of Grubstreet appear to have been assailing mine: this is as it should be, both in them and in me. One of the accusations in the nameless epistle alluded to is still more laughable: it states seriously that I "received five hundred pounds for writing comments for Day and Martin's patent blacking!" This is the highest compliment to my literary powers which I ever received.

"Another charge made, I am told, in the 'Literary Gazette' is, that I wrote the notes to 'Queen Mab'; a work which I never saw till some time after its publication, and which I recollect showing to Mr. Sotheby as a poem of great power and imagination. I never wrote a line of the notes, nor ever saw them except in their published form. No one knows better than their real author, that his opinions and aims did not materially upon the intellectual portion of that work: though in common with all who are not blinded by baseness and bigotry, I highly admire the poetry of that and his other publications."

Mr. Southey, who made an ungenerous attack on Lord Byron, in his 'Vision of Judgment,' a poem, which, for absurdity, political profligacy, and blasphemy, is almost without a parallel, meets with a very just and richly merited castigation from his lordship, who, at the same time, speaks with manly wit and becoming modesty of himself:—

"Mr. Southey, too," says his lordship, "in his pious preface to a poem whose blasphemy is as harmless as the sedition of Wat Tyler, because it is equally absurd with that sincere production, calls upon the "legislature to look to it," as the toleration of such writings led to the French Revolution: not, such writings as Wat Tyler, but as those of the "Satanic School." This is not true, and Mr. Southey knows it not to be true. Every French writer of any freedom was persecuted: Voltaire and Rousseau were ex-

les, Marmontel and Diderot were the Basile, and a perpetual waging with the whole class by the despotism. In the next place, the Revolution was not occasioned by writings whatsoever, but must have occurred had no such writers ever existed. It is the fashion to attribute every thing to the French revolution, and the revolution to every thing but its cause. That cause is obvious—the government exacted too much, and the people could neither give nor bear more.

"I am not ignorant of Mr. So's calumnies on a different occasion, ing them to be such, which he sent abroad on his return from Switzerland against me and others; they have him no good in this world; and, creed be the right one, they will less in the next. What his "death" may be, it is not my province to state: let him settle it with his Maker must do with mine. There is something at once ludicrous and blasphemous arrogant scribbler of all works sitting down to deal damnation and destruction upon his fellow creatures, with Wat Tyler, the Apotheosis of George the Third, and the Elegy on Martin, the regicide, all shuffled together in his writing desk. One of his consolations appears to be a Latin note from a work of a Mr. Landor, the author of "Gebir," whose friendship for Robert Southey will, it seems, "be an honour to him when the ephemeral disputes and ephemeral reputations of the day are forgotten." I for one neither envy him "the friendship," nor the glory in reversion which is to accrue from it, like Mr. Thelouso's fortune in the third and fourth generation. This friendship will probably be as memorable as his own epic, which (as I quoted to him ten or twelve years ago in "English Bards") Porson said "would be remembered when Homer and Virgil are forgotten, and not till then." For the present, I leave him.

But to the tragedy of 'Sardanapalus,' which is founded on an event that occurred about eight hundred years before Christ, recorded by Herodotus, Strabo, and Diodorus Siculus. Sardanapalus, who was the fortieth and last King of Assyria, was celebrated for luxury and voluptuousness. He is represented as passing the principal part of his time among his women, disguised in the habit of a female, and spinning wool for his amusement. This effeminacy irritated his officers, two of whom, Belesis and Arbaces, conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus, for a time, shook off his indolence, and placing himself at the head of his armies, defeated the rebels in three successive battles; but, at last, he was beaten, and, taking refuge in the city of Ninus, he defended it two years. At length, despairing of success, he huried himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, women, and treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators.

Such are the materials on which Lord Byron has constructed a noble tragic poem, adhering closely to the story, and reducing it to all the dramatic regularity of which it was capable, in order to approach the unities, — conceiving, as his lordship says in the Preface, 'that with any very distant departure from them, there may be poetry, but can be no drama.'

The principal characters in the drama are Sardanapalus, the King of Ninus and Assyria; Arbaces, the Mede who aspired to the throne; Belesis, a Chaldean and soothsayer; Salamenes, the king's brother-in-law; Zariac, the Queen; and Myrrha, an Ionian female slave, and a favourite of Sardanapalus. The tragedy commences with a fine soliloquy by Salamenes, which, as it describes the character of Sardanapalus, we shall quote entire:—

Salamenes (solus).

'He hath wrong'd his queen, but still he is her lord;

He hath wrong'd my sister, still he is my brother;

He hath wrong'd his people, still he is their sovereign;

And I must be his friend as well as subject:

He must not perish thus. I will not see

The blood of Nimrod and Semiramis

Sink in the earth, and thirteen hundred years

Of empire ending like a shepherd's tale;

He must be roused. In his effeminate heart

There is a careless courage, which corruption

Has not all quench'd, and latent energies,

Reprint by circumstance, but not destroy'd—

Steept, but not drown'd, in deep voluptuousness.

If born a peasant, he had been a man

To have reach'd an empire; to an empire born,

He will bequeath none; nothing but a name,

Which his sons will not prize in heritage—

Yet, not all lost, even yet he may redeem

His sloth and shame, by only being that

Which he should be, as easily as the thing

He should not be and is. Were it less toil

To sway his nations than consume his life?

To lead an army than to rule a harem?

He sweats in palling pleasures, dulls his soul,

And saps his goodly strength, in toils which yield not

Health like the chase, nor glory like the war—

He must be roused. Alas! there is no sound

(Sound of soft music heard from within.)

To rouse him short of thunder. Hark! the tute,

The lyre, the timbal; the lascivious tinklings

Of illing instruments, the softening voices

Of women, and of beings less than women,

Must chime in to the echo of his revel,

While the great king of all we know of earth

Lies crown'd with roses, and his diadem

Lies negligently to be caught up

By the first manly hand which dares to snatch

it.

Lo, where they come! already I perceive

The reeking odours of the perfumed trains,

And see the bright gems of the glittering girls,

Who are his comrades and his council, flash

Along the gallery; and amidst the damais,

As femininely garbed, and scarce less female,

The grandson of Semiramis, the man-queen—

He comes! Shall I await him? yes, and front

him.

And tell him what all good men tell each other,

Speaking of him and him. They come, the slaves,

Led by the monarch subject to his slaves.'

Salamenes remonstrates with the king on his effeminate amusement, and the necessity there is for him to rouse himself and see the danger which threatens him. Sardanapalus exclaims, that his brother-in-law wishes to make him a tyrant. Salamenes answers,—

So thou art:

Think'st thou there is no tyranny but that

Of blood and chains? The despotism of vice—

The weakness and the wickedness of luxury—

The negligence—the apathy—the evils

Of sensual sloth produce ten thousand terrors,
Whose delegated cruelty surpasses
The worse acts of one energetic tyrant.
However harsh and hard his own bearing.'

Salamenes reproaches Sardanapalus that the people say his sceptre is 'turned into a distaff;' the king replies, in truth which the history of all ages confirms:—

Thou seest

The populace of all the nations see Each calamity they can to sink their over-reigns.

Sardanapalus is a lover of peace, and rejoices that he has not shed blood, as he might have done, till his name —became the synonyme of death,

A terror and a trophy.'

The solitariness of royalty is beautifully described in the following passages:—

Barb. There comes

For ever something between us and what
We deem our happiness: let me remove
The barrier which that hesitating accent
Proclaims to thine, and mine is sealed.

Myr. My lord—

Sard. My lord—my king—sire—sovereign!— thus it is—

For ever thus, addressed with awe. I never Can see a smile, unless in some broad hazard.

Interesting glare, when the buffoons
Have gorged themselves up to equality,
Or I have quaffed me down to their shameless.

Myrrha, I can hear all these things, now
names,

Lord—king—sire—monarch—nay, time will prized them,

That is, I suffered them—from slaves and ob-
bles;

But when they falter from the lips I love,
The lips which have been press'd to mine, I chill

Comes o'er my heart, a cold sense of the fil-hood

Of this my station, which represses feeling
In those for whom I have felt most, and main-
me

Wish that I could lay down the dull darts,
And share a cottage on the Caucasus
With thee, and wear no crowns but those of flowers.'

The second act opens with an interview between Belesis and Arbaces, at the portal of the hall of the palace.

Salamenes, who is invested with the king's signet, attempts, with a body of soldiers, to seize them. Belesis re-renders, but Arbaces defends himself.

Sardanapalus enters with his train, and, snatching a sword, separates Salamenes and Arbaces, and pursues

the latter and Belesis.

In the third act there is a banquet during which Sardanapalus is apprised that the conspiracy has broken out—

Belesis and Arbaces enter with the rebels; Belesis is wounded and disarmed, but is rescued; the rebels, however, are routed. The opening of the fourth act displays great poetic imagi-

Myrrha (sola, gazing.)

I have stolen upon thy rest, if rest it be,
Which thus convulses slumber: shall I wake
him?

No, he seems calmer. Oh, thou God of Quiet!
Whose reign is o'er seal'd eyelids and soft
dreams,
Or deep deep sleep, so as to be unfeeling'd,
Look like thy brother, Death—so still—so stir-
less—

For then we are happiest, as it may be, we
Are happiest of all within the realm
Of thy stern, silent, and unawaken'd twin.
Again he moves—again the play of pain
Shoots o'er his features, as the sudden gust
Crisps the reluctant lake that lay so calm
Beneath the mountain shadow, or the blast
Ruffles the autumn leaves, that drooping cling Faintly and motionless to their loved boughs.
I must awake him—yet not yet: who knows
From what I rouse him? It seems pain; but if I quicken him to heavier pain? The fever
Of this tumultuous night, the grief too of His wound, though slight, may cause all this,
And shake

Me more to see than him to suffer. No:
Let Nature use her own maternal means,—
And I await to second, not disturb her.

Sardanapalus (awakening.)
Not so—although ye multiplied the stars,
And gave them to me as a realm to share
From you and with you! I would not so purchase

The empire of eternity. Hence—hence—
Old hunter of the earliest brutes! and ye,
Who hunted bloody-creatures as if brutes:
Once bloody mortals—and now bloodier idols,
If your priests lie not—And thou, ghastly bel-dame!

Dripping with dusky gore, and trampling on
The carcasses of Indes—away! away!
Where am I? Where the spectre? Where—no—that

Is no false phantom: I should know it 'midst
All that the dead dare gloomily raise up
From their black gulf to daunt the living—
Myrra:

Myr. Alas! thou art pale, and on thy brow
The drops
Gather like night dew. My beloved, hush—
Calm thee. Thy speech seems of another world,
And thou art loved of this. Be of good cheer;
All will go well.

Sard. Thy hand—so, 'tis thy hand;
Thy flesh; grasp—clasp yet closer, till I feel Myself that which I was.

Myr. At least know me
For what I am and ever must be—thine.
Sard. I know it now. I know this life again.
Ah, Myrra! I have been where we shall be.
Myr. My lord!

Sard. I've been in the grave, where worms are lords,
And kings are—But I did not deem it so;
I thought 'twere nothing.

Myr. So it is; except Unto the timid, who anticipate
That which may never be.

Oh, Myrra! if Sleep shows such things, what may not death disclose?

Myr. I know no evil death can show, which life
Has not already shown to those who live
Embodied longest. If there be indeed
Ashore where mind survives, 'twill be as mind,
All unincorporate; or if there fits
A shadow of this cumbersome clog of clay,
Which stalks, methinks, between our souls and beasts,

And fetters us to earth—at least the phantom,
Whate'er it have to fear, will not fear death.

Sard. I fear it not; but I have felt—have seen
A legion of the dead.

Myr. And so have I.
The dust we tread upon was once alive,
And wretched. But proceed: what hast thou seen?

Spoke H's—'twill lighten thy dimm'd mind.
Sard. Methought—

Myr. Yet pause, thou art tired—in pain—exhausted; all
Which can impair both strength and spirit: seek Rather to sleep again

Sard. Not now; I would not Dream; though I know it now to be a dream
What I have dreamt—and canst thou bear to hear it?

Myr. I can bear all things, dreams of life or death,
Which I participate with you, in semblance
Of full reality.

Sard. And this look'd real,
I tell you: after that these eyes were open,
I saw them in their flight—for then they fled.

Myr. Say on.
Sard. I saw, that is, I dream'd myself Here—here—where we are, guests as we were,

Willing a host that deem'd himself but guest,
Willing to equal all in social freedom;
But, on my right hand and my left, instead
Of these and Zames, and our custom'd meeting,
Was rang'd on my left hand a haughty, dark,
And deadly face—I could not recognize it—
Yet I had seen it, though I knew not where;
The features were a giant's, and the eye
Was still, yet lighted; his long locks curl'd
down

On his vast bust, whence a huge quiver rose
With shafts—heads feather'd from the eagle's wing,

That peep'd up bristling through his serpent hair,
I invited him to fill the cup which stood
Between us, but he answer'd not—I fill'd it—
He took it not, but stared upon me till
I trembled at the fix'd glare of his eye!

I frown'd upon him as a king should frown—
He frown'd not in his turn, but look'd upon me
With the same aspect, which appal'd me more
Because it chang'd not, and I turn'd for refuge
To milder guests, and sought them on the right, Where thou wert wont to be. But—

[He pauses.]
Myr. What intrud'?

Sard. In thy own chair—thy own place in the banquet—
I caught thy sweet face in the circle—but instead—a grey-hair'd, wither'd, bloody-eyed,
And bloody-handled, ghastly, ghastly thing,
Female in garb, and crown'd upon the brow, Furrow'd with years, yet sneering with the passion

Of vengeance, leering too with that of lust,
Sate—my veins curdled—

Myr. Is this all?
Sard. Upon
Her right hand—her hank, bird-like right hand, Sate—

A goblet, bubbling o'er with blood; and on her left, another, still'd with—what I saw not;
But turn'd from it and her. But all along
The table sat a range of crown'd wretches,
Of various aspects, but of one expression.

Myr. And felt you not this a mere vision?
Sard. No:
It was so palpable, I could have touch'd them:
I turn'd from one face to another, in
The eager fondness that such things

Ere I saw their's; but no—all turn'd
And stared, but neither ate nor drank,
Till I grew stone, as they seem'd to have Yet breathing stone, for I felt life in
And life in me: there was a horrid
Of sympathy between us, as if they Had lost a part of death to come to us
And I the half of life to sit by them
We were in an existence all apart
From heaven or earth—And nature
Death all than such a being?

Myr. And that Sard. At last I sate marble as thou wast

The hunter and the crew; and smiling
Yes, the enlarged but noble aspect of
The hunter smiled upon me—I shuddered
His lips, for his eyes moved not—art man's

Thin lips relax'd to something like a Both rare, and the crown'd figures on Rose also, as if aping their chief's shal-
Mere imitations even in death—but I sate
A desperate creature creep through even
And, at the last, I fear'd them not, but Full in their phantom faces. But then
The hunter laid his hand on mine: I
And grasp'd it—but it melted from me
While he too vanish'd, and left nothing
The memory of a hero, for he look'd
Myr. And was the ancestors of her
And thine no less.

Sard. Ay, Myrra, but the
The female who remain'd—she flew
And burnt my lips with her noisome
And, singing down the goblets on Methought their poisons flow'd around
Each form'd a lideous river. Still sate
The other phantoms, like a row of statues Stood dull as in our temples, but she Embraced me, while I shrank from her
In lieu of her remote descendant, I
Had been the son who slew her for her
Then—then—a chance of all loathsome Thro' thick and chapselous—I was feeling—

Buried, and raised again—consumed I Purged by the flames, and wither'd in
I can fix nothing further of my thought Save that I long'd for thee, and a
they

In all these agonies, and woke and wept
Myr. So shalt thou find me ever at Here and hereafter, if the last may be But think not of these things—the an-tions

Of late events acting upon a frame
Unused to toil, yet over-wrought by fate
Such as might try the sternest.

Salemenes is mortally wound-dies immediately after reach-royal palace. 'We now hasten closing scene of the tragedy, the of Sardanapalus. The soldier around their sovereigns;

Sard. My best! My last! My Let's not unman each other—part at All farewells should be sudden, when Else they make an eternity of momen-
And clog the last sad days of life with Hence, and be happy: trust me I am
Now to be pitied; or far more for what
Is past than present—for the future,
In the hands of the duties, if such
There be: I shall know soon. Farewell.

[Exit Paris and
Myr. These men were honest: it is still

That our last looks should be on loving faces.
Sard. And lovely ones, my beautiful!—but I bear me!

If at this moment, for we now are on
 The brink, thou feel'st an inward shrieking from

This leap through flame into the future, say it:
 I shall not love thee less; nay, perhaps more,
 For yielding to thy nature: and there's time
 Yet for thee to escape hence.

Myr. Shall I light
 One of the torches which lie heap'd beneath
 The ever burning lamp that burns without,
 Before Bal's shrine, in the adjoining hall?

Sard. Do so. Is that thy answer?
Myr. That shall see.

(Exit Myrrha)
Sard. (solus). She's firm. My fathers! whom
 I will rejoin,

It may be, purified by death from some
 Of the gross stains of too material being.
 I would not leave your ancient first abode
 To the defilement of usurping bondmen;
 As I have not kept your inheritance
 As ye bequeath'd it, this bright part of it,
 Your treasure, your abode, your sacred relics
 Of urns, and records, monuments, and spoils,
 Is which they would have revere'd, I bear with
 me.

To you in that absorbing element,
 Which most personifies the soul as leaving
 The least of matter unconsumed before
 Its fiery workings:—and the light of this Most royal of funeral pyres shall be
 Not a mere pillar form'd of cloud and flame,
 A beacon in the horizon for a day,
 And then a mount of ashes, but a light
 To lesson ages, rebel nations, and Voluptuous princes. Time shall quench full many

A people's records, and a hero's acts;
 Sweep empire after empire, like this first
 Of empires, into nothing; but even then Shall spare this deed of mine, and hold it up
 A problem few dare imitate, and none
 Despise—but, it may be, avoid the life
 Which led to such a consummation.

Myrrha returns with a lighted torch in her hand, and a cup in the other.

Myr. Lo!
 I've lit the lamp which lights us to the stars.

Sard. And the cup?

Myr. 'Tis my country's custom to Make a libation to the gods.

Sard. And mine
 To make libations amongst men. I've not Forgot the custom; and although alone,
 Will drain one draught in memory of many
 A joyous banquet past.

(Sardanapulus takes the cup, and after drinking and tinkling the reversed cup, as a drop falls, exclaims—)

And this libation
 Is for the excellent Beleses.

Myr. Why
 Dwell'st the mind rather upon that man's name
 Than on his mates in villainy?

Sard. The other
 Is a mere soldier, a mere tool, a kind
 Of human sword in a friend's hand; the other
 Is master-mover of his warlike puppet:
 But I dismiss them from my mind.—Yet pause,
 My Myrrha! dost thou truly follow me,
 Freely and fearlessly?

Myr. And dost thou think
 A Greek girl dare not do for love, that which
 An Indian widow braves for custom?

Sard. Then
 We but await the signal.

Myr. It is long
 In sounding.

Sard. Now, farewell; one last embrace.

Myr. Embrace, but not the last; there is one more

Sard. True, the commingling fire will mix our ashes.

Myr. And pure as is my love to thee, shall
 they,

Purged from the dross of earth and earthly
 passion,

Mix pale with thine. A single thought yet irks me.

Sard. Say it.
Myr. It is that no kind hand will gather
 The dust of both into one urn.

Sard. The better:
 Rather let them be borne abroad upon
 The winds of heaven, and scatter'd into air,

Than be polluted more by human hands
 Of slaves and traitors; in this blazing palace,

And its enormous walls of reeking ruin,
 We leave a nobler monument than Egypt

Hath piled in her brick mountains, or dead kings.

Or mine, for none know whether those proud piles

Be for their monarch or their ox-god Apis:
 So much for monuments that have forgotten
 Their very record!

Myr. Then farewell, thou earth!
 And loveliest spot of earth! farewell Ionias!

Be thou still free and beautiful, and far
 Aloof from desolation! My last prayer

Was for thee, my last thoughts, save one, were of thee!

Sard. And that?
Myr. Is yours.

(The trumpet of Pania sounds without.)
 Hark!

Sard. Nam!
Myr. Adieu, Assyria!

I loved thee well, my own, my fathers' land,
 And better as my country than my kingdom.

I satiated thee with peace and joys; and this
 Is my reward! and now I owe thee nothing,

Not even a grave. (He mounts the pile.)

Now, Myrrha!
Myr. Art thou ready?

Sard. As the torch in thy grasp.
(Myrrha fires the pile.)

Myr. Thy fire! I come.

(As Myrrha springs forwards to throw herself into the flames, the curtain falls.)

This tragedy, like every production of Lord Byron, displays great poetic genius, and abounds in the most brilliant passages. It possesses, however, few of the requisites of an acting tragedy:—the plot is meagre, the incidents are few and not striking, and the situations undramatic. It however should always be recollected, that Lord Byron does not write for the stage; that he aims only at producing a tragic poem; and every person who reads Sardanapulus must allow it to be one of no ordinary merit.

The tragedy of 'The Two Foscari', which is founded on a subject much better adapted to the stage than the story of Sardanapulus, we shall notice at some length in our next.

A Voyage to Africa. By W. Hutton.
 (Concluded from p. 786.)

MR. HUTTON'S return to Cape Coast, from Coomassie, was attended with several unappassionate adventures. He appears to have travelled quicker than any of his companions, having performed the whole distance in six days, which the natives declared was never done before, either by native or European. When a day's journey from Cape Coast, his haumcock-bearer deserted him in the dead of the night, and in the heart of the forest. His servant, a little black boy, was his only companion; his feet were dreadfully lacerated, and tied up with the sole of an old pair of shoes and pack-thread; the path was rugged, and he was entirely destitute of provisions and water. Pursuing his journey, he observes,—

'I at length arrived at some extensive plantations of Indian corn and plantain, which gave me hopes of being near Fas-trey, or the adjoining croom, called Yascomadie. But just at this moment, my boy, who was before me, lighting me along with a torch, loudly exclaimed,
 "Majeh! majeh!" and danced about like a frantic person. Before I had time to inquire what was the matter, I found the cause, by feeling a number of large black ants crawling up my leg, which stung me dreadfully, by digging their forceps into the sores on my feet. I had some difficulty in tearing them off. My boy, from the agony he suffered, threw down the torch, and I had now the misery to be left in this dismal forest without a light! Having, with my servant, retreated from the nest of ants, we assisted each

* 'This is an exclamation the natives generally use when flogged. It signifies failure.'

† The ants here mentioned, are species of the most surprising nature. They are different species of them; red, black, and white. They go in troops of millions and tens of millions; and the regularity and order with which they march from place to place are astonishing. In making their nests they throw up the earth to an incredible height, making hillocks at least six or eight feet high, and twenty feet more in circumference; they also make their nests in trees. Bosman, speaking of these worms, says, "they come to our forts and dis-tressers in such prodigious swarms, that they frequently oblige us to quit our beds in the night time; they are strangely rapacious, and as an animal can stand before them. They have often, in the night, attacked one of my sheep, which I have found a perfect abode in the morning, and that so nicely done, that the best master of the dismembering art could not succeed so well, it being impossible for human hands to have done it so artfully. As well as rats are, they cannot escape them; and as soon as one of them assaults a rat he is invariably gone." These ants appear to have a sort of language, calling one another to assist their prey, when they march off with it. In great order, all of them moving in the same direction.

other as well as we could in the dark, in brushing them off our legs.

'Worn out with fatigue, having travelled nearly thirty miles, exposed eighteen hours in my wet clothes, from the rain which had fallen during the day; deserted by my people, without any thing to eat or a glass of water to allay my parching thirst; without even a bed of straw to lie down upon; without a great coat or any thing to shelter me from the heavy dews of the night; without the means of making a fire to keep off the wild beasts which every where surrounded me in the forest, I was almost without hope. And if any thing had been wasting to fill up the uncertainty of this night's misery, it was the circumstance of my having travelled, in the early part of the day, in my wet clothes, which were doubtless wet from the profuse perspiration I had been thrown into by walking, and which now hung about me the whole night.

'To proceed on my journey or to return, with a view of finding my people, in the dark, I conceived was equally hopeless; and, indeed, I was too fatigued, and in too much agony to do so. I therefore sat down in the forest (being unwilling to climb a tree) and waited anxiously for morning. In this situation the lines of Mr. Bird, in the "Vale of Slaughter," forcibly occurred to me:—

"But far remote thy native valley lies,
Dear are the scenes thy dubious path supplies.
Where, when the night falls chilly on thy head,
Will thou, sad wanderer, find thy lonely bed?
No friendly comfort near to hush the sigh
That thou may'st breathe in weary agony."

Having passed the night in singing the most noisy song I could think of, in which I was assisted by the discordant yells of my boy Quassie (whom I was obliged to keep awake by a gentle rap occasionally on the head with my sabre), I proceeded at day-light, and, in less than half an hour, passed through Yancoffodie; so that, had I continued my journey the preceding night, only half an hour longer, I should have escaped the misery which I have just described.

"On leaving Yanconfofie, we passed many extensive plantations of Indian corn, plantains, and fruit, and crossing a beautiful stream, about a mile from Paintrey, we entered that neat little village, which, it will readily be imagined, was an agreeable relief to me, after the perilous night I had just encountered. Here I was received with the most cordial welcome by my old friend Quamiso Hloenyese, the house-master, with whom we put up on our journey to the capital. A large brass pan of water was immediately provided to bathe my wounded feet, and, stripping off my wet clothes, I wrapped myself up in a large country-cloth of Hoyenese's, and felt comparatively comfortable.'

* 'I did not sing from an impression that music would charm the savage beasts, but as I had no fire, I thought it was the best plan to prevent them from coming near me, which I have no doubt it did; for, although I heard them frequently throughout the night, they did not molest either me or my companion.'

On the subject of the Niger and the rivers in the heights of Benin and Beafra, Mr. Hutton has the following judicious remarks :—

So many theoretical opinions have been hazarded as regards the course and termination of the Niger, that it only remains to be practically decided which of those opinions is correct. Some have supposed that this great river is absorbed by sands, others have endeavoured to prove that the Nile and the Niger are one and the same river, and various conjectures have been offered from time to time, which still leave us in the same uncertainty upon this interesting subject; but the clouds which have so long obscured this geographical problem, it is now hoped, will shortly be dissipated.

'Among all the hypotheses which have been submitted to the public', that which has lately been published by Mr. McQueen, carries with it the greatest probability of being correct; not that I come to this conclusion from the facts so distinctly elucidated by that gentleman, but from various inquiries and observations during my residence in Africa, and particularly in my last visit to that country (before the publication by Mr. McQueen), I gave almost precisely the same opinion upon this subject, and stated it, in writing, to the President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh (Mr. Henry Mackenzie), who did me the honour to read it before that board in April last.

I read it before that board in April last. I have since seen Mr. McQueen's publication, and read it with increased satisfaction, from the circumstance of that gentleman's sentiments being so much in accordance with my own, and the whole of his arguments have tended to confirm the opinionions I have long entertained; namely, that the Niger terminates in the bights of Benin and Biafra. In support of this opinion, Mr. McQueen has so ably arranged the various authorities, both ancient and modern, that little now remains to be said upon the subject. It may be proper, however, to notice two authorities which he quotes in support of this opinion: the first is Gregory of Abyssinia, who states, that flowing west from the Egyptian Nile. He says pointedly, "descendit enim verus regionem Elwah, et sic illabitur in mare magnum; viz. Oceanum Occidentalem." The other is Mr. Robertson, who states, "that the natives on the coast of Benin and Biafra assert, that all the rivers

* * M. Mollin (to whom we are indebted for determining the sources of the Senegal, Gambria, and Rio Grande) has laid down the source of the Niger, in his map, nearly two degrees further to the westward than it was hitherto supposed to be. How far this gentleman may be correct in doing so, we must leave to future travellers to determine; but I have not copied him in my map, as I would not pay so bad a compliment to the diligent researches of the enterprising Park.

in the Delta come from one gr which descends from the north."

‘ Indeed, although it is true Moors, whom I have met with in the interior and elsewhere, have insisted on there being a communication between the Niger and the Nile, natives on the coast positively state the rivers in the bights of Benin and Biafra are branches of the Niger, which they call Inaukussey, or Insonkassy, and in the Fantee and Ashantee languages signifies Large Water, or Large’

"That much was my opinion, I stated to Mr. Mackenzie, but also since as 1819, I wrote a letter to him, to be laid before Lord Bathurst the same effect, and suggesting arrangements on the rivers Volta, Lake Formosa, as well as on the island Fernando Po, which would command the sea and extensive trade with all Africa, and by which our merchandise could be transported into the year of that country with facility and ease. Much credit is due to Mr. M'Carty the able manner in which he has set out the advantages which would result from our taking possession of the island Fernando Po. It is, however, but to others to observe, that he means the first to suggest this, as myself, but my respected friend Charles McCarthy and Mr. Robinson submitted the same opinion for his Majesty's government; and Mr. Robinson, in 1819, arrived on the Coast with three vessels, for the taking possession of this island, and the sanction of his Majesty's government."

'But to return to the subject at hand, we will suppose, for a moment, that the main body of this river does indeed flow into the bights of Benin and Biafra, and that some other branch of it, to the south of the Leasa, I have no doubt, may ultimately be found to do so. If this is true, have positively stated again, that the Niger communicates with the Nile, and after all the information has been collected to support this notion, it would be presumptuous to say that such is not the fact.' It is clear that these two great rivers may communicate with each other, but they are distinct rivers; neither is it probable that the Niger may communicate with the Nile, and also throw off a great body of water, by a tributary stream, to the south of the Leasa, not yet discovered.

* 'A stronger proof, indeed, strange concatenation of rivers referred to than that mentioned Bowdich, drawn by Baron H. who represents the courses of the and Amazon to be quite opposite

* 'Mr. Dupuis, I believe, is of the Niger and the Nile unite, and the opinion of others. (Vide Jackson of Morocco and Bowdich's Ashantee)

other, notwithstanding their immediate connection; and there is nothing more improbable in the Niger and the Nile being connected by the Gir (although flowing in opposite directions), than there is in the Orinoco and Amazon being connected by the Caciaquaire.

* According to information we obtained at Coomassie, there is a water communication from Porto Nova and the Lagos river nearly all the way to Egypt; and this is, in a great measure, confirmed by the late Mr. Jarvis, of the company's service, with whom I had many conversations, who stated that, during his residence at Lagos, he met with Negroes who had come from the banks of the Niger, who assured him that there was a water communication nearly the whole of the way. Mr. Bowdich, in a late publication, speaks of having received similar information, and Mr. Robertson writes also to the same effect, and says he was informed that canoes have come from Timbuctou to Lagos in three days; but this, I suppose, must be a typographical error, as I cannot imagine that gentlemen would write such a manifest absurdity, three weeks being more likely. The Quolla* mentioned by the Moors, and alluded to by Mr. Bowdich, is said to be the Lagos, and not the Niger†. The Moorish name is the Bahr Neel or Seer Neel, which the Moors call all large rivers, and the sea they call "Bahr Mull," "Joliba" is also a figurative name, meaning "a great river;" and the Negroes call the Nile of Egypt "Gubbi," which signifies a sea. It is also called "Neel Massar" and "Neel Sham." The Niger likewise is known by various names, such as Neel-el-Abede, Joliba, Coudha, &c.

† The Quolla is reported to be one month's journey from Coomassie, and the Niger one month's journey from the Quolla. According to Mr. Bowdich's account, the Niger is forty-seven days' journey from Kong, to which place the Ashantees can travel in safety. The Mecca itinerary, detailed by that gentleman, is of considerable value, and strongly tends to confirm what I have stated in the first part of this chapter, respecting the route to the Niger, through Ashantees.

‡ On the route to Coomassie, after passing the Boosempa, most of the rivers run to the eastward. The Volta or Adiri is said to flow from the Kong mountains, and is a beautiful river, which empties itself into the ocean about one degree to the eastward of our settlement.

* Mr. Dupuis, in Adams's Narrative, states, upon the information of a Negro of Bambara, that Quolla is the name of a country, and says it must be to the south-east of Bambara; and, about three journeys from the capital of Quolla is a considerable lake, or rather a river, which communicates with the Niger.

† This statement I would wish to be understood as offering with great diffidence, as I had no opportunity of confirming it by the general reports of the Moors.

at Accra*. This statement is indeed confirmed by the new map published by Mr. Bowdich, on which this river (the Volta) is traced from the Coomba or Zamma, close to the Kong and Koon-doo-goree mountains.

* These scanty notices, regarding the Niger and the geography of this part of Africa, I trust will be excused, when it is considered that I was prohibited from making inquiries upon these subjects. Vide Instructions, p. 416 and 447.

† But, from what has now been stated, it will be evident that these noble rivers afford the greatest facilities for the introduction of our commerce into the very heart of Africa; and it cannot be too often repeated, that whether they have a communication with the Niger or not, they ought at least to be explored, as more trade might be thus carried on in one month, than on the Gold Coast in a year; there being no rivers of any magnitude near our settlements there, and, consequently, the transportation of merchandise on the heads of the Negroes for hundreds of miles under a vertical sun, must evidently be attended with every disadvantage to the African trader, as well as to the mercantile interests of Great Britain.

Mr. Hutton's maps appear to be well drawn, and we doubt not are as correct as the imperfect knowledge we still have of this portion of the globe will permit; the coloured engravings give a good idea of the African costume.

Malay Annals: translated from the Malay Language, by the late Dr. John Leyden. With an Introduction by Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles, F. R. S. 8vo. pp. 361. London, 1821.

THIS is an unfinished production of that excellent oriental scholar, Dr. Leyden, who undertook to translate some of the most popular traditional stories of the Malays, but, unfortunately for that branch of literature of which he was so distinguished an ornament, he died without completing his design. The work, from the want of explanatory notes, with which it was intended to be enriched, is in many respects unintelligible; and, though it might have been difficult to get any one to supply the deficiency, yet, unless that had been done, we think it would have been as respectful to the memory of the lamented translator, to have withheld the Malay Annals from the public. The introduction of Sir T. Raffles has nothing at all to do with the rest of the volume. With this impression, we shall not enter into any analysis of a work in every respect so incomplete, but shall merely select two of the traditions which it contains. The first, it will be seen, has some reference to the most universal of all traditions—the Deluge:—

“Raja Suran, considering that he had now become acquainted with the contents of the land, wished to acquire information concerning the nature of the sea. For this purpose, he ordered a chest of glass, with a lock in the inside, and fixed it to a chain of gold. Then, shutting himself up in this chest, he caused himself to be let down into the sea, to see the wonders of God Almighty's creation. At last, the chest reached a land, denominated Zeya, when Raja Suran came forth from the chest, and walked about to see the wonders of the place. He saw a country of great extent, into which he entered, and saw a people named Barsam, so numerous, that God alone could know their numbers. This people were the one half infidels, and the other true believers. When they saw Raja Suran, they were greatly astonished and surprised at his dress, and carried him before their raja, who was named Aktab-al-Arz, who inquired of those who brought him, “whence is this man?” And they replied, “he is a new comer.” “Where is he come?” said the raja. “That,” said they, “none of us know.” Then Raja Aktab-al-Arz asked Raja Suran, “whence are you, and whence have you come?” “I come from the world,” said Raja Suran; “and your servant is raja of the whole race of mankind; and my name is Raja Suran.” The raja was greatly astonished at this account, and asked if there was any other world than his own. “Yes, there is,” said Raja Suran; “and a very great one, full of various forms.” The raja was still more astonished, saying, “Almighty God, can this be possible?” He then seated Raja Suran on his own throne. This Raja Aktab-al-Arz had a daughter named Putri Mahtab-al-Bahri. This lady was extremely handsome, and her father gave her in marriage to Raja Suran, to whom she bore three sons. The raja was for some time much delighted with this adventure; but at last he began to reflect what advantage it was for him to stay so long below the earth, and how he should be able to carry his three sons with him. He begged, however, his father-in-law to think of some method of conveying him to the upper world, as it would be of great disadvantage to cut off the line of Secauder Zulkarnein. His father-in-law assented to the propriety of this observation, and furnished him with a sea-horse, named Sambrani, which could fly through the air as well as swim in the water. Raja Suran mounted this sea-horse, and amid the lamentations of his spouse, the princess; the flying steed quickly cleared the nether atmosphere, and having reached the upper ocean, it rapidly traversed it; and the subjects of Raja Suran quickly perceived him. The mantri of Raja Suran, perceiving on what sort of animal his master was mounted, quickly caused a mare to be brought to the shore of the sea. On perceiving the mare, the steed Sambrani quickly came to the shore, and as quickly did Raja Suran dismount from him, on which he immediately returned to the sea. Raja Suran then called a man of science and an artificer, and ordered the account of his descent into the sea to be recorded, and a monument to be formed, which might serve for the information of posterity to the day of judgment. The history of this adventure was accordingly composed, and inscribed on a stone in the Hindostanee language. This stone being adorned by gold and silver, was left as a monument, and the raja said that this would be found by one of his descendants, who should reduce all the rajahs of the countries under the wind. Then Raja Suran returned to the land of Kling, and after his arrival he founded a city of great size, with a fort of black stone, with a wall of seven fathoms in both height and thickness, and so skillfully joined, that no intricacies remained between the stones, but seemed all of molten metal. Its gates were of steel, adorned with gold and gems. Within its circumference are contained seven hills, and, in the centre, a lake, like a sea, and so large, that if an elephant be standing on the one shore he will not be visible on the other; and this lake contained every species of fish, and in the middle was an island of considerable height, on which the mists continually rested. The island was planted with trees, flowers, and all kinds of fruits, and whenever Raja Suran wished to divert himself, he used to frequent it. On the shore of this lake was a large forest, stocked with all sorts of wild beasts, and whenever Raja Suran wished to hunt, he mounted his elephant and proceeded to this forest. The name of this city was Bijanagar, which, at the present time, is a city in the land of Kling. Such is the account of Raja Suran, but if all his adventures were to be related, they would rival those of Hananah.

Our next story, and with which we shall conclude, is, in the highest degree, romantic, and would furnish a fine subject for a fairy tale, at Covent Garden Theatre:—

It is related, that the wife of Sultan Mahmud, and mother of Rajah Ahmed, returned into God's mercy, and the king was extremely afflicted! and how long it was that, through grief, he would not have the nobles sounded! All the chiefs likewise looked gloomy, at seeing the grief of the prince; and all their attempts to console him proved ineffectual, and could not remove the impression from his heart. One day, all the nobles, mantri, and hula-balangs, assembled, and the king asked them, what they advised, since the land of Malacca was now devoid of a queen. The chiefs said, "the daughter of what raja would you choose? Mention the name of any princess, and we will go and ask her in due form." The king replied, "I don't want to marry a raja's daughter, for any other raja may marry a raja's daughter; but I want to marry one to whom no other prince can aspire." "Inform us, then," said the nobles, "whither your wishes tend, and we will do our utmost to carry them into effect." Then said the king, "I want to ask the Princess Gunung Ledang." Then they asked him whom he wished to send as his messengers. He said, "I will send the laksamana, Sang Satia, and Tun Mamed." They cheerfully assented. Then Tun Mamed first set out with the men of Indragiri, to clear the way to Gunung Ledang, for he was the head man, or pengulu of Indragiri. After long journeying they reached the foot of the hill, and began to ascend it, but found no road; the hill men, however, showed them the road, for the way was excessively difficult, with violent gusts of wind, and a cold quite unupportable. They advanced, however, till they reached about the middle of the mountain, when none of the people could proceed farther. Then, said Tun Mamed to the laksamana and Sang Satia, "stop you here, gentles, and let me ascend this hill." The others assented, and Tun Mamed, with two or three hearty men, ascended as well as he could, till he came to the bamboos, which are spontaneously melodious; and all that ascended felt like birds flying, in the furious gusts of wind, and the clouds closed round so near, that one might touch them; and the sound of the musical bamboos was extremely melodious; and the very birds lingered to hear their music; and the forest deer were all enchanted by their melody; and Tun Mamed was so delighted with their sound, that he could not prevail on himself to advance on his journey for some time. Again, however, he proceeded slowly, till at last he reached a garden of wonderful beauty, such as had never been seen. It was full of all kinds of flowers and fruits which are to be found in the whole world, arranged in plots of divers kinds. As soon as the birds of the garden observed the approach of Tun Mamed, they uttered all kinds of cries, some like a man whistling; others like a person playing on a pipe; others like a person playing on the sirdam; others like a person reciting verses; others like persons bersaluta, or joyous; others like persons ber-gorindam, or conversing in dialogue. The large lemons made a loud noise, the grapes giggled, and the pomegranates smiled; and the warasac laughed aloud, while the rose repeated pantuns, in the following style:—

"The teeth are grating against each other,
They wish to eat the fish of the tank;

Fine and fat are the roes for frying,
And the scales will stick to the breast."

"The Tanjung's flower replied,—
"Dang Nila put in his betel box,
The Berimbang and the Pidada fruit,
Was there ever such a fool as you,
The bird is flown, and you are only ginsing
the pepper (for catching it)."

Tun Mamed was exceedingly surprised to hear a tree so skillful in making pantuns, as well as to see the whole arrangement of the garden. Tun Mamed at last came up to a hall in the garden, the whole materials of which were of bone, and the roof of hair. In the balcony dais, sat an old woman, of elegant appearance, with a plaid thrown across her shoulder, with four young women before her. As soon as they saw Tun Mamed, they asked him, "whence do you come, and whither are you going?" Tun Mamed said, "I am a Malacca man, named Tun Mamed. I am sent by the Sultan of Malacca, to ask in marriage the lady Princess Gunung Ledang. This is the reason of my coming. The laksamana, and Sang Satia also are on the hill beneath, but unable to ascend, and have sent me onward. Now, please to inform me what is your name, and whence you come?" The elder lady replied, "my name is Dang Raya Rani, and I am the head person here of the Princess Gunung Ledang. Whatever you want, stay here, and I will go and represent it to the princess." On this the five females instantly vanished. Then there came to him an old woman, hunch-backed, and bent threefold, and said to him, "Dang Raya Rani has delivered your message to the Princess Gunung Ledang, who desires me to say, that if the Raja of Malacca wishes for me, he must first make a flight of stairs of gold, and another of silver, from Malacca to Gunung Ledang; and in asking me, he must present a goat's heart seven platters broad, a moth's heart seven platters broad, a vat of human tears, and a vat of the juice of the young betel nut, one phial of the raja's blood, and one phial of the Prince Raja Ahmed's blood; and if the raja performs this, the Princess Gunung Ledang will assent to his desire." As soon as she had spoken this she vanished, so that nobody could perceive where she had gone. According to some accounts, however, the elderly lady who conversed with Tun Mamed, was the Princess Gunung Ledang, who had assumed the appearance of an old woman. Then Tun Mamed returned and descended to the laksamana and Sang Satia, and informed them of what had passed; after which they all returned and related the whole of the old woman's conversation to Sultan Mahmud Shah, who said, "all these requests may be complied with, but the taking of blood is an unpleasant business, and I have no inclination for it at all."

The Gossip: A Series of Original Essays and Letters, Descriptive Sketches, Anecdotes, and Original Poetry. 8vo. pp. 188. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH we are now only in the third year of our editorial age, yet, in that period, we have seen a host of contemporaries, who started with more apparent vigour than ourselves, consigned to the 'tomb of the Capulets.' The 'Indicator' no longer points out the sweets of literature; the spell of the 'Talisman' is broken; we are compelled to take our breakfast without a 'Dejeuner,' and silenced is the tongue of the 'Gossip.' A host of reviews, journals of literature, &c. have 'fretted their hour,' and are now no more, while we (thanks to a good constitution and the nursing kindness of our friends) live to perform an act of christian friendship to the manes of our deceased contemporaries.

The 'Gossip' was born on Saturday the 3rd of March, 1821, about eight o'clock in the morning, and expired about the same hour on the 11th of August, to the inexpressible grief of numerous friends and acquaintance.

The 'Gossip' was a light, amusing, and unassuming little weekly periodical, and though only a two-penny tract, was not 'two-penny trash.' The twenty-four numbers now before us, for that was the extent it reached, contain some articles, which we think ought to have saved it from annihilation; and, although we know it is extremely unedifying to acknowledge merit in a contemporary, yet we venture to do it, and quote the following articles in support of our opinion:—

CONJECTURE ON SHAKESPEARE.

MACBETH, Act I. Scene 3.

And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal in her lap

And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal. Give me, quoth I.

And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal. And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal. And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal.

And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal. And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal. And mouchal, and mouchal, and mouchal.

For the following conjecture, but very plausible, amendment, we are indebted to an edition of the play of Macbeth, published at York, in 1797, by Mr. Harry Rowley.

It certainly appears, very strange, that a witch (a being remarkable for mischief and revenge for insults) should not inflict some punishment upon the sailor's wife who affronted her, instead of purposing to take a long voyage to vent her malice on the offender's husband, who, it does not appear, had in himself given any cause of complaint whatever.—Mr. Rowe therefore, observes, that in Scotland, the rown-tree was supposed to have the property of driving away witches and evil spirits. "An ancient song, called the "Lardley worm of Spinnleston blangs," has the following stanza:—

"Their spells were vain. The hags return'd
To the Queen in sorrowful mood,
Crying that witches have no power
Where there is rown-tree wood."

A rown tree was certainly the answer given to the witch by the sailor's wife, and plainly means, "I have a charm against all your power, and defy you to injure me, so begone, and do your worst;" and then the subsequent resolution of the hag becomes perfectly natural, who in return argues thus, "I cannot be reveng'd on the charm-guarded rump-fed ronyon, but her husband is open to my power; he has no charm to protect him, and therefore on him I'll vent my spite."

Some of the very learned commentators on this passage have very absurdly supposed that the rump-fed woman was charitably fed from a great man's kitchen, because in ancient times "rumps, kidney's fat, and trotters," were the perquisites of the cook, and sold to the poor. Now Shakespeare only meant to convey the idea of a fat, indolent, and unweildy sailor's wife, of whom fac-similes may, at this day, be seen in every sea-port of Great Britain. Besides, Shakespeare tells us, that her husband was gone to Aleppo, "master of the Tyger," which is more a proof of riches than poverty.

'Anticipations of public opinion in the year two thousand three hundred on the poets of the present day.

S—t, Sir W—r. An eminent poet and novelist of the 19th century. He published 2000 volumes in prose and died at length of a broken heart, from the circumstance of having been out-bid at a sale in the purchase of a black letter piece of antiquity, afterwards proved to be spurious. His avowed aim was to rival Lopez de Vega, and treble the tax upon paper, in which he ultimately succeeded, and was rewarded by a liberal government, with a baronetcy. It was his usual boast that he had written more in a few years, than the world would be able to read in as many centuries. In his last moments he raved upon Ballantyne and Winkin de Worde; declared that publication was his God; that he thought of no devil, but the printer's, and regretted no errors but those of the press.

He was shrouded in proof sheets of his last novel, and followed to the grave by all the printers in England and Holland. The superstitions of that dark and bar-barons age have not failed to inform us, that even after death his spirit paid nocturnal visits to the press, and delighted to disarrange with its unsubstantial fingers the types it could no longer employ.

B—n, L—d. A dark and powerful poet of the same age. He was born in a charnel house, and at an early period fell in love with a death's head and cross bones. Disappointed in this elegant attachment, he became melancholy, wrote stanzas to worms and sextons, and finally married a mere woman, in a fit of hypochondria. He was undoubtedly somewhat licentious; having seventeen mistresses in his native country, (eight of whom were actresses, and the remainder, maids of honour,) besides a scraggo or two in Greece and Albania, established during his travels in search of a skull-capacious enough to hold a gallon of Greek wine. He is said to have possessed a peculiar felicity in swimming, and at one period crossed the Hellespont three times a day during several months for an appetite. Of these feats we find mention in upwards of fifty passages throughout his works.

His Lordship made a vain attempt to rebuild the temple of Jupiter Olympus with pebbles, and a cement of powdered bones.—Drank himself delicious at the fountain of Dirce, and expired at length in the catacombs of Egypt, dancing the giuacca among the mummies.

S—y, R—t. Poet and biographer. This author produced an infinite number of stupendous poems, some of which it is said were to be seen in the libraries of the curious about a century ago, but are now totally obsolete and forgotten. He published proposals for nine hundred epic poems to be produced in as many successive weeks, but after writing six months without sleep, was seized with an unaccountable drowsiness from which he never recovered; and it was ever afterwards remarked that his works had sympathetically imbibed the power of producing similar torpid sensations on others.

He died in a fit of blank verse, having accomplished little more than half his proposed task. A malicious story is told of this writer being at one time the King's Jester, or Court Buffoon, with the singular title of Poet Laureate, a name, in no way generally supposed given in derision to those contemptible creatures who write bombastic verses in praise of the king and court. But this is a mere traditionary rumour, and in all probability far from being founded on truth.

W—ds—th. A poet. None of whose multifarious productions have reached our age, with the exception of a few passages, which, for their pretensions, add extreme simplicity; have for many years found a place in the London Primer, had modern Reading made Easy. He formed his style when a child, and never departed from it, the simplicity of the nursery being obvious and apparent throughout the whole range of his more mature

'The uniform tendency of his writings was to throw down (at least in the poetical world) all distinctions of men and things. To render the mishaps of a plough-boy of equal importance with the calamities of a monarch, and a lamb bleating on the mountains an object of as spirit-stirring as a victorious army.

'From cotemporary writings preserved by the lovers of ancient trash, we learn that W—ds—th either wrote or planned a poem of some magnitude, named "The Excursion," consisting of one hundred cantos, and an introduction in fifty parts; this work, if accomplished, has long been forgotten. He was the inventor of re-busses and conundrums; and in his extreme old age is said (we know not how truly) to have thrown the adventures of "Jack the Giant Killer" into blank verse, with a prefatory essay on true simplicity of style. We have likewise met with the titles of various other works attributed to this now forgotten bard; such as "Tommy Hickelbruff," "The Bloody Gardener;" "The White Doe," &c. &c. But how far tradition may speak correctly on these points it would at this distance of time, be useless to inquire.'

A Letter to the Rev. W. L. Bowles in reply to his Letter to Thomas Campbell, Esq. and to his two Letters to the Right Hon. Lord Byron. By Martin McDermott, 8vo. pp. 86. London, 1821.

THE silly controversy about the morality of Pope, and the rules and invariable principles of poetry seems interminable; and if we may judge from the positive tone of the disputants is likely to remain so. After reading the letters of Lord Byron and Mr. Bowles, we got so satiated with the subject, that it was some time before we had resolution to venture on the pamphlet now before us.

Mr. McDermott takes the side of Lord Byron, Mr. Campbell, and the Quarterly Review, respecting the poetical talents of Pope, whom they place by the side of Shakespeare and Milton. He also agrees with his Lordship in all the arguments which he has advanced against Mr. Bowles's principles of poetry, but he differs with the noble bard in granting, that images or objects are poetical per se, and contends that there is no object in either art or nature that is so. On other points Mr. McDermott dilates at some length, and with considerable ability, but the subject is worn threadbare, and it would be very difficult for any talent to give it a new interest, especially after Lord Byron and Mr. Campbell have written so well upon it.

The Mediator, AN OCCASIONAL PAPER, No. VII.

The manifest use of a Dedicator is this, videlicet: That the readers may be so blinded by the lustre of a splendid name, that they shall consider all the Author's faults as no many palpable beauties; or, at all events, as real though unintelligible perfections. AXON.

I HAVE thus given a succinct, explicit, and circumstantial description of my earthly person. Some might doubt the policy of this, inasmuch as it is a kind of Hue and Cry, and might serve as a direction to the officers of justice, in case these papers were found to contain anything subversive of civil government, or too nearly subversive, or too nearly touching the sensitive person of royalty, in matter of private libel, or of public defamation. But the least attention to the difference between satire and libel, will always preserve an author from the above danger, much better than the concealment of his person. Satire is drawn from general views of the follies, the singularities, and the vices of human nature. Libel from a particular, and frequently from a partial view of its object. The former is useful, the latter criminal. Satire makes you despise folly and hate vice. Libel tends to make you despise and hate yourself. Satire is a silent monitor. Libel is an open accuser. You are either ignorant that satire applies to you, or you hope that others are ignorant that it does apply, and therefore endeavour to avoid the faults which entail it. You know that libel does apply to you, that every one knows it, that remedy of the fault you are accused of is impossible, that the correction of it is useless; you therefore persist in it. Thus the tendencies of satire and libel are directly opposite; the one good, the other evil.

And, if this be looked into, it will be found to resolve itself into the distinction between knowledge and truth. We may assert generally, that the exposition of knowledge never can be injurious, but must be always beneficial: the exposition of truth may frequently be highly detrimental. There is no stronger instance of this than the use to which the Holy Scriptures have been put by weak or designing men. The Sacred Volume is a book of truths. Explain these truths properly, and then they become knowledge, which never can but redound to the honour of God and the utility of man; leave them unexplained, or explain them improperly, they are then bare truths, (for the sacred propositions are true in themselves, however falsely explained,) and lo! into what sects, factions, faiths, opinions, and beliefs is the world divided! The assertion, that things are so, which is truth, may set foolish or depraved minds on a train of false reasoning: the assertion that things are so, and the explanation why they are so, which is knowledge, puts an end to further disquisition, and the possibility of error therefrom, which is the only ill effect to be dreaded. In the same way, just satire is knowledge, just libel is truth. In this case also, we see that truth is injurious, knowledge is useful. Satire opens the springs of the human heart, shows where the true sources of vice and folly are to be found, and by this means teaches us how to diminish and dam up the vicious currents. Libel points out with invidious hand the folly or the vice, but gives us no knowledge of its source, or the manner of preventing it. Libel deals with facts alone, satire with their origin. The one is the office of the villain or the knave, the other is the business of the philosopher.

Having thus briefly excused myself, I proceed. If these papers contain an explicit description of my corporeal person, I think they also contain an implicit delineation of my incorporeal (begging the materialist's pardon) person; in the junction of which two different persons, consists the one person, I call myself. From hence, I think, with a spice of that sort of prophecy, usually denominated, common-sense, and with the additional information, that I dwell within lath and plaster of the nocturnal scenes of those damnable orgies, performed by shrunk lions and mock tigers, within three inches of the upper elements, within snore of the owls on the chimney brink, —that I eat crasses, and drink the pitiful tears of heaven, the reader may draw some shrewd conclusions as to the manner of my life, and the tenor of my conduct in it. Yes; if, as you promised, you had dedicated the six preceding numbers to yourself, but—

True; I forgot

DEDICATION:

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD WILDERNESS.

MY LORD,—In thus fulfilling my promise of dedicating to you these papers, be assured it is my judgment and not my ambition, which directs my choice. Your title, my Lord, should never win that from me, your merit could not. Ambition may do very well in a king or a conqueror,—judgment must satisfy the philosopher. Toally myself, who am but an ape of philosophy, with a Lord, were but a sorry stretch of ambition, if I looked no farther than his title; but when I cover myself with an escutcheon of the order of merit, to which his title may give eclat, where I openly praise his qualities, I tacitly approve my own judgment in appreciating them. Believe me also, my Lord, no dedicater ever approaches his patron with more sincere conviction of the praises he was about to bestow on the great personage, than I do in the present instance. I am no worshipper for broken meats, and if the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table were to be gathered by flattery, either of him or his butler, (and in this the lord and the drawer of corks are nearly upon a par, except that I believe the latter has the fuller and more servile levee,) I would rather choose to go to bed with Lazarus, than purchase the means of life by the sale of my honesty. As the poet says—

'I would not flatter Neptune for his trident,
'Nor Jove for his power of thunder.'

The reverence which is paid to rank, title, and estate, is very well as a bond of society. The theory of social equality is mere Utopian. It can no more exist than a plurality of gods. If we were all lords, we should have no tinkers; for who the devil would mend a kettle, with a patent of nobility in his pocket? It may be said, if we are all equal, every lord would mend his own kettle. Absurd! we must have tinkers as well as lords: Wherever there exists society, there must be laws to bind it; where there are laws, there must be law-makers; and the ablest law-maker will be the greatest man in the community. This is the origin of rank and degrees of state. In one respect indeed, we are all on an equal footing; we are all servants: the poor man is the servant of the lord, and he, in his turn, is but a servant in a richer livery. Yet, still we must have gradations even in servitude. Each particular society must in this resemble the grand system of the universe. In this, the ranks of all things existing, estimated according to their powers and intellectual capacities, by which alone excellence is properly measured, rise in a continuous ascent, from insignificance to infinity. It may be likened to a vast cone, the rings thereof representing the several potentialities and order of intellectual excellence with which the individual things of the universe are endued, beginning from a mathematical point, which may be taken for blind matter having no mental efficiency, and from thence increasing in size and circumference, so as to represent proportionally all the different degrees of intellectual comprehension existing in the world, till at length it swells out into an illimitable base, which comprehends ubiquity itself, the infinite, the inconceivable, the omnipotent and omniscient God.

But the cones of particular societies, such as nations and empires, differ from the great cone of the universe, in other particulars besides magnitude. In this especially, that whereas in the latter, the place of each individual is founded on attributes proper and intrinsic to the individual himself; in the former it is estimated by circumstances (most frequently) purely accidental and extrinsic. The difference between the beggar and the king, lies not in the men, but in their offices. The apex and the base of these cones, are not blind matter and omniscience, but a reasonable creature in rags, and another of the same species in ermine. Hence, the reverence I spoke of above, is for the vulgar. By it, a proper degree of subordination is preserved, but the philosopher looks upon such miserable and accidental distinctions with contempt.

This is a comical kind of a dedication. I set out with a resolution of praising your lordship's qualities, and thereby my own judgment in appreciating them; but in a fit of my profession, have deviated into a lecture upon societies, cones, kings, and beggars. However, to make a long story short, for altitude of wit and profundity of judgment, I know of no person who is your equal, except—

Your Lordship's

Most sincere and most devoted admirer,

PARISH FEASTING.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Without pretensions to any of the qualities of a public writer, but with feelings that I have heard eulogized as characteristic of an Englishman, and with courage enough to defend the class to which I belong when assailed, I venture through your indulgence to repel the wanton attack made on parish officers by your correspondent E. G. B.

The improved state of literature and knowledge of the present day might render any remark of mine upon parish feasting superfluous, were it not that the rising generation,—with warm honest feeling, unaided by experience, and guided, perhaps, by your correspondent,—might fall into ungenerous erroneous conclusions, which a hint or two may probably prevent. If parish feasting prevail to an alarming extent, 'so as to increase 'the sum of human misery,' it would be well in your correspondent, before he so loudly asserts it, to show where this growing evil is to be found; I have not seen it; and till he does show this 'giant form'—this bug-bear, it is but fair to treat the assertion as at least unguarded; for, if true in any instance, and not universally so, it raises, or is calculated to raise, an unjust outcry against those parish officers who do their duty disinterestedly.—If we inquire into the characteristics of that important officer, an overseer of the poor, we shall find that he is chosen as 'a substantial inhabitant and householder,' and is called away from his usual avocations to do the duties of a most irksome and difficult office, in which he is to see the poor properly provided for, and to guard against imposition upon the purses of the parishioners,—and this he is to do 'on compulsion;' if he do not, he is subjected to a penalty; and if he do,—as honestly, as diligently, and with as much talent and discrimination as a meritorious magistrate,—he may escape the imaledictions of his brother householders; he may be even unexecrated by the poor he governs;—but if he has partaken of a vestry dinner, (should custom have made such honourable,) then the law and unthinking, who may have a high judgment as gratitude, are to be influenced by the seeming philanthropic reflections of E. G. B.—Sir, I believe as 'just and true Englishmen' will take a man from his business and re-pley him usefully, laboriously, or disagreeably, without wishing him some compensation or complimentary acknowledgment, and it is consistent with good old English custom so to do. When the services of a gentleman have been had that deserve high remuneration, but which it would be as repugnant to good taste to offer as to receive, it is agreeable to our best feelings that some kind of entertainment may be proposed, at which honourable mention may be made of services performed, and at which the bonds of friendship and concord may be strengthened by cheerful convivality;—and I should pity the man who would object, as one of a parish, to give an officer a good dinner, whose services could not have been purchased for a hundred guineas. Crying parsony! I hate it. Leaving this point, I would advert to another of E. G. B.'s opinions: he says, 'that a greater degree of activity and vigilance, on the part of parish officers, would materially tend to assist the operations of the Mendicity Society; and asks, "what are they to do to this charge of negligence?"—Negligence of parish officers in not assisting the Mendicity Society! Surely this gentleman's zeal has over-ran his judgment.—And thus, in many cases, no doubt, the tender feelings, humane motives, and weak conclusions of the well-meaning, induce them to meddle with public economy, to guide which they are incompetent, raise clamours against efficient officers, increase the discontents of the poor, and do injury where they intended none.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

RIDING THE STANG.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Ephraim Wood, wishing for some information relative to this singular custom, I have extracted the following account from a work, entitled Popular Pastimes, or the Customs and Amusements of Great Britain in Ancient and Modern Times, which, if you think worthy of notice, you will oblige me by inserting. Your's, &c. E. W.

Riding the Stang (according to Dr. Jameson) is the remains of a very ancient custom among the Goths, who were wont "to erect what they called nidstaeng, or the pole of infamy; with the most dire imprecations against those who were thought to deserve the reprobation which this act implied.

The person thus subjected to dishonour was called nidings, or infamous, and he was therefore deemed incapable of making oath in any cause. A memorable instance of the consequences of raising the nidstaeng is furnished in the Runic Law, which states that Egill Scallogrim, the celebrated Icelandic bard, having performed this tremendous ceremony against Eric Bladdox, who, he supposed, had highly injured him, the latter soon after became hated by all, and was obliged to fly from his dominions in Scandinavia; for Soren gives stang-hestes as signifying a roddle-horse. Callender observes, that in Scotland, 'Riding the Stang is a mark of the highest infamy, and the person who has been thus treated; seldom recovers his honor in the opinion of his neighbour.' 'When they cannot,' he continues, 'lay hold of the culprit himself, they put some young fellow on the stang, or pole, who proclaims, that it is not on his own account that he is thus treated, but that of another whom he names.

The glossary to Gawin's Douglas's Virgil, informs us that riding the stang, is 'when one is made to ride on a pole for his neighbour's wife's fault.' The word stang, says Rey, is still used in some colleges in the university of Cambridge: 'to stang scholars in Christmas time, being to cause them to ride on a colt-staff or pole, for missing of chapel.' In the Icelandic tongue, stang means a spear; and hence, probably, the stang of Yorkshire and the north, where it signifies a long pole.

'I am informed,' says Dr. Jameson, 'that in Lothian, and, perhaps, in other counties, the man who had debauched his neighbour's wife was forced to ride the stang; yet this punishment was not exclusively inflicted on gallants detected in criminal amours. The virago who had beaten her husband was also subjected to ride the stang, not in person, however, but by substitute, as we learn from Allan Ramsay's admirable continuation of "Christ's Kirk on the Green," canto 31, where, after the marriage, the visitors became inebriated, and the conduct and punishment of a graceless vixen are thus humourously drawn:—

The wail's wife her black derry sought,
And fand him skis and him;
Quoth she, 'This doggie work's be drat
bought';
He ban'd and ga'e a girm,
Ca'd her jade, and said she micht
Gae bane and scum his kirk:

Whicht ladens, for gin you ought Mist, I an wist ye a gairn.
To reel some day
Ye'll wind a pirl, ye silly snool,
Wad worth ye'r drunken soul;
Quoth she and tap-out o'er her stool,
An' clought him by the squab;
He shook her, and swore muckle dool,
'Ye's thole for this, ye scaul;
I've rive frae aff ye'r hips the hool,
And learn ye to be baul,
On aie a day!'
'Ye'er tippin'giant scant o' grace',
Quoth she, 'gas me gang duddy;
Our abour Fate an break o' days
Been thumping at his study;
An' it be true that some fouk says,
Ye'll girm yet in a woo'dy';
Syne wi' her nails she rive his face,
Made a' his black bald bloody
Wi' acits that day.

A gippy that had seen the wail,
I wot, he was nae lang,
Till he had gather'd seven or eight
Wild hemps stout and strang;
They frae a burn a kaber raght,
Ane mounted wi' a bawg,
Betwixt twa's shoulders, and sat straight—
Upon't and rode the stang.
On her thaid day.
The wires and gytling's a' spaw'd out,
O'er midding and o'er dykes,
Wi' many an unco skirl and shout,
Like bumbes frae their bykes;
Thro' thick and thin they scour'd about,
Plashing thro' dubs and sykes,
And sic a reid thro' the rout,
Gart a' the hale town tyke.

Yamph loud that day.

In Yorkshire, in the neighbourhood of Leeds, it was customary, about sixty years ago, to 'ride the stang' on the man who had beaten his wife; but this practice was pursued only by the lowest of the vulgar.

ON THE PRESENT STATE OF THE DRAMA.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR,—It is but natural that we should wish to encourage and support whatever affords us pleasure and improvement; this consideration it is, that causes me to regret, that my abilities are not equal to my inclination, in contributing a subject that might excite an interest in your excellent literary miscellany. The perusal of it never fails to produce a train of reflections, which I sometimes commit to paper; but as I do not observe any of my sex have favoured you with their lucubrations, (in prose) I feel diffident in stating my opinions, either to obtain further information, or truths I may have discovered in the course of my own reflections, and which I should present to you in the form of essays.

Some of my late reflections have been on the present rage for spectacular amusements; at those theatres which ought solely to be devoted to the interests of the genuine drama, leaving coronations, processions, fire-works, &c. &c., to the minor theatres, which appear now to be in fact emulating with the large houses, in regular dramatic performances, as the large houses are descending to such performances as were used to be confined to the minor theatres.

I think many observations of the good Spectator, on the abuse of the theatres, are very applicable to the present times, and I should be much pleased to see any champion of the regular drama step forward as the Spectator in its defence.—I am, Mr. Editor,

Your constant reader and admirer,
MARIA OF DOWD TEAS.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE

ARCTIC LAND EXPEDITION.

IN our last account of the progress of the Land Arctic Expedition, under Lieut. now Capt. Franklin*, we mentioned that they reached their wintering ground in the beginning of October, at Cumberland Fort, from whence they were to set out in the proper season, upon the more important and hazardous remainder of their journey.

Mr. Williams, the principal agent of the Hudson's Bay Company, and dignified with the title of Governor, being resolved to prepare his visitors for some of the scenes which were to become part of their future occupation, proposed to Mr. Franklin and Mr. Richardson a wolf-hunt, in the beginning of January. Those gentlemen having practised the necessary accomplishment of running with snow-shoes, were qualified to join in the hunt, and the wolf, against whom the attack was meditated, had already roused the anger of the inhabitants of the fort, by killing several of their dogs. Indeed, upon one occasion, the ferocious animal had attacked two of the Company's servants, as they were crossing Cumberland Lake with a quantity of fish, and obliged them, after having torn one of them in a desperate manner, to leave the provision behind. At the time the hunt was proposed, there was a great fall of snow upon the ground, and the track of the formidable white wolf, which had so long persecuted the fort, was observed on the outside of the stoccade. The thermometer at the time was thirty-nine degrees below Zero, and the wolf had just abandoned the lake, in despair of getting hold of any living creature with which to satisfy his ravenous appetite. The hunters set out with three dogs, and were well armed. Having followed the track of the wolf through the woods about two miles, they started him as he was devouring the bark of a tree. After a most toilsome and disastrous exertion for two hours, two of the half-breeds succeeded in destroying the wolf, which had been completely harassed by hunger and fatigue. The officers of the expedition and the Company, who had not been in the habit of scouring the woods in snow shoes, presented the most miserable spectacle. In their efforts to get through the thickets, their faces had been frightfully scratched, and their duffle coats and chin cloths—the latter being put on to keep their chins and cheeks from being frozen—were torn to pieces. Under these circumstances, it was found necessary to kindle a fire with all possible dispatch, and, even before that could be accomplished, it was feared that the intense cold would more woefully disfigure some of the poor adventurers. The warmth of the blaze from the brambles and trees soon removed this gloomy apprehension, and the wolf was immediately skinned and drawn for the purpose of being roasted. The animal, however, was so old and weather-beaten, that not one of his hungry pursuers could put a tooth in the most delicate part of him.

A report had for some years prevailed, within a circuit of some thousands of miles, both amongst the natives and the British settlers and the servants of the two companies, that an Indian conjurer, named Ka-ka-wa-rente, who resided far away amongst the most distant northern tribes, was revered as one of their deities by the surrounding people, and was actually capable of performing the greatest wonders, in consequence of his awful intercourse with supernatural agents. Mr. Williams, who had learned that this extraordinary person was within five hundred miles of the fort, and that he had very recently foretold some remarkable calamities that soon occurred amongst the tribes, sent a messenger to him, requesting that he would as soon as possible appear at the fort. The conjurer gladly accepted the invitation, and reached the post at the latter end of January, accompanied by two mortal agents, named Wappisthaw and Tappotum. Upon his arrival, the half-breeds paid homage to him, and even several officers of the Company placed implicit reliance in his power, so high was his character throughout the land, for an intercourse with the world of spirits. Wagers were laid upon the effect of his magic, and the officers of the expedition were surprised at the readiness with which their ridicule was answered by the proposal of considerable bets. In reply to a question put to Ka-ka-wa-rente, as to what he was able to do, he said—'every thing. He could bring back a wife to a husband, or separate man and wife for ever. He could, in fact, reconcile things the most contradictory in their nature. It was in vain that attempts were made to weaken his power with his agents above or below, and as absurd to try to imprison his body as his mind.' Mr. Williams said he should be content with an experiment upon Ka-ka-wa-rente's body, and the next evening was fixed for the trial. Ka-ka-wa-rente, not thinking it respectful to the invisible powers with which he communicated, to request their assistance within the walls of those who doubted their infallibility, pitched his leathern trut in the woods, within half a mile of the fort, and called upon the governor to put him to the test. Wappisthaw and Tappotum stood at the door of the tent, the former blowing a whistle, the latter beating a drum, when the principal inhabitants of the fort sallied out with lighted torches in their hands. The conjurer was rather struck with the preparations at first, but he soon laughed away the fears of some of his admirers, who had observed that he was not insensible to the cold. The Governor then produced a quantity of stout new ropes, and having served in the navy for several years, and placing some reliance in his own strength, undertook to imprison the conjurer in the tent. With this view, having stripped Ka-ka-wa-rente naked, he tied his arms and legs together, and put so many seamen's knots upon the ropes, that the efforts to get out of such thralldom could not but be attended with excessive pain to any one not under the immediate care of the gods. The conjurer was then placed on his back within the tent, at the top of which was a small hole for the admission of the particular genius who was to release him. In a few moments a great bustle was heard within the tent: the whistle and drum played as it were, with the very spirit of inspiration; still the Governor and the officers of the expedition had such re-once upon the seaman's twist, that while others looked to the top of the tent in the expectation of seeing the ropes fly out of it, they kept their eyes upon Wappisthaw and Tappotum, in order that the marician might be under no compliment to human agency. A quarter of an hour was occupied in this manner, when a loud cry was heard from the tent, and, immediately after, Ka-ka-wa-ente was pulled out in a state of insensibility, pinioned as before, and frozen almost to death, notwithstanding his laborious efforts to anticipate the work of his invisible friend. The publication of this circumstance had the effect of removing from the minds of the thousands of Indians who had placed such confidence in the power of the conjurer, all respect for his former exertions. He slunk back to his own people, but was no longer received as a superior. A few months afterwards, he was seen hunting with his companions, whose hardships he was compelled to share from the moment he was proved to be a liar. It was a wish expressed with a great deal of fervency by Mr. Franklin, upon observing the exceeding docility of the Indians, and their contempt of all attempts at imposture, that the religious societies of England would send out amongst them some of those excellent men who are so easily procured to visit other countries, for the purpose of giving religious instruction where it would be most gratefully received.

FOR GREECE AND LIBERTY.

"Woe! Woe! woe! woe! woe! woe!
Of many an age in thee,
Renowned Greece! her counsel gave,
Twice—as her thoughts be free!
And Poesy the lesson taught
To many a list'ning throng—
Inspiring, as her bosom wrought
With ecstasy of song.
Their mingling voices, who not fell,
Or linger'd at the sound,
Degenerate, 'til the foamman dwelt
Upon the Grecian ground?
Thy native plains his burial-place,
Thy mountain-pass his bed,
His dust too honor'd in disgrace
To mingle with thy dead.
Yet, hoos it now, enslave'd, to know
The freedom of thy race,
Or waken, but in dreams, the glow
That fir'd th' Olympian chace?
Reviler! age on ages more
Through slavery degrade;
The stamp of heaven the freeman bore,
Departs not with the dead!

O, lead me where the Samian fields
Unfil'd uncultur'd lie,—
That, ere the bloody Moslem yields,
While yet my arm its weapon wields,
For Hellas I may die! Mac.

TO THE GREEKS.

"Pronounce what sea, what shore is this?
The gulf, the rock of Salamis!
These scenes—their story not unknown—
Arise, and make again your own;
Smash from the ashes of your sires
The embers of their former fires,
And be who in the strife expires,
Will add to their's a name of fears
That Tyranny shall quake to hear,
And leave his sons a hope, a fame,
They, too, will rather die than shame!"

LORD BYRON.

Ye children of those who in days that are gone,
In vanish'd but glorious ages,
With splendour unrivalled a galaxy shone,
Of heroes, and patriots, and sages;
Rush forward to combat, your infidel foe
On the fields where your fathers have stood,
Nor cease from the strife till the tyrant is low,
And your right arm is red with his blood!

One thought on the deeds that your great sires have done,—

But one glance at Thermopylæ's shore,
And then will the battle of freedom be won,
And the tyrant be beat as before!

Again will thy laurel be placed on the brow
Of that freedom which erst was thy boast,
Whose spirit is watching thy proud struggle
now,

And inspiring each patriot host!

Then lose not your strength in disunion and
fear,

But as brethren and patriots unite,
And show to your foemen a courage as dear
As your sires did in Salamis' fight!

Rear the hallow'd cross high, and rush on your
foe,

Nor despair, tho' be powerful be,—
The laurel of conquest your God shall bestow
On the brave, and the pure, and the free!

TO —

Bloom on, fair flow'rs, in nature's vernal sight,
Now meek-eyed morn plays on thy daisies
cheek;

Whilst sportive love, in airy revels, seek
To shed o'er thee his rays of purple light!

And when the rose on those sweet lips, dear
maid,

With all its fragrance perish in the tomb;
Thy worth, bright excellence, which ne'er can fade,

Shall rise and flourish in immortal bloom!

A SEARCH AFTER HAPPINESS.

Say, what is happiness? ah, where Resides the nymph so bright?

Does she within the palace dwell,
Where pleasure holds her potent spell,

Or does she with the peasant share
Her calm delight?

Tis not where pomp and idle state
In proud importance dwell;

For fell misanthrope and dark deceit,
Waiting around the monarch's seat,
But ill conceal the bitter hate

The tongue could tell,

The peasant's cot is not her home;
For there, with wrinkled brow,
Sits Poverty, whose chilling frown
Forbids her presence to be known,
And sends the luckless wretch to roam,—
The claim retreat

But wouldst thou seek the calm retreat
Where love and friendship share
The sweet delights of social life,
Free from ambition, want, and strife,
Where honour, truth, and virtue meet,
E. G. B. Her home is there.

THE CORPORAL'S GRAVE.

In a lone and silent spot,
Underneath the willow,

There the corporal's grave is wrought,
There I made him pillow;

Full of thought and sad at heart,
Wandering round the fountain,

There I pray'd the comrade's part,—
All his noble actions counting.

Rest of moss, of herb, or grass,
Underneath the willow,

Should a stranger thither pass,
He will know the corporal's pillow:

Dark and fresh, the sloping earth
Forms his long and narrow prison;

But the essence of his worth
Into glory's sphere is risen. P.

TO THE NIGHTINGALE.

Oh, did I hear of thy soft melting lay,
Sweet Philomel, and oft have wished to hear

Thy full notes warble on my pensive ear,
And all their magic to my soul display;

But chance did not e'er till now my wish obey.
And hope stood lost in doubt, truly misbe-

lieving,
That from thy little frame thou couldst convey

Sounds which could raise the soul entranced to heaven.

How great must be his voice who thus has given,

Concentrated in thy speck of life, the power,
When, from the grove each other songster's driven,

To fill with ecstasy thy midnight bower;

And on thy voice to hear the thoughts away,
From all the fears of night and cares of day.

Fine Arts.

At the anniversary of the Royal Academy, on Thursday last, Sir T. Lawrence, the President, delivered the following address to the professors and students:—

"GENTLEMEN,—I congratulate you on the decided improvement of one of the schools of art (the Life Academy), and the general alacrity displayed in all. A spirit of emulation so useful in all professions, is most particularly essential to the perfection of art. I caution you, gentlemen, against too great a reliance on that genius with which nature has gifted you; it is by perseverance alone, and not by natural talent, that you will be enabled to surmount the difficulties of art—those difficulties which enhance and give superiority to our profession over all others. While I congratulate you that the Life

Academy has this year retrieved its character. I cannot omit still to enforce the necessity of a constant attention to correctness and purity of drawing; and this, too, in the most minute and apparently insignificant parts, as well as in the general contour of the whole. The works of antiquity should never be absent from your memories; let no one depend upon the correctness of his eye for fidelity of representation, without having first formed his ideas of beauty from these; for a knowledge of beauty is essential to that of truth. The gentlemen who are candidates in historical painting, I would earnestly advise, when inventing their compositions, not to be led away by an attention only to a play of line and an harmonious adjustment of parts, but to let truth, nature, and simplicity be their guide. It is well known that the happiness of life is often lost by an inattention to known and vulgar truths; and in the same manner are the beauties of art missed by overlooking those simple and affecting incidents which nature presents to us every day. When inventing, gentlemen, I would advise you not to follow this or that great master, but to consider your subject as it would have taken place in reality; rendering every thing subordinate to expression, for it is by expression alone we can touch the heart. He who would make us feel, must feel himself, says a high authority, and the experience of every day justifies the truth of the assertion. To attain the powers of expression, I would recommend to you to make it your constant pursuit every day and every hour of your lives, ever to concentrate your thoughts towards that point; for whatever tends to fix and concentrate our thoughts, elevates us as thinking beings. Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Dominichino, and Rembrandt, are the four greatest masters of expression, and from the sketches of these in existence, it is evident that they made expression the primary and constant object of their studies. The first designs of Leonardo, for all his works (excepting those upon fortification and the mathematics) are highly finished drawings of expression. For the characters and expression in his 'Last Supper,' he appears, all his life-time, to have been searching through nature. Raphael seemed to have formed in his mind the whole of his intended work before putting a line upon paper, and all was regulated by expression. Dominichino thought no line worthy of the painter that the mind did not draw before the hand. The portfolio of Rembrandt is like the page of Shakspeare—every drawing is in itself a drama—the passions speak for themselves; composition, colour, arrangement of light and shade—all are lost in the power of expression. It is this, and this alone, that intitles our works to situations in the galleries of monarchs, and by the side of the great efforts of genius of different ages.

The following distribution of premiums took place, viz:—

To Mr. John Graham, for the best historical painting, the gold medal, and the Discourses of the Presidents Reynolds and West, handsomely bound and inscribed.

To Mr. W. Frederick Smith, for the best historical groupe in sculpture, the gold medal and the Discourses of Reynolds and West.

To Mr. Richard Kelsey, for the best architectural design, the gold medal and the Discourses of Reynolds and West.

To Mr. Andrew Morton, for the best copy made in the Painting School, the silver medal and the Lectures of the Professors Barry, Opie, and Fuseli.

To Mr. W. Rose, for the best drawing of an academy figure, the silver medal and the Lectures of Barry, Opie, and Fuseli.

After which, the President addressed the students at some length, expressing the satisfaction of the Members of the Royal Academy on the improvement of the schools, encouraging them to persevere in their attention to correctness and purity of drawing, and concluding with observations on their mode of study for the higher departments of art, which he enforced by reference to the example of the greatest masters.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE.—It has often been urged against Mr. Kean, by those who would rather carp at a trivial fault than award due praise, that in his dramatic career, he would bear 'no rival round the throne,' nor act in any piece in which he was not the alpha and omega. That charge can now no longer be made against him, while, in order to afford an opportunity for a young lady making her debut in Jess Shore, Mr. Kean has played the part of Lord Hastings. Although Hove did not possess, in a high degree, the principal features of tragic invention, such as the nice discrimination of character, and the skilful development and varied play of passion; yet his drama is poetical, without affectation or bombast, his verification is remarkably sweet; and his plays abound with sentiments, given with great force and elegance. The Fair Penitent is Roe's best tragedy, though, perhaps, Jess Shore excites the deepest interest in an audience, on account of the sympathy for the fair unfortunate, created by the traditional story of her wrongs and misery. In this tragedy, Roe professed to be the imitator of Shakspeare, but nothing can be more dissimilar than the mode and colour of writing in the two poets, unless, indeed, we compare the genius of each.

The tragedy was brought forward on Friday night, for the avowed purpose of introducing Miss Edmonstone (who has been a pupil of Mr. Foots, and does honour to his instructions) in the character of Jess Shore. The lady, who, we understand, is twenty-five years of age, possesses the natural advantages of a graceful figure and a countenance capable of varied and forcible expression. Her voice, though not very powerful, has some of the tenderness in its natural key. There is scarcely any fault in her action that is not common to inexperienced performers, and that a little discipline will not correct. 'It is easy to discern in the performance that this young lady has had recourse to her own judgment and the suggestions of natural feeling, for her guide and standard. The timidity which is always so becoming in a first appearance happily was of service to her on this occasion. The calamitous story of the fortunes of Jane Shore appeared pictured in her dejected and languid features as she entered. She rather faltered through the earlier scenes, which afforded so many fine declamatory passages; and it was not until almost the fourth act that she appeared to be warmed into an entire sympathy with the tragic suffering of the ill-fated heroine. In the fine dialogue between her and Glo'ster, at the commencement of the fourth act, her glow of pride at the recollections of her more fortunate days produced a fine strain of animated delivery. The closing scenes of exhaustion and agony told with terrible force upon the audience—the applause was frequent and ardent. Mr. Keen's Hastings was as good as the character could be made, but it is not one in which he could possibly reap any new laurels. Mr. Cooper's Glo'ster was respectable; Mrs. Egerton's Alicia good. On Monday and Thursday evenings, the tragedy was repeated with increased effect.

On Wednesday night, encouraged by the success which had attended her efforts in Jane Shore, Miss Edmiston ventured on the strongest ordeal to which her talents could be subjected, and one in which she hazarded, we thought rather injudiciously, her dramatic reputation. We were, however, mistaken, and most agreeably so.—The character was that of Lady Macbeth, one that, perhaps, was never before attempted by a lady on her third appearance on the stage. The transition from Jane Shore to Lady Macbeth was a most adventurous flight. The managers themselves appear to have felt it, and, in conformity with that feeling, a preparatory address was spoken by Mr. Cooper, which reminded the audience of the difficulty of the undertaking, and deprecated all comparison with that great heroine of the stage, who so far embodied Shakespeare's matchless portrait as to give it the appearance of reality. Miss Edmiston's youth and figure does not correspond with the notion we form of Lady Macbeth from the tragedy. As it was once observed of Garrick, that though, on his first entry, he appeared short, yet he seemed to rise as the play advanced, and, before the conclusion, he seemed the tallest person on the stage. The remark will apply to Miss Edmiston's Lady Macbeth, for she had not been long in the character before she seemed so identified with it, that we forgot every thing else. Her conception of the character was generally correct, and, in several instances, she gave touches of such real spirit and intelligence as completed the dramatic illusion. The opening scene was very impressive; she read the letter amidst breathless suspense, in so admirable a manner, that it produced the most enthusiastic applause. When she is told that Duncan is to take up his residence at the castle, the passage, 'when goes he hence,' was delivered by her with an eagerness both of look and voice, which gave it the most powerful effect. Again, in the scene which ensues the murder, she distinguished herself by a firmness of deportment, and an energy of tone, completely in unison with the character. In the banquet and in the sleeping scenes, she was scarcely less successful, though the last is one of the utmost difficulty, which can only be given with due effect when great talents are combined with experience. When Miss Edmiston has acquired the latter, her acting in this scene will nearly approach perfection; as it was, it possessed much excellence, and the whole performance placed her not only in the first rank as a female tragedian, but as the first at present on the stage.—Mr. Keen's Macbeth is well known; and he always plays best when best supported by other actors: his personation of the Scottish tyrant, on this evening, was one of his happiest efforts. In the dagger scene, and in that immediately after the murder, he was particularly successful, and electrified the audience by his powerful acting; the fight with Macduff was admirable, and his death was truly terrific. Mr. Cooper sustained the character of Macduff, and gave greater proofs of talent than in any previous part; his horror at the murder of Duncan, was expressed in the most forcible manner, and the mixture of grief and revenge in the scene where he is informed of the fate of his wife and children, afforded him an opportunity of depicting those varied emotions which always put an actor's powers to the test; he succeeded in turning them to his advantage, and was rewarded with loud applause. The whole tragedy was admirably acted, which we trust will ensure its frequent repetition.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—A new piece entitled the Milliner's Apprentice, which excites continued laughter, but does not meet our entire approval, has been produced here. Arrivals, or Three Days at Long's, and Life in London maintain their popularity, and the house is well filled every evening.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—Life in London continues in full favour at this house, and is repeated every night with some amusing afterpiece.

Literature and Science.

An apparatus has been invented at Glasgow, for the manufacture of any mineral water requiring to be charged with carbonic acid gas, which amounts, in fact, to the development of a power hitherto unknown, but equal to that of steam. This machine is described as having neither gascometer nor air pump, yet the strength of a boy is ascertained to be capable of compressing into any vessel from thirty to forty atmospheres, as gas, in a few minutes; while to effect the same with a forcing pump, would occupy the strength of several men as many hours. A machine equal in force to an engine of forty-horse power, and requiring neither fire nor water, would not occupy a space of more than four feet square. For many purposes it may be more applicable than steam; but by reason of the present price of sulphuric acid, greatly more expensive.

LUCRETIVS

John Wesley's Opinion of a Chancery Bill.—The following passage occurs in the journal of the Rev. J. Wesley, under the date of Thursday, 27th of December, 1744.—'I called on the solicitor whom I had employed in the suit lately commenced against me in Chancery. And here I first saw that foul monster a Chancery Bill! A scroll it was of forty-two pages in large folio, to tell a story which needed not to have taken up forty lines!—And stuffed with such stupid, senseless, improbable lies (many of them, too, quite foreign to the question,) as I believe would have cost the compiler his life, in any heathen court either of Greece or Rome. And this is equity in a Christian country! This is the English method of redressing grievances.

LORD BYRON'S NEW TRAGEDY:

'THE TWO FOSCARI.'

THE tragedy of the 'Two Foscari' is founded on an event which occurred at Venice near the middle of the fifteenth century, during the authority of that bloody tribunal, the Council of Ten. The story is given at considerable length in Dora's History of the Republic of Venice; but, as his lordship has adhered pretty closely to it, we shall so connect our extracts as to give a tolerably faithful sketch of the plot. The characters of the tragedy are only six, excepting a few nameless senators, and consist of Francis Foscari, the Doge of Venice,—Jacopo, his son, who, in 1445, was accused of having received presents from some foreign princes, which was an infraction of one of the laws of the republic. He was brought before the Council of Ten, in which his own father was compelled to preside: he was interrogated, put to the torture, and condemned, and, from the mouth of his own father, he received the sentence of banishment. After five years' exile, a second alleged offence brought him again into the power of this hated Council. Besides these, the dramatis personæ comprise only Loredano, a patrician, and Barbargo, both sworn foes to the Foscari,—Memmo, a chief of the Forty,—and Marina, the wife of young Foscari.

The first act, which is rather dull and tedious, develops the enmity of Loredano and Barbargo, and the ferocious cruelty of the Council of Ten, in putting young Foscari repeatedly to the torture, in order to force some confessions from him. There is a pretty passage, in which young Foscari, on standing at a window which overlooks the water, describes the sports of his youth and his ardent love for his native Venice:—

'Guard! How feel you?
Jacopo Foscari. Like a boy!—oh, Venice!
Gua. And your limbs?

J. Fosc. Limbs? how often have they borne me
Vol. III.

Bounding o'er you blue tide, as I have skimm'd
The gondola along in childish race,
And, masqueraded as a young gondolier, amidst
My gay competitors, noble as I,
Raced for our pleasure in the pride of strength,
While the fair populace of crowding beauties,
Fiebian as patrician, cheer'd us on
With dancing smiles and wishes audible
And waving kerchiefs and applauding hands,
Even to the goal!—How many a time have I,
Clown with arm still tustier, breast more daring,
The wave all roughen'd; with a swimmer's stroke
Flinging the billows back from my drench'd hair,
And laughing from my lip the audacious brine,
Which kiss'd it like a wine-cup, rising o'er
The waves as they arose, and prouder still
The loftier they uplifted me; and oft,
In wantonness of spirit, plunging down
Into their green and glassy gulfs, and making
My way to shells and sea-weed, all unseen
By those above, till they wax'd fearful; then Returning with my grasp full of such tokens
As show'd that I had search'd the deep, exulting,
With a far-dashing stroke, and drawing
The long-suspended breath, again I sprang!
The foam which broke around me, and pursued
My track like a sea-bird!—I was a boy then.'

In the second act, the interview between Marinus and her father-in-law, in which she endeavours to induce him to save her husband, is very tame, and does not possess one particle of that spirit which Lord Byron usually displays on such occasions. Here, however, we meet with one gem:—

*Doge. Child—child—
Marina (abruptly). Call me not child!
You soon will have no children—you deserve none—

You, who can talk thus calmly of a son
In circumstances which would call forth tears
Of blood from Spartans! Though these did not weep

Their boys who died in battle, is it written
That they beheld them perish piecemeal, nor Stretch'd forth a hand to save them?

Doge. I cannot weep—I would I could; but if Each white hair on this head were a young life,
This dual cap the diadem of earth,
This ducal ring, with which I wed the waves,
A talisman to still them—I'd give all
For him.

Mar. With less he surely might be saved.
Doge. That answer! only shows you know not Venice.'

Loredano enters, and informs the Doge that the 'Ten' have decreed a second banishment of young Foscari, without putting him further to the torture. The third act opens with a soliloquy of the unfortunate Foscari in prison:—

No light, save you faint gleam, which shows me walls
Which never echo'd but to sorrow's sounds,
The sigh of long imprisonment, the step
Of feet on which the iron clank'd, the groan
Of death, the imprecation of despair!
And yet for this I have return'd to Venice,
With some faint hope, 'tis true, that time,
which weans

The mangle down, had worn away the hate
Of men's hearts; but I knew them not, and here

Must I consume my own, which never beat
For Venice but with such a yearning as The dove has for her distant nest, when wheel-

ing
High in the air on her return to greet Her callow brood. What letters are these which [Approaching the wall.]

Are scrawl'd along the inexorable wall?
Will the gleam let me trace them? Ah! the names

Of my and predecessors in this place,
The dates of their despair, the brief notes of
A grief too great for many. This stone page
Bolds like an epitaph their history,
And the poor captive's tale is graven on
His dungeon barrier, like the lover's record
Upon the bark of some tall tree, which bears
His own and his beloved's name. Alas!
I recognize some names familiar to me,
And lighted like to mine,—which I will add,
Fittest for such a chronicle as this,
Which only can be read, as writ, by wretches.

[He engraves his name.]
Young Foscari's wife is admitted to see him, and the interview between them is in the noble poet's happiest style:—

Marina. My best beloved!
Jacopo Foscari (embracing her). My true wife
And only friend! What happiness!

Mar. We'll part
No more.

J. Fosc. How! wouldst thou share a dungeon?
Mar. Ay,

The rack, the grave, all—any thing with thee,
But the tomb last of all, for there we shall Be ignorant of each other—yet I will Share thus—all things except new separation;
Is it too much to have survived the first.
How dost thou? How are those worn limbs?

Alas!
Why do I ask? Thy paleness—
J. Fosc. 'Tis the joy
Of seeing thee again so soon and so
Without expectancy has sent the blood
Back to my heart, and left my cheeks like thine,
For thou art pale too, my Marina!

Mar. 'Tis
The gloom of this eternal cell, which never Knew sunbeam, and the sallow autumn glare

Of the familler's torch, which seems akin
To darkness more than light, by lending to
The dungeon vapours its bituminous smoke,
Which cloud whate'er we gaze on, even thine
eyes—

No, not thine eyes—they sparkle—how they sparkle!

J. Fos. And thine! but I am blinded by the torch.

Mar. As I had been without it. Couldst thou see here?

J. Fos. Nothing at first; but use and time had taught me

Familiarity with what was darkness;
And the gray twilight of such glimmerings as Glide through the crevices made by the winds
Was kinder to mine eyes than the full sun.
When gorgeously overgilding any towers
Save those of Venice; but a moment ere Thou camest hither, I was busy writing.

Mar. What?

J. Fos. My name: look, 'tis there—recorded next

The name of him who here preceded me,
If dungeon dates any true.

Mar. And what of him?

J. Fos. These walls are silent of men's ends;
they only
Seem to hint surlily of them. Such stern walls

Were never piled on high save o'er the dead,
Or those who soon must be so—What of him?
Thou askest—What of me? may soon be ask'd,
With the like answer—doubt and dreadful surmise—

Unless thou tell't me tale.

Marina informs her husband that his life is safe, and that his sentence is banishment:—

J. Fos. Had I gone forth
From my own land, like the old patriarchs, seeking

Another region, with their flocks and herds;
Had I been cast out like the Jews from Zion,
Or, like our fathers, driven by Attila
From fertile Italy to barren islets,
I would have given some tent to my late country.

And many thoughts; but afterwards address'd
Myself, with those about me, to create
A new home and fresh state: perhaps I could Have borne this—though I know not.

Mar. Wherefore not?
It was the lot of millions, and must be
The fate of myriads more.

J. Fos. Ay—we but hear
Of the survivors' toil in their new lands,
Their numbers and success; but who can number

The hearts which broke insilence of that parting,
Or after their departure! of that malady
Which calls up green and native fields to view
From the rough deep, with such identity
To the poor exile's fever'd eye, that he
Can scarcely be restrain'd from treating them?
That melody, which out of tones and tunes
Collects such pasture for the longing sorrow
Of the old mountaineer, when far away
From his snow canopy of cliffs and clouds,
That he feeds on the sweet, but poisonous
thought.

And dies. You call this weakness? It is strength,
I say—the parent of all honest feeling.

He who loves not his country, can love nothing.
Mar. Obey her, then; 'tis she that puts thee forth.

J. Fos. Ay, there it is: 'tis like a mother's curse.

Upon my soul—the mark is set upon me.

The exile you speak of went forth by nations,
Their hands upheld each other by the way,
Their tents were patch'd together—I'm alone.

Mar. You shall be so no more—I will go with thee.

J. Fos. My best Marina!—and our children?

Mar. They,
I fear, by the prevention of the state's Abhorrent policy (which holds all ties
As threads, which may be broken at her pleasure),

Will not be suffer'd to proceed with us.

J. Fos. And canst thou leave them?

Mar. Yes. With many a pang
But—I can leave them, children as they are,
To teach you to be less a child. From this Learn you to sway your feelings, when exacted
By dutiful paramount; and 'tis our first
On earth to bear.

J. Fos. Have I not borne?

Mar. Too much
From tyrannous injustice, and enough
To teach you not to shrink now from a lot
Which, as compared with what you have undergone

Of late, is mercy.

J. Fos. Ah! you never yet
Were far away from Venice, never saw
Her beautiful towers in the receding distance,
While every furrow of the vessel's track
Seem'd ploughing deep into your heart; you never Saw day go down upon your native spires

So calmly with its gold and crimson glory,
And after dreaming a disturbed vision
Of them and theirs, awoke and found them not.

Mar. I will divide this with you. Let us think

Of our departure from this much-loved city
(Since you must lose it, as it seems), and this Chamber of state, her gratitude allots you.
Our children will be cared for by the Doge,
And by my uncles: we must sail ere night.

J. Fos. That's sudden. Shall I not behold my father?

Jacopo inquires if he may not see his children.—Marina answers:—

'I would that they beheld their father in
A place which would not mingle fear with love,
To freeze their young blood in its natural current.

They have fed well, slept soft, and knew not that
Their air was a mere hunted outlaw. Well,
I know his fate may one day be their heritage,
But let it only be their heritage,
And not their present fee. Their senses, though
Alive to love, are yet awake to terror;
And these vile damps, too, and you thick green wave

Which floats above the place where we now stand—

A cell so far below the water's level,
Selling its pestilence through every crevice,
Might strike them: this is not their atmosphere.'

No sooner have the vindictive Loredano and Barbarigo succeeded in banishing the son, than they seek to wreak their vengeance on the father.
The young Foscari, whose love of country rises to an enthusiasm without a parallel, and who would rather live in the dungeons of his native city than breathe the fine air of Candia, on being summoned to embark, suddenly dies in presence of his wife and father.

The fifth act brings us to the Doge's apartment, where a deputation from the senate proposes that he should resign. The Doge consents, and this brings us to the end of the tragedy.
The Doge, having resigned his dignity and given up his ring and diadem, a impatient to depart:—

Chief of the Ten. My lord, if you insist
Are bent upon this rash abandonment
Of the state's palace, at the last resort
By the private staircase, which conducts you towards

The landing-place of the canal.

No. I
Will now descend the stairs by which I mounted

To sovereignty—the Gian's Stair, on whose Broad eminence I was invested due.

My services have call'd me up those steps.
The malice of my foes will drive me down.

There, five and thirty years ago, was I Install'd, and traversed these same halls, from which

I never thought to be divorced except A course—come, it might be, fighting in them—

But not push'd hence by fellow citizens
But, come; my son and I will go together—
He to his grave, and I to pray for mine.

Chief. What thus in public?

Doge. Elector, and so will I be deposed.
Marina! art thou willing?

Marina. Here's my arm!

Doge. And here my staff: thus people will
I go forth.

Chief. It must not be—the people will perceive it.

Doge. The people! There's no people, you well know it.

Else you dare not deal thus by them or me.
There is a populace, perhaps, whose looks May shame you; but they dare not grow or curse you,

Save with their hearts and eyes

Chief. You speak in a passion,
Else—

Doge. You have reason. I have spoken much

More than my wont: it is a foolish which
Was not of mine, but more excuse you,
Inasmuch as it shows that I approach
A danger which may justify this deed
Of yours, although the law does not, we will Forewell, sir!

Barb. You shall not depart without
An escort fitting past and present rank.

We will accompany, with due respect,
The Doge unto his private palace. Say!

My brethren, will we not?—

Different Voices. Ay—Ay—

Doge. You shall not Stir—in my train, at least. I could not
As sovereign—I go out as citizen

By the same portals, but as citizen
All these vain ceremonies are base

Which only alternate the hour the name
Applying poisons there are antidotes—
Pomp is for princes—I am none—They say
I am, only to these gates—Ah!

Loredano. Hark!

[The great bell of St. Mark's
Barb. The bell!

Chief. St. Mark's, which with the bell
Of Malpiero.

Doge. Well I recognize the sound? I heard it once, but once before, And that is five and thirty years ago; Even then I was not young.

Barb. Sit down, my lord!

You tremble.

Doge. 'Tis the knell of my poor boy! My heart aches bitterly.

Barb. I pray you sit.

Doge. No; my seat here has been a throne till now.

Marina? let us go.

Mar. Most readily.

Doge (walks a few steps, then stops).

I feel athirst!—no one bring me here

A cup of water?

Barb. I—

Mar. And I—

Lor. And I—

(The Doge takes a goblet from the hand of Loredano.

Doge. I take yours, Loredano, from the hand Most fit for such an hour as this.

Lor. Why so?

Doge. 'Tis said that our Venetian crystal has Such pure antipathy to poison as

To burst, if aught of venom touches it.

You bore this goblet, and it is not broken.

Lor. Well, sir?

Doge. Then it is false, or you are true.

For my own part, I credit neither; 'tis

An idle legend.

Mar. You talk wildly, and

Had better now be seated, nor as yet

Depart. Ah! now you look as look'd my husband!

Barb. He sinks!—support him!—quick—a chair—support him!

Doge. The bell tolls on!—let's hence—my brain's on fire!

Barb. O do beseech you, lean upon us!

Doge. No!

A sovereign should die standing. My poor

boy!

Off with your arms!—That bell!

(The Doge drops down and dies.

Mar. My God! My God!

Barb. (to Loredano). Behold! your work's completed!

Chief. Is there then

No aid! Call in assistance!

Attend. 'Tis all over

Chief. If it be so, at least his obsequies

Shall be such as befits his name and nation,

His rank and his devotion to the duties

Of the realm, while his age permitted him

To do himself and them full justice. Brethren,

Say, shall it not be so?

Barb. He has not had

The misery due to a subject where

He reigned; then let his funeral rites be princely.

Chief. We are agreed then?

All. except Loredano, answer—Yes.

Chief. Heaven's peace be with him!

Mar. Signor, your pardon: this is mockery.

Juggle no more with that poor remnant, which,

A moment since, while yet it had a soul,

(A soul by whom you have increased your empire,

And made your power as proud as was his glory).

You banish'd from his palace, and tore down

From his high place, with such relentless cold-

ness;

And now, when he can neither know these honours,

Nor would accept them, if he could, you, signor,

Purpose, with idle and superfluous pomp, To make a pageant over what you trampled. A princely funeral would be your reproach, And not his honour.

Chief. Lady, we revoke not

Our purposes so readily.

Mar. I know it,

As far as touches torturing the living.

I thought the dead had been beyond even you,

Though (some no doubt), consign'd to powers which may

Resemble that you exercise on earth.

Leave him to me; you would have done for

His drops of life, which you have kindly shortened:

It is my last of duties, and may prove

A dreary comfort in my desolation.

Grief is fantastical, and loves the dead,

And the apparel of the grave.

Chief. Do you

Pretend still to this office?

Mar. I do, signor.

Though his possessions have been all consumed

In the state's service, I have still my dowry,

Which shall be consecrated to his rites,

And those of— (She stops with agitation.

Chief. Best retain it for your children.

Mar. Ay, they are fatherless, I thank you.

Chief. We

Cannot comply with your request. His relics

Shall be exposed with wonted pomp, and follow'd

Unto their home by the new Doge, not clad

As Doge, but simply as a senator.

Mar. I have heard of murderers, who have inter'd.

Their victims; but ne'er heard, until this hour

Of so much splendour in hypocrisy

O'er those they slew. I've heard of widows'

tears—

Alas! I have shed some—always thanks to you!

I've heard of heirs in sables—you have left none

To the deceased, so you would eat the part

Of such. Well, sir, you will be done! as one day,

I trust, Heaven's will be done too!

Chief. Know you, lady,

To whom ye speak, and perils of such speech?

Mar. I know the former better than yourselves;

The latter—like yourselves; and can face both.

Wish you more funerals?

Barb. Heed not her rash words;

Her circumstances must excuse her bearing.

Chief. We will not note them down.

Barbarigo (turning to Loredano, who is writing upon his tablets). What art thou writing,

With such an earnest brow, upon thy tablets;

Loredano (pointing to the Doge's body).

That he has paid me?

Chief. What debt did he owe you?

SEVERITY OF PUNISHMENT.

Speech of Thomas Fowell Buxton, Esq. in the House of Commons, May 23, 1821, on the bill 'For mitigating the Severity of Punishment in certain Cases of Forgery and other Crimes connected therewith.' 8vo. pp. 70. London, 1821.

ALTHOUGH much has been said and written on the severity of the English laws, yet we have never met with so able, so argumentative, or so comprehensive a view of the subject as in the pamphlet before us. It is a speech of Mr. Buxton, a gentleman well known for his philanthropy, delivered in the House of Commons last session, during the discussion of a bill 'for mitigating the severity of punishment in certain cases of forgery and the crimes connected therewith.'

Mr. Buxton begins by denying the necessity of inflicting death, or the efficacy of such punishment in preventing crimes. On the contrary, increase of crime and excess of punishment have gone hand in hand together. The severity of punishment, as disproportioned to crime, is next noticed: for example,—kill your father or catch a rabbit in a warren—the punishment is the same! Destroy three kingdoms or destroy a hopbine,—the penalty is the same! Meet a gipsy on the highway, keep company with the said gipsy or kill him, no matter which—the penalty by law is the same. The inefficacy of capital punishments is ably illustrated:

'About the year 1811, the linen bleach-ers of England and Ireland found their property peculiarly exposed to depredation. This they ascribed to the impunity with which that crime was committed; and that impunity to the reluctance to prosecute; and that reluctance to the severity of the law. They therefore came to Parliament praying for protection, and intimating that that protection would be found in a mitigation of the law. That prayer was conceded: in this house, cheerfully; in another place, acquiescence was granted somewhat in the same spirit in which the Satirist describes the deities of old as yielding to the fool's importunities of their votaries:—

'Erefter domos totas, opacibus ipais Dit facies."

'And here it was determined to punish those romantic petitioners with the fulfilment of their prayer, and to inflict upon them the penalty of conceded wishes.

'With what effect? Among the official returns appended to our Report, gentlemen will find a return of the number of persons tried and convicted of this offence in the county of Lancaster—the county in which this species of trade is principally carried on. This return is for twenty years, thirteen of which were prior, and seven subsequent to the mitigation of the law. Of these seven, I take no notice of the two first; because it is plain that no conclusion can be drawn from the immediate effect of the alteration of the law. Where the penalty is mitigated, you must expect always an apparent, sometimes a real increase of trials—always an apparent, because those who did not prosecute before, now prosecute, and are found to do so, perhaps, with more severity than others, for the purpose of showing that their previous abstinence originated in principle, and not in any selfish consideration. Sometimes a real increase is also to be anticipated; because those who are in the habit of committing this species of offence know only as yet that the penalty is mitigated, and have not learned from experience—the only instructor to whom they will listen—that that mitigation brings with it a greater certainty of punishment. I shall, however, enter into a comparison, of which no man will deny the fairness. I take the first five years, during which the crime was capital, and compare them with the last five years, during which it was not capital. Now, if I prove that this offence has increased, but only in the same proportion with other offences, I prove my point, for the reasons which I have already assigned. But if I go a step further, and prove that, while all other crimes have increased, this alone has remained stationary, a fortiori I prove my point: but what if I go a step, and a very great step further, and prove that, while all other offences have increased with the most melancholy rapidity, this, and this alone, has decreased as rapidly—that there is only one exception to the universal augmentation of crime, and that one exception the case in which you have reduced the penalty of your law;—if I do this, and upon evidence which cannot be shaken, have I not a right to call upon the noble lord opposite, and upon his Majesty's ministers, either to invalidate my facts or to admit my conclusion?

"Well, then, all other crimes have increased in the county of Lancaster. That is my first position:

During the first five years,
Highway robbery	31
Burglary	30
Horse-stealing	7
Stealing in dwelling-houses	4

During the last five years,
Highway robbery, 77—the number more than doubled.
Burglary, 103—the number more than trebled.
Horse-stealing, 31—the number more than quadrupled.
Stealing in dwelling-houses, 45—the number increased more than eleven-fold.

Then we come to the offence of stealing from bleaching-grounds, and we find 28 in the first five years, 9 in the five last; that is, the offence has decreased two thirds. But we have always contended, that by reducing the penalty you augment the certainty of conviction. Is any thing of this kind observable? It appears by the official returns, that, during the former period, at least one third were acquitted; and it appears also that, during the latter period, there has not been one single acquittal.

"I must confess that I was surprised at this result—that it exceeded my expectation; and I felt anxious to ascertain what had been the effect in Ireland. I therefore addressed a letter to a gentleman of the name of Hancock, of Lisburn, with whom I had no personal acquaintance, and of whom I knew no more than that he was a gentleman of great respectability, who had invested a considerable sum of money in this species of trade. His answer was, "that though, from the general increase of crime, arising from the peculiar state of these countries. Bleach-ground robberies have not lately diminished, yet that the change of punishment of death has not had the smallest tendency to increase this particular crime; but, on the contrary, convictions have been in much greater proportion than under the old law. Prosecutors now act vigorously, witnesses give their testimony willingly; and especially jurors, relieved from the punctious visitings of nature, feel grateful for the relief, and willingly return verdicts of condemnation, when death is not the consequence." He then goes on to say, "it is worthy of observation, and tends to show the benefit of the change in the law, that convictions have multiplied so greatly since 1811. In my opinion, the protection to Bleach-grounds is much increased, and things probably would have been much worse under the old law, owing to the greater number of culprits who would have escaped."

"This, though satisfactory, was not conclusive. But I have since received from Mr. Walter Bourne, clerk of the crown, a return of the number of committals and convictions for Bleach-ground robberies on the north-east circuit of Ulster, for twenty years; and with it I pursue the same method as with the returns from Lancaster. I take the five first years, and compare them with the five last: and these are the results:—

First five years during which the offence was capital.		Last five years during which the offence was not capital.
Antrim	24		18
Armagh	11		4
Down	15		12
Louth	4		5
Monaghan	7		3

"But here returns the question: has any greater facility of conviction resulted from a mitigation of the law? It has. While the law was rigid, it was hardly possible to prove a conviction. Out of sixty-two persons committed, fifty-eight or fifty-nine had not been convicted. But since that alteration, though the number of trials have decreased nearly one-half, the number of convictions have increased five-fold."

English history throws a curious light on the subject of criminal jurisprudence:—

"First, the reign of Henry the Eighth—a reign remarkable for the abundance of its crimes,—which certainly did not arise from the mildness of its punishments. In that reign, says his historian, 72,000 executions took place for robberies alone—(exclusive of his religious murders,) amounting, on an average, to six executions a-day, Sundays included, during his whole reign. What was the effect of the barbarous severity of the law? Did it do that for which it was designed? Did it prevent crime? Upon that point, Sir Thomas More is no bad authority. He introduces into his works, a dialogue between himself and a lawyer. "The lawyer applauds the severity of the law, and exults in the fact, that he had himself seen twenty executed upon the same scaffold. But he concludes by confessing, that it was a little difficult for him to explain how it happened, that, "while so many thieves were daily hanged, so many still remained in the country, who were robbing in all places."

"It may be supposed, that these severities would at least have succeeded at the conclusion of his reign, and that he would at length have exterminated the race of robbers. There is, however, in existence, in Strype's Annals, a letter from a magistrate of Somersetshire to the lord chief justice, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. This letter gives an account of the state of society in Somersetshire during "the glorious days of good Queen less;" and such an account as may make us all rejoice that those "glorious days" have long since passed away. The magistrate writes thus:—"I may justly say, that the able men that are abroad, seeking the spoil and confusion of the land, are able, if they were reduced to good subjection, to give the greatest enemy her Majesty hath a strong battle, and, as they are now, are so much strength to the enemy. Besides, the generation that daily springeth from them, is likely to be most wicked. These spare neither rich nor poor; but, whether it be great game or small, all is fish that cometh to net with them; and yet I say, both they and the rest are trussed up apace." But what was the reason criminals so abounded at that time? The same magistrate, very undesignedly—for he is a strong advocate for the severity of the law, and calls the statute for the execution of gypsies, "that golly edict"—lets us into the secret. He says: "In which default of justice, many wicked thieves escape. For most commonly the most simple countrymen and women, looking no farther than to the loss of their own goods, are of opinion that they would not procure any man's death, for all the goods in the world." This conveys a striking picture of the state, both of the law and of the country, at that time. It appears, that the people still neral Paoli, in company with a lady of distinction, to solicit the life of his uncle. The nephew's anxiety made him think the lady did not speak with sufficient force and earnestness. He therefore advanced, and addressing Paoli, said, "Sir, is it proper for me to speak?" as if he felt that it was unlawful he should make such an application. Paoli bade him proceed. "Sir," said he, "may I beg the life of my uncle? If it is granted, his relations will make a gift to the state of a thousand zechins. We will furnish fifty soldiers in pay during the siege of Furiati. We will agree that my uncle shall be banished, and will engage that he shall never return to the island." Paoli knew the nephew to be a man of worth, and replied, "You are acquainted with the circumstances of this case, and such is my confidence in you, that if you will say, that giving your uncle a pardon would be just, useful, or honourable for Corsica, I promise you it shall be granted." Though the affection between relations is exceedingly strong in the Corsicans, the young man turned round, burst into tears, and quitted the general, saying "Non vorrei vendere l'onore della patria per mille zechini." "I would not have the honour of my country sold for a thousand zechins;" and the uncle suffered.

"George!—This illustrious monarch, in answer to a petition of the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London, on the 6th of November, 1718, said, "I shall be glad, not only for your sakes, but for my own, if any defects which may touch the rights of my good subjects are discovered in my time, since that will furnish me with the means of giving you, and all my people, an indisputable proof of my tenderness of their privileges."

"Sobieski.—At the time that the treasury of Poland was exhausted, the city of Warsaw drained of its last ducat, the provinces laid waste, and every means of raising a supply seemed impracticable, the council hopeless of devising any expedient for even a temporary succour, met in his majesty's cabinet, to consult about obtaining resources. The debate was as depending as their situation, until Thaddeus Sobieski, who had hitherto been a silent observer, rose from his seat. He advanced towards Stanislaus, and taking from his neck and other parts of his person those magnificent jewels which it was customary to wear in the presence of the king, he knelt down, and laying them at the feet of his majesty, said, in a suppressed voice, "These are trifles, but such as they are, and all of the like kind which I possess, I beseech your majesty to appropriate to the public service."

"A Noble young man!" cried the king, raising him from the ground, "you have indeed taught me a lesson; I accept these jewels with gratitude. Here," said he, turning to the treasurer, "put them into the national fund, and let them be followed by my own, with my plate, which I desire may be instantly sent to the mint.

One half of it the army shall have, the other we must expend in giving some little support to the surviving families of the brave men who have fallen in our defence."

"The palatine readily united with his grandson, in the surrender of all their personal property, for the benefit of their country; and, according to their example, the treasury was soon filled with gratuities from the nobles, which enabled the army to march out, newly equipped, and in high spirits."

Memoirs de l'Abbé Morellet de l'Académie Française, sur le 18me Siècle, et sur la Révolution précédés de l'Eloge de l'Abbé Morellet. Par M. Lémontey, Membre de l'Institut, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1821.

THE Memoirs of the Abbé Morellet are written by himself, M. Lémontey having had no other share in the work than that of editing it, and furnishing a somewhat unintelligible and silly eulogy. It is to be regretted that the Abbé did not commence his Memoirs before he reached his seventieth year, as his recollection of the events during the early period of his life is very imperfect, and hence the first portion of the work is comparatively uninteresting. Such portion of it, however, as relates to the revolution, is curious and important.

Andrew Morellet was born at Lyons, in 1727, and was the son of a paper-manufacturer. In the course of his collegiate education, he became the companion of two men, Turgot and De Brienne, both of whom were afterwards ministers of state. At the conclusion of their academical studies, in 1751, De Brienne gave a farewell dinner to Morellet, Turgot, and about a dozen of their companions, when, in a moment of hilarity, they agreed to meet on the same day in the year 1800, to play a match at hand-ball against one of the walls of the Sarbonne; but such is the mutability of human affairs, that when the day arrived, Morellet found that he had not only survived all the company, but even the Sarbonne itself, which had been destroyed in the early part of the revolution.

Morellet's connection with Turgot and De Brienne, naturally drew his attention to political subjects; he was, however, so moderate in his principles, that he luckily escaped the fury of the revolution without any dishonourable compromise. In his religious principles he was rather free, though he boasts that he was never an Atheist;

which is more than could be said for some of his friends, particularly Barré D'Holbach, at whose house the following 'excellent scene,' as the Abbé calls it, took place:—

"One evening that Diderot and Rousseau had outdone each other in talking atheism, and had said things to call down a thousand thunderbolts on our heads, if thunderbolts fell on such occasions, the Abbé Galiani, who had listened patiently to this dissertation, at last said—"Gentlemen, gentlemen, allow me to say that if I were Pope, I would clap you both up in the Inquisition; or if I were King of France, in the Bastille: but having the happiness to be neither, I have only to promise to meet you here next Thursday, and I hope you will hear my answer as patiently as I have heard yours." "Very well,"—we all exclaimed, and particularly our Atheists,—on Thursday."

Thursday came, and after dinner and coffee, the Abbé gathered himself up into an arm-chair, cross-legged like a tailor; and, as the weather was hot, holding his wig aloft on his left hand, and gestulating with his right, he proceeded as follows:

"Let me suppose that one of you gentlemen, who believe that this world is the production of chance, were to go to the gaming-table, and that your adversary were to throw seize-à-cœur, twice, thrice, four, five and six times running, our friend Diderot would lose his money, and think the devil was in the dice. Very well; the game proceeds, and your adversary still goes on throwing his main of seven, and without variation or interruption wins every stake. Diderot will now lose his temper as well as his money: he will swear that the dice are loaded—that the adversary is a blackleg, and that the house is a hell! Ah, Mr. Philosopher! because the same sides of two dice come uppermost for ten or a dozen times, and you lose a few shillings, you frankly believe that it is caused by a trick, an art, a combination, by, in short, a mauvais d'œuf and his subversive tools; and yet, seeing in the universe around you, millions of millions of combinations, more regular, more difficult, more complicated, and all certain—all useful—all beautiful—you never suspect that the dice of nature are loaded, that there is, indeed, an art, a combination, and a Master Intelligence above, who regulates the great play by his subversive tools, and confounds the reason and the skill of such shortsighted gamblers as you."

It would lead us to too great a length to follow the Abbé in the black catalogue of crimes which he unfolds in his Memoirs of the Revolution; we shall, therefore, only select a few of the most striking passages. The first relates to the death of the celebrated Condorcet:—

"Among the remarkable events of the melancholy times, is the manner in which Condorcet perished. Condorcet, whose name has been spread over Europe, the pupil and friend of D'Alembert, the still nearer friend of M. Turgot, found himself, as it were, naturally summoned to our Legislative Assemblies; and if he did not sit in the first, he appeared in the second and third.

Every body expected from him settled opinions, great independence, courage in combating the abuses of the old government, and those sentiments of justice and humanity which true philosophy inspires. These hopes, however, he disappointed, not only since he has been a member of the Convention, but long before. At the commencement of the revolution he had written several things, in which he expressed sentiments quite contrary to the principles which he was known to profess, and to which he had pledged himself in several works. For example, after having expressed the highest respect for the rights of property in all his writings, both against M. Necker and on the form of the States-General, he no longer pays any regard to those rights, when he attacks even the usufructuary property of the clergy, that of the feudal rights purchased by the proprietors, doing away the personal services and that of the renters, in substituting for a given value in silver and gold, nominal value in paper, by which they were to lose fifty—nay, a hundred, and even two hundred per cent.

Having become a member of the Convention, and a judge, if not de jure, at least de facto, of the king, when the evidence itself and the forcible arguments of Deszeze and the grave authority of Malesherbes, convinced all just men that the king was innocent, he had the baseness and the cruelty to declare the king guilty, and voted every kind of punishment short of death. He added, that he did not vote the king's death, only because he did not think that society had the right to punish with death any crime, whatever was its enormity.

During the whole time that he sat in the Convention, we have not seen him rise once to oppose the sanguinary laws which it enacted, nor to denounce that band of robbers and assassins, called Jacobins, at whose meetings he occasionally appeared and presided. He thus became connected with Brissot and Robespierre. When Brissot was arrested, together with some of his partisans, Condorcet withdrew from the pursuit of the successful party, and lived a wandering and obscure life. He was taken up in Paris by a lady, who knew him only by reputation; she afforded him a generous asylum. Here he remained until the domiciliary visits of April, 1794, when, fortunately for himself, he fled, and strolled about for several days in the neighbourhood of Clamart, Fontenay, and the forest of Vevriere, about three leagues from Paris.

M. and Madame Suard, with whom he had lodged several years, had a house at Fontenay, divided into two apartments, one of which was let to M. de Monville, one of the Council of Parliament. One morning, Condorcet presented himself at the door of M. de Monville, supposing it was M. Suard's. A servant opened the door to him; the unfortunate fugitive had all the appearances of a beggar,—a long beard, a torn coat, his feet wounded, and he seemed dying of hunger, after having spent several nights in the woods:—"Ah, my God! sir," said the servant, "how I pity you!" "What, then, do you know me?" "Oh, yes, sir—often have I attended upon you at M. Trudaine's." "Can you admit me?" "Alas, sir, it is impossible; my master does not like you." "What, is not this M. Suard's house?" "No, sir, there is his door."

Condorcet went in to Suard's, and found him at home. Suard sent away his servant, and learned from Condorcet his situation. He gave him some bread, cheese, and wine, and agreed to go to Paris to see if he could obtain a passport for Condorcet. Suard went to Paris, obtained the passport, and returned to his house, where he expected that Condorcet would meet him at an appointed hour. But Condorcet did not come at that hour, nor the next day, nor for two days after. On the third day, Suard and his wife went to spend the evening at a house in the neighbouring village, and there they heard that a person was arrested at Clamart, who was believed to be Condorcet: this was the fact.

The unfortunate wanderer, on leaving Suard's house, whence he had taken with him some bread, had returned to the forest of Vevriere, where he passed the night. The next morning he went to Clamart, and he was eating with avidity an omelet in a public-house, when his long beard, his negligent exterior, his unswelled air, attracted the attention of one of those volunteer spies who then infested all France. The spy asked him who he was, whence he came, whither he was going, and desired him to produce his passport. Condorcet, always too much embarrassed to speak or reply clearly, said, at length that he was in the employment of M. du Sejour, one of the council of the Court of Aids,—that he followed mathematics, and could produce the most satisfactory references, on account of his connexion with that person. These answers did not satisfy the spy, who conducted him to Bourg-la-Reine, where, not being able to give a satisfactory account of himself, he was imprisoned.—The next day he was found dead. He had taken stramonium mixed with opium, which he always carried about him; he had said to Suard on leaving him,—"If I have one night before me, I have no fear; but I abhor being dragged to Paris."

Strange and melancholy end for a man of his talent and reputation! His wife, one of the handsomest, best-informed, and most intellectual women that ever adorned the sex, retired to Anteuil, and was reduced to the necessity of painting miniatures for her livelihood.

There is an excellent chapter of Morellet's attempt to procure, from the municipality of Paris, 'a certificate of civism,' which was a passport so necessary, that to walk the streets without one incurred the danger of the guillotine.

The Abbé, in vain, supplicates this famous commune, which kept the convention in awe, and was, in fact, the sovereign authority of the whole nation; but his certificate was traversed, and he was obliged to relinquish all hopes of obtaining it. At the last sitting at which the poor Abbé attended, Lubin, the President, who was the son of a butcher, not only sung the Marseillais Hymn and Ca Ira, but in all the pomp of his official dress, and from the eminence of the judicial bench, entertained the assembled crowd for full three-quarters of an hour, with patriotic songs, one of which was 'The Sparrow which my Lassy loves.' But, to give a faithful picture of the crime and absurdity which marked the proceedings of this council—the Common Council of Paris, we must quote the Abbé's account:—

'I had obtained,' says the Abbé, 'my certificate from my own section, and had taken it in the beginning of July, for final approval, as was the custom, to the Common Council at the Hotel de Ville; day after day I attended, and day after day was disappointed, until the 17th of September, when my case was finally appointed to be heard.'

'I arrived at the Hotel de Ville at six in the evening. At each end of the hall benches were erected amphitheatrically, which were filled with women of the lowest order, busy knitting, or mending waistcoats and breeches: their appearance was squalid, their eyes fiery with drink and rage, and their deportment worse than masculine. These women were hired to sit here, to fill the scene, and to applaud the actors.'

About seven the President and his colleagues took their places in the centre of the hall; he and the secretaries at one side, and in front of them, on the right, the several members of the Common Council, and on the left the poor suppliants.

'The business began by reading the minutes of the last meeting; in which the arrest of Bailly, late mayor of Paris, was announced, and the speedy death of this traitor and enemy of the people prophesied: this promise was received with shouts of bravo, and the most violent expressions of joy from all sides, but particularly from the women.'

'Another article of the minutes was a decree which forbade pretty women ap- pearing at the mayor's office, whither they came to solicit the release of imprisoned aristocrats. At this article, Hebert, the Attorney of the Common Council, rose to complain of the non-execution of this salutary law. Somebody attempted to observe, in extenuation, "that in the land of freedom the public offices were necessarily open to all; that tastes differed, and that a lady might be admitted as ugly by one, and rejected by another as pretty; and that young and old, handsome or plain, all might have business to do; and that, in short, the public offices could not possibly execute the decree." These reasons however plausible, did not convince Hebert, who renewed his complaints against these petty aristocrats,—these Circés as he called them,—to the great satisfaction of the crowd of women, most of them old, and all of them disgusting, who composed the auditory.

'Now entered with a clatter of drums and fifes, bodies of recruits furnished to the army by the respective sections: each made a speech of devotion to liberty, and hailed to tyrants; and the President replied to each in the same style; and not content with speechifying, he stood up, and at the top of a sharp discordant voice screamed out the several verses of the Marseillais Hymn, while all the auditory joined in the chorus. This performance gave him and his assistants so much gratification that he repeated it to each deputation, (five that night,) and every time further favoured his audience with "Ca Ira," by way of afterpiece.

'Next came a wounded soldier, who, in the vulgar language, "swore never to quit his post," (which he had already left); this speech was received with such applause, that the fellow thought he could not do better than repeat it, which he did with new applause. Encouraged by this repeated success, he was about to begin again, but was with some difficulty persuaded that every one must have his turn; he was consoled, however, for this little check by getting a place near the President, where he stood during the whole sitting, enjoying his glory and the admiration of the company.

'Then came three Austrian deserters, swearing in unintelligible French to die for France; and then an orator from one of the sections swore (there seems to have been nothing but swearing and singing) by the holy trinity of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity—"the only trinity," added the wretch, "in which we believe."

The Abbé Morellet was a prolific writer, principally on political subjects, but none of his works intitle him to much praise as a literary man, though he was a very remarkable instance of the longevity of intellect. He died on the 19th of January, 1819, at the age of ninety-two; and up to that age, he used to celebrate his birth-days with a family fête, which he enlivened by an annual song. That which he wrote and sung at the commencement of his ninety-first year, is a panegyric on old age, and is remarkable for its spirit, elegance, and gaiety.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE!—CAIN'S SECOND MURDER!!

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

MR. EDITOR,—I have just been on my knees, at least two hours and a quarter, returning thanks to my guardian deities for the wonderful escape which it has been their pleasure to procure me. The benevolence of my disposition makes me eager to communicate to you the interesting particulars of this event, in order that others may benefit by my experience, and be prevented from rushing unwarily upon immediate horror, and, it may be, ultimate perdition!—You must know, Mr. Editor, that I (in common with yourself and the majority of our countrymen), am a great admirer of the poetry of Lord Byron. You may guess then with what delight I saw announced all over the city and elsewhere, in blue, white, and red, the publication of the three dramas, that are now making so much noise in the literary world. I have hitherto been denied an opportunity of perusing these productions; and this circumstance, which I had been inclined to consider as peculiarly unfortunate, turns out to be quite the contrary. This morning, Mr. Editor, a friend put into my hand a number of 'Loquemanne's Cunnynge Advertiser,' which contains a notice of, and remarks upon Lord Byron's 'Cain,' which have absolutely electrified me. The Quarterly's attack upon Shelley, and the 'Advertiser's' celebrated 'cutting up' of the 'Cenci' are nothing to it! I am ashamed to confess that till now, I have never been very partial to the above journal, but shall henceforth conceive that I owe it an unerasable debt of gratitude. It has preserved me from undergoing the penance of struggling through a perusal of 'Cain, a Mystery;' to which operation the renowned critic of the above Advertiser has fallen a victim! Praise, Mr. Editor, for an instant, and pay to departed worth the tribute of one sympathizing tear! He was your rival, but though a little pompous and not less conceited, he was an honourable man, and had the interests of literature at heart.—Sir, I would not, for the possession of the whole world; and his own mighty genius into the bargain, endure the least of the agonizing tortures, that must evermore goad the conscience of the wretched bard. He has written 'Cain,' and killed an editor!

—Cruel, cruel man! had not the immorality and evil tendencies of his 'Don Juan,' and the very palpable plagiarisms contained in all his works, together with his affected contempt for the 'Cunnynge Advertiser,' inflicted enough of suffering upon the sensitive mind of the departed reviewer, to excite his reluctant compassion and restrain him from putting a finishing stroke to the dreadful work, by sending 'Cain' into the world to work fresh mischiefs? Can we disbelieve him or blame ourselves, when we hear such a man declare, that 'he has not loved the world, nor the world him?'—How can we reverence the writer of such appalling 'mysteries' as Cain?

I once thought that the honest independence of Lord Byron's opinions, his sturdy good sense, and his unassuming integrity, had caused him to have such assaults as the writers in Blackwood, and the men whom his 'Cain' has just destroyed; but I am now convinced that it must be the frightful infidelity that characterises his works, that occasions the ceaseless enmity of his distinguished opponents; and I cannot but lament that so many passages of his more heart-felt effusions should have touched my sympathies to the core, and captivated my affections so completely as they have.

I see, Mr. Editor, I see but too clearly, that Lord Byron is as bad as either of his friends, Messrs. Shelley or Leigh Hunt; and the unfortunate writer who is now no more, has often solemnly averred of the latter, 'that they are fiends who care not how much misery they cause on earth, nor how much anger they excite in heaven!' What will not Lord Byron have to answer for?—I should have read 'Cain,' and doubtless I should have died too! dreadful and overwhelming thought!—Yes, Sir, I have as much reverence for religion as the late Mr. J., and the effect would have been the same with me as with him. You cannot, therefore, feel surprised that I am grateful to the work which warned me of my danger.

It would appear that the unfortunate gentleman did not expire immediately, but was preparing (like the Roman putting his robes in order, ere he did fall), to depart with decency last Thursday afternoon. Unhappily for us, are bound to conclude that he is gone by this time;—sacred be his memory! With his own dear dying hand did he extract passages from this horrible drama, to prove that the reckless and blasphemous author had made Lucifer talk like Lucifer, and not like Mr. Wilberforce. The enormity of this offence, in every point of view, must be perceptible to the first glance of your editorial and inspeccatorial capacity. To be sure, Satan, in Paradise Lost, does the same thing; but then, as our all-accomplished but unfortunate critic very justly observed, Milton's Devil is in pain, while we are not exactly aware whether Lord Byron's Prince of Darkness is conversant with any thing but pleasure!

You will thus perceive, Mr. Editor, what a basilisk sort of work this 'Cain' must be; and if, after this warning, with that desperate courage for which you reviewers are celebrated, you venture to read and review this 'Mystery,' and survive the operation, I shall consider you little better than Lord Byron, and not much inferior to his Satanic Majesty himself! Trusting that you will profit by this admonitory note,

I am, Mr. Editor,

Yours, very truly,

ANCIENT MEDAL.

To the Editor of the Literary Chronicle.

SIR,—You mention in your last 'LITERATURE AND SCIENCE,' p. 797, some curious particulars of a medal having been offered in Inverness. I have an engraved fac simile of this coin in most excellent preservation, in a book under the following title, 'ΣΥΜΒΟΛΙΣΤΕ, or the intimate Conversation of Pope and Devil, attended by a Cardinal and Buffoon; to which is annexed the Portrait of each, with a brief explication' thereof. By James Salgado, Spaniard and Converted Priest. London; Typis T. Snowden, 1681.' Over the grotesquely hideous face of the Pope are these lines:

Papa, Satanas, fratres nudo jungatur ab arcto,
Cui quoniam mundi fertur uterque: Deus,
Quod erit junctum est; quia, quo diabitur orbis
Communis voto, suffiat uterque: sibi.

DEVIL.

With what strict bonds the Pope and Devil are tied!

Who, 'twixt them, both the rule o' th' world divide.

They, to each other mutual kisses lend,
And in their voice which way the world shall bend.

MORIO GNATHONI BAPHLOINIS, JUNGATUR SAT CAR,
OCTEBI NAM SCAMIN FRATER UTROQUE: FACIT.

Vix spectator erit, stulto modo tolle theatrum;
Nec Romas, dempto Cardine, Presul erit.

FOOL.

Too! Fool and Card'nal join, and well they may:
Both make the world their scene and all a play,
No shew in th' fair without a lay buffoon;
So, without Cardinal, no Pope at Rome.

This book, which contains 47 pages in Latin and English, is a severe philippic against the Pope, and denounces him with every epithet that consigns him to eternal woe. It is dedicated to Prince Rupert, Duke of Cumberland; in the last period, the author wisheth success 'proportionable to his high valour.' An appendix of 39 pages is full of matter relative to a magistrate, and gives a fac-simile, but much larger. Round the portrait are these words, 'moriendo restituit rem Edmund Bury Godfrey:—the reverse represents, 'tantum religio potest suadere malorum;' the Pope stands to witness the scene, Sir Edmund cries 'pro fide et patria.' He is being stabbed and strangled by three persons; and his holiness exclaims, 'Hereticus non est serranda fides!' Underneath are the words that follow; 'the true effigies of Sir Edmund Bury, who was cruelly murdered by the Papists in the year 1678, and of his age 57. He was a worthy gentleman and zealous Protestant, justice of the peace, &c. inhumanly butchered by the ruffian hands of the pernicious emissaries of the Pope. Sir Godfrey Edmund is a just man, crushed down: an Abel falls—a Jonathan perishes, when Cain makes insurrection, when the Philistines compe, and the murderers wash their hands in the blood of the innocent.' I add, Mr. Editor, that the language in 'Pape et Diaboli' is not suited to the uniform delicacy of your instructive paper; in the hope that I have not been too prolix, I beg, Sir, to offer you my thanks for your inserting this article, and wishing you 'a merry Christmas and happy new year.' I remain, your's, very respectfully,

CURIOUS WILL.

THE following lines are copied from the original will of the late Nathaniel Lloyd, Esq., who died some time since, at his seat at Twickenham, Middlesex:—

What I am going to bequeath,
When this frail part submits to death;
But still I hope the spark divine
With its congenial stars shall shine:
My good executor fulfill,
I pray ye, fairly, my good will,
With first and second codicil.

And first I give to dear Lord Hinton,
At Twyford School now, not at Wigton,
One hundred guineas for a ring
Or some such memorandum thing;
And truly much I should have blunder'd
Had I not given another hundred
To Vere, Earl Poulett's second son,
Who dearly loves a little fun.
Unto my nephew, Robert Longdon,
Of whom none says, he e'er has wrong done,
Tho' civil law he loves to hash,
I give two hundred pounds in cash.

One hundred pounds to my niece Tuder,
(With loving eyes one Matthew view'd her,)
And to her children, just among 'em,
A hundred more, and, not to wrong 'em,
In equal shares I freely give it,
Not doubting but they will receive it.
To Sally Crouch and Mary Lee,
If they with Lady Poulett be;
Because they round the year did dwell
In Twickenham House, and serv'd'd full well,
When Lord and Lady both did stray
Over the hills and far away:
The first ten pounds, the other twenty;
And, girls, I hope that will content ye.

In seventeen hundred sixty nine,
This with my hand I write and sign,
The sixteenth day of fair October,
In merry mood, but sound and sober;
Past my three score and fiftieth year,
With spirits gay and conscience clear;
Joyous and frolicsome, tho' old,
And, like this day, serene, but cold,
To friends well wishing, and to friends most kind,
In perfect charity with all mankind.

Original Poetry.

THE DYING YEAR.

As the sad lover with his mistress parted
In woe and weeping to a distant shore,
No voice awakens, bleeding, broken-hearted,
Save that which speaks to him of joys no more.
No eye, evasive of the common stare,
To gaze on one loved countenance alone,
As if it found the real ideal there,
A Phidias struck upon the breathing stone.
So, shade of the departing year, I weep,
Successive as thou fittest time annual round,
Some ling'ring loveliness into the deep
Evanish'd, at thy steps 'decaying sound;
And wish in vain the future may reveal
A part of what I've felt, but never more must feel!

STANZAS.

SPIRIT! the holiest,
Beaming bright,
Sweet are thy regions blest.
Slumber light
Grieves o'er my weary eyes
Flitting dreams
Pass with thy spirit by—
Brightly he gleams.
Skimming the lucid air,
Hovering o'er
His dead victims there,
Breathe no more!
Quickly the fatal shafts
Glancing above—
The poison this Spirit wrares
Is hopeless love.

The sleeping waters roll
In silence on—
The silence of a guilty soul
When hope is gone:
And on their chrystal side
A hly bows,
Steeping in the fairy tide
Her faster brows.
Beneath the hly's stem
A violet blows;
Rushing to part them
The dark wave flows:—
In the shade of the twilight
They pass away;
And the spirit takes flight
On the morning ray.
Sweetest! thou lovely one—
Light of my soul—
The torrent has now begun
Onward to roll;
Closer then clasp me,
Aye, to thine heart—
The torrent may rush, but we Never will part.

TO PEACE.

O PEACE!—thou cordial of the breast,
That giv'st the soul its wonted rest;
Sweet inmate, be my bosom's guest,
And I with thee,
Not caring for the world's alarms,
Serene will sleep, undisturb'd in thine arms
Most quietly!—

And when Aurora's rosy eye
Peeps out the golden eastern sky,
Unveiling heaven's canopy

In streets of light,
I'll gird my loins each passing day,
And journey on my lonely way
With calm delight!

And when I lay me down to sleep,
May gentle peace her vigils keep!
That sorrow oft hath made to weep

In sighs and tears,
Subduing every anxious weight
That bears on life's uncertain state,
Its doubts and fears!

HATT.

LINES

Written in consequence of an observation made by a young lady in the author, that it was to be lamented that the rose which she held had not been allowed to remain until it bloomed!
ALAS! 'tis not strange that that beautiful rose Should be plucked from its stem by an unfeeling breast,

For scarce half its beauties 'thas been led to disclose,

Or 'tis in its summer habiliments dress.

How oft do we find that the youth of the maid
Is blemished ere 'thas reached its bloom;
How oft do we find seeming virtue's a shade,
And that honour has sunk to the tomb.

The hand that can tear, and the heart that can wish

To draw innocence sweet from its duty,
Ought never to taste the enchantment and bliss
That is yielded by virtue and beauty.

May he, me's (who would pluck the sweet rose ere it bloom).

Taste the sweets which this life can bestow!
May he be neglected—nor mourn'd when en-tomb'd,

And, oh! in this life great be his woe.

Yet when his soul flies to its Maker above,
May his sins and his faults be forgiven;
And his sufferings, in this life, alone serve to prove
The justness and mercy of heav'n.—J. O. P.

The Drama.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Mr. Elliston is a bold man; he has not only ventured to deprive the little play-going world of its usual holiday amusement, a pantomime, but he has attempted to force upon the public as a substitute, a piece which is a disgrace to the theatre, and an insult to the feelings and understandings of the audience. This is the long promised, much prepared, Giovanni in Ireland,—an extravaganza as it is called, which may be described in two lines. In it

'Wisdom and wit are not seen,
But folly at full length.'

If a total absence of plot, incidents, humour, and sentiment, had been the only objections to this piece, we might have been disposed to pass a lenient judgment; but when, to the want of all these requisites for a drama, we add, that it is, in many places, grossly indecent,—that it is an insult to that religion which Ireland chiefly professes, we shall not be accused of ill-nature if we speak of it in terms of unmix'd severity. To describe the thing is difficult, for it was an incomprehensible jumble from beginning to end; and the scenes were so unconnected, that they might have occurred in any order which the scene-shifter pleased, without the slightest injury; or half of them might have been omitted without making any breach of the progress of the story.

The author, Mr. Moncrieff, had collected names of some of the powerful characters of Lady Morgan's Florence McCarthy, and Miss Edgeworth's novels, and the names only, for they were stripped of every portion of their spirit, and these were all made subservient to Giovanni and Leporello. At an early hour symptoms of disapprobation, 'not loud but deep,' manifested themselves in all parts of the house; and, but for the beautiful airs (for they were all wretched parodies,) it would never have got through the first act. The piece opened with a beautiful scene, a view of the Bay of Dublin by moonlight, and the arrival of the Holyhead packet at the Pigeon House, from which the hero landed, and the business of the opera commenced; and proceeded amidst evident signs of uneasiness in all parts of the house. On several occasions, when the impatience of the audience could no longer be controuled, but burst out and exhibited itself in cries of 'off!' and loud hisses, a beautiful air, warbled forth by Madame Vestris, Miss Povey, or Miss Cubit, procured their further forbearance; and thus, amidst alternate storms and calms, the piece reached the end of two long tedious acts, when in fact, Giovanni, the hero of the piece disappeared. The third act was entirely occupied by a grand pageant, representing the procession of the Knights of St. Patrick to the cathedral, and the ceremony of their installation; but even pageant seems to have had its day, for this, though splendid in scenery and decorations, could not even find toleration. The marriages which had been so long suppressed burst out in a storm, which had the effect of bringing the ceremonies of the cathedral to a very abrupt termination. The scene changed to a view of the pier and harbour of Dunleury, and the departure of the Royal George yacht, which was followed by a beautiful moving panoramic view of the coast scenery from Dunleury to Milford Haven, with the landing of the Sovereign at that place, with which the piece concluded. This really beautiful piece of scenery and mechanism, however, failed to create any impression in favour of the piece. The actors did all that could be done for it, but in vain, and the curtain fell amidst loud hisses. On Mr. Russell's coming forward to announce it for repetition, the cries of 'off,' and the efforts of friends, prevented a single word being heard. The afterpiece of Monsieur Tonson commenced, but the renewal of the uproar, and cries of 'Manager' rendered it totally inaudible. Mr. Russell again came forward and addressed the audience, entreating their indulgence for a repetition of the piece, when he treated many objection unavoidable on a first night's representation, would be removed. This address had the desired effect, and the farce was suffered to proceed.

On Monday night Giovanni in Ireland was repeated to a slender audience as ever graced a theatre on a Christmas holiday. Considerable entertainments, and some reformation had taken place; but it still remained such a piece of 'manity,' that the audience was decidedly against it.

We wish Mr. Elliston would get us tragedy, comedy, or farce,—even the farce of the author of Giocanni in Iceland, rather than such ridiculous mummery as he is now attempting to impose upon us;—and he must ultimately do so, for his treasury will bear evidence that will convince him his last extravaganzas is unpopular.

We are happy to hear that Miss Edmiston, who has played Jane Shore and Lady Macbeth with such great success, is studying the character of Belvidera, in which she will soon make her appearance. In speaking of this lady last week, we said she was twenty-five years of age; we find, however, that she has attained her great dramatic fame at the early age of twenty-one.

COVENT GARDEN.—After the performance of Virginies,—in which Mr. Macready, Mr. Abbott, and Miss Beaumont played the principal characters, amidst the noisy applauses of a crowded holiday good-natured audience, a new grand and comic pantomime, called Harlequin and Mother Bunch, or the Yellow Dwarf,¹ was played for the first time;—too often is there just cause to complain of the vaunting puffa of the play-bills, but here the piece is well and truly described. The story is taken from the tale of Mother Bunch, in which the Princess Allfair (Miss Dennett), has two lovers; one, the King of the Gold Mines (Mr. Ellar), and the other the Yellow Dwarf (Grimaldi), son of the Fairy of the Desert, Mother Bunch (Master Longhurst). The King of the Gold Mines is the favourite lover, afterwards transformed to Harlequin, and the Yellow Dwarf, the rejected, becomes the Clown. After various situations of difficulty, which by magic aid are happily surmounted, the piece closes with the union of the King of the Gold Mines and the Princess Allfair. In his adventures Harlequin is attended by a favourite lacquey, Guinea Pig (Mr. Grimaldi, jun.) whose remarks with Pantaloon (Mr. Barnas), and the pantomimic tribe afforded ample gratification to the lovers of fun and laughter; while the more sedate part of the audience were delighted with the ever-varying brilliancy of elegant, tasteful, and splendid scenery. Of this description is the bedchamber of the princess, the draperies of which are of the most elegant and costly kind; the castle, of polished steel, which is perhaps as tasteful, and noble a specimen of scenic representation, as ever graced a theatre; and the brilliant splendour of the Gold Mine must be most dazzling to those who find pleasure in the reflection of burnished gold, which here shone in every direction: even the wigs of the favoured inhabitants hung in brilliant golden tresses over their rich habiliments. One of our greatest pleasures in visiting a theatre at this season, is in beholding the delight so generally expressed by all around, and, upon this occasion, it seemed universal. The piece was much applauded and Harlequin and Mother Bunch will no doubt have crowded levees throughout the festival season.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—After the popular burletta of Tom and Jerry, which increases in attraction, an admirable comic pantomime was produced, founded on the well known story of The Beauty and the Beast, or Harlequin and the Magic Rose. The gambols of Paulo, as the clown, of W. Kirby, as Harlequin, with the graceful dancing of Miss Simpson, kept the house in continued merriment. The tricks were good and well managed, and the scenery excellent, particularly the last, the azure palace of the fairy Moonbeam, which was a most beautiful scene, and does great credit to the artist, Mr. Franklin.

SURREY THEATRE.—This favourite house opened on Wednesday night, with three new pieces. The first was a farcical burletta, called Jack in the Green, or the Family Punch Bowl, and seemed to give great pleasure to the good folks of the holidays. An interesting melodrama, by Mr. Ball, of Norwich, called Ugolino, or the Tower of Famine, followed, and the last piece was called Animal Sympathy. It is a most whimsical romance, and was admirably played. Several novelties are announced, which shew that the spirited manager of the Surrey will be able to compete with his theatrical rivals.

OLYMPIA THEATRE.—The treat prepared for the holiday-folk at this theatre, consisted, first, of Life in London, the part of Tom by an amateur, who played the character with spirit and effect; next, Rumfuskinn, which seemed to give universal delight; and, lastly, a new pantomime, entitled Harlequin Tatter'd and Torn, in which many excellent scenes were displayed, very creditable to the talents of the artists. A lady made her first appearance as Columbine, who danced with considerable skill, and was much applauded. The tricks wanted originality to recommend them; but, taken as a whole, the pantomime deserves commendation, and will well maintain its rank among the London Christmas amusements.

COBURN THEATRE.—The proprietor of this theatre has introduced a novelty,—a looking-glass curtain, which reflects his own folly, as well as that of the audience, in paying their money to witness such a ridiculous exhibition in a theatre. It is certainly splendid, and appeared to give approbation to an audience which has always been proverbial for its good nature and indulgence.

Literature and Science.

Signs of the Weather.—In general it may be taken for granted, that violent tempests seldom or never happen without previous indications of their approach: one of the most insidious, but at the same time most certain prognostics of an impending storm, is prettily well known to sailors by the name the "mackerel sky." The clouds appear dappled, (cyrrhus) and the sky is generally serene. If these dappled clouds either increase in magnitude and apparent density, or suddenly assume a different shape, a description, the storm is at hand; but if they seem to diminish and fade away, they foreshew settled weather. The halo or circle round the moon, another sore prognostic of bad weather, but it does not always precede a heavy gale; perhaps it more frequently denotes rain, but very often both wind and rain. The larger and broader the halo, the nearer is the bad weather. The streaky appearance of the high clouds (cirrus stratus) is another sign, and demonstrates that there is ready a strong gale in those regions, which, at no distant period, will sweep the lower part of the atmosphere. The aurora borealis makes its appearance, it is a sign of a gale from the opposite point, and the brighter the aurora the more severe will be the gale, which generally takes place within 36 hours at most; when the aurora is very brilliant, it denotes that the storm is not very far distant. Shooting or falling stars also indicate an approaching storm, and the more visible these meteors appear, the more dangerous is to be apprehended. Virgil notices this prognostic 2000 years ago, and the justness of his description has been proved thousands of times: Sape etiam stellis, vento independente, visis

*Præcipitis coelo labi, noctisque per umbram
Fluminarum longos a tergo albescere tractus.
When glowing stars are seen to glide,
With sparkling train through ether wide;
The watchful mariner will know,
That stormy winds will quickly blow.*

Mrs. Inchbald's Grave.—The remains of this celebrated lady, it is known, were deposited in the New Burying-ground attached to the parish church of Kensington; and there has just been placed over the grave a large and substantial but plain grave stone, with the following inscription: neither in the form of the stone, nor in the character of the letters, is there the least ornament:

Gloria in excelsis Deo.

(Then a Cross).

Sacred to the Memory of

ELIZABETH INCHBALD,

Whose writings will be cherished while Truth, Simplicity, and Feeling, command public admiration;

And whose retired and exemplary Life closed

She died August 1, 1821.

Aged 66 years.

Requiesce in peace!

The New Burying-ground is divided into compartments, which several divisions are numbered; and it may not be uninteresting to add, that at the end of Mrs. Inchbald's grave are the figures 142, and that it is next to the grave of George Charles Canning, eldest son of the Right Hon. George Canning, over which there is an elegant marble monument.

By an official return, laid before the Lord Mayor, of the christenings and burials, within and without the walls of the city of London, from Dec. 12, 1820, to Dec. 11, 1821, it appears that there have been christened—males, 13,072; females, 12,160; total, 25,232. Buried—males, 9,379; females, 9,079; total, 18,451. Whereof have died:—

The city of Metz, it appears, has been some time afflicted by one of these plagues of Egypt—viz. frogs. Several streets were found covered with these animals, and no one could imagine from whence they came, until a Marchande de Grenouilles (frog merchant) explained the mystery by applying to the tribunals and claiming his property. He had shut up six thousand frogs in the troughs and buckets of the fish-market, and several children, who discovered his dépôt, put every one at liberty. The frogs, delighted with freedom, spread themselves in every direction. They entered the houses, and the inhabitants could not relieve themselves from their visitors, without considerable trouble and difficulty.

When first the beer pumps were introduced in the bars of the country inns, they excited a great deal of curiosity amongst the bumpkins, and they used to be continually looking at, prying into, and handling them, as their slender knowledge of hydraulics did not enable them to comprehend the principle upon which they acted. This meddling sort of curiosity, greatly annoyed a Mr. Boniface, at a country inn, in the neighbourhood of London. By the bye, this same gentleman was considered within his own sphere, not only as a great wit, but a great poet also, and was famous for making verses, upon all extraordinary occasions; now this being considered as one of those great events worthy of his notice, he invoked the muses (over his pipe and his pot), and produced the following very elegant and classical couplets, which he printed on a board, and placed over the handles of his beer cocks, in order to prevent any further encroachments being made on them.

* Caution,

'Whoever preumes with these here cocks for to meddle,

Shall pay a pint of beer, that there is the riddle;
But whoever preumes these here cocks for to draw,

Shall pay a pot of beer, and that there is the law;

But if he does not pay that, he shall be sous'd
In the pond with the ducks,

And all this here comes of meddling with them
these here cocks.

Illuminating in Germany, alias Darkness Visible.—The following is from a German paper:—'In a placard, which the magistrates of Nieubury caused to be made public on the occasion of his Britannic Majesty's passage to Hanover, the following was noticed among other arrangements:—"The manner in which the inhabitants shall illuminate their houses is left to their own disposition; nevertheless, we would wish that every window looking over the street should be lighted with one candle at least. We should be glad that even two candles should be placed in each of the aforesaid windows. Such of the inhabitants as find it a hardship to purchase candles are invited to wait upon the burghmaster, who will defray the expense." What a splendid appearance the town of Nieubury must have presented, when every window had its little-farthing rushlight burning in honour of the Majesty of Britain!

Mr. Horne Tooke, on finishing his pamphlet, intitled the Two Pair of Portraits, thus concluded:—'The author now begs leave to propose two questions to his readers, which all men, he conceives, will in their closets answer in the same words.—You have here been presented with four portraits (merely an assemblage of known indisputable facts). First question—Which two of them will you choose to hang up in your cabinets, the PITTS or the FOXES? Second question—Where, on your consciences, should the other two be hanged?'

Epigram.

A Scotchman, delighted when Salomon's play'd,

Would tender his hand; 'But no,' Salomon said—

'Thou'rt fattier generally allance,
This mark of your kindness I needs must refuse!

My fiddle you like, and that's all very well,
But I'm not over partial to your's.'

TO READERS & CORRESPONDENTS.

Some of our readers will perhaps be disappointed in not finding a review of the Farmer, in our present number. To such we must observe that it is a part of the plan on which we set out, and to which we have faithfully adhered, to render every volume of our work complete in itself; and as we did not conceive we could do justice to the last production of the author of 'Waverley' in one number, we have deferred reviewing it until next week.

In addition to a copious review of the Firer, our first number for the new volume will contain reviews of Lord Byron's 'Cain, a Mystery,' and Lady Harriet's Letters, with such a variety of literary and scientific intelligence, as will, we trust, ensure us a large accession of subscribers.

We have received several communications which we shall notice in our next.
